

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2008 with funding from Microsoft Corporation

.

MORES CATHOLICI;

OR,

AGES OF FAITH.

BY

KENELM H. DIGBY.

VOLUME THE FIRST,

CONTAINING

BOOKS I., II., III., & IV.

NEW YORK:

P. O'SHEA, PUBLISHER.

45 WARREN STREET.

1888.

1367

12 12

BRIEF NOTICE OF THE AUTHOR.

ENELM HENRY DIGBY, author of this work, was born at Geashill, King's County, Ireland, A. D. 1800.

He was the youngest son of the Very Rev. William Digby, Protestant Dean of Clonfert. He came of a family that had enjoyed considerable ecclesiastical preferment: one of his ancestors was Protestant Bishop of Elphin, and another was Protestant Bishop of Dromore.

He was sent at a very early age to Trinity College, Cambridge, to complete his studies, and graduated as Bachelor of Arts in 1823.

He was a diligent, but discursive reader, as is evident from his varied and vast attainments. His works exhibit a variety and amount of erudition truly amazing. His acquaintance with Mediaeval customs and literature was altogether unequalled. His knowledge of Greek and Roman literature was, perhaps, no less extensive and profound. With all this accumulation of ancient and Mediaeval lore he combined an acquaintance with the modern literatures of Europe, which, alone, would seem to require a lifetime to obtain.

But these vast stores of knowledge, and the happy art of using them appropriately and felicitously, did not constitute his sole claim to the world's attention. He united a high poetic with a profound philosophic faculty. This rare union fitted him for the examination and discussion of the most elevated subjects. His early studies in scholastic theology enabled him to see the errors of Protestantism, and soon after his graduation at Cambridge he became a Catholic.

A short time before this, when he was yet but twenty-two years old, he published the first edition of The Broadstone of Honor. This famous book, on the “origin, spirit, and institutions of Christian chivalry,” extorted the praise, even, of critics who had but little sympathy with Mediæval institutions, and was heartily welcomed and extolled by the historian Arnold, and the poet Wordsworth.

The subject of Wordsworth’s beautiful poem—The Armenian Lady’s Love—is taken from the fourth book of The Broadstone of Honor. Wordsworth dedicated the poem to Digby, “as an acknowledgment, however unworthy, of pleasure and instruction derived from his numerous and valuable writings illustrative of the piety and chivalry of the olden time.”

In 1831, appeared the first volume of his Mores Catholici; or, Ages of Faith. It was published in eleven duodecimo volumes; the last of which appeared in 1840. It was reprinted in 1845-47 in three volumes, royal octavo.

It may be safely affirmed that this great work has made its author’s name immortal. No other work in our language—we believe we may say with perfect truth, no other work in any language—presents so completely, so felicitously from every point of view, the claims of the Catholic Church to the veneration, love and obedience of every existing human being. It may be said to be a picture of the life of the Christian world so accurately photographed, that no feature is wanting that could be required to give due expression to the whole, in which the portraiture is so faithful that the inner life is expressed as well as the outer semblance.

The humility, the devotion, the greatness, the learning, the genius of the man are all displayed in this incomparable work. In producing it, he evidently placed under contribution the principal libraries of Europe and Asia, and invested the knowledge garnered from these sources with charms peculiarly his own; charms which exhibit the genius of the poet, the acuteness of the philosopher, the comprehensiveness of the statesman, and the holiness and purity of the saint.

His Comptum; or, The Meeting of the Ways at the Catholic Church, was published in seven duodecimo volumes, 1848—54.

A second edition of this excellent work with additions appeared in 1855.

From this time forward until his death he wrote and published the following works:

- I. The Lover's Seat.—Kathemerina or Common Things in Relation to Beauty, Virtue and Faith. London, 1856. 2 vols.
- II. The Children's Bower ; or, What You Like. London, 1858, 2 vols.
- III. Evenings on the Thames ; or, Serene Hours and What They Require. London, 1860. 2 vols.
- IV. The Chapel of St. John ; or, a Life of Faith in the XIXth Century, London, 1861. Second Edition, 1863.
This was a memorial to his deceased wife.
- V. Short Poems. London, 1865. Second Edition, London, 1866.
- VI. A Day on the Muse's Hill. London, 1867.
- VII. The Sales and Transfers of Shares in Companies, etc. London, 1868.
- VIII. Little Low Bushes (Poem). London, 1869.
- IX. Halcyon Hours (Poem). London, 1870.
- X. Ouranagaia (A Poem). London, 1871.
- XI. Hours with the First Falling Leaves (in verse). London, 1873.
- XII. Last Year's Leaves (in verse). London, 1873.
- XIII. The Temple of Memory (A Poem). London, 1874.
- XIV. The Epilogue to Previous Works in Prose and Verse. London, 1876.

He died at his residence, Shaftesbury House, Kensington, March 22, 1880, in the 81st year of his age.

The American publisher hopes to receive sufficient encouragement to enable him to reproduce all Digby's works, in a uniform edition, worthy of their great merit.

NEW YORK, January, 1888.

SUMMARY.

BOOK I.

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCTION, stating the origin and design of the Work—The general interest attached to the history of the middle ages, and the opinion of certain modern writers respecting them—They were ages of faith—The advantage of the proposed course—The importance generally of instruction by examples—Its particular advantage in the case of Christians—Religion intimately connected with history—Such retrospects especially valuable to those who live in countries that have lost the faith—England retains a fondness for the association of Christian antiquity—The inconsistency of directing studies solely to classical literature—The claims of the middle ages upon general attention—From what sources the matter of these books will be drawn, and what style will be adopted—The objection that it is only a system, stated and answered, as also that which accuses it of not following a plan sufficiently defined—Remarks upon the real objections to which it may be liable p. 9

CHAPTER II.

The novelty of the truth announced respecting the beatitude of the poor in spirit—The reception of this doctrine in ages of faith—How delivered by holy writers—How far corresponding with the sentences of ancient sages—The evils and wretchedness of the rich, and the dangers consequent upon riches—How religion consoled the poor, and forced its wisdom upon the secular society—The political condition of the poor in the middle ages not so unfavorable as is supposed—The spiritual advantages of poverty—The opinion of some ancient sages—The practice of the Christian society—The devotion of the poor, and the influence which they exerted upon the manners of society. p. 40

CHAPTER III.

How the riches of the Church were consistent with poverty of spirit—The origin of ecclesiastical property—The spirit with which it was acquired, and the purposes to which it was applied—Examples to illustrate the latter. p. 60

CHAPTER IV.

The humble spirit of ages of faith one cause why they are despised by the moderns—Ages and nations, as well as men individually, must follow the type either of religion or of the world—The whole character of Christian antiquity reduced to the former—The doctrine on this head thus was taught, and the manners resulting from it—The humility of the learned—What traces of this were found in the sages of antiquity—The humble heroism of ages of faith—The absence of great excitement in matters of earthly interest, and the content with which men remained in their natural station—The horror with which pride was regarded. p. 70

CHAPTER V.

A glance at the spirit of chivalry in the middle ages, and an admission that it may be noted as deficient in humility; it can only be defended as one of the many forms of a Catholic life in these ages—The danger consequent upon the love of honor—The vanity of human honor; and of the attempt of some modern writers to exalt it as a pure self-existent principle—In ages of faith, honor may have been gained with humility—The remarks of St. Theresa upon worldly honor—The evils consequent upon the excessive susceptibility of the chivalrous nature; how this is evinced in many heathen portraits—The misery and guilt of the manners resulting from it—The same delicacy productive of error in pushing virtues to extravagance—The disposition to revenge only overcome by the constant action of the Catholic religion—The misery of these passions protracted to age—The danger resulting from the importance attached to nobility, and even from the generous qualities of the chivalrous nature—Its only safety was in complete submission to the religious doctrine. . . . p. 79

CHAPTER VI.

The influence of poverty of spirit upon the authors of books in the middle ages—The vain motives of the generality of heathen writers—The contrast to these in ages of faith—With what object the monastic chronicles were written—Their humility—These books often anonymous—Fame not the object—The obscurity of their authors' lives—The vanity of human fame—The style of the monastic writings; its modesty, stability, and playfulness, not recommended by pompous titles; its simplicity and liability to be misinterpreted by the moderns; the innocence of these authors, and love of truth—The ascetical writers; remarks upon their style, its connection with their lives and spirit of sacrifice; its literary merits. . . . p. 92

CHAPTER VII.

The first beatitude answers to the mind of youth—Education with the ancients; with the moderns—Education in ages of faith—Illustrations from ancient books—Care bestowed upon the infant mind—The respect with which youth was treated from a reference to the infancy of our Saviour—The meditations of St. Bonaventura—The sanctity ascribed to youth; its character in secular life—In religious life—Introductory remarks—The advantages of the system of education in ages of faith—Examples from ancient chronicles—The testimony of reason to the beauty and excellence of ancient discipline—The Io of Euripides—The piety of youth exemplified in an ancient story. . . . p. 104

CHAPTER VIII.

Happiness the end of man—The transports which rewarded the humble; their cheerfulness—Humility a source of joy—The irony which belonged to faith and love—The repose and peace consequent upon the absence of vanity, and upon the will being made conformable with the divine will—Humility secured delight by causing men to seek no exclusion of participants in good—Hopes arose from poverty and weakness—Humility rendered men patient when deprived of spiritual refreshment, and enabled them to estimate the advantage of being left without it; poverty of spirit a source of consolation in calamity; the only resource to support men of delicate and susceptible natures, which must, if left without it, become intolerably wretched—Conclusion: that these ages were eminently characterized by humility, and rich in the qualification for the first beatitude. . . . p. 135

SUMMARY.

BOOK II.

CHAPTER I.

The meekness of manners in ages of faith; their courtesy arising from religion; the gracious benignity of holy men, evinced in their address, in their writings, in their relation with the world; it gave a character to their countenances; the beauty of the Christian portraits; the influence of religious meekness upon the exterior features; beauty ascribed to an internal excellence—The mild and humble manners which chivalry acquired from religion, examples from history and from fable—The romance of Gyron le Courtois—The kindness shown to strangers and to the poor—Meekness and benignity necessarily a characteristic of the Christian manners in all ages p.163

CHAPTER II.

The principle of religious obedience in relation to the meek; the importance ascribed to it; obedience was the test of piety and the rule of genius—The origin of this duty—The neglect of it caused the fall of man in Paradise—The consequences of self-will exposed by ancient writers—Men are constituted by nature to obey—The obedience of the world is that of cupidity or of necessity; that of Christians is the free obedience of charity—Their service is a free offering; their will must be free—The moral dignity arising from religious obedience; all despotism excluded from Christian authority, which rested upon mutual love—The happiness resulting to the social order from obedience; the evils consequent upon neglecting it in spiritual relations; the misery introduced by disobedience; it is the source of all heresy; the confusion to which this gave rise p. 181

CHAPTER III.

The delight experienced on returning to contemplate the Church—What a new view of history it unfolds—The Catholic Church distinguished from all the Churches of heretics; furnished a universal remedy for all the wants and miseries of men—The connection between meekness and the means employed by God to preserve its unity—The supremacy of St. Peter and of the Roman See—The language of the Fathers respecting Rome—The testimony to the spiritual greatness of Rome furnished by genius, learning, philosophy, the science of the saints, the judgment of the intelligent in past ages; the doctrine of Christian antiquity on this point—The reverence with which the sovereign pontiffs were treated; remarkably evinced in the worst ages—The relation of the Church to the civil government—The temporal power with which bishops were invested—What was the fact respecting the false decretals—The two powers always distinct but directed to one end—The lessons given to princes respecting their authority—Instances of the oppression of the ecclesiastical liberties by the temporal power—The Ghibellines—The controversy respecting the investitures, and the memorable scenes to which it gave rise—The Gallicans, and the consequences of their opposition—The Machiavellian policy of modern governments—The despotism of Louis XIV—The real freedom of nations endangered by the modern doctrines—The popular opposition as dangerous and unjust as that of tyrants—The Gallican liberties are servitudes; the Church essentially free—The advantages which resulted to society from its influence on governments p. 195

CHAPTER IV.

The temporal government in relation to the principles of the meek—Obedience and freedom secured; authority respected by the people, and supported by religion—Origin of the prayers of the Church for kings; all degrees of authority respected; all social distinctions implied services; rule not the object of universal ambition—Gravity of the magisterial character and of the tone of government—The duties of the magistrates, and their manners in ages of faith; examples—The instructions which they received—The sovereign dignity; its origin and establishment—The provisions made against a tyranny; the political notion of a king in the middle ages—Provisions for legislative redress: the Christian king was not a despot but had his council—The character of men who belonged to it—Their abhorrence of flattery; how they were loved by the kings whom they corrected—The objection founded on the non-intervention of the Commons considered—The interest of the majority was always to be consulted, according to the doctrine of government then taught—Religion the basis of government—The sentiments of the ancients were conformable to this doctrine—The object of government was religious—The change which has taken place in legislation; legality not always justice—The civil legislation was to co-operate with the ecclesiastical—The science of legislation with Catholics was simply Christian; honor essential to the art of reigning—The protection of the clergy; their influence—The legislative wisdom of the middle ages—The character of kings themselves—The great number of truly Christian kings—The testimony of St. Thomas—The virtue of these kings; the love which their subjects entertained for them; conclusion that meekness is the only secure policy p. 223

CHAPTER V.

The general character of a Catholic state in relation to the consequences of meek obedience—The spirit of freedom which belonged to it—The maintenance of domestic liberty; how the founders of Christian states had to contend against the evils of the former pagan society—The astonishing unity which characterized them—The people exercised an acknowledged and effectual power—The ancient capitularies prove this—In what light the people are regarded by a Catholic state—In what light by a Protestant—The doctrine of the schoolmen—The errors of the moderns in exaggerating or diminishing the popular influence, in what light the people were regarded by the Church—The objections founded upon the absence of constant political debates considered—The evils that attend a government by assemblies; how the Christian philosophy tended to preserve society from their license—The sentiments of the ancient sages respecting popular assemblies and orators—The influence of the great judicial and legislative councils in states during the ages of faith—In what manner the popular voice was consulted—The modern notions of a public opinion not then entertained; the danger of this rule; the judgment of Socrates—Catholics most exposed to the danger of its influence—The objection founded on the supposed inactivity of the ages of faith considered—What was the spirit of industry in them, and in modern times, how regard must be had here to the two philosophies—The consequences of each—The commerce of the middle ages; the religious and even poetic character belonging to it—The consistency which characterized the ancient Catholic state; its settled composure; its regard to old customs; it was the most natural of all states; it had a love for past times; it was united as one man; its security founded on virtue; hence the censorship which it established upon literature and the arts; its creative spirit; the doubts of modern writers unjustified—The modern opinions respecting the progress of society considered—What is the true judgment on this subject—The abuses and injustice of the civil government in modern times—Meekness, freedom, union, and moral dignity characterized the ancient Catholic state. . . . p. 262

CHAPTER VI.

In what manner the institution and privileges of nobility were compatible with the meekness which is ascribed to the middle ages—The feudal system; all classes of subjects enjoyed privileges; towns, trades, and ages had their privileges—The principle of nobility not an invention of the middle ages—The testimony of the Holy Scriptures in its favor—The sentiments of the Fathers respecting it, and those of the ancients—The interests of the Christian nobility were connected with those of the poor; instances of its regard for them—The sentiments of the middle ages less favorable to the pride of birth than is generally supposed—The importance of forming a right estimate of the advantages of nobility—Examples of nobles in the ages of faith—That the grandeur of their castles is no proof of their pride—A visit to the feudal castle; its position, architecture, and decoration—Its chapel—Circumstances of the castle life; how it was reconcileable with piety and meekness, which is all that we have to demonstrate p. 296

CHAPTER VII.

The various associations among the lower ranks of the state in ages of faith depending upon meekness—The spirit of the Catholic Church is eminently social, and opposed to isolation—The pride of the moderns is destructive of associations—The fraternities of the middle ages; their constitutions; the patrons—The religious and even poetic character assumed by trades; commerce was made instrumental to objects of religion; and not allowed to interfere with its duties—The character of men in trade during the ages of faith—The examples of St. Eloy—Conclusion. p. 331

SUMMARY.

BOOK III.

CHAPTER I.

In what sense the meek were to possess the earth—Religion conduced to the rise, augmentation, and dignity of cities, to the preservation of their ancient monuments, and to the style of their construction and adornment—The beauty of the Christian cities in ages of faith—The holy images, memorials of saints, and inscriptions, in cities—The manners of the ancient city life—Cities like holy places, notwithstanding the riches which they possessed—The moral features peculiar to some—The contrast which all presented to the cities of heathen times—Instances of the general idea which prevailed of the sanctity of cities—The religious character of their festivities, and even of their traffic, as in the institution of fairs—The fair of St. Denis and that of St. Mark—Hermits used to be seen in cities on great festivals, and used to live near and even within them—The scenery and monument which generally surrounded cities—How the Christian memorials in cities are fast perishing—How their glory in ages of faith forms their chief present interest p. 347

CHAPTER II.

The vast number of churches and other beautiful monuments which were erected in the ages of faith—The churches of the first Christians, those of the empire, and those constructed after the barbarians had founded new kingdoms—The cathedrals of the middle ages—By what means they were raised—The devotion of the people, the munificence of kings and private persons, the zeal of the clergy—The substitution of these works for the canonical penance—The spirit in which they were erected—The site of churches determined by events connected with faith—That of the heathen temples also seized and sanctified, sometimes changed, for objects of convenience—The ceremonies observed at the building—The dedication—The spirit in which all this proceeded—The position of churches—The symbolical sense—Their exterior—The bells—Their interior—The advantage of its grandeur—The beauty and interest of the ancient churches—The pavement and its lore—Corners for retirement—Cells for recluses—The altar; its decoration and riches—The offerings made towards it—The relics—The antiquity of this devotion—Their translation—The memorials of antiquity in churches—The ex voto figures—The images and paintings—State of the fine arts in the middle ages—Antiquity of the Christian use of paintings and images, and the grounds on which it was justified against the Iconoclast—The love which men entertained for churches—Accounted for by the end to which they were devoted—The sanctuaries p. 399

CHAPTER III.

How the meek possessed the beauties and advantages of the natural world—How all creatures were objects of their love—Great enterprises to aid material interests—Preservation of Forests, love of agriculture—Men subjects, not citizens—Yet nature alone was felt to be not sufficient—How the Catholic religion sanctified it—The testimony of the moderns themselves—Oratories, images, Calvaries, and crosses, erected to sanctify the visible nature—Places of pilgrimage—Their origin and use—Isolated crosses—Why they were venerated—The happiness of the meek in relation to the earth p. 448

CHAPTER IV.

How the earth supplied intellectual riches—Of poetry, and the advantage to be derived from it—Adopted by the holy Fathers, many of whom cultivated it—How it was favored by the secular clergy and by monks—Cultivated by the people—Loved with enthusiasm by all classes—Meekness conduced to this—Poetry cultivated by the feudal nobles—Character of the poetry of the middle ages—Its power upon minds—Its religious tone—Shakespeare, Dante, Tasso, St. Avitus—The old French poets—Their merit—Their idea of the end and nature of poetry—Their own lives—Dramatic poetry—The mysteries p. 512

CHAPTER V.

On what ground the riches of learning were possessed by Christians—How it was prized, and cultivated, and extended, by means of the Church—The learning of the clergy secular and regular—The ancient libraries—The labor and spirit of the monks in writing books—Their attention to the vulgar tongue, to history, and to every branch of learning—The care with which manuscripts were preserved, and the enthusiasm with which the invention of printing was hailed—How great the love for learning—The learning of the laity—General character of the learning of the middle ages—Summary of the literature of France from the fifth to the tenth century—Why the sciences are more cultivated by the moderns, who are naturally more averse to historical, religious, and moral studies—Glance at the modern learning—Yet in point of science, the books of the middle ages remarkable—The scholastic doctors as naturalists—The scholastic theology—General style of the writers of the middle age—Their Latinity—Influence of the Catholic religion on the study of heathen literature—The character of learning in application to secular objects—The study of medicine and of law p. 540

CHAPTER VI.

Rise and progress of the Christian schools—Monastic and secular, parochial and metropolitan—Establishment of universities—Their privileges and honors—The advantages of the monastic schools—General character of the ecclesiastical school—Their discipline—Their dignified and holy aspect—Manners of their students—Their zeal for learning—The mode of instruction—Object of the universities—Founded by religion for the poor—The evils attending them—Dignity and happiness of the ancient scholastic life p. 600

CHAPTER VI

Friendship belonged to the meek—How it was promoted by the Catholic religion, by the principles and manners of the meek—The friendships of chivalry—Those of the religious society—Spiritual friendship—Summary of the evidence that the meek possessed the earth p. 637

SUMMARY.

BOOK IV.

CHAPTER I.

The history of the ages of faith in relation to blessed mourning—Objectors reminded that religion does not obtrude melancholy themes upon men—The mourning of the world truly great in all ages; exemplified in the writings of ancient and modern times . . . p. 655

CHAPTER II.

Joy and cheerfulness the pervading spirit of the ages of faith—The Catholic religion excludes melancholy—Examples and sentiments of monks, pilgrims, the holy fathers, and of the poets of the world during the middle ages—Yet mourning belonged to the blessed race—What kind of mourning—The mourning of nature—The mourning of wisdom—The mourning of love . . . p. 663

CHAPTER III.

The mourning of piety—The necessity for affliction in the spiritual life; how it was sanctified—The contrast to heathen sentiments; examples of the former, and of Christians—Louis-le-Gros—Pélisson—Piety mourned by reason of the contemplation of heaven, and the remembrance of sin, of a regard for humanity in general, and of a view of the evils which are in the world—The insensibility of the crowd—The desolation of heresy and of false Christians—Why Catholics must mourn more than other men from loving order and knowing truth—The mourning of converts, from the new view of history which opens on them, and from the loss of former friends—The mourning caused by sympathy with all members of the city of God—The mourning from contemplating the Passion of Christ . . . p. 679

CHAPTER IV.

The mourning of penitents, that the spirit of self-sacrifice was unknown to the heathens—The advantages of abstinence discerned by the ancients—The Christian doctrine of penance—The severe principles of early ages—What subsequent abuse was corrected . . . p. 698

CHAPTER V.

The pilgrimages of penitents, and their mourning—The origin of their appointment by the Church—Opinion of the ancient saints—The advantages of travel recognized by the heathen philosophers—Grounds and utility of Christian pilgrimages—Examples of those of the middle ages—That of St. Paula—The sufferings and mournings of pilgrims—The journeys of our Lord—The holy and dignified character of the ordinary traveller in ages of faith; the difficulties he had to encounter—The penitential spirit of the Crusaders—The manners prescribed to pilgrims—What assistance was afforded them on the way—Hospitals and inns—The protection afforded to travellers by the Holy See—Their entertainment recommended—The spirit of hospitality—The interest attached to the pilgrim: how far due—His character; his sentiments illustrated from the Chronicle of Nicole—The mourning which belonged to his observation of the world p. 710

CHAPTER VI.

The mourning consequent upon death—The character of death had been changed by the resurrection of Christ—The aspect during ages of faith the same in youth as in old age—The mourning attached to sickness—The state of sickness also changed—The language addressed to the sick—The utility of sickness recognized by the heathen philosophers—The Christian consolations for the sick—The manners of the sick in ages of faith—The comforts afforded them by the Church p. 752

CHAPTER VII.

The thought of death familiar to men in ages of faith—Why this was so—What grounds for mourning at the thought of death—The speedy judgment which follows it attested by visions—St. Augustin's opinion respecting them—The mourning for death as a punishment, as having been endured by Christ, as the prelude to judgment—Terrors of an evil death—The death of the saints—Examples from the chronicles of the middle ages; general remarks upon them; uniformity of observances; the reception of ashes; the use of the cross; aspect of the body; assumption of the religious habit—Moral characteristics of death in the middle ages; its fore-knowledge and supernatural announcement; examples—The suddenness of many holy deaths—Doctrine of the ages of faith on this head—The steadfast hope and tranquillity of men in death—Their last words—Administration of the last sacrament—The dying frankly warned of their danger—Modern opinion on this head—Zeal in assisting the dying—Remarkable narratives connected with it—The mourning of survivors, and their consolations—The passing bell—The burial—What was the doctrine respecting its importance—Custom of the first Christians—The form of burial, monastic, episcopal, collegiate, royal, and secular—What mourning was allowed at funerals by the canons p. 775

CHAPTER VIII.

The comfort reserved for mourning survivors—Prayer for the dead; its origin; anniversaries; the office of the dead—Doctrine of the Church; customs derived from it—Alfred's prayer p. 815

CHAPTER IX.

The zeal of mourners in erecting tombs over the dead—Customs of the first Christians in choice of locality—The catacombs of Rome—What was thought respecting burial in holy ground, and why it was desirable—When the dead were first buried in churches—Variation of discipline—What the canons prescribed—Style of sepulchral inscriptions—Those in the primitive and middle ages—Examples; the symbols and imagery of their tombs—Cemeteries—Destruction of ancient monuments by political and heretical insanity in latter ages—Modern cemeteries. p. 822

CHAPTER X.

The argument recapitulated—The happiness of mourners—Objections drawn from history answered—The prosperity of the wicked shown to be their punishment—Conclusion, p. 838

MORES CATHOLICI;

OR,

AGES OF FAITH.

BOOK I.

MORES CATHOLICI;

OR,

AGES OF FAITH.

THE FIRST BOOK.

CHAPTER I.

N the third stage of this mortal course, if midway be the sixth, and on the joyful day which hears of the great crowd that no man could number, I found me in the cloister of an abbey, whither I had come to seek the grace of that high festival. The hour was day's decline; and already had "Placebo Domino," been sung in solemn tones, to usher in the hours of special charity for those who are of the suffering church. A harsh sound from the simultaneous closing of as many books, cased in oak and iron, as there were voices in that full choir, like a sudden thunder-crash, announced the end of that ghostly vesper. The saintly men one by one slowly walked forth, each proceeding to his special exercise. Door then shutting after door gave long echoes, till all was mute stillness, and I was left alone under cloistered arches, to meditate on the felicity of blessed spirits, and on the desire which presses both the living and the inmates of that region in which the soul is purged from sinful stain, to join their happy company. Still methought I heard them sing of the bright and puissant angel ascending from the rising of the sun, and of the twelve times twelve thousand that were signed; and of the redeemed from every nation and people and language; and of the angels who stood around the throne in Heaven. It seemed now as if I heard a voice like that which said to Dante, "What thou hearest was sung, that freely thou mightest open thy heart to the waters of peace, that flow diffused from their eternal fountain." What man is there so brutish and senseless to things divine, as not to have sometimes experienced an interval like that which is described by him who sung of Paradise, to whom the world appeared as if stretched far below his feet, and who saw this globe,

So pitiful of semblance, that perforce
It mov'd his smiles; and him in truth did hold
For wisest, who esteems it least; whose thoughts
Elsewhere are fix'd, him worthiest call'd and best ?*

But soon the strained sense will sink back to it; for the human spirit must perforce accomplish in the first place its exercise in that school which is to prepare it for the home that it anticipates above. Yet I felt not disconsolate, nor forgetful, of the bright vision. My thoughts were carried backwards to ages which the muse of history had taught me long to love; for it was in the obscure and lowly middle-time of saintly annals that multitudes of these bright spirits took their flight from a dark world to the Heavens. The middle ages, then I said, were ages of highest grace to men; ages of faith; ages when all Europe was Catholic; when vast temples were seen to rise in every place of human concourse to give glory to God, and to exalt men's souls to sanctity; when houses of holy peace and order were found amidst woods and desolate mountains, on the banks of placid lakes as well as on the solitary rocks in the ocean: ages of sanctity which witnessed a Bede, an Alcuin, a Bernard, a Francis, and crowds who followed them as they did Christ: ages of vast and beneficent intelligence, in which it pleased the Holy Spirit to display the power of the seven gifts, in the lives of an Anselm, a Thomas of Aquinum, and the saintly flock whose steps a cloister guarded: ages of the highest civil virtue; which gave birth to the laws and institutions of an Edward, a Lewis, a Suger: ages of the noblest art, which beheld a Giotto, a Michael Angelo, a Raffaello, a Dominichino: ages of poetry, which heard an Avitus, a Cædmon, a Dante, a Shakespeare, a Calderon: ages of more than mortal heroism, which produced a Tancred, and a Godfrey: ages of majesty, which knew a Charlemagne, an Alfred, and the sainted youth who bore the lily: ages too of England's glory, when she appears not even excluding a comparison with the eastern empire, as the most truly civilized country on the globe; when the Sovereign of the greater portion of the western world applied to her schools for instructors; when she sends forth her saints to evangelize the nations of the north, and to diffuse spiritual treasure over the whole world; when heroes flocked to her courts to behold the models of reproachless chivalry, and Emperors leave their thrones to adore God at the tombs of her martyrs! as Dante says,

No tongue
So vast a theme could equal, speech and thought
Both impotent alike.

In a little work which embodied the reflections, the hopes, and even the joys, of youthful prime, I once attempted to survey the middle ages in relation to chivalry; and though in this we had occasion to visit the cloister, and to hear as a stranger who tarries but a night the counsels of the wise and holy, we never were able to regard the house of peace as our home; we were soon called away from it to return to the world and to the courts of its Princes. Now I propose to commence a course which is more peaceful and unpretending, for it only supposes that one has left the world, and withdrawn from these vain phantoms of honor, and of glory, which distract so often the morning of man's day. Thus we read that in youth many have left the cloister, dazzled by the pomp and circumstances of a wild, delusive chivalry, who after a little while have hastened back to it, moved by a sense of earthly vanity, there

*Cary's Dante.

To finish the short pilgrimage of life,
Still speeding to its close on restless wing. *

Yes, all is vanity but to love and serve God! Men have found by long experience that nothing but divine love can satisfy that restless craving which ever holds the soul, "finding no food on earth:" that every beauty, every treasure, every joy, must, by the law which rules contingency, vanish like a dream! and that there will remain for every man sooner or later, the gloom of a dark and chaotic night, if he is not provided with a lamp of faith. Those men, who, reasoning, went to depth profoundest, came to the same conclusion; they found that the labors of the learned and the visions of the poet were not of their own nature different in this respect, from the pleasures of sense:

'Tis darkness all; or shadow of the flesh,
Or else it's poison.

This was their experience. That labor of the mind, or that fond ideal ecstasy, did not necessarily secure the one thing needful, the love of Jesus. In a vast number of instances it led to no substantial good; its object was soon forgotten, or the mind recurred to the performance with a sense of its imperfections. Still the heart cried, Something more! What said they can be given to it? What will content it? Fresh labor? fresh objects? Ah, they had already begun to suspect how little all this would avail; for in hearkening to "the saintly soul, that shows the world's deceitfulness to all who hear him," they had learned to know that it might indeed be given to their weakness to feel the cruel discord, but not to set it right; to know that it was but a vain delusive motive which would excite them to exertion from a desire of pleasing men; for men pass rapidly with the changing scene of life, and the poor youth who, mistaking the true end of human labor, had fondly reckoned upon long interchange of respect and friendship, at the moment when his hopes are the brightest and his affections warmed into ecstasy, wakens, suddenly from his sweet protracted dream, and finds himself without honor, without love, without even a remembrance, and virtually in as great solitude as if he were already in his grave! Well might they shudder at the thought of this eternal chillness, this spiritual isolation, this bitter and unholy state! Truly it was fearful, and something too much for tears! Sweet Jesus, how different would have been their state if they had sought only to love and serve thee! for thy love alone can give rest and comfort to the heart, a sure and lasting joy:—

* Dante, Purg. XX.

————— other good

There is, where man finds not his happiness;

It is not true fruition; not that blest

Essence of every good, the branch and root.

Changed then be the way and object of our research, and let the converse to that which formerly took place hold respecting our employment here; and if we shall again meet with knights and the world's chivalry, let it be only in the way of accident, and as it were from the visit of those who pass near our spot of shelter, and let our place of rest from henceforth be in the forest and the cell. Times there are when even the least wise can seize a constant truth, that the heart must be devoted either all to the world, or all to God. When they too will pray, and make supplications urged with weeping, that the latter may be their condition in the mortal hour, that they may secure the rest of the saints for eternity.

Returning to that cloisteral meditation, how many, thought I, throughout the whole world have heard this day the grounds and the consummation of the saint's felicity! how many have been summoned onward! and told that the steps were near, and that now the ascent might be without difficulty gained? and yet,

A scanty few are they, who, when they hear

Such tidings, hasten. O ye race of men!

Though born to soar, why suffer ye a wind

So slight to baffle ye?*

But for those who seemed to feel how sweet was that solemn accent, eight times sung, which taught them who were blessed! would it not be well, when left alone, and without distraction, if they were to take up histories and survey the course which has been trod by saintly feet, and mark, as if from the soul-purifying mount, the ways and works of men on earth, keeping their eyes with fixed observance bent upon the symbol there conveyed, so as to mark how far the form and acts of that life, in ages past, of which there are still so many monuments around them, agreed, not with this or that modern standard of political and social happiness and grandeur, but with what by heaven's suffrance gives title to divine and everlasting beatitude? Such a view would present a varied and immense horizon, comprising the manners, institutions, and spirit of many generations of men long gone by: we should see in what manner the whole type and form of life were Christian, although its detail may have been often broken and disordered; for instance, how the pursuits of the learned, the consolations of the poor, the riches of the Church, the exercises and dispositions of the young, and the common hope and consolation of all men, harmonized with the character of those that sought to be poor in spirit; how, again, the principle of obedience, the constitution of the Church, the division of ministration, and the rule of government, the manners and institutions of society, agreed with meekness and inherited its recompence; further, how the sufferings of just men, and the provisions for a penitential spirit were in accordance with the state of those that were to mourn and weep, then how the character of men in sacred order, the zeal of the laity, and the lives of all ranks, denoted the hunger and thirst after justice: again, how the institutions, the foundations, and the recognized principle of perfection proclaimed men merciful: moreover, how the philosophy which prevailed, and the spiritual monuments which were raised by piety and genius, evinced the clean of heart; still further, how the union of nations, and the bond of peace which existed even amidst savage discord, wars, and confusion; as also how the holy retreats for innocence which then everywhere abounded, marked the multitude of pacific men: and, finally, how the advantage taken of dire events, and the acts of saintly and heroic fame, revealed the spirit which shunned not suffering for sake of justice.

* DANTE, Parad. XII. Cary's transl.

But very lately a distinguished professor in the Academy of Paris, admitted, in the course of his lessons upon history, that it would be in vain to deny the present tendency of the public mind to recur with pleasure to the traditions, manners, and monuments of the middle age. He proceeded to point out the advantage of nourishing that taste for the poetical history of his country, which would result from mere historical impartiality. "Is it not something," he asked, "to have a new source of emotions and pleasure opened to the imaginations of men? All this long period, all this old history, where men used to see nothing but absurdity and barbarism, becomes rich for us in grand memorials, noble events, and sentiments which inspire the most lively interest. It is a domain restored to those who feel that need of emotion and sympathy which nothing can stifle in our nature. Imagination plays an immense part in the life of men and nations. To occupy it, to satisfy it, there must be either an actual and energetic passion, like that which animated the eighteenth century, and the revolution, or else a rich and varied spectacle of remembrance; the present alone, the present, passionless, calm and regular, cannot suffice to the human soul. Hence the importance and the charm of the past, of those national traditions, and of all that part of the life of nations, when the imagination can wander through a space far wider than the limits of real life. The school of the eighteenth century was guilty more than once, of this error, in not understanding the part which the imagination performs in the life of men and of society. It attacked and decried all that was ancient, and all that was eternal—history and religion—that is to say, it wished to rob men of the past and the future, to concentrate them in the present ;” so that, conversely to what was prescribed by the Church, they should neither “meditate on the days of old, nor have in mind the eternal years.”

The justice of this estimate of the present tendency of men’s thoughts, would also be admitted by Lamartine ; who, however, it must be remembered, is the poet of hope—for he has said that Dante is the poet of our epoque. But however this may be, it is impossible to deny that, even to men of secular learning, there is an immense source of interest and admiration, connected with their own studies, in the history of the middle ages ; for all the discoveries to which the present race of men owe their superiority in those material acquirements, of which they are so proud, date from these ten centuries, which are accused of intellectual apathy, barbarism, and ignorance. Then it was, says a French writer, that a new spirit was breathed into the ancient world—all social relations were changed—vassalage, a kind of modified servitude, prepared the way for the abolition of slavery. The principle of association began to operate ; corporations were formed. The stage of life presents great personages and sublime actions. Deeds of eternal fame were done ; deeds which tell of Charlemagne, Philip Augustus, and St. Louis ; Alfred and Canute ; Richard the Lion-hearted, and the Black Prince : Gerbert and Hildebrand, Aleuin, Bede, Thomas Aquinas, Roger Bacon. What names ! what men ! Who is not seized with astonishment at beholding the architectural monuments of these ages ? such as the Gothic vaults of Cologne and Westminster, of Amiens and Jumièges, which had been preceded by others, the destruction of which had made men weep ! Then too hospitals arose for the first time, asylums for all kinds of human misery, and innumerable establishments for the poor. Would we enter into still lower details, it was in the eighth century that paper was invented : in the tenth that the monks invented clocks ; in the eleventh that the Benedictines raised the first windmills ; and that a citizen of Middlebourg invented the telescope. In the same age was disclosed the loadstone, or the polarity of the needle, though there is a still earlier mention of it in the Romance of the Rose : and, during this period, the greatest problems of mechanics were defined. Linnæus even shows the successful labors of the monks in the cultivation of useful plants and vegetables, many of which were now, for the first time, introduced into Europe. Engraving dates from the fourteenth century, when a multitude of arts were invented, which in these times seem indispensable to domestic life. So that, upon the whole judging merely upon these principles, no ten other ages can be produced, which had results of greater importance, and contributed more to the happiness of mankind.

Frederick Schlegel divides the middle and later ages into the scholastic-romantic, which was a period essentially Christian, notwithstanding the horrors which occasionally appear in history ; for from these Christianity never promised to free the world ; then the heathen-antiquarian, the spirit of which extended to literature and to political theories ; and then the barbaro-polemic, which included the seventeenth century.* When we speak of the middle ages as barbarous, we should be understood, he says, as referring to this latter period, which was really barbarous, which was distinguished by the change of religion, and the religious wars.† To the first of these periods, the learned Danish Professor Grundtvig alludes, saying, in particular reference to England, “the fact that there once existed a civilized world, limited to the shores of the Mediterranean sea, is not more unquestionable than that a new one arose out of the chaos of those barbarous tribes, who destroyed the western empire.” Indeed, the most superficial reader must have occasionally been struck at the startling manner in which the charges, so generally brought against these times of grossness and absurdity, are often disproved. Thus a French critic of our time, speaking of Petrarcha, says, “How can we convey an idea of that form of imagination, perhaps too delicate for us, though it dates from the middle age ?” “In these ages, called dark,” says St. Victor, “men possessed every one of these maxims, founded on good sense and morality, which belong to the most civilized society of these times.”‡ But it is in their character of Christian and holy ages, that, in accordance with the proposed course, we are invited to consider them : and here a far richer prospect will be found to open before us. Thus the seventh century was, to the eye of Mabillon, a golden age, in which men of the greatest innocence and sanctity spread the rule of St. Benedict to the farthest regions of Europe ; “for the truth of Christ did not preach that only wise and learned men were the salt of the earth and light of the world, but also included under that title holy men who opposed the salt of integrity and the light of justice to corrupt manners and darkened minds.”§ Neander points out a new path to lead us through the labyrinth of history, where he says that “it is impossible to despise an age, over which a man like St. Bernard was able to exercise such an influence, by the sole empire of his character and of his sanctity.”|| From a multitude of remarks of this kind, founded upon facts which cannot be questioned, we should be led to take a very uncommon, though judicious view, of this period. The ancient chronicle of Ely affirms of the time when the blessed Ædelwold rebuilt that monastery, “These were golden ages of the world, when pure faith, peace, and true love flourished. Fraud, pride, and perjury were unknown. Then liberty had for itself sure seats.

Tunc et libertas sedes habuit sibi certas.

Then Martha and Mary shone equally in the Church.”¶ Sentences of this kind may indeed be commonly received with a certain degree of abatement, from ascrib-

*Philosophie der Geschichte, II. 190. {Ibid. 214. †Tableau de Paris, Tom. I. 353.

§Præfat. in II. Sæculum Benedict. ¶Der heilige Bernhard und sein Zeitalter, Berlin, 181.

¶Hist. Eliensis apud Gale, Hist. Brit. Tom.III.

ing something to the rhetorical tone which pervades them : but in the present instance the writer describes a period not greatly remote from his time, and of which the most exact tradition must have reached him. He does not make the remark angrily, for the sake of contrast, but in order to edify and stimulate his contemporaries, who, let it be observed, considered these evangelical qualities, which he ascribed to their fathers, as the highest virtue for which a nation or an age could be illustrious. Throughout all this long period, there would have been nothing startling or questionable in a proposition like that which was assumed by St. Ambrose in writing to the Emperor Valentinian, when he said, "This is worthy of your times, that is, of Christian times."* Men would not have been instantly struck with an intimate sense that a falsehood was proposed to them. Still, indeed, was fulfilled the sentence of infallible wisdom, that the world cannot receive the spirit of truth : † but so was also fulfilled the divine prediction respecting the kings and princes of the earth. The Christians were sufficiently numerous and powerful to imprint a character upon society, protect the institutions of meek and holy men, and to sanctify the whole form of the political state, by founding it upon the principles of revealed wisdom.

Such a view of history, I am aware, is widely different from that which is generally proposed by modern writers, who follow one another in representing these ages as a period of the greatest misery and degradation : but before their testimony is received, would it not be of some importance to ascertain whether their opinions respecting misery and degradation agree with those which must necessarily be entertained by Christians ; because, if it should prove the case, that what they regard as misery is happiness in a Christian sense, and that their standard of happiness is that of evil in the same, it would only follow from their censure, that there is an additional evidence in favor of our proposition respecting the peculiarly Christian character of these ages! Now, in fact, this would be the result from such an enquiry. For if we consult these teachers of the modern wisdom, who are so full of vile disdain for Christian antiquity ; and if we consider what are the ends proposed in their speculations respecting political and domestic economy, and national happiness, we shall find that they are all foreign from those which are comprised in the beatitudes ; that in many instances they are exactly opposed to them ; and that, in fine, that terrible væ is pronounced by truth itself upon those who attain to their standard of excellence. To be rich, to be filled, or in the phrase of the economists, to have capital, to secure a life of luxury, ease, and dissipation ; to be praised and extolled by men : to be the first in rank ; to raise oneself to an eminent situation ; what, they ask, is more lawful than to desire this? Well—woe to all who attain to this, says Christ.‡ Now, it is from this celestial wisdom, opposed to that of the modern sophists, that the principles of action were formed, which were admitted and recognized during these ages, of which I shall soon attempt to unfold the moral history. I shall not fear to be contradicted in stating, that during that period religion, with all the apparently new and remarkable peculiarities of the doctrine of Christ, was uppermost in the thoughts of men, and even adopted universally as the basis of civil government, and of their whole domestic customs and manners: the justice of which proposition is so certain, that Guizot could not avoid observing that "the religious society played a grand part in the history of modern civilization." So that, in fact, notwithstanding the number of evils and abuses which then prevailed, in consequence of human passions, these entire ages might be described in the words of the great Apostle, as exhibiting themselves to our view;—"In much patience and tribulation, by glory and dishonor, by evil fame and good fame, as poor yet making many rich, as having nothing, and yet possessing all things:"—words, which might be received as almost a literal description of the precise interval which the moderns have affirmed to be the darkest in the annals of mankind. For, as the learned author of the "Perpétuité de la Foi" says of the tenth century, which even Baronius himself was tempted to concede to them, from limiting his view to one country,—“we must conclude that this tenth age, vulgarly so reviled, was one of the most fortunate times of the church, since the vices which are ascribed to that age, are common to it with others; whereas the fact is otherwise respecting the good which recommends it.” He proves this position by showing, that there flourished then, in various parts of the Western Church, a multitude of bishops, eminently illustrious for piety and sound doctrine: many theologians, deeply versed in ecclesiastical matters; many holy men, who restored decayed discipline in monasteries; and many princes, of eminent and saintly virtue. But above all, he observes, that it was in this century that the Danes, Bohemians, Poles, Hungarians, Normans, and other people, were converted to the Christian Faith by the labors of holy missionaries: facts which sufficiently clear it from the charge of ignorance, superstition, and corruption;”* and which could hardly be summed up in more precise language than that used by St. Paul, in alluding to the qualities which should belong to the apostolic character. The truth is, from a fixed law and a principle inherent in nature, which the reason of Plato was able to expose clearly, it is with nations and with whole ages as with men individually—their energies must be devoted either to religion or to the world; they must adopt the views and perform the service of either the one or the other; and on their choice depends the whole order of life, and all that gives a character and peculiar expression to their spirit, manners, customs, and institutions.

*Epist. XXX.

†John XIV.

‡Luke VI.

As the subject which is here to be proposed, is full of interest, so is it one that may be applied to the most important purposes of life. There was a book in the middle ages called "Universale bonum." This was nothing but a collection of edifying accounts of holy men, and, if we reflect upon the great end of all education, and the admirable force of examples in the instruction of ingenuous minds, it must be admitted, that the author evinced excellent judgment in choosing that title. It is to the effects of such a study, that a modern poet seems to allude, in saying :—

* Perpétuité de la Foi, Tom. I. part iii. c. 6. 7.

————— a man so bred,
 (Take from him what you will upon the score
 Of ignorance or illusion,) lives and breathes
 For nobler purposes of mind : his heart
 Beats to the heroic song of ancient days.*

As to instruction by examples generally, its importance has always been felt by wise men. Quintilian thought it of essential use, that boys should even learn by heart the sayings of the illustrious men,† with whose lives they were to be familiar. St. Augustin says, that men can more easily follow things themselves, than the precepts and discipline of those who would teach them in a scientific manner ; that if any one were to give lessons in walking, he would have to specify many things which men would not so easily learn from him, as they would practice them without his instruction : and that generally the spectacle of truth itself more delights and assists us, than the process by which rhetoricians would teach it. “Perchance, indeed,” he adds, “such exercises may render the mind more expert, though they may also render it more malignant and inflated.”‡ “The philosopher setting down with thorny arguments, the bare rule is so hard of utterance, and so misty to be conceived, that one that hath no other guide but him shall wade in him, until he be old before he shall find sufficient cause to be honest ; but as for the poet,” continues Sir Philip Sidney, “he cometh with a tale, forsooth he cometh unto you with a tale which holdeth children from play and old men from the chimney corner.”§ Moreover, books, especially those connected with history, instruct the great when no one but flatterers can approach them. Books instruct and wound not. Therefore Don Alphonzo, king of Arragon, being once asked who were the best counsellors, replied,—“The dead, (meaning books,) because we learn easily from them what we wish to know.”|| But above all, it is to Christians that a study of this kind is most important and delightful. Quidnam dulcius,” as William of Malmesbury says, “quam majorum recensere gratiam ut eorum acta cognoscas, à quibus acceperis et rudimenta fidei et incitamenta bene vivendi.”¶ “Who would not wish to know,” says a learned Dane, who has directed his studies to Anglo Saxon literature ; “Who would not wish to know how those patriarchs of the new Christian world preached and reasoned, what lessons they taught, what examples they referred to, in what manner they attuned the minds of their heathen converts to the doctrines they communicated, whether these doctrines were instilled in humble prose, or to gain their holy ends, they thought it needful to build

* The Excursion.

† Instit. Lib. I. II.

‡ De Doctrin. Christ. Lib. II. chap. 37.

§ Defence of Poesy.

|| Æneas Sylvius de dictis Regis Alphonsi.

¶ De Gestis Pontif. Anglorum. Prolog.

the lofty rhyme, or called in the aid of music, married to immortal verse?" And, to draw a reflection still more immediately suggested by what is passing around us, which will lead us to the same result, by showing that which is opposed to the experience of such studies, what is it which renders the minds of many of the moderns, among whom assuredly is many a soul of mighty worth, so gloomy and apprehensive; why do they appear at times so lonely and disconsolate, amidst the wastes of their interminable speculations, afflicted like those spirits seen by Dante, who lived "desiring without hope," variable as if they felt utterly lost on the way, journeying on, and knowing not whither, as if they had no track of any that had gone before to guide their feet, no prospect of rejoining any, with whom the thought of meeting might cheer their present path; looking backwards to ages gone by with disdain, and forwards to the future with dismay, if it be not that the magnificent chain of Christian history and ecclesiastical tradition has been broken to them, and that notwithstanding the outward professions which may be made in reliance upon the resources of genius and learning, they inwardly feel the impossibility of forming, with the broken fragments thrown to them by mere poetic fancy or literary taste, that happy clue which might lead them through the labyrinth of life to a peaceful and joyous end.

In all ages of the world, religion has had regard to history. Dionysius says, that with the Romans there was no ancient historian or writer of legends, who did not compose his work from ancient narrations which were preserved on sacred tablets.* And Plutarch, in his treatise on the means of perceiving the progress made in virtue, makes allusions to the effects of its moral application, saying that there is no more effectual mode of advancing in virtue, than for a person to have always before his eyes those who are, or have been good men, and to say to himself, "What would Plato have done in this case? What would Lycurgus or Agesilaus have said?" "But with Christians," as Voigt observes, "there is no knowledge so holily connected with religion as history."† They are of the number of those of whom it is written, that "their hearts live in all the generations of ages."‡ It is a divine precept which the church sings at lauds of Saturday, "Memento dierum antiquorum: cogita generationes singulas."

The facts which show the consequence of neglecting this counsel are most striking. Thus we behold men who seem to know the whole Bible by heart, without appearing to be conscious of the inconsistency of modern manners and modern ways of thinking with what is required of all that would follow Christ; for though they read what the duty is, it exists only in their mind as a grand abstraction, because they never see in what way men can actually reduce it to practice, under the real circumstances of life. Still less have they a desire to imitate that perfection which they regard as a thing beyond their reach, and without the wish to do so, as St. Chrysostom says, in his treatise on compunction, it would not have been possible even for the saints to have led the life of angels as they did. "The wish of these men," as John à Kempis, the brother of Thomas, used to say, "is that they may be humble but without being looked down upon, patient but without suffering, obedient but without restraint, poor but without wanting any thing, penitent, but without sorrow."* They are in fact, perfectly reconciled to themselves, by concluding that one command was only figurative, and another solely applicable to the times of the apostles, and that others could not be performed without incurring the charge of extravagance and fanaticism. Such persons are always found to turn in unutterable disgust from the lives of the saints, and the books which describe the holiness of antiquity; they affirm that they will never read these books, adding with unguarded sincerity, that it gives them painful emotions to look into them; and, in fact, they go away from them sorrowful, like the young man who left Christ, and not only from the same unwillingness to comply, but also being forced to see that there were others better than themselves: and this discovery is painful to that latent pride which desires to be singular even in goodness. Besides, they are taught to believe that faith was lost in the middle ages, and that they are the best judges of what should be the form and course of a Christian life. Whereas, other men, by merely turning to the old Christians, are filled with a desire to follow them.

* Dion. Halicar. Lib. I. cap. 73.

† Voigt. Hildebrand und sein Zeitalter vorrede.

‡ Psalm xxi. 27.

And their most righteous customs make them scorn
All creeds besides.

Then they hear themselves addressed as if by the poet of Christians:—

——— Why dost thou not turn
Unto the beautiful garden blossoming
Beneath the rays of Christ? Here is the rose,
Wherein the Word divine was made incarnate,
And here the lilies, by whose odor known
The way of life was followed.†

Father Mabillon says, in his Treatise on Monastic Studies, that one of the greatest geniuses of that age, who had been born in heresy, was converted to the Church by means of studying ecclesiastical history ‡

Needful to all, we may observe, that to those engaged in what Lord Bacon calls the narrow and confined walks of natural science, this study is especially important; for such persons, in tracing the history of natural philosophy, become accustomed to reflect upon the errors of men in successive ages, the absurd fancies which were discarded for opinions that following ages deemed equally fanciful and thus they gradually and unknowingly become incapable of believing in the constant transmission of the same religious truths through a long lapse of ages, of which certain fact, an acquaintance with the learning and customs of Christian ages would have convinced them.

* Joan. Buschius de Vir. Illust. cap. 32.

† Hell xxiii.

‡ Traites des Études Monastiques, Part II. chap. 8.

On the use of historical study to theologians, in order to supply them with arguments, and examples, and means of avoiding error as to popular or vulgar reports, Melchior Canus discourses at large.* But that I may not seem presumptuously to offer information to those from whom it would become me rather to learn, I pass on to observe, in the last place, that the whole scope and matter of this book may be regarded as peculiarly interesting and useful to persons who inhabit countries separated from Catholic communion, and at a distance from the traditional customs and manners of the Christian life. In such lands, the faithful may be said to live and converse principally with the spirits of former times, with their saintly and heroic ancestors, who lived in ages of faith. No men of cultivated minds and delicate susceptibility suffer such privations there as Catholics: for the sense of the beautiful and the just is nourished continually in their minds, and refined and sublimated, while the matter on which it might be externally exercised is withdrawn. Excluded from the august temples, which stand as monuments of ancient faith, they have none of those local resources which the wisdom of religious ages had provided for souls like theirs; they cannot continually behold gracious and ennobling objects to be the defence of holy thoughts against the impressions of vanity. To summon them to holy rites, no solemn tower sends forth its mighty peal; the outward form of things ceases to be divine, for they behold no places of public state and grandeur, sanctified by the emblems of their religion; confined, and fettered, and thwarted in desire, theirs are but maimed rites. For them no night is now with hymn or carol blest. Even nature's beauties are cut off and appropriated, in a manner, from the holy purpose for which they know them to have been originally intended. Every pleasant site, every hill and gentle shore is claimed for uses of luxury or secular profit, (for the new sects seem conscious that there is no connection between them and the divine harmonies of the natural and material world;) they who are of the eternal fold can possess only some new and frail edifice, in the meanest and obscurest recess of a distant suburb, for the sanctuary of the Lord of Glory. For them, therefore, books, and especially the annals of Christian ages, are a principle of life almost essential. It is to them that a Bede and an Aleuin are dear and precious, and that there can be no higher enjoyment than to stray along the sea-beaten shores of Lindisfarne and amidst Iona's piles,

Where rest from mortal coil the Mighty of the Isles.

Men say that this is the most distressing of all cases, when any one knows admirable things, but is obliged by necessity to keep at a distance from them.

καλὰ γιννέσκοντ' ἀνάγκη
ἐκτὸς ἔχειν πόδα†

* De Locis Theologicis, Lib. XI.

† Pindar Pyth. Od. IV.

And these lines of Pindar may well be applied to those few faithful Christians who are found in such lands, pursuing their way alone through regions which seem deserted of God, and light, and joy.

Ibant obscuri sola sub nocte per umbram
Perque domos Ditis vacuas, et inania regna

Visions of grief and care meet them at every step.

—————Tristisque Senectus
Et Metus, et malesuada Fames, et turpis Egestas
Terribiles visu formæ, Lethumque, Laborque;
Tum consanguineus Lethi sopor, et mala mentis
Gaudia, mortiferumque adverso in limine Bellum; Ferreique Eumenidum thalami, et Disordia demens.*

They must seem insensible to all the impious deeds around them, or they will hear terrible menaces, in words like those of Charon, "This is the place of shades, of sleep, and night." It is not lawful to carry the living in the Stygian vessel.—

Corpora viva nefas Stygiâ vectare carinâ.

Thus these nations used to cry, let there be no Catholics amongst us, it is not lawful that they should be seen here; which was as much as to say, it is not lawful to admit the living among the dead. Meanwhile, every thing serves to remind them of their saintly and mighty ancestors. Their magnificent domes and towers still remain, of which every arch has its scroll teaching Catholic wisdom, and every window represents some canonized saint.

The spot that angels designed to grace
Is blessed, though robbers haunt the place.

And though their graves are yearly violated, and the stone cases which contain their venerable ashes hewn and scattered on the public ways, still does their virtue live, by a kind of vague tradition, in the memory of the people:—

Even by the bad commended, while they leave its course untrod.

Towns still bear no other name but that of the saint or martyr who first gave them renown,—a St. Alban, a St. Neot, a St. Ives, or a St. Edmund. Our lonely mountain sides still have crosses, whose rude form attests their Saxon origin, and still are there pious hands among the simple people of those wild hills, to guard them from profanation. The sweet countenances of saintly kings and holy abbots, carved in stone, are still remaining over the solemn gates of venerable piles; and by the side of the pompous inscription, in more than pagan vanity, the antique slab is often discernible, which humbly invokes the prayer for a soul's rest. There too still flow the same dark waters, o'er whose wave so often swept at midnight the peal of the convent bell, or was heard faintly chanting the man of blessed order, as he hastened on the errand of charity. Lo, yonder are the shattered arches of some abbey, on a river's bank, more lonesome than the roads that traverse desert wilds. It is Croyland, and at that calm and solemn hour

* Æneid. VI. 268.

When near the dawn, the swallow her sad lay,
Rememb'ring haply ancient grief, renews;
When our minds, more wand'ers from the flesh,
And less by thought restrain'd, are, as 'twere, full
Of holy divination.*

You approach and kneel upon the spot, and the long deserted walls of the ruined sanctuary wonder at the pious stranger, who seems to bear alone, through a benighted world, the torch of faith. Where is now that devout assembly for the early sacrifice: where that rich and varied order, the gorgeous vestments, and the bright gems, and all

The beauteous garniture of altars on a festival time?†

Our old historians dwell with delight upon the glory of this place. They describe at length the altars of gold, the richly painted windows, the solemn organs placed on high over the entrance, the candelabras of solid silver and the processional cross, the splendid presents of the Mercian kings, of the emperors of Germany, and princes of France, the beautiful buildings, the great hostel for the poor, and the hall for noble guests.‡ They leave us to picture to ourselves the benign countenance of meditative age, the cheerful grace of angelic youth, the innocent joys of study, the delights of unity and peace, the psalmody, the sweet en-tonation of sublime prayer, the silence, the charity, the faith so oft attested at St. Guthlac's shrine, the lives of saints, and the death of the just! Alas! all are gone, and nothing remains but a desolation, the mere view of which chills the heart; some mouldering arches, which each succeeding winter threatens to lay prostrate; a line of wretched cabins, which shelter some wild people, that seem ignorant of God and Christ, untaught and sensual, like those who know not whether there was such a thing as the Holy Ghost, prepared to assure the stranger that these walls were once a jail, or a place built by the Romans, while all around you lies a dark and dismal fen, where a gibbet is more likely to meet your eye than a cross, the image of death and not of redemption! The very earth seems to mourn,—“Terram tenebrosam, et opertam mortis caligine, terram miserie et tenebrarum, ubi umbra mortis, et nullus ordo, sed sempiternus horror inhabitat.” Alas! what remained for the sad pilgrim, but to smite his breast and continue the accustomed chant,—“Quid faciam miser? ubi fugiam? Anima mea turbata est valde ; sed tu, Domine, succurre ei. Ubi est nunc præstolatio mea ? et patientiam meam quis considerat ? Tu es, Domine, Deus meus."

* Dante, Purg. ix.

† Ibid.

‡ Vide Ingulphus Hist. p. 9. Hist. Croylandensis Rerum Anglie. Script. Tom. I.

Yet he who hath made the nations of the earth curable* leaves no man without the sustenance which is required for the peculiar wants of his soul, and without the means of salutary exercise. In the worst of times there are redeeming features, and objects of imitation, such as what the Roman historian specifies "ipsa necessitas fortiter tolerata ; et laudatis antiquorum mortibus pares exitus."† And though our pomp must needs admit the pale companion, though in desiring the return of the reign of truth, we have but "wishes and tears, poor fancy's followers ;" yet still are left some of those that have St. Thomas for guardian, to comfort and direct us on our way. We may not be able to enjoy the lot of Samuel, who departed not from the temple ; but there are chapels on the distant hills from before whose bright altars, setting forth into the darkness of night, having the stars for companions, and no other solace but to chant again by the way some of the sweet melodies which seem still to linger around us, we may travel homewards, and hope that each step has been reckoned by an angel. We may not be able to frequent the assemblies of the holy people who worship in vast cathedrals, and repeat with innumerable voices the solemn hymn which marks the yearly return of some most holy time, but we can walk alone in the woods, and sing the Stabat Mater, while the nightingale will lend her long and plaintive note to deepen and prolong the tones of that sweet and melancholy strain, and then our tears will fall upon the wild flowers, and we shall feel in communion with the holy dead ; with those who so oft had sung it, sad and sighing, like the Beatrice of Dante, in such a mood "that Mary, as she stood beside the cross, was scarce more changed."‡ Yes, beloved land, that would so smile on gentle, lowly spirits, land twice converted,§ too fair to be for ever lost, thou art still dear to all thy sons, but doubly so to such of them as lament thy sad destiny : for thy sweet meadows would cover themselves with the enamel of flowers to grace the progress of Jesus Christ in the victim of the altar ; thy solemn woods would give shelter to the lonely eremite, and thy bright streams would yield refreshment to the tabernacles of the just ;—thy gardens would give roses to scatter before the adorable sacrament, and thy towns and hamlets would send forth their cheerful youth, children fair as the race of primal creatures, to commence their flowery sprinkling. Thou art still a noble instrument, though now mute or discordant. Ignorant and unskillful hands have played upon thee till they broke thee into a thousand parts ; but, though thus broken and disarranged, let but the master arise who can revive the Catholic chord, and thou wilt again send forth the sweetest music.

* Sanabiles fecit nationes orbis terrarum. Sap. c. i. v. 14. † Tacitus, Hist. Lib. I. 3

‡ Purg. XXXIII.

§ The priests of England bore upon their albs, on the left shoulder, "quasi socipes de panno serice super assutas," the upper closed, in sign of there being but one faith, but the lower divided, as a sign of their having been twice converted to the faith, first by the missionaries of Pope Eleutherius, and secondly by St. Augustine. Chronicon Monasterii S. Bertini, cap. 1. Par. 1. Martene Thesaurus Anecdotorum, tom. III.

It is the remark of Frederick Schlegel that a love for the romantic world of the middle ages, and of their chivalry, has continued to characterize the poetry of England, even while the negative philosophy of her sophists has maintained its ground.* And though, at the same time, for reasons which do not require a sphinx to explain, the complaint of learned foreigners is most just, that the literature and antiquities of our ancestors have been nowhere throughout the civilized world more neglected than in England ; yet it is equally true, and still more remarkable, that in this country several old Catholic customs of the middle ages have been transmitted down to us, as if protected in ice, to be the astonishment of other nations. It is true they have lost all the qualities of life ; there is no spirit to vivify, no mind to direct them, but still the form, though dead and motionless, has something in it imposing and majestic ; nay, even pleasing and amiable. Indeed, a book might be composed on the latent Catholicism of many natives of this country, where every thing solid and valuable is, after all, either a remnant or a revival of Catholic thinking or institution. Methinks it would not be too much to suggest, from general principles, that youth, at least even in such a country, can never be essentially opposed to Catholicism. Cold, dry negations and that disdainful mood, however well it may suit the breasts that wear it, are not congenial with its warm and generously confiding nature. If it has heard the words of the blessed Gospel, which children can understand better than proud scholars swollen with vanity ; if it has been familiarized with the paintings of Catholic artists, which a taste for the fine arts may have incautiously suffered to appear before it ; if it has had on all sides the images and memorials of saints and martyrs ; if it has been reared in a land abounding, in spite of fanatical and commercial Vandalism, with the ruins of sacred edifices and memorials of ancient faith ; if it has visited the desolate cloister, and beheld the lofty cathedral, and heard the solemn bell ; and if it has learned by accident to repeat some affecting incident connected with the sanctity and grandeur of times gone by, some beautiful passage in the wondrous lives of the meek men of God, and to feed its imagination with the mysterious lessons of sweet Christian poesy, in vain will pedagogues and worldly teachers have required it to adopt the protestations of men who doubt and deny and refuse to hear the Church. It is Catholic in heart, in genius, in modes of thinking, and even in many of its habits of life, and it must continue to be so until age and the world shall have tarnished its golden nature. These considerations again will justify my former position, that the study to which I purpose directing attention in these sheets will have a peculiarly domestic interest. Some, indeed, their conscience dimmed by their own or others'

* Philosophie der Geschichte, II. 250.

shame, may feel that parts are sharp, but notwithstanding as Cacciaguیدا says to Dante, the whole vision shall be made manifest,

And let them wince, who have their withers wrung,
What though, when tasted first, the voice shall prove Unwelcome; on digestion, it will turn
To vital nourishment.*

Pindar sings truly, making allowance for the unblest style, that "the ancient virtues recover fresh strength which had been changed with the ages of men. For neither does the black earth produce her fruit in ceaseless succession, nor do the trees send forth their odoriferous blossom in every period of the year, but only at certain intervals, and in the same manner also is the strength or virtue of mortals subjected to the government of fate."† Meanwhile, the display of the ancient virtues which belonged to ages of faith, and the diligent search into the customs and manners of Christian antiquity must be peculiarly valuable to those upon whom the iniquity of the proud is multiplied. For it is by remembering the blessed spirits

That were below, ere they arriv'd in heav'n,
So mighty in renown, as every muse
Might grace her triumph with them,‡

That they learn to feel the wretchedness of those that are on earth,

All after ill example gone astray;

I myself have found, while living in a Catholic country, that these instances, taken from the middle ages, of the customs and manners of a Christian life, of charity and zeal, of holy penitence and angelic innocence, of wealth and time, beauty and service devoted to God and to the poor, lost half their interest, because they differ in nothing from what passed actually around men, and from what was as familiar as the ordinary occurrences of domestic life; but in faithless lands, unless within the walls of a college, or in some singularly favored family, they seem to be wholly historical, if not a part of poetry, to belong to another world, or to a time gone by for ever. It is by the study which recalls the images of former sanctity, and the former prevalence of truth, that men are enabled to draw lessons from the very stones of their ruined abbeys, which will seem to dictate that solemn prayer, "Salvum me fac, Domine, quoniam defecit sanctus, quoniam diminutæ sunt veritates à filiis hominum."§ Nor is it an advantage unworthy of regard which will result from studying the history of ages of faith, that it may be made even a source of consolation and support in our last hours: for how sweet, then will be the thought that, perhaps, through grace of highest God we may be admitted to behold the crowd of great and holy men, with whom such studies will have made us long familiar ! to enter that country whither have already journeyed all who have ever been the objects of our love and reverence ! There will be the princes under whose happy reign the Church had peace and freedom, there the meek confessors, and there the lowly ones who ran to follow Christ. Truly in vain will have been these studies if we cannot derive this consolation from them ; for ———What to thee is others' good,

* Paradise XVII. † Nem. Od. XI. ‡ Dante, Paradise XVIII. § Psal. II.

If thou neglect thy own.*

Mabillon, in his preface to the fifth age of the Benedictines, speaks of those who had assisted him in the labor of this vast enterprise, and mentions in particular, one young man, John Jessenetus, (who had begun to furnish some illustrations,) a youth of the greatest hopes, who was cut off by a sudden death, while on a journey, returning with him from the Lotharingia. Mabillon adds these effecting words, "I wish that his meditation on the glory of the saints may have been profitable to him for a better life ! I wish it may not return to my confusion, that after being occupied during so many years on the acts of the saints, I should be so far removed from their examples."

But I return to speak in general as to the course and object to be pursued in the following research. It has often been a subject of astonishment and complaint, that a direction almost exclusively classical, should be given to the studies of youth in modern times, and though it might not be difficult to detect the real cause which has operated to produce this partiality, which certainly must be sought elsewhere than in the supposed barrenness and barbarism of the ancient Christian literature, it may be sufficient here to bear testimony to the justice of such complaints. For, in fact, what can be more unreasonable than to maintain that an acquaintance with the histories and manners of the ancient Greeks and Romans is more essential to complete the instructions of Christians than the like knowledge of the habits and institutions of their own national ancestors and fathers in the faith ; that an English student should be familiar with Livy without having ever even heard of Ingulphus, or a William of Malmesbury ; that he should know by heart the sentences of Demosthenes, without being aware that St. Chrysostom was, perhaps his equal in eloquence and grandeur ; and that he should be afraid of corrupting his latinity by looking into St. Jerome, of whom Erasmus said, that if he had a prize to award between him and Cicero, he should be tempted to give it to the Christian father rather than to the great orator of Rome. Ah ! could these mighty spirits of the ancient world give utterance to conviction which now possesses them in answer to the multitude of voices which continually are raised from earth to speak their praise, they would counsel their fond admirers to place their affection upon Diviner models ; they would speak in words like those of the shade of Virgil, when he first meets Dante. "We lived in times of the false and lying gods ; we sung of earthly conquests, but why dost thou return into this fatal region ? why not scale this delicious mountain, which is the beginning and the cause of all joy?"

*Dante, Purg. X.

——— At Rome my life was past,
Beneath the mild Augustus, in the time
Of fabled Deities and false. A bard
Was I, and made Anchises' upright son,
The subject of my song, who came from Troy,
When the flame preyed on Ilium's haughty towers.
But thou, say wherefore to such perils past Return'st thou ? Wherefore not this pleasant mount Ascendest, cause and source of all delight ? *

I am aware, indeed, that books have of late been written, (and how many it skills not to say), with the professed object of instructing men in the spirit and manners of the middle ages ; but without wishing to delay in sounding forth my own praises, and in condemning the works of others who have already written on this subject, after the manner that we used to hear censured of Anaxilaus and Theopompus, who are known to have thus launched forth in their prefaces to their histories. —I may be allowed to urge that complaint against some of our contemporary historians, which Dionysius expressed in reference to men, " who had dared," as he says, " to compose histories with the sole object of making them agreeable to barbarous kings who hated Rome, to flatter whom they wrote certain gracious books, which were neither just nor true."† For these great men of the earth, though barbarous, who so cordially hate Rome, there continues to be no want of corresponding writers, whom no reverence of the keys restrains. The ancients have left us an excellent example, in evincing a most lively interest in all that related to the antiquities of their country, and the customs of their ancestors. Cicero says that he had written an elaborate work " De moribus, institutisque majorum et disciplina ac temperatione civitatis."‡ Dionysius says, in the first book of his history, " I shall begin from the most ancient stories, ἀπὸ τῶν παλαιότατων μύθων, which former writers have omitted, and which cannot be found without great pains and difficulty ;" though he speaks elsewhere of one writer who had made a collection of these ancient stories.§ Plautus improves upon the counsel of Pindar, and says that they are wise, " qui libenter veteres spectant fabulas."|| Now it is not certainly too much to affirm, that the customs and manners of the middle ages are deserving of quite as much attention from us, as that Homeric way of life, and those Pythagorean manners spoken of by Socrates,¶ that their literature might supply most interesting variety to those who may very well think that they have heard enough of the hard Eurystheus and the altars of the illaudible Busiris, and the other verses which continue to arrest so many vacant minds ; and that these our

* Hell, Canto I. † Dionysii Halicarnass. Antiquit. Rom. Lib. I. 4. ‡ Tuscul. Lib. IV. 1.

§ Lib. I. 68.

|| Prolog.

¶ Plato, de Repub. Lib. X.

domestic antiquities would furnish ample matter to exercise, with the greatest advantage, all our diligence and research, though we had the industry of a Chrysippus, who was so curious, as Cicero says, in collecting various examples from all history.* St. Ambrose mentions that he had himself written a book, "De Patrum Moribus;"† but it would be difficult to find a work which entered into the full detail of the manners and institutions of the ancient Christian society amongst our ancestors. In the composition of these books, I shall avail myself of the interesting writings which remain to us from the middle age; of which we may say, with far greater justice than Quinctilian affirmed of the old Latin authors, "Sanctitas certe, et ut sic dicam, virilitas ab his petenda, quando nos in omnia deliciarum genera vitiaque, dicendi quoque ratione, defluximus."‡ The ancients, from a general principle, professed a great respect and admiration for their old authors. Cicero and Virgil both extracted gold from Ennius: Horace thought that the reading of the books of the ancients was the best consolation for the misery of the present.—

O rus ! quando te aspiciam, quandoque licebit,
Nunc veterum libris
Ducere sollicitæ jucunda oblivia vitæ? §

The Romans speak with enthusiasm of their Attius, their Pæuvius, and their Nuvius, for whom they have almost a religious respect. Thus Quinctilian, in reference to them, says, "Let us reverse these old trees of our sacred groves, whose trunks, half-decayed, have something in them most venerable, which even time seems to respect while it destroys them."

Without alluding to the works of a St. Thomas or an Anselm, and others, whose names should stand, not so much for the names of men as of wisdom and even eloquence, there are a multitude of works which date from that begotten period of the middle ages, of whom fame has no note; in which, like an ancient temple, there is not so much grace and elegance as religion, but yet, which contain many bright sentences, and many things to be read for the sake of manners; whose authors do not collect the rain-water, but burst forth into a living spring.

From these works, then, "quasi quodam sancto augustoque fonte nostra omnis manabit oratio."|| They will be quoted, but without any reference to the disputes and controversies which modern writers may have raised upon them. Mabillon, in applying himself to illustrate the acts of the Benedictine order, found the necessity, from the first, of approaching things so ancient with the mind of an ancient, free from the disputes of more recent times, and anxious only to serve the common cause of Christian religion.¶ To some it will appear a recommendation, that truth is not produced here as in a work of reasoning, where, as Bonald says, it is like a king at the head of his army on a day of battle,—but rather, as in one of

* Tuscul. 1. 45. † Epist. Lib. VI. 37. ‡ Inst. Lib. 1. 8. § Lib. II. Sat. 6. v. 66.

|| Cicero, Tuscul. Lib. V. 13. ¶ Præfat. in IV. Sæcul. Benedict. § 4.

sentiment, where he compares it to a queen on the day of her coronation, amidst the pomp of festivity, the splendor of a court, the acclamations of a whole people, the decorations and perfumes, and surrounded by all that is magnificent and gracious. And as Alexander Borgia was wont to say of the expedition of the French for Naples, that they came with chalk in their hands to mark up their lodgings, and not with weapons to say, fight; so, with Lord Bacon, many will say, that they like better that entry of truth which cometh peaceably, with chalk to mark up those minds which are capable to lodge and harbor it, than that which cometh with pugnacity and contention.* I shall wander on, therefore, without fearing to be led far from the matter, even though I should resemble Isocrates in writing the praise of Helen; for I shall presume that my reader will be like the youth who disputes with Cicero, in the first book of the Tusculans, when he replies, that he remembers the proposed object of their conversation, from which they had been led away, and adds, "Sed te de æternitate dicentem aberrare à proposito facile patiebar."† But writers in our time affect to be more judicious in their style of discourse than even the Minerva of Homer.‡ Nevertheless, Euripides, as a philosopher or as a poet, does not stand higher in the estimation of sensible men, because he offers to prove, in the famous contest between him and Æschylus, in the shades, that he has never said the same thing twice.§ It is Plato who is so fond of the maxim; καλὸν δὲ τὸ γε ὀρθὸν καὶ δὴς καὶ τρίς.|| And we shall be on the soil of Catholicism;—that is, on the ground of infinity in great thoughts and gracious harmonies,—ground that is

Enlivened by that warmth, whose kindly force
Gives birth to flowers and fruits of holiness;

fruits, let it be remembered,

That ne'er were plucked on other soil.

In whatever direction, on that blessed shore, we turn our steps, we shall find inexhaustible riches of every virtue, of wisdom and learning, of beauty and grandeur; to cheer the sage, who may then detect the truth of things in an abyss of radiance, clear and lofty; to ravish that imagination of the young, which is kindled by the splendor of eternal light; and to satisfy in all

The increate perpetual thirst, that draws
Toward the realm of God's own form.¶

Such a course, viewed in relation to the number of material images which truth and love assumed on earth, does not afford a prospect of a speedy termination; it rather would prepare us for a work deserving the title of that which Christine de

* Of the Advancement of Learning. † I. 33. ‡ Odyss. I. 260. § Aristoph. Ranæ. 1178.

|| De Legibus, XII.

¶ Dante, Paradise, II.

Pisan wrote, and styled "Le chemin de longue estude." But if a description of the armor of one hero could justly occupy so many verses as those of Homer and Virgil, in explaining that of Achilles and of Æneas, what indulgence may not be granted to him who should endeavor to place before men's eyes the grandeur and holiness of the lives and deaths of men under the ancient Catholic state? *πρὲι γὰρ τίνος ἂν μᾶλλον πολλὰ τις τοῦν ἔχων χαίροι λέγων καὶ ἀκούων; it is such things which, as Socrates says, one should learn to sing to one's self; καὶ χρὴ τὰ τοιαῦτα ὥς περ ἐπὶ τῶν ἑαυτῶ.† They should be embodied before the mind, as if on a painted tablet; that as the poet, says, "even though we lived and speculated alone, Remembrance, like a sovereign prince, might still maintain for us a stately gallery of gay or tragic pictures." Yet I shall not swell the book with those sentences which serve, like straw and wool, to pack precious objects for a rude journey. The passage here will be into quick and generous souls, to whom precious fragments may be offered as I find them, without the delay of enveloping them in this stuffing of one's own creation. Cardan shows the advantage of such a plan, saying, "Brevity of language is of excellent service to persons of competent ability and knowledge, though to stupid and ignorant persons it may be useless. To those who have the power of understanding many things comprised in few words, this style impresses the mind with more force, brings light, and prevents things from vanishing through oblivion; does not produce weariness; and while it increases the authority of the speaker, augments also in the hearer the desire of being gratified."‡ This mode of representing the lion only by showing his claws, was greatly esteemed by the ancients, who studied the utmost brevity and compression in their writings, so as to speak much in a narrow space; whereas the moderns, who can trace no connection unless it can be touched with their fingers, are unable to understand any thing unless it be drawn out at length into a continued flowing discourse. We hardly can get beyond the bark of the old authors, who wrote with the greatest art and study; so that many things still lie deeply buried in their writings, which would amply repay men for the trouble of searching, and which would render any man now admirable. This is still the remark of Cardan, who gives the instance of Plato, who, hating Aristippus and Cleombrotus, wrote that they were in Ægina when Socrates was in prison.§ For it was a fact, that Ægina was only a short distance from Athens.|| From many writers of the middleage also, men might learn "scholastico more presse loqui," although it is from their works that precedents may be produced to justify the frequent occurrence of poetry, with which these pages will be interspersed. Thus the Temple of Honor, by John le Maire, addressed to the Duchesse de Bourbonnois, et d'Auvergne, daughter of Louis XI. is composed of both prose and verse, after the style of the work by Boethius on the Consolations of Philosophy;* as is also Pierre Michault's book, "Le Doctrinal de Cour," and "Le Verger d' Honneur," by André de la Vigne, and the Manuel Royal of John Breche, and the Life of Louis de la Tremouille, by John Bouchet; for the separation of the prose and poetry in this latter work was not made until the year 1536, when the poems were separately published.

* Plato, de Repub. II. † Phædo, 114. ‡ Hieronym. Cardan. de Prudentia civili, Lib. cap. 1.

§ Phædo.

|| Ib. cap. 54.

It may be remarked in general, that the writers of that period loved to embrace the whole of wisdom in their works. Thus, in the famous Tresor of Brunetto the Florentine, which is said to be "un enchaussement des choses divines et humaines," there is an union of theology and the beauties of heathen literature. Perhaps too in this history there will be found matter to illustrate the position of Aristotle, ὅτι χωρίζονται ἀλλήλων αἱ ἀρεταί, † and that of Plato, when he says, that our soul seems to resemble a book,‡ Its form shall not resemble that which the writers of wars give to their histories, nor such as that adopted by men who relate the separate condition of particular states, nor that of those meagre annals which are so tedious and uninviting; but it shall be a mixed style, like that proposed by Dionysius, "composed of every idea, both positive and theoretical, that it may be agreeable both to those who study the policy of nations and to those who devote themselves to philosophic speculation, and also to such as seek a kind of quiet delight in the reading of history."§ So that the subject here proposed would require a writer like the old Monk of Cluny, Udalricus, who collected with diligence the ancient customs of that place; of whom it is said, "He was a learned Father, producing from his treasury things new and old, with which he instructed many to knowledge." It may with truth be said here, referring to what I have found in ancient books,

*Ἔχω καλὰ τε φράσαι, τόλμα τέ μοι
Εὐθεῖα γλῶσσαν ὀρνί'ει λέγειν.¶*

Or, as Pindar sings of himself elsewhere, "There are to me, within the quiver, many quick arrows, sounding to the wise, though with the vulgar they may want an interpreter."

*Φωνᾶντα συνετοῖσιν ἐς
Δὲ τὸ πᾶν, ἐρμηνέων
Χαρίζει ¶*

The whole may be styled a rhapsody, for it is made up of fragments, and from the works of men who, like Homer, flourished in an heroic age—

Hic genus antiquum—————
Magnanimi heroës, nati melioribus annis.

And the rule for such compositions would not be unworthy of a Christian author, for the Scoliaſt on Pindar informs us that the rhapsodists always began with the name of Jove.* Farther than fragments collected in a spirit of reverence, nothing can be expected here.

* Gouget, Bibliotheque François, Tom. X. p.70. † Ethic, VI. 13. ‡ Philebus.
§ Antiquit. Rom. Lib. I. ¶ Pindar, Olymp. XIII. ¶ Olymp. II.  Æneid, VI. 644.

Floriferis ut apes in saltibus omnia libant,
Omnia nos itidem depascimur aurea dicta.†

Certainly if one were ambitious of taking lofty ground in self-defence for such a mode of composition, there might be abundant precedents. Plantus and Terence took whole scenes from ancient poets, and Cardinal Bona appeals to the example of Virgil, Cicero, Aristotle, and also of Plato, who transferred a great part of the work of Philolaus into his Timæus. Nay, Homer himself supplies an instance, as Eustathius shows. Apollodorus used to say, that if any one took from the books of Chrysippus what he had borrowed from others, there would be left only empty sheets. St. Jerome remarks, that the writings of St. Ambrose are filled with the sentences of Origen. The second part of the Somme of St. Thomas is taken almost entirely from the Speculum of Vincentius Belacensis. And such a mode is absolutely inseparable from the course of one who attempts to exhibit ancient manners and ways of thinking :

Veterum volvens monumenta virorum.‡

Which is the object here proposed :—for,

———Tibi res antiquæ laudis et artis
Ingredior, sanctos ausus recludere fontes.§

It may be objected to the design of this work, that it engages one in the support of an arbitrary system, which would lead us from viewing the truth of history. Before replying to this charge, I would observe, that the expression, a system or systematic, may be taken and employed in a double signification ; in a good and praise-worthy sense, as well as in one that deserves blame and rejection. In this latter sense, it appears in those phrases which affirm that some thing is a mere system, or conformable to this or that system, in which judgment, as Frederick Schlegel remarks, “ men do not intend to affirm that it stands upon no ground whatever, a mere creation of caprice, but rather, perhaps, that though it may contain many truths and much good, yet it does not extend to the whole of truth ; or, in a word, that the systematic connection is only external and visible and a mere delusive contrivance ; whereas, in a good and right sense, we may say that a work is a system, or that it is systematic, in allusion to its internal connection, and to the uniform and living unity which pervades it throughout.”|| Now, in this latter sense, every work which is written in the spirit of Catholicism must be a system : that is, it must embrace the whole of truth. However broken and imperfect its arrangement, though it be but a rhapsody, it must still be systematic, in this noble and just sense of the term ; and, in fact, it is nothing but this Catholic view of things, conceived in its highest degree of clearness, which Dante describes in that unrivalled passage, which is near the close of the Paradise, where he says that he looked, and in the depth of the everlasting splendor

*Rhapsody, from ῥάπτω ὥδη, because the Rhapsodists sung fragments from Homer. The Scolist on Pindar, Nem. III. Od. 2, says that they were of the family of Homer, and Pindar calls them the children of Homer.

† Lucret. Lib. III. ‡ Æneid, III. 102. § Georg. II. 174. || Philosophie der Sprache, p. 7.

Saw in one volume clasp'd of love, whate'er
The universe unfolds; all properties
Of substance and of accident beheld Compounded, yet one individual light
The whole.*

Many saintly men, like St. Benedict, have reached the same pitch, in more than poetic semblance, and have described it ; while its practical effects have been the support and consolation of all the just. These have been expressed in the sacred songs : “Ambulabam in latitudine, quia mandata tua exquisivi,” said David ; and again, “Eduxit me in latitudinem ;” and again, “Statuisti in loco spatioso pedes meos.” †

It is true that I shall not stop to take up the odious and degrading objects which may occasionally be met with on the way. We read, in Homer, that when Jove suspended the fatal balance, and the scale of Hector descended, that immediately Apollo left him—

———λίπεν δέ ε Φοῖβος Ἀπόλλων.‡

The Muse should forsake all cursed and condemned things abandoned by God ; not search for them and make them the subject of interminable complaints. “How have my verses injured the state ?” asked Euripides. “Have I composed the history of Phædra otherwise than according to the facts ?” “Nay, according to the facts,” replies his accuser Æschylus. “But you should not have produced what is evil, and bring it upon the scene to pervert the minds of youth.” Some are yet to be convinced of the wisdom of our modern writers, who would agree with Euripides in maintaining that it was more useful to expose on the stage, all the turpitudes of his familiar fables, than to resemble Æschylus in the lofty and superhuman grandeur of his theme.§ Let no one, however, express his alarm here on account of truth. We do not think it a pardonable offence to invent and publish falsehoods, however admirable in appearance respecting holy men, like Pindar, who says that it may be allowable for mortals to frame beautiful tales in honor of the immortals.|| Strictly speaking, however, the best history of these middle ages would be collected from a series of biographical memorials respecting the great and holy personages who flourished from the time of Charlemagne and Alfred till their close. Frederick Schlegel says, "I would rather seek to find the true quality of a Christian state during this period, in a series of portraits, representing men who were great in a Christian sense, and who governed according to Christian principles, than in any scientific definition."* But all things now are full of pedantry. History is only regarded as a mine from which men of every political school can extract the matter which can be made serviceable to the illustration of their respective theories; and even when they loudly protest against such an application of historical study, they are still like inquisitive mechanics, who, when presented at the representation of a solemn tragedy, occupy themselves solely endeavoring to discover by what wires and pulleys the scenes are shifted, and the artifices of the stage conducted, without ever having one thought excited by the harmony of the heroic pageant. How much wiser and more acute are those who are sitting in ignorance of what passes behind the scenes and only anxious to co-operate with the moral intentions of the poet, which were to instruct, to delight, and to move! Whether it be from a mere vanity, which makes men anxious to evince the powers of an analytical mind, even though it is to be misapplied, or whether it be from the deeper motive mentioned by St. Jerome, saying, "Lacerant sanctum propositum, et remedium pœnæ suæ arbitrantur, si nemo sit sanctus,"† or whether it arise from that mistaken principle which perverts the whole of modern philosophy, and which displays men as the poet says, who

* Canto XXXIII. † Ps. cxviii. 17, 30. ‡ XXII. 212. § Aristoph. Ranæ, 1055. || Olymp.I.

Viewing all objects unremittingly,
In disconnection dead and spiritless;
And still dividing, and dividing still,
Break down all the grandeur,‡ the great object of modern research seems to consist in contriving arguments which will oblige men to renounce their admiration for ancient deeds of virtue, and to come to the conclusion, that there is no one who can show them any good. Well might the poet feel it sad

————— to hear
The repetitions wearisome of sense
Where soul is dead, and feeling hath no place;
Where knowledge, ill begun, in cold remark
On outward things, with formal inference ends.

A distinguished professor in the Academy of Paris complains of the Germans, and says that "whenever a social state appears noble and good, seen on one grand side, they regard it with an exclusive admiration and sympathy. They are inclined generally to admire, to be impassioned; imperfections, deficiencies, and the bad side of things strike them but little. Singular contrast! In the sphere purely intellectual, in the research and combination of ideas, no people have more extent of mind and more philosophic impartiality ; and when facts are concerned which address themselves to the imagination, which excite moral emotions, they fall easily into narrow prejudice and confined views ; their imagination wants fidelity and faith : they lose all poetical impartiality ; they do not see things under all their faces, and such as they really are.”* This long dogmatical censure, as far as it is intelligible, proves only the good sense and judgment which guides the imagination that it condemns. Sin and evil are only negations in the universal view of this creation, and to the person whose mind is united with the source and essence of all created things, they are as if not existing. They interrupt not for a moment his view of the immensity of that great glory for which his heart devoutly returns continual thanks.

* Philosophie der Geschichte, II. 20. † Epist. XXVIII. ‡ Wordsworth, the Excursion.

It may be further objected to the present design, that it does not suppose sufficient attention to distinguish the peculiar character of each age in the annals of the Christian society, and that consequently it would tend to give, at the best, but a very confused idea of the history of the period. But nothing can be farther from it than to profess to give a history of these ages in any ordinary sense of the term. The object in view is to show in how many details the life and institutions of men were then inspired with the Christian spirit, and if the succession of ages are not always distinguished, it is because such a distinction would be wholly unnecessary to the proposed argument. And after all, as far as relates to the greatest part of the subjects that will here be introduced, all ages of the Church are one and the same, in like manner as when the soul is united to God, there is for her neither past nor future ; she is in possession of eternity, and in the bosom of this immutable eternity, which is God ; she possesses all things.

Looking at the point whereto all times are present;

I deny not, that in some respects there may be ground for many timid friends of truth to think that there is danger and novelty in the course which is here laid down for us. What more dangerous, they will say, than to attempt to eulogize these ancient times, which so many deem to have been buried in darkness and barbarism ? And

Why dost thou with single voice renew memorial of their praise?

I admit, that in some parts we may seem to arrive at troubled and turbid waters. Convinced, however, notwithstanding the arguments of the sophists, that there is always excellent store beyond them ; I only ask, in the Platonic style, “Whether I, being youngest, and having experience of many streams, may not be permitted to try to first pass alone, leaving those who would counsel me to watch in safety, and determine if it be fordable to them also who are older ; that if it should prove so, they also may cross over, but if it be not passable, it will be of no importance that I should incur danger.”* We shall enter on a forest where no track of steps hath worn a way, but it may resemble that forest of Colonea, the forest of the sombre destinies, yet flourishing with all the sweet verdure of a Grecian spring, within which the laurel, and the olive, and the vine are found, and where the nightingale pours forth her ceaseless song.† I shall not find the track of many lately preceding us. For there is no chance here of discovering mines of gold and silver, or any thing that can be turned into money; nor can I hope that many will hereafter follow. I am but a lonely gleaner “through fields time-wasted;” but the weakest may do something, and as a father says, “sometimes what has been left by the perfect is found by a little boy.” It will be something in our age to bring any one to renounce the style of the ignoble Capaneus, “We are much better than our fathers:”

*Guizot, Cours d' Hist. Mod. IV. 3.

Τῷ μὴ μοι πατέρας ποθ' ὁμοίῃ ἔρθεο τιμῇ;‡

and to say not merely from devotion, but upon a ground of historical veracity, “Sufficit mihi Domine; neque enim melior sum quam patres mei.” It will be something to make the proud world see that all were not of its train; that there were those “who faith preferred, and piety to God.” But whatever be the supposed danger, or the apparent novelty, let it be well understood that the whole is written in a spirit of the most humble submission to the judgment of our holy mother the Catholic Church, and that if any thing should be in the least at variance with that judgment, I renounce, and in proportion to the degree of variance, abhor it with the utmost clearness of tongue and sincerity of heart.

In a little work that once met the eye of a few persons, whom chance or private friendship directed to it, which attempted to unfold the ways of the ancient chivalry, may perhaps be traced the commencement of this course, of which I now enter upon the last stages. Here we need a still more simple construction, and one ought to perceive already that we move in a freer sphere, as in imagination we draw nearer to the limit where all wishes end. It should be no longer that same mixture of grace and terror, as when we consorted with the offspring of earth and darkness. The burlesque and the ignoble ought to disappear. We are entering as if within that circle of hope described by Dante, which inspires temperance in sadness, and a melancholy, always gentle, which has left all the misanthropy of this lower world and of hell. The haughty knight, severe and inflexible in his judgments, must disappear now or leave but few traces, and we shall seem, though some will ascribe it only to a greater degree of weakness, to have lost the memory of the agitations of the world: and though the subject of this book will be so high above me, there need be no charge of great presumption, for it will not be as priest or man of blessed order that I shall propose my thoughts, but like to those who, speaking before their betters with reverent awe,

* Plato, de Legibus, Lib. X.

† Sophoc. Œdip. Col.

‡ H. IV. 410.

Draw not the voice alive unto their lips.

I shall but suggest things in imperfect sounds; coming forth as the meanest brother, that has only charge of the outward gate of the blissful enclosure, or perhaps as the last comer among the rude strangers of the common hall; and if still sometimes there should be aught of rash and intemperate observable, it will be enough to remember, that such men have long haunted the proud courts of mundane chivalry, and that time is needful no less for diseases of the mind than for those of the body. The sea itself, for a long while after the tempest, is still agitated; still its waves retire back to return again and dash themselves against the shore, and it is not till after a great interval that they become appeased and recover their original tranquillity. Ah! truly, to lead men to consort with the spirits of the great and good of times gone by, demands a tongue not used to childlike babbling:—

Myself I deem not worthy, and none else
Will deem me. I, if on this voyage then
I venture, fear it will in folly end;*

for I shall sometimes catch, even amidst the music of angelic bells, the wild measure of those tales that once charmed me:

Rude though they be, still with the chime
Return the thoughts of early time.

Then will begin to rise the ancient pride, and like the last minstrel in Newark's tower, he who once loved all the pomp of chivalry, will begin, perhaps, (such grounds are there for suspecting the truth of Plato's nation, that names are of some importance in determining the human course,)

————— to talk anon
Of good Earl Francis dead and gone,
And of Earl Walter, rest him God!
A braver never to battle rode.

Thus, "speaking of matters, once perhaps befitting well to speak, now better left untold;" and then going on to say—

————— He would full fain,
He could recall an ancient strain
He never thought to sing again.

For he too his legendary song could tell

* Dante, Hell. II.

Of ancient deed, so long forgot ;
 Of feuds whose memory was not ;
 Of forests, now laid waste and bare ;
 Of towers which harbor now the hare ;
 Of manners, long since changed and gone :
 Of chiefs, who under their grey stone
 So long had slept, that fickle fame
 Hath blotted from her rolls their name.

Alas ! it must indeed be admitted, in concluding this preliminary discourse, that, in alluding almost inadvertently to this seductive power of deceitful images, and to this variety of contending themes, within the bounds of the imagination, we have laid bare a source of real danger, enough to make us proceed tremblingly on our way in thoughtfulness and dread ; for it is the counsel of the wise, as given in the words of Albert the Great, that we should abstain from the phantasms and images of corporeal things, because above all things that mind pleases God which is naked and stript from these “ forms and features ; since it is certain, that if the memory, imagination, and thought be at leisure often to dwell on such things, it will follow that the mind must be entangled with new or with the relics of ancient things, or be variously qualified, according to other objects ; and the spirit of grace and truth departs from thoughts which are without understanding. Therefore a true lover of Jesus Christ ought to be so united in understanding, by a good will to the Divine will and to goodness, and so removed from all phantasms and passions, that he should not observe whether he be despised or honored, or in what way soever entreated, but should be in a manner transformed into the Divine likeness, so as not to see any other creatures or himself unless only in God, and so as to love only God, and to remember nothing of others or of himself, unless in God.”*

These are the thoughts which purge the world’s gross darkness off, and which heal the wounds of those that weep to see “the heathen come.” I would exclaim in those words of Dante to the spirit of Oderigi, who had shown the vanity of earthly ambition. True great Albert,

True are thy sayings; to my heart they breathe
 The kindly spirit of meekness, and allay
 What tumors rankle there.†

* Albertus, M. de adhaerendo Deo, cap. VI.

† Purg. XI.

CHAPTER II.

AND now delaying no longer through distrust, for they will assist me whose manners I record, let us advance as if we heard entoned the sentence from the mount, as if voices in strain ineffable did sing, "Blessed are the poor in spirit." Blessed the poor! Ah, how far unlike to this the learning of those that are without. There it was said with the great Stagyrice, "We fear all evil things; such as loss of fame, poverty, sickness, friendlessness, and death."* And here we are taught that each one of these can be the object of a Christian's love who meekly follows Christ. Aristotle insists that it is disgraceful, and indicative, of the highest insolence not to fear the want of glory. So far behind does his famed learning halt. The Athenian, with Plato, would make a law in every state to this effect, "Let there be no poor person in the city, let such a person be banished from the cities, and from the forum, and from the country fields, that the country may be altogether pure and free from an animal of this kind."† In short, for four thousand years poverty was looked upon as a dreadful evil, a sign of malediction, insomuch that even he who was by such love inspired, that all our world craves tidings of his doom, prayed to God to deliver him from it. And such continues to be the case, for wherever the influences of the Catholic Church of Christ has not become dominant, the same sentiments maintain their ground among men, and form them to action. The poor are still those vile animals against whom the Athenian proposed to make laws, banishing them from every place of public resort, that the country may be clear of them. The Bonzes of Japan, in the time of St. Francis Xavier, even taught that neither the poor nor women could be saved, and the contrary doctrine of the Gospel was what chiefly rendered the preaching of that holy missionary so strange to them.‡ The ages of faith were admirable in the contrast which they exhibited to this opinion and practice respecting the condition of poverty, as I shall proceed to show, by pointing out what were the sentiments held respecting it, and what was, in fact, the practice of men during that period. The sentiments, the principles, the philosophy, or, in short, the religion of men, in these ages, taught expressly that since the incarnate Son of God had chosen poverty for himself, and poverty in all its bitter circumstances, and had pronounced a blessing upon the spirit which corresponded with it, it was therefore a good and holy state to be borne cheerfully by all, and even to be embraced voluntarily by such as aspired to perfection; and in fact many, who like St. Dominic, as Dante says, seemed messengers and friends fast-knit to Christ, showed their first love after the first counsel that Christ gave. "Let the Pagan," says St. Bernard, "seek riches, who lives without God; let the Jew seek them, who receives temporal promises; but with what front, or with what mind can a Christian seek riches, after that Christ has proclaimed the poor blessed?"* "Not to have the burden of poverty," says St. Augustin, "is to have the burden more than needful of riches." The rich will discover at the last day what a weight has been this burden, unless the poor shall have relieved them of it by receiving their alms. There will remain nothing to them but that terrible woe of the Gospel, Vae vobis divitibus, Christ in his Gospel speaks to the rich only to thunder against their bride, Vae vobis divitibus! A virgin can conceive, a barren woman can bring forth a child, a rich man can be saved; these are three miracles of which the Holy Scriptures give us no other reason, but only that God is all powerful. This is what Bossuet says in his discourse on St. Francis of Assisium. St. Chrysostom says that there are always three considerations which should make a rich Christian humble, the contrast between the condition of the rich and that of Jesus Christ in poverty, the choice which Jesus Christ made of poverty for himself, and the character of malediction which he seems to have fixed upon riches. "Oh if we loved God as we ought," cries St. Augustin, "we should not have any love for money."† "The rich man speaks of his money," says St. Cyprian, "his goods, his riches, which are all to be kept for himself."‡

* Ethic, Nicomach. Lib. III. 6.

† Όπως ή χώρα του τοιούτου ζώου καθαρά γίγνηται τὸ παράπαν. De Legibus, Lib. XI.

‡ Bouhour's Vie de St. F. Xavier, II, 67.

——How many from their grave
Shall with shorn locks arise; who living, ay,
And at life's last extreme, of this offence,
Through ignorance, did not repent! §

How many are, even now, like the snakes described by Virgil?

——Quàm vellent æthere in alto
Nunc et pauperiem et duros perferre labores! ||

Now, at least, they know, "how dear it costeth not to follow Christ."

"What have we to answer," asks St. Cyprian, "to the arguments of Satan against these wretched men, when he asserts that they have always served him and offered him their treasures? How can we defend the souls of the rich covered with such thick darkness?"¶ "Woe to you, his wretched followers!" cries Dante, on beholding their distress in hell.

Of gold and silver ye have made your god
Diff'ring wherein from the idolater,

* Sermon I. De omnibus sanctis.
§ Dante, Purgatory, XXII.

† In Joan. Tract. XL. 20.
|| Vl. 436.

‡ Epist. II.
¶ De Bon. Op. et Eleemos.

But that he worships one, a hundred ye?
How must the trumpet sound for you, since yours
Is the third chasm.——

Some of the ancient sages were not without an insight into the evil and danger of riches, however that truth was generally obscured. Plato shows that the man who would correspond in his own life to the best constituted state must despise riches from his youth.* The man who in his life corresponds to a state whose constitution is mixed with good and evil, will despise riches while young; but as he grows old, he will become fond of them, because he partakes of the money-loving nature, τοῦ φιλοχρημάτου φύσεως, from not being devoted purely to virtue, through having lost the best guard, which consists in reason tempered with music, Λόγου μουσικῇ κερραμένον· which alone is the preserver of virtue through life to whoever possesses it. And in another place he says, "We have proved, therefore, that the very rich are not good men, and if not good, that they cannot be happy."† And of the rich and powerful man, Socrates says elsewhere, "that he is always in want of most things, and that he appears poor indeed if any one knows how to view his whole soul."‡ In another place, he speaks as follows: "Who can question the possibility of the sons and descendants of kings and despots being born with a true philosophic nature? No one certainly. But perhaps it will be said, that if such sons should be born to them, their disposition must, of necessity, be corrupted, for we have ourselves admitted that it is very difficult to save it. But that in all the lapse of time there should not have been one saved, it would be absurd to suppose. If, then you grant the possibility of one escaping, it is sufficient to justify our hypothesis and to screen us from the charge of teaching impossibilities."§ This is language sufficiently discouraging to the rich, of whom there are many, and the good are rare. In truth, even according to the morals of Aristotle, such men might generally be found guilty in the two respects of deficiency in giving, and of excess in appropriating: || τῇ τ' ἐλλείψει τῆς δόσεως καὶ τῇ ὑπερβολῇ τῆς λήψεως. He says elsewhere, that "men who have ever so little, think that they have enough of virtue, but that they would go on to infinity adding to their wealth and possessions, to their power and glory."¶ Plato represents Socrates as laughing at men of this description, and saying, as if he had lived on the bank of Thames, "that they would regard it as the height of happiness if they could have gold even within their bodies, three talents in their stomach, a talent in their skull, and a statera in each eye; and that they envy the Scythians for having their skull lined with gold, though it is for men to drink out of them."

But it was only in the school of Christ that ordinary men were enabled to discover the depth of the evil, and the exceeding folly of that spirit of appropriating riches to themselves. St. Chrysostom asks, "Why does not the gold that shines in the shops of merchants give you the same pleasure as if it belonged to you personally? At least this would not involve you in such a number of torments. You reply, because it does not belong to you. Thence I conclude that it is nothing but avarice which makes you love all these treasures. What mean these expressions, this is ours, and that does not belong to us? When I examine these words to the bottom I find only vanity and nothingness. How often does a single moment cause people to lose for ever what they call theirs? All this applies equally to those vast possessions, those magnificent houses, those delicious gardens, of which the rich men of this world are so proud, and in allusion to which you will find that the words 'mine and ours' are senseless and vain. For the use of these things is common to all, only those who are called the possessors have the trouble of taking care of them."* St. Chrysostom does not seem here to contemplate the possibility of such a state as that in which no one but the actual possessor was allowed to enjoy the goods of life, such as may now be seen in countries where a servile war has repeatedly been on the eve of breaking out, to close the tragedy of "mine and thine," personages which have played such a part from the very first in that drama partaking of the terrible and the ludicrous, which professed to represent the downfall of superstition and the establishment by law of the reign of primitive Christianity!

* De Repub. VIII. † De Legibus, Lib. V. ‡ De Repub. Lib. IX. § De Repub. Lib. VI.
|| Ethic, Lib. IV. cap. I. ¶ Polit. Lib. VII. c. I.  Plat. Euthydemus.

What must be the wretched state of that mind which can find delight in the solitude of pride, in the gloomy seclusion of vast parks, from which God and men are equally excluded? In the middle ages the castle of the Lord was surrounded by the houses of his dependants, and yet even then it was not a secret that his elevation had no privilege as to greater happiness. Martial d'Auvergne, in his Vigils of the death of Charles VII. contrasts the life of the great with that of the poor, and says

Mieux vaut liesse
L'accueil et l'adresse,
L'armour et simplesse
Des bergiers pasteurs,
Qu' avoir à largesse
Or, argent, richesse,
Ne la gentillesse
De ses grans Seigneurs;
Car ils ont douleurs
Et des maulx greigneurs;
Mais pour nos labeurs
Nous avons sans cesse
Les beaulx prés et fleurs,
Fruitaiges, odeurs,
Et joye à nos cueurs,
Sans mal qui nous blesse.†

* Tractatus de Virginitate, cap. 24.

† Gouget, Biblioth. Française, Tom. X. 51.

And in a later age François Maynard could affirm in song, "that all the pompous houses of princes,"

Ne sont que de belles prisons
Pleines d'illustres misérables.*

What did a splendid palace profit Cosmo de Medicis when, after the death of John, he used to walk in sorrowful meditation through the vast apartments, observing that it was too large a house for so small a family? Yet such is moral blindness! Our Lord never inhabited any house which he could call his own, and we must establish ourselves in castles and Louvres which are to be called ours, as if we were never to leave our present habitations.

Riches were also known to be evil in a Christian sense, because of the innumerable obstacles which they evidently oppose to the spiritual life. "Ubi rerum omnium abundantia est, ibi plerumque etiam vitiorum," says Drexelius.† Fuller confesses, in his quaint style, the secret which explained many changes which had lately occurred in his unhappy country: "The possession of superfluous wealth sometimes doth hinder our clear apprehensions of matters." "Merchants," says Cardan, "and they who arrive at riches by a continued course of smiling fortune, and also the majority of nobles, are time servers."‡ "Avoid the great, and confer no benefit upon them, for they are by nature ungrateful; and the experience of this fact is more known than the reason is evident."§ Nobility, when it is not bound by the chains of the Catholic religion, will generally be proud and terrible in proportion to its power; and men who have only the sentiments of nature will be found to regard it alternately with abhorrence and with a kind of superstitious awe. Children dread the approach of those great men of the earth; and even age forgets, in his presence, what is due to its own native dignity. The proud rich man shows himself to his visitors and guests, as Plutarch says, "ὑποδελίζεσθαι προσκυνοῦμενον καὶ καταστολιζόμενον καὶ ἀναπлатτόμενον ὑπ' αὐτῶν ὥσπερ ἄγαλμα βαρβαρικόν."||

In ages of faith, when such men did appear they were sure to hear language as bold and severe as that of St. Jerome, when he said, "Do not say to me, I am sprung from an illustrious race; I have always lived in delights, in the midst of every luxury; I cannot deprive myself of wine, nor of these exquisite meats, nor adopt so severe a mode of life. I would answer you with all the rigor of my ministry. Well, then, live according to your law, since you cannot live according to the law of God."¶ They would have been reminded, that some centuries before the very title on which they prided themselves signified a miscreant, for the méscréants and infidels were the "Gentiles." Father Louis of Grenada was unable to take any other view of the great nobles of his age, of whom he said pub-

* Ib. Tom. XVI. 69. † De conformit. humanæ voluntatis cum Divin. Lib. V. cap. 7.

‡ Prudentia Civilis, cap. VI. § Ib. cap. XL. ¶ How to discern true Friends XXXV.

¶ S. Hieronym. Epist. ad Eustath.

lily, that almost all by pride and heaping up riches precipitate themselves and their heirs into hell.*

Curst be estate got with so many a crime,
Yet this is oft the stair by which men climb,†

To follow the spirit and manners of the gentle by denomination, from the times described by Spelman in his history of sacrilege to the present, one might almost suppose that the world had receded to that state during which the title passed under its heathen signification. That balance of Critolaus, of which the goods of the soul were placed in one scale and those of the body in the other,‡ places them in no dilemma, for they decide without deliberation. They stigmatize the choice of a Francis and an Anthony as the folly of an abject superstition; and it would be hard even to find among them an example such as that of the heathen youth Lysiteles, who says of his poor friend, "Quia sine omni malitia est, tolerare egestatem ejus volo.§ Speak to them of "loving holy poverty, humility, and patience, following the way of Christ and of his saints,"|| like such multitudes of men of all ranks as did embrace this way in the ages of faith, and they reply, as in the words of Spencer,

———"Lett be thy bitter scorn
And leave the rudenesse of that antique age
To them, that live therein in state forlorne.
Thou that dost live in later times must wage Thy works for wealth, and life for gold engage."¶

And even when their language is intended to be all disinterestedness and noble sentiment, even when these high-minded followers of reformers and patriots are for declaring their ardent desire to make every personal sacrifice to further some end which is to bear the semblance and win the honors of a holy cause, their tongues are unable to complete a sentence without providing always that there shall be "a reasonable equivalent" for themselves. Here an important reflection suggests itself. We often seem lost in astonishment at the slowness of men to comply with the loving invitations of the Church of Christ; we are amazed that unanswerable arguments should produce no effect upon the crowd of rich philosophers, who are all considered by the world as such enlightened judges. Ah! we might learn the reason of this from the Evangelist, where he says of some who heard all the things spoken by Christ, "erant avari et deridebant illum." How should we expect them to answer otherwise to the dispensers of his mysteries? especially in a land like that the poet speaks of, "where for lucre a 'no' is quickly made?"

"Wisdom herself," says Pindar, "is fettered by gain."

ἀλλὰ κέρδει καὶ σοφίᾳ δέδεται.††

And Mammon wins his way when seraphs might despair!

* In Festo alienjus martyris Concio II. † Tasso, II. 58. ‡ Cicero, Tuscul. V. 17.

§ Plautus, Trinum. II. 2. || Them. à Kempis, De tribus tabernaculis, I.

¶ Fairy Queen, II. 7.  Luc. XVI. 14. †† Pyth. Ode. III.

True, such men may sometimes appear to be convinced, and even perhaps moved in their will to embrace the holy law of Catholics, but it will be only to furnish an example of a most strange and awful phenomenon in the human heart. Father Lewis of Grenada points out this, "How subtle is self-love, and how it seeks some utility for itself, even amidst noble affections. When Paul disputed concerning the judgment to come, before Felix, with such force, that we are told that Felix was filled with awe, and that he trembled, what do we find was the consequence of this terror? Truly a wonderful thing. 'At the same time,' says Luke, 'he hoped that he would receive money from Paul.' Who could have conceived this?"*

No longer, then, let any one be surprised at finding every intellectual force unavailable with the rich, or with those who love money, in poverty: with those whom Cicero describes as, "a race of men horrible and fearful, who hold their possessions embraced with such love, that rather than relinquish them, you would say, their limbs might sooner be torn from their bodies."†

But how far have we wandered from beatitude? Beati pauperes! Ah! how deeply did these words sink into the hearts of men in faithful ages! Such is the eminent dignity of the poor in the Church, that Bossuet declares that already, even in this world, by means of the Church, God has partly fulfilled that sentence which will hereafter be fully accomplished, that the last shall be first, and the first last. In the world, the poor seem born only to serve the rich; on the contrary, in the holy Church, the rich are only admitted on condition of their serving the poor; for those that are the last in the world are first in the Church. "The Church, therefore," says Bossuet, "may be called the city of the poor, as it is the city of God." To the poor was the Saviour sent, to the poor he preached his first sermon. It was the poor who first entered into the Church; it was the poor whom God chose, that they might be rich in faith and heirs of his kingdom. St. Paul besought the brethren to pray for him, that the service which he was about to render to the poor, that is, the alms he was about to give, might be agreeable to them.‡ With such honor did he revere them! In the world the rich may assume and bear proud titles, but in the Church of Jesus Christ they are only recognized as the servants of the poor.§ Observe how this philosophy prevailed in the middle ages. "The Church," says Jona, "wishes to have rich men, such as the Apostle describes, men rich in good works; for the Church understands, by a rich man, one who is rich in Christ; but as for others, they should have no honor among Christians. They are rich at home in gold and silver but in the Church they are beggars."|| It is most curious to observe how in these ages the love which men entertained for the beauty of the divine temples

* In Festo B. Jacobi Concio II.

† Pro L. Flacco.

‡ Rom. xv. 30, 31.

§ Sermon sur l'éminente dignité des pauvres dans l'Eglise.

|| Iona Aurelianensis Episcop. de Institutione Laicali, Lib. I. cap. 20. apud Dacher. Spicileg. Tom. I.

induced them to labor with constant diligence in order to qualify themselves for entering them ; so that to this end they strove with as much care as men now seek to heap up temporal riches to support their living in the secular courts. They cared not if they were beggars in the world's eye, if they were conscious of having sent that treasure before them which they might hope to find

When that the two assemblages shall part,
One rich eternally, the other poor.*

Hereafter we shall have occasion to show in detail, how, under the influence of the Church, a multitude of institutions arose to minister both to the spiritual and material wants of the poor, founded too without gold or silver, but with prayers and fasting, and meek humility ; but of these, one instance must be sufficient for the present, to give an idea of the spirit which animated them all.

In a letter of St. Theresa written to Father Dominick Bagnez, there is the following sentence : " Be assured, Father, that it is an occasion of the greatest joy to me whenever I receive sisters who bring nothing with them to the convent, whom I receive for the love of God ; I wish I might receive them all in this manner."† There is at present before me a task which might seem to some very difficult, to show that the influence of this philosophy was diffused in some degree even over the rude and troubled scene of civil society. There exists a long letter from Pope Gregory the Great to the sub-deacon Peter, who had been charged with the administration of the goods of the Church of Sicily, in which the Pontiff desires him to attend minutely to the interests of the rustic population, and to abolish various customs which oppressed them, and which he adds, " he detests altogether."‡ Guizot observes that these prescriptions of benevolence and justice will explain why the people were always so anxious to be placed under the domination of the Church, for that the lay proprietors were then very far from watching so carefully over the interest of the inhabitants of their domains.§ This is a just observation ; but yet it is no less true that the principle of respect being due to the poor, was forced by religion even upon the secular society. The famous ordinance of Louis le Hutin for the enfranchisement of the serfs began thus ; " Since according to the right of nature, every one should be born free, and that by certain usages and customs, which have been introduced and kept from great antiquity in our kingdom, and that by adventure many of our common people are fallen into condition of servitude which greatly displeases us ; We, considering that our kingdom is called the kingdom of the Franks, and wishing that the thing should in truth agree with the name, by deliberation of our great council have ordained, and do ordain, that generally throughout our kingdom, as far as in us lies, and in our successors, such servitudes should be abolished, and that

* Dante, Pur. XIX.

† Vie de S. Thérèse, par de Villefore, Tom. 1.

‡ S. Greg. Epist. Lib. I. 41.

§ Cours d'Hist. Mod. IV. 8.

freedom should be given on good and agreeable condition to all those who are fallen into servitude, either by origin, or by marriage, or by residence.”* Guizot says, speaking of this ordinance, that in our age the emperor Alexander would not have dared to publish a similar ukase in Russia : he would not have dared to proclaim that, according to the right of nature, all men should be born free. † In these ages, life was all in harmony with itself, and poetry, united with domestic manners and with social activity, was a source of consolation to the poor as well as to the rich. The greatest part of men’s time was not devoted to business and speculations, and to what is now called the positive of existence, while only some rare hours belonged, as a privilege, to a select few, during which they might procure emotions by purchase, at a theatre or in a library : and how small is even this privileged number ! A late French writer makes this reflection : “ The immense majority,” he remarks, “ are delivered over to labors which nothing ennobles, to cares which nothing can console.” There is no more servitude we are told ; the emancipation of the people is accomplished. Well, but liberty alone is not sufficient for man ; it can be only a mean, never an end. Witness the savage ; he is free, and yet what is he ? In the middle ages the social state was no doubt imperfect ; Christianity had not terminated her work, but was it not better to be one of the people then, than to be so now in the nineteenth century ? Was there not more movement around him, and did he not participate in it in a manner more immediate and direct ? He was a serf, it is true, but now is he not a workman ? The first held to something ; a moral tie attached him to the family of his master, to the castle whose old towers protected him as they had his fathers ; to the Church at whose door he assumed all the dignity of a man and of a Christian, and which offered an inviolable asylum against the power of the world. Around him all was animated ; his habits, his labors, his privations, his perils, were all connected with ideas in which he had faith, and for which he would have died gladly. Behold that great sensation caused by Peter the Hermit, and by St. Bernard. Harken to the voice of the millions of obscure priests, who are each a power, and who like Foulques de Neuilly, Martin Litz, Herloin, Eustache de Flay, &c., repeated throughout Europe the words which Rome was addressing not to kings, but to Christianity at large. It was in speaking to nations, and in stirring up all the popular convictions, that Urban II. made himself be understood at Clermont, and it was by speaking the same language that Innocent III., Innocent IV., Gregory IX., Pius II., and so many other great Pontiffs, kept alive the sacred fire and enthusiasm, which was to preserve the Christians of the east. It may be observed that all the negotiations of Rome, purely political, to determine kings to bear assistance to the Christian colonies of Asia, and afterwards to the Greek empire, when it was menaced by the successors of Othman, were ineffectual against the rivalry of interests or the implacable enmities of courts ; but when the Popes, afflicted by the sad news which came from the Holy Land, showed to the Christian people their brethren of the East, struggling against the sultans of Egypt and Damascus; when they endeavored to excite their sympathy for the young colonies of Edessa, Tripoli, and Antioch, founded at the price of their fathers' blood; and, above all, when they made Jerusalem speak, Jerusalem, again polluted by the infidels, then were kings borne away by the people, and obliged to yield before the will of the devout and heroic multitude. Their political combinations could not resist the murmuring population, which demanded an account of their delays. It was not from the circle of courts, but from the heart of countries, that proceeded those cries of enthusiasm and of faith, "Jérusalem, Jérusalem! Dieu le veut! il le faut!"* So then it was not merely in the decline of the minstrel's art that the wandering harper might ——— Tune to please a peasant's ear,

* Ordonnanc. des Rois, T. I. p. 588.

† Cours d’Hist. IV. 8.

The harp a king had loved to hear.

For there was an union of feeling and even of taste, and a community of enjoyments among the high and low. The same poet, who devoted his genius to instruct princes and nobility, paid an equal regard to the wants of the poor, of artisans and country laborers, who are all severally addressed by Simon Bougouine, in his famous Poem of the Young Prince conquering the Kingdom of Good Renown.† John Bouchet, who wrote so many chivalrous books, in his Epistles gives instruction to all classes of men, from the throne to the cabin: the ploughman is taught with as much detail as the prince; the knightly author disdains no state, not even that of the young scholar in the University of Poitiers, nor that of the printer and bookseller.‡ The gentle Symphorien Champier also, in his "Nef des Princes et des Batailles de Noblesse," gives instruction, useful and profitable, to all kinds of people, to teach them how to live and die well.§ In fact, there is no feature of the heroic character, in the middle ages, of which we find more explicit notice, than its Christian affection for the poor, and its scrupulous delicacy in defending them from injustice, as in the instance related by Don Diego Savedra Faxarda, of the king, Don Alonzo VII. who no sooner discovered that an outrage had been committed upon a poor laborer by a certain noble, than he flew in disguise with such speed to inflict punishment, that it was executed before the guilty oppressor knew that he had been discovered. Don Fernando, the Catholic, did nearly the same thing when he set out secretly from Medina to Salamanca, where he seized Rodriguez Maldonat, who had been guilty of oppression in the fortress of Monleon.||

The very maxims of nobility had a tone of spirituality, which had been infused into them by the Catholic religion, and which tended to soften the distinction between rich and poor. "Nobility," says the knight, who argues with the clerk, in a famous book of chivalry, "proceeds at first from nobleness of manners and virtue. Richesses ne peuvent tollre ne donner noblesse ; car richesse sont de soy viles ; et ce qui est vil ne peut aucun nobiliter ;" and riches are vile, because he who hath them "est toujours angoisseux et en souey."*

* Le Correspondant, 43. † Gouget, Tom. X. 169. ‡ Ibid. Tom. XI. 303. § Ibid. X. 216.
|| Mariana, Hist. Hisp.

But whatever may be thought as to the political situation in these ages of the poor, to whom is promised a spiritual, not a material recompense, there can be no doubt but that the sentence from the mount was fully verified, which pronounces them to be blessed. The moderns, indeed, would hear poverty speaking in her own defence, with far more impatience than did Blepsidemus and Chremulus. Nevertheless, her arguments, as stated in that old play, are unanswerable, even in the school of political economists. The best answer that they can make to her, would be in the unblushing confession of Blepsidemus,—“Truly, by Hereules, I wish to be rich and to feast with my children and my wife, and then, washed and adorned, proceeding from the bath, to spurn at laborers and at poverty.”† “The rich man,” as is observed in the Platonic dialogue, “has power to commit crimes which the poor man is prevented from accomplishing ; the powerful can commit crimes which the infirm are unable to act ; riches and power are therefore evils, so far as they give means of operations to the will which is inclined to evil.”‡

When Zeno heard that the ship was lost, in which was all his property, he said,—“You do well, O fortune, driving me to the scip and to a life of philosophy !”§ Oh, how deeply were these truths felt by Christians in ages of faith ! and with what sweetness and conviction are they expressed by them ! Will you hearken to one of that family whom the Lord girt humbly ? “The falcon, when she is too full, will not know her master : so it was with the prodigal son. Riches did separate him from God, and poverty brought him home again.” This is what Father Diego de Stella remarks, in his work on the Contempt of the World.|| “Contemplate our Lord,” says St. Bonaventura, “seated at the well, waiting for the return of his disciples with food, and see with what humility and condescension he speaks to that poor woman of Samaria, and contemplate his frugality ; for the disciples were to return with food, but where was he to eat it ? At the side of the well, or by a stream or fountain, and this you may believe was his custom, through poverty and simplicity of life. He had no exquisite dainties, no curious vessels, no delicate wine, but pure water from that fountain or rivulet.”¶ The ancients, even in their blind unhappy state, were yet sensible of the blessedness of the very circumstances which are now deemed the evils of poverty :—

* Le Songe du Vergier. † Aristoph. Plutus, 613. ‡ Eryaias. § Plutarch, de exilio.

|| On the Contempt of the World, by F. Diego de Stella, of the order of St. Francis; translated from the Spanish. St. Omers, 1622. Part i. 87.

¶ Meditationes vitæ Christi, cap. xxxi.

"Yet was their manner then but bare and playne;
For th' antique world excesse and pryde did hate,
Such proud luxurious pompe is swollen up but late."

"It seemed," as Cicero says, "an evident thing, and nature herself daily taught them, quam paucis, quam parvis rebus egeat, quam vilibus."* There was the supper of Xenoerates, which was enough to teach men that they had no need of riches, and that bribery could not stain their souls.† The laws of Crete, given by Minos, or by Jove himself, and those of Lyeurgus, as Cicero observes, trained youth to virtue by labor, and hunger, and thirst, and cold.‡ Plato introduces a speaker, who praises the discipline observed by the Lacedemonian youth, and expressly commends their practice of going barefooted in winter, and of their sleeping under the stars without a bed, and having no servants to wait upon them, wandering over the country by night and by day; and in reply to the question of an Athenian, he says that "valor and a manly spirit are not evinced merely by resisting fear and pain, but by overcoming desires, and pleasures, and luxury."§

Is it not strange that men professing to be Christians should attempt to condemn the same state of manners, when resulting from Christian discipline, poverty and simplicity? "The best discipline for the body," says Plato, "is that simple and Homeric economy, which corresponds to the tone of the simplest music, ἡ βελτίστη γυμναστικὴ ἀδελφὴ τις ἂν εἴη τῆς ἀπλῆς μουσικῆς; for simplicity in music produces temperance and wisdom in the soul, and in gymnastic discipline, health in the body."|| The learned physicians of the middle age came to the same conclusion. Cardan describing the great importance of moderation, and even austerity as to food and drink, observes, that it is by such discipline that the manners of youth can be preserved from evil, and adds a remarkable allusion to the custom of his time, saying,—“This may be easily seen in the children of nobility so well brought up, merely on account of this spare diet, for it is not by stripes that they are restrained. I have never seen a young person abstemious in food who perished, unless through an accident; but such boys, when otherwise well brought up, generally arrive with glory at great old age.”¶ These habits were called into constant exercise by the ordinary engagements of life. Thus, when Madame de Chantal used to be on a journey, she always chose the poorest houses for her lodging; she used to eat with the poor of their common hard fare, and thus found sources of spiritual perfection, in the very circumstances which fill our modern travellers with such bitter disgust.

The sons of noble houses did not attempt to introduce the luxurious banquets of a city among the wild mountains and woods, where they loved to dwell. They would have used the words of Tityrus to their welcomed friend,—“How sweet

* Tuscul. V. 35. † Tuscul. V. 32. ‡ Ibid. Lib. II. 34. § De Legibus, Lib. I.

|| De Repub. Lib. III. ¶ Prudentia Civilis, Cap. xxxiv.

 Vie de Mde. de Chantal, par Marsollier, Tom. II. 294.

to rest here with me this night under the green boughs, and partake of fruit and milk, the fare of these goatherds. And now the smoke rises from the roofs of the distant village, and the lengthening shadows fall from the lofty mountains."

"There are some kinds of men and families," says Cardan, "which are altogether immovable and inaccessible to any suggestion of treason. Such are the German and Helvetian nations, the Cardan family, and others, in towns which educate their children in a hard and simple manner."*

Don Diego Savedra Faxardo, in his Instruction of a Christian Prince, uses the coral growing out of the sea as an emblem of beauty and force, to be a model to kings and nobles. Sprung from the midst of the waves, beaten by the tempests, it grows hard in suffering, and impervious and fit for the most precious purposes of men while the rose perishes at the first blast. The effect of the two modes of education was seen in the lives of the Don John II. and Don Fernando the Catholic; the one educated in the palace, the other in the country; the one by women, the other among men; the one became despicable to the whole world, the other the object of general admiration. This it was which made Don Ferdinand the saint give a hard and manly education to his sons.† Ribadeneira, in his Princeps Christianus, shows that a soft and delicate education is the cause why men are not active and robust, and that the Christian discipline, as observed in Catholic states, tends to produce strong and valiant men, by commending coarse food and raiment, poverty, temperance, and labor.‡ This may now seem physically untrue, "Sed nos umbris, deliciis, otio, languore, desidiâ animum infecimus; opinionibus, maloque more delinitum molivimus."§ In the middle ages, the greatest men did not wish, on ordinary occasions, to be distinguished in dress from the poor. It is easy now to talk of dressing according to our rank, but St. Francis said well, "It is very difficult for those who are arrayed in silk, and adorned with jewels, to put on Jesus Christ."|| Job, David, and all the old saints, did often wear vile apparel, and Christians of old did esteem it wisdom to use it on the ordinary occasions of life. It was this which Dante thought worthy of being remembered in Paradise, where, alluding to the simple dress of the Florentines, he says,—

I saw Bellincion Berti walk abroad
In leathern girdle, and a clasp of bone:
———The sons I saw
Of Nerli, and of Vecchio, well content
With unrobed jerkin; and their good dames handling
The spindle and the flax.¶

The great Basil had only one suit of clothes, and all the riches which were found

* Prudentia Civilis, Cap. lxxiii.

† The Instruction of a Christian Prince, Lib. I. 29.

‡ Lib. II. cap. 39.

§ Cicero, Tuscul. V. 27.

|| Le sacré Mont d'Olivet, ou le Paradis de la Religion du Seraphique Père St. François, par F. Elzeare L'Archer. Paris, 1614.

¶ Canto XV.

in his possession on his death were a crucifix, as St. Gregory Nazienzen relates. St. Chrysostom lays great stress upon the danger of wearing fine apparel, and shows its inconsistency with the apostolic precept. "I admire," he says, in writing to Olympias, "that admirable simplicity in your dress, in which you have so much resemblance to the poor." The old writers of chivalrous romance are fond of that trait in the great Sir Perceval, that he would never abandon the good hempen shirt that his mother made for him, and their heroes are generally as fond of going without shoes or stockings as Socrates and his friend Aristodemus, of whom we read ἀνυπόδητος ἄει.^{*} Socrates would go barefoot in frost and snow, and use no other dress but his ordinary one, so that the very soldiers thought that he did it to shame them. This was the spirit of our great heroes. Charlemagne, who hated distinction in dress, used to complain of being obliged sometimes to wear a cloak made more for decoration than use. "Of what use are these little cloaks? We cannot be covered by them in bed. When I am on horseback, they cannot defend me from the wind and rain, and when we retire for other occasions, I am starved with cold in my legs."[†] If in our times there should be any one among the great like Vespasian, not distinguished in dress from persons of the lowest rank, there is too often reason to fear that it will only be as Tacitus adds, "Si avaritia abesset, antiquis ducibus par."[‡] It was the same with respect to the employments in which men of all ranks were willing to engage. The sons of kings and nobles served at the table of their fathers or lords, and were ready to discharge any office, however servile. There was but one word to signify the servants who rubbed down the horses, and all young noblemen under the dignity of knight, both being called from the stable or the shield which they carried for their master. Albertus Magnus places it among the signs of true humility to converse with poor companions, and assist them in their work, and follow their customs.[§] And the sons of our great Catholic ancestors thought this no dishonor. They never forgot the discipline of their college, where no distinctions were allowed on account of birth or fortune. St. Bonaventura, general of the order of St. Francis, and the seraphic doctor, was washing the vessels of the convent when they came to present him with the hat of a cardinal; which he caused to be hung upon a hook in the kitchen until he had finished his employment.|| This sounds strangely, but there is never any justice in drawing an inference from the thoughts and manners of men in these later times, when we are endeavoring to estimate the minds of Christians in ages of faith. It would be far safer to have regard to what was done by several of the wise ancients, who, as Alcibiades said of Socrates, seemed always to despise what the world most esteemed, riches and honors, so that he never appeared aware whether a man were rich, or had any public honors or privileges, for which the multitude might count him happy, but he thought all these possessions to be worth nothing, and that we ourselves were as nothing, and in this manner did he spend his whole life, always indulging in irony, and playing as it were with the thoughts of men.* But with our simple ancestors, possessing that spiritualized mind, which was able to put almost every thing around them in harmony with truth, there was the dispossession without the necessity for concealing it under a form of disdain. The very circumstances of affluence, of men with whom

* Plato Symposium. † Chron. S. Gall. ‡ Hist. Lib. 11. 5. § De Paradis. Animæ, c. 2.

|| Le sacré Mont d'Olivet, 648.

——— life and time
Ring all their joys in one dull chime
Of luxury and ease,

could excite no envy where there existed the faculty of appreciating the beauty of spiritual good, for it is in proportion as men are imbued with matter that riches become so powerfully attractive. Amyot says in his Breviarie, "that one can know by the countenance of a man whether he loves money or not." This is, in fact, the love which makes so many countenances hideous and almost fearful to behold. In the ages of faith, to be known to love money, or even to possess it in any extraordinary degree, would have been no recommendation to love and friendship, and to all that made young and generous hearts beat high.

In truth, in a Catholic country, where the sons of the rich behold the generous and amiable manners of the rustic chivalry among whom they spend their youth; where the noble has learned to weep over the sad tale of many a poor companion, and to sing to himself those plaintive songs which are so sweet and wild, that the traveller oft stops on his road, by the meadow's side, to hearken to them, and to wonder at the melodies of the poor—the simpler and lower ranks of society are so estimable, that noble natures will often seek to be confounded with them, and to conceal even from others those very distinctions of wealth, which are brought forward with such haughtiness under all other circumstances of human society. The Catholic form of life tends necessarily to keep the hearts of men susceptible of all the innumerable, gracious, and beautiful harmonies of social relation. To Nature's unclouded eye, the manners of the rich and dissipated seem so full of affectation and selfishness, that they are wondered at as a spectacle, not admired as a model of imitation. And even by the influence of this general impression, the rich are at length delivered from the delusion of vanity, so that they would now as anxiously court community with others, as formerly they would have shunned it. Such beauty is there in the simplicity and modesty of nature. For human life, when restored and spiritualized by the Catholic religion, is full of grace and loveliness. There are a thousand of expressions of goodness, which are only destroyed by the absurd vanities of the rich and haughty. There are forms of moving, even tones of voice, which breathe joyous simplicity and angelic innocence, and which young hearts would not exchange for the wealth of worlds. Hence, in relation to the fine arts, it is the poor who almost always have the feeling and the sentiment of beauty, which is the source of genuine taste, though in them it may often remain rude and imperfectly developed; whereas the rich, by luxury and pride, have often lost that feeling and sentiment, though they may vainly attempt to supply their place by assuming the conceit, the tone, and the phraseology, of the insolent connoisseur. The simple, virtuous poor are men of first thoughts: the sophists and people of the world, who deem themselves so knowing and enlightened, are men of second thoughts. The profound sages and learned holy Christians, are men of third thoughts, which only bring them back to the first, convinced of the vanity and emptiness of the intermediate stage in their intellectual progress. It is the poor who have the most lively sense of the beauty and solemn grandeur of the holy ritual of the Church. It is they who are sure to catch the tender mystery. Jacob, indeed, was the son of a rich man, but as St. Jerome observes, it was when he was going into Mesopotamia alone and naked, with staff in hand and when, being wearied on the road, he lay down; and he who had been educated with such delicacy by his mother Rebecca, and now a stone for a pillow to his head; it was then that he beheld the ladder of angels;* and as an old writer says of Jacob sleeping thus on the ground, “who would not have had his hard lodging, therewithal to have his heavenly dream?” And observe too, that where such sentiments prevail, the real wants of nature are sure to be supplied. “Ubi caritas est, etiam exigua sufficiunt,” says Ardo, in his Life of St. Benedict, Abbot of Ania. Love knows no distress of poverty; and let it be remarked also, as a general rule, that almost always, whatever costs the least is the most conducive to health, and even to beauty. Riches cannot procure the blessings which belong to love and innocent simplicity, in a Catholic land, where a sweet look is of more avail than a long purse. The rich are amazed on entering it, to find how indifferent men seem to their stern orders. It is not there that they would be able to quote their favorite maxim, which they seem to have learned from Bacchus, who cries out in the shades, when he hears that Charon will ferry him across for two oboli,—

* Plato Symposium, 33.

Φεῦ! ὥς μέγα σὺνὰσθον πανταχοῦ τῷ σὺ ὀβολῷ†

Their two oboli will not go so far here as with their own unhappy people, whom they have debased, and as it were imbruted, in matter. It would be endless to produce instances of the ennobling influence of the Catholic religion upon the minds and manners of the poor. The historians of Italy, (though it is not in history that we should look for such records,) relate numerous cases of the highest generosity and heroism evinced by poor peasants, and laborers in cities, which prove how completely the humbler classes may be exalted to the highest intellectual and moral dignity.‡ Assuredly, in a Catholic state, Virgil would have found another term for his husband-man besides "greedy."* What pure and noble chivalry, even when extravagant, showing a root of goodness, appeared in the brave and pious peasants of the Bas-Maine, as related in the later histories of France! The brother of John Chouan dies, "because he will declare his real name to the enemy; he does not know how to lie, for he has never lied."

* Epist. XCII.

† Aristoph. Rane, 141.

‡ See, for instance, Matt. Villani, Lib. X.

But if such was the condition of the poor in all these respects, which might seem earthly and temporal, how must it have been blessed in regard to purely heavenly interests, and to those that are spiritual and eternal! Beati pauperes. And here I will forget all the blessedness which we have hitherto ascribed to that condition in ages of faith, because so far it may seem allied even to the choicest goods of this present life. But let us view them even in the most extreme bereavement, as described by Dante, among the blind and poor, who

Near the confessionals, to crave an alms,
Stand, each his head upon his fellow's sunk,
So most to stir compassion; not by sound
 f words alone, but that which moves not less,
The sight of mis'ry.†

What a wretched state is here to the eye of flesh! Yet prejudging men, the world, is blind; that world from which you come; but enter the sanctuary, and perchance —That sweet strain of psalmody will give ye Light which may uncloud your minds.‡

Perchance you will learn to see, that even this is blessedness,

For those who live that life, which is a race
To death.———

So thought the holy Fathers, who drew their wisdom herein from experience. For what avails it to come to the churches like the men of whom St. Ambrose speaks, who are wholly of earth, and occupied with its interests; who come now, non quia ex fide Christiani sunt, sed ne Christiani ab hominibus non putentur? who have always an excuse for themselves on account of the season or circumstances of their life, not to obey the church. For when a fast is appointed in the summer months, they say, "The day is long; we cannot bear thirst;" and in the winter, "The cold is severe; we cannot endure hunger." Thus these rich men, whose soul is always bent upon dining, seek reasons for themselves why they should always dine, and to excuse themselves from fasting, accuse the seasons of the Creator. In like manner, when you ask them to give any thing to the poor, immediately they object to you that their necessities are infinite; they cannot pay the taxes ; and they become so eloquent, that you seem to be almost a culprit for having wished to admonish them ; so little do they understand that the greatest of all necessities is that of salvation.* With what a different mind do the poor frequent the divine courts ! The poor ! to behold whose sweet and saintly countenances, at moments of devotion, the artists, as at Rome, repair to the churches ! For in the Churches, before the divine altars, or following those that walk and sing solemn litanies, in the delight and transport with which all their senses minister to the soul, is already partly fulfilled the promise from the mount, that theirs is the kingdom of heaven. To the Church they repair humbly at morning and at eve, enjoying that privilege which was felt to be so great by David, that he said, in allusion to it, “One thing I have asked from the Lord, that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life, and visit his temple.” Here they were inebriated with the fatness of his house, and were given to drink of the torrent of his pleasure.† And where were the rich and lofty ones the while ? What was their felicity ? Restless and in want they were driven abroad to the theatre, to the proud assembly ; they were at home in their palaces, satiated and weary with splendor and dissipation, saying, like Theseus in Shakespeare,—

* Georgic, 1, 47. † Dante, Purgatory, XIII. ‡ Dante, Purgatory, XXVIII.

Where is our usual manager of mirth ?
What revels are in hand ? Is there no play
To ease the anguish of a torturing hour ?‡

And remark too, with St. Chrysostom, that “it is the rich and prosperous who condemn Providence, in affected pity for the sufferings of innocence.”

Strange to observe, the French sophists of the last century confessed this of themselves. “It is from the midst of voluptuous prosperity,” said Bernardin de Saint-Pierre, “that these murmurs against Providence issue. It is from these libraries, so filled with light, that the clouds rise up which have obscured the hopes and the virtues of Europe.”§ “It is not Lazarus,” says St. Chrysostom, “that pronounces such blasphemy. He would have shuddered at the thought of it. Is it not revolting, then, that while those whom God has visited with all kinds of misery, bless him and give him thanks, you, who are only bare spectators of the combat of humanity with suffering, should thus blaspheme against Providence ? For if the sufferer should for a moment give way to grief, and utter some guilty words, there would seem to be some excuse for him ; but that another, who is a stranger to the sorrows of life, should lose his soul and outrage his Creator, condemning things which are regarded by those who endure them as benefits, and a subject of gratitude, —this certainly is inconceivable, and undeserving of pardon.”|| Nor let it seem rhetorical, to ascribe such sentiments to those who suffer the extreme of poverty. A great theologian discovered a master of theology in a

*Serm. XXXIX.

† Psalm xv.

‡ Midsummer Night's Dream, V. I.

§ Études de la Nature, Tom. I. 158.

|| Hom. IV.

poor beggar who sat at the door of a Church. This poor afflicted man assured him, upon being interrogated, that he was always prosperous, that he was never unfortunate; that he never had an enemy; and that every thing happened to him exactly according to his wish. Omnia fiunt ut volo. The secret consisted in his being contented with his lot; in feeling assured, that whatever came from God was good for him; that no man could injure his soul; and that whatever event befell him, was conformable to the divine will. "Et hoc unum volo quod vult Deus," said he, "ita omnia fiunt ut volo." Therefore this theologian drew a general conclusion, saying, "Verè sub sordido palliolo sæpe magna latet sapientia."*

The father of Thomas à Kempis was a poor rustic laborer.† Jo'in Aumont, a poor simple peasant of the valley of Montmorenci, composed a treatise on prayer, which was approved of by the doctors of Paris: he died in the middle of the sixteenth century, in the odor of sanctity.‡ The parish of Stains, near Paris, produced a peasant named John Bossart, of a very ancient family in that place, who died at an advanced age in Paris, in 1752; he was of such piety and goodness that the curate of the village wrote his life. Persons of the first quality used to visit him out of the respect to his virtue.§

The ingenious tenderness of divine Providence does not even exclude the poor from the full benefit of making offerings to God. The widow's mite was received and applauded. "O thrice happy woman, and covered with glory!" cries St. Cyprian, "to have deserved even before the day of judgment to be praised by the mouth of the Judge."|| "Who knows not that the offerings of the lowest persons are most grateful to God?" said Gerson. The self-called reformers, those enemies of the poor, as the result quickly proved, were so absorbed in matter that they overlooked this. Fuller cannot consent to go the whole length of their profaneness, but says, "the Magdeburgenses, out of a spirit of opposition to the Papists, do in my mind, on the other side, too much deery St. Peter, causelessly eviling at his words to our Saviour, 'Ecece reliquimus omnia;' what say they had he left?" St. Jerome would have taught them, that though the Apostles, as we read, did only leave their ships and nets, yet did they leave all things to follow Christ, because they offered themselves, which was an offering beyond all the treasures of Darius and Croesus.¶

"Abraham was rich in gold and silver, in flocks, possessions, and raiments; he had such a household that on a sudden emergency he could produce young men to form an army which was able to rout the host of four kings; and yet in his exercise of hospitality he did not give orders to his servants and maidens to minister to the guests, but, as if he had found a treasure, he applied himself alone with Sara to wait upon them: he stood as a servant to serve supper to the strangers. Hence it was taught that we also should learn not to be content with offering money, but to offer ourselves to Christ, and imitate the Son of man, who came not to be ministered unto but to minister." That is what St. Jerome says.*

* Drexelius de Conformitate Voluntatis Hum. cum Divina. Lib. II. cap. 1.

† Vita ejus, cap. 5. ‡ Lebeuf, Hist. du Diocèse de Paris, Tom. III. p. 392. § Id. III. 320.

|| De Bon. Op. et Eleemos. ¶ Epist. XCII.

So great, indeed, and numerous, are the spiritual advantages of poverty, that it might even be argued that the general influence of religion during the ages of faith was in some measure owing to the varied and constant application of that moral power which, though it may not have found a place in history, was most certainly exerted by the people, that is, by the vast majority of men who lived in a comparative state of poverty. The poor common people have often been the protection of the saints, as they were of John the Baptist from the fury of Herod, for we read "timuit populum : quia sicut prophetam eum habebant."† How often would the foul crew of rich sophists and greedy plunderers of ecclesiastical property, who hold their counsel on the Seine, have overthrown whole churches, but that, like Herod, they feared the people? It is the poor common people too who have the quickest and most judicious sense of admiration for heroic virtue in distress. This is shown in Homer, when he says, that, "when Telemachus, at the close of his address, wept and threw his sceptre to the earth, all the people were moved to pity, but that Antinous, who represented the proud suitors, began to accuse him."‡ Nay, the holy poor have often exerted a direct influence upon the manners of the great. At Florence, after the defeat and execution of the conspirators, the people, who remembered the blasphemies to which old James Pazzi had been addicted, began to murmur publicly at his having been buried in holy ground. At length a multitude of country peasants repaired to Florence, and required that his body should be removed from the sacred place : it was dug up and thrown into the Arno.§ Of a still more remarkable instance there is a monument yet existing, if we give credit to what is reported by some historians of Normandy, for there is a place on the banks of the Seine, opposite Jumièges, which is called Heulerie, or Jolerie, and it is said that the origin of the name is to be traced from the inhabitants having been accustomed to assemble there frequently in order to express their detestation of immorality, by hissing Agnes Sorel, as the king's mistress, who had retired there.||

* Epist. LIV.

† Matt. xiv. 5.

‡ Od. II. 31.

§ Pignotti, III. 6.

|| Hist. de Jumièges, par Deshayes.

CHAPTER III.

O far we have regarded the state of the poor in ages of faith; but it is obvious that a far wider range is opened to our view in reference to the first circle of beatitude than the mere limits of material poverty, which, after all, may itself, in some instances, be excluded from it; for "if humility be not joined to poverty," as Thomas à Kempis says, "poverty cannot please God."* "Poverty is not a virtue," says St. Bonaventura, "but the love of poverty."†—There may be religious poverty amidst riches, and worldly riches amidst poverty: the poverty of religion, that is, the spirit which is disengaged from the love of riches, distinguished Abraham, Job, David, Josias, in the Old Testament, to all of whom Providence had given great wealth, and the Augustins, the Paulins, the Gregories, and so many other holy bishops and kings and nobles of the Christian Church who regarded their riches and dignities as treasures of which they were only the dispensers for the good of others.‡ St. Jerome appeals to the example of noble men and rich men then living who had renounced all things for Christ.§ The great possessions which every Christian must renounce are his attachment to creatures and his self-love.

The Church, that city of the poor, as Bossuet calls it, possessed great wealth in these ages of faith. We must show in what manner this was consistent with that spiritual poverty which is the object of the divine benediction.

From the very first, we know that offerings were brought to the churches, and placed at the disposal of the ministers. The Church had virtually acquired property long before the time of Constantine; for that emperor ordered that all things which had been unjustly taken from the Church, whether houses or lands, should be restored to her, at the same time making it lawful for all persons to leave property to her by will.|| After Constantine, in the Greek Church, we find St. Gregory Nazianzen and St. Chrysostom urging the duty of devoting tenths to support the ministers of God. St. Augustin, than whom no one could be more pure from all terrene cupidity, presses upon the laity their obligation to enable those who serve the altar to live by the altar, and warns them to beware lest

* De Tribus Tabernac. cap. 7.

† Medit. Vitæ Christi, cap. 43.

‡ St. Bonaventura de Sept. Grad. Vit. Spiritual. cap. 45.

§ Epist. XCII. || Thomassinus de veteri et nova Ecclesiæ Disciplin. Pars III. Lib. I. cap. 16.

the silence of the clergy should reprove their illiberality.”* He advises them to reserve some fixed sum for this use, “something fixed either from your annual or your daily fruits,” and he even prescribes tenths ;† as does also St. Jerome.‡ The maxim was “Laïcorum est antevolare cleri necessitatibus.” Charlemagne, without regard to the remonstrances of several of the clergy, established the systems of tithes by law.§ The laws of Justinian would not even allow a Church to be constructed unless it was also endowed so as to support the clergy.||

Besides this legal provision, an immense source of wealth was derived from the faith and spirit of the people. Some made offerings through gratitude : thus in the year 1103, Hugue, count of Troyes, published the following letter at a time when he made great donations to the churches. “In the name of the holy and undivided Trinity, I, Hugue, by the Grace of God, count of Troyes, after great sufferings and affliction from dangerous wounds, and despairing of a cure, expecting only death ; and yet God having granted me a recovery, considering in myself that I have in many ways offended the grace of my God, and that I had justly deserved this penalty for my sins, and acknowledging that I had deserved a still greater ; after this great benefit of God in restoring me to health, I have proposed to render him thanks, by giving alms and doing good to some churches.”¶ Others made offerings through fear of God’s judgment. Thus at the close of the tenth century, the Church received a great influx of riches, in consequence of the opinion which then generally prevailed, that the world was near its end. I cannot refrain from observing here that the moderns need not make this a ground of triumph, for so far is this fact from being favorable to their views, that it is on the contrary one which reflects the highest honor upon the spirit of men in these ages. For what must have been the holiness and grandeur of that society to which persons of every rank and country offered their treasures, thinking that they were about to appear in a body before the eternal Judge, and that these offerings would recommend their souls to his justice? What must have been the faith and piety of those men who had their hearts thus fixed upon the good of the future and eternal world? When property was given to the Church, it was the practice to add the most solemn imprecations against all who should attempt to sever and convert it from the holy purpose to which it was destined. Thus the charter of Ælnothus to the Abbey of Ramsey, giving to it his estate of Aceia, ends thus, “Rogamus ergo et obsecramus per Dei terribile nomen, ut nullis omnino hanc terram donet, vel vendat, vel aliquo modo ab eadem Ecclesia alienet ; quod si quis fecerit, sit ille maledictus, et alienatus ab omni beatitudine præsentis vitæ et futuræ, sitque ejus commoratio cum demonibus in inferno, ubi ignis eorum non exstinguitur et vermis eorum non morietur.”

* In Psal. iv. 46.

† Sermon. 219, de Temp.

‡ In Matt. xxii. 39. T. I. Col. 355.

§ Cap. Car. M. ann. 801.

|| Thomassinus iii. Lib. I. cap. 19.

¶ Hist. du Diocèse de Troyes, par Desguerrois, 266.

 Hist. Ramesiensis, cap. xviii. Gale Hist. Brit. Tom. II.

Long after the change of religion in England, it seemed a horrible and fearful thing to many even who went with it to take any part in the plunder of property which had been so solemnly dedicated to God. Some, indeed, of rich and powerful agents made no scruple, like Sir John Russell, in making a dwelling-house of the dissolved abbey, and a stable of the church; but in a vast majority of instances, when the first plunderers had departed on their circuit of destruction, the people durst not take any advantage of what then stood defenceless and open to any invader. The people, as Sir Henry Spelman says, were fearful to meddle with places consecrated to God. * Sir Henry Spelman, in his history of Sacrilege, gives a list of all the peers who were present in parliament on Friday the 23rd of May, in the thirty-first year of Henry VIII. when the act passed for dissolving the monasteries, and he shows the calamities which fell upon them and their races : he also gives a list of the abbeyes, traces the property through various hands, and shows that the acquirers never prospered. A remark which was repeated by Jeremy Taylor and many of the Protestant preachers, with what consistency, indeed, might have been questionable. Such, then, was the wealth of the Church, and such the mode of its acquisition during the ages of faith. Now one observation suggests itself before we proceed to consider the spirit with which it was received, and the object to which it was applied. It would seem that the wealth of a particular church, or convent, was only a memorial of its sanctity. Hear the accurate Abbé Lebeuf, "The reputation of holiness which belonged to the Abbey of Livry, was the cause why Matilda de Cramoël gave to it in the year 1244 twenty acres of land at Berneau."†

We shall have occasions hereafter to produce many curious instances of a similar kind. At present I pass on to show the spirit of the Church in receiving this influx of wealth, and the purposes to which it was applied. "The holy fathers," says Thomassinus, "regarded the accession of temporal goods to the Church as a subject, not of joy, but of religious fear and necessary caution, and even of grief and sadness."‡

In a letter which Aleuin wrote to Charlemagne, he desires the emperor not to require that tithes should be always paid to the clergy. "It is much better to lose tithes than faith : we who have been born, nourished, instructed in the Catholic faith, even we can hardly consent to give the tenth of our goods, and must not the newborn faith, the weak heart, and the avaricious spirit of these people still less consent to it?"§ This was his view of their legal enforcements. In the year 813, a council of bishops under Charlemagne grievously inveighed against those who tempted the faithful to endow the Church, and ordered such gifts to be restored to the natural heirs, but it added, "Hoc vero quod quisque Deo juste et rationabiliter de rebus suis offert, firmiter Ecclesia tenere debet." A certain

* Hist. of Sacrilege, p. 245.

† Hist. du Diocèse de Paris. Tom. XII. 235.

‡ De veteri et nova Ecclesiæ Disciplina, Pars iii. Lib. I. cap. 4. § Aleuini Epist. XXVIII.

matron, by name of Ammonia, left land and her house to the Church. Stephania her nurse, and Calaxinus her son, hastened to Pope Gregory the Great, and exposed their poverty to him, upon which he ordered the land and house to be restored to them;* “Why desire gold which cannot help us?” cried St. Ambrose, “the Assyrians formerly plundered the temple of Jerusalem of its gold, but the gold of the Church, that is, the poor, holds out a prey to no one.”† “The tribute of the Church,” says the canon of the Irish Church, in the eighth century, published by Dacherius “is according to the custom of the province, tamen ne pauperes in decimis vim patiantur.”‡ “The synod decreed that a priest should not receive gifts from any one of whom he did not know the conscience, for as much as the hosts do not profit him, so much do the gifts of the wicked man injure him who receives them.”§ The bishop Jona, in his work de Institutione Laicali, quotes as follows from St. Gregory’s morals. “He who gives his external substance to the needy, but does not at the same time preserve his own life from sin, offers his substance to God and himself to sin; that which is least he gives to his Creator, and what is greatest he keeps for iniquity; he gives his property to God, and he prepares himself for the devil.”|| We may observe that this is not the language of men who only thirsted for the riches of the laity. In like manner, Walafred Strabo, Abbot of Fulda, in the ninth century, shows that no offering to a monastery or church would be acceptable, unless from men who obeyed the precepts of Christ with a pure heart.¶ In accepting offerings, the Church had always regard to the purity and innocence, or penitence, of those who offered, whence Epiphanius says in his exposition of the Catholic faith, “The Church admits the oblations of such as have done injury to no one, and done no wickedness, but led an innocent life.” “The offerings of the faithful at the altar were bread and wine, hosts for the Divine sacrifice, testimonies of gratitude for the clergy, and proofs of charity for the poor. The names of those who offered were solemnly read at mass from tablets which were the Diptycha.”†† Men would not have relinquished the benefits of the Church, if they could have escaped their burden of tithes. The farmer of the farm of Orensis, in the deanery of Montlhery, was declared by sentence, exempt from paying tithes. The curate concluded that he was not his parishioner; but the farmer not choosing to remain without a pastor, offered to pay twenty livres every year, if he would put him among the number of his parishioners. The offer being accepted, it was approved of by the vicar-general in the year of 1660.‡‡

It is worthy of remark, that in the ages of munificence to the Church, we read of no consequent distress among the people. It was then the well-known proverb, * Thomassinus iii. I. 20. † Offic. Lib. II. c. 28.

‡ Capitula Canon. Hibernens. cap. xxx. Spicileg. Tom. IX. § Ibid. cap. xxii.

|| Lib. III. cap. 10. Apud Dacher. Spicileg. Tom. I. • De Rebus Ecclesiasticis, cap. xiv.

 Cap. xxiv. †† Thomassinus, iii. Lib. I. cap. 12.

‡‡ Lebeuf, Hist. du Diocèse de Paris. Tom. XII. p. 38.

“que donner pour Dieu n’apauvrit jamais un homme.” * Thus, then, did riches pour into the Church. It remains to observe the purposes to which they were applied. Tenthhs were given to the clergy as shining in their divine mission, as representing Christ, “quo fit ut eis non frui, sed uti debeant religiose, pie, et parce.”†

“The tithes are to be divided into three portions,” say the canonical rules of Crodogang, Bishop of Metz, decreed in 816, “one for the ornament of the church, another for the poor and for strangers, which is mercifully to be dispensed with all humanity ; the third part for the priests themselves.”‡ St. Ambrose says to Symmachus, the champion of the Pagan Temples, “the Church possesses nothing for herself but faith ; the possessions of the Church are the expenses of the poor. Let the Pagans count how many captives their temples have redeemed, what sustenance they have given to the poor, to what exiles they have afforded support.”§ Thus, at the Council of Rheims, in 596, those who retain the goods bequeathed to the Church are styled murderers of the poor.|| Hence in the time of Charles the Bald, while many seculars had taken possession of ecclesiastical property, and were expending the goods of monasteries and churches in secular pomp, some of them proceeding to justify their conduct by representing that riches were a poison to the church, to their specious argument the fathers of the sixth Council of Paris replied in these terms, “It is right that the pastors of the churches should possess the goods of the Church not be possessed by them, and, as Prosper wrote, they ought, while possessing, to despise them, and not possess them for themselves, but for others. It is certain, that the most holy pontiffs who will reign with Christ their Remunerator, whose place we that are unworthy hold, possessed the goods of the Church, not for themselves, but for others ; not for their own glory and delight, but rather to the honor of God and to the advantage of the faithful. Let cease, therefore, that ambition which is accustomed to say that the Church of Christ has too much wealth ; and let it observe, that however great may be the riches of the Church, so long as they are dispensed in the manner in which they ought to be dispensed, they are never too great.”

Mabillon relates, that in the monastery of Cluny, in one day, there was a stipend given to 17, 000 poor, as is stated by Udalricus. In fact, it was one and the same thing to give to the poor and to give to the Church, for all the substance of the Church was the patrimony of the poor, and the money intended for the poor was, therefore, committed to the Church ; and this will partly explain why Constantine desired that the clergy should be exempt from paying taxes.¶ In the primitive Church, the bishop was the sole dispenser of the goods of the Church, by the hands of the deacons. Thus we read in the Apostolical Constitutions, which are of great antiquity—“It is for you, O layman, to contribute liberally ; it is for the bishop, as the steward and administrator of ecclesiastical matters, to dispense. Beware, however, lest you wish to call the bishop to account; and do not watch his dispensation in what manner he expends it, or when or to whom, or whether well or otherwise; for he has God to call him to account, who hath delivered this procuratorial office into his hands, and desired to commit to him this great sacerdotal dignity." Thus we read that St. Cyril of Alexandria, protested against any attempt to call bishops to account.* But while the bishop had the sole dispensing power, he was bound to follow the canonical law of dispensation, and if he swerved from it, he might be summoned to answer before the metropolitan. This law divided the goods of the Church into four parts, one being for the poor, one for the clergy, one for the bishop, to enable him to exercise hospitality, and to redeem captives; and one for the repair of churches. In the cathedrals of Spain, was a threefold division, to the bishop, to the clergy, and to the repair and support of buildings; for what was received by the bishop and clergy, contributed to the maintenance of the poor.† To attempt to enter upon any detail as to the distribution of ecclesiastical property, would not only lengthen this present discussion beyond proper limits, but lead me upon ground which I shall have to explore minutely in a future place, when we shall have to review the character of the clergy in these ages. Yet before we interrupt the subject, it may be well to give some idea of the extent of ecclesiastical charity, by stating a few instances. When the provinces of Gaul and Italy had been laid waste by the Goths, St. Patiens, archbishop of Lyons, contributed an incredible quantity of corn, which he caused to be conveyed from parts beyond sea. Sidonius Apollinaris congratulates the pontiff upon his munificence. "You sent corn gratuitously to these desolated provinces. We have seen the ways obstructed by your corn. We have seen on the banks of the Arar and the Rhone, not merely one granary which you had filled, you have filled rather two rivers than two ships."‡ From the laws of Theodosius Valentinian and Theodoric, it appears that the Church possessed great ships, but it was for the sole purpose of assisting the poor, by procuring corn and other provisions for them. It was in this manner that the church of Alexandria, under the holy patriarch John the Almoner, nourished, besides a numerous clergy, 7500 poor. Victor Vitensis says of Eugene, bishop of Carthage, during the Vandal persecution, "He never kept money in his possession, unless it was offered so late in the evening that nocturnal darkness had closed the labors of the day; he reserved for himself only what was sufficient for the day."§ The blessed Honoratus, who, after living in the monastery of Lerins, became bishop of Arles, used to distribute whatever he received without reserving any part even for his convent. Hilary, his successor in that see, says of him, "Exhausta est aliquando dispensationis substantia; fides nunquam." St. Chrysostom says that laymen must not hold themselves dispensed from hospitality to the poor, because the churches receive them. "Let every Christian have a hospice in his own home, a house in which Christ may enter. Say this is Christ's room."* The Romans having gained a great victory over the Persians, and taken 7000 prisoners, whom they kept in chains and dungeons, Acacius, bishop of Amida, hearing that they suffered also from hunger, obtained the consent of his clergy to melt down all the gold and silver vessels of his Church, to redeem them from chains and hunger. So they returned back to Persia. "The thing done by Acacius being known, the king of Persia was seized with admiration, that the Romans should labor to conquer in both war and benefits, and the king desired to see the bishop."† When Atticus, bishop of Constantinople, had sent 360 pieces of gold to the Church of Nicene, he advised the priest Calliopius, who was to dispense them, not to give to those who made an art of begging, but to the ingenuous poor. The distribution of corn for the use of the poor, which had been committed to the Church by Constantine through all the imperial cities, was revoked by the emperor Julian, but again renewed by Jovian, his successor, and confirmed by Marcian, from whose edict it appears that whatever was conferred upon the Church was conferred upon the poor.‡

* Desguerrous Hist. du Diocèse de Troyes. † Thomassinus, Pars iii. I. cap. 4.

‡ Crodogangi Regula Canon. Cap. lxxv. apud Dacher. Spicileg. Tom. I.

§ Epist. XXXI. || Hist. de Reims, par Anquetil. ¶ Thomassinus, Pars iii. Lib. I. cap. 16.

* Can. Tom. V. Par. ii. † Thomassinus, Pars iii. Lib. II. cap. 13. ‡ Lib. VI. Epist. 12. § Lib. II.

St. Gregory the Great used to give gold and habits to strangers natalitio apostolorum vel suo, that is, on the anniversary of his consecration. His wonderful charity is described in detail by John the Deacon, who wrote his life. When the Persians laid waste Syria, vast multitudes of every condition and sex fled to Alexandria, when the holy patriarch, John, received them with wonderful charity, and when some of his clergy asked him what they were to do when men dressed in splendid habits asked alms of them, he replied that he was the dispenser of Christ, from whom he had these orders, "Omni petenti te da." These are wonderful things, but still more wondrous was the sweetness and humility which accompanied his bounty. On one occasion, seeing a poor person appear ashamed to receive so great a gift, he encouraged him, saying, "nondum sanguinem meum pro te, frater, effudi, sicut mandavit mihi Dominus meus et omnium Christus Deus."§

The sixth Council of Paris, in 829, condemns the accumulation of riches in the Church, because the Church always is in want as long as there are poor in want. In a general convention of abbots in 817, it was decreed that of all the alms which were conferred upon the churches and upon monks, the tenth part should be given to the common poor. In the more opulent churches under Charlemagne and Lewis the Pious, two parts out of three of all oblations were given to the poor, and the third was reserved for the nourishment of the monks and clergy; but in churches which were less rich, an equal portion was allotted to the poor and to the clergy.|| The Council at Paris in 1212 enjoined the practice of hospitality to the poor and at the same time taught, that what was occasionally expended upon

* In Acta hom. 45.

† Socrat. Lib. VII. cap. II.

‡ Cod. Lib. I. Tit. I. leg. xii.

§ Vita ejus, cap. 29.

|| Conc. Gall. Tom. II. p. 429. Capitulum Carl. Mag. Lib. I. c. 87.

the rich might be for the use of the poor, when it propitiated the favor of the rich, and inclined them to love and liberality. Such were the gifts of the holy Vuanus, Archbishop of Hamburg, as appears from the Chronicle of Adam, “Ut ferocissimos reges Aquilonis hilaritate suorum munerum ad omnia que voluit, benignos obedientesque haberet.”^{*} When a great famine afflicted Rome, Pope Innocent III. nourished 8000 poor, besides those whom he sustained in fixed houses. On his elevation to the Pontificate he gave to the poor all oblations which came to him from the Church of St. Peter, and the tenth of all other supplies, and also all offerings which were presented at his feet in the ancient manner. It would be endless to relate the charity of the blessed Antoninus, Archbishop of Florence, St. Thomas of Villeneuve, Archbishop of Valentia, St. Laurence Justinian, the first of the Venetian Patriarchs, St. Charles Borromeo, Archbishop of Milan, &c. The decrees of Cardinal Pole, Legate of the Apostolic see in England in 1566, reminded the clergy of the charge of Pope Gregory to St. Augustin, the Apostle of England, respecting the distribution of ecclesiastical goods, that they should be dispensed to the poor, and for the purpose of educating youth in schools, to the glory of God and utility of man; that the ministers of holy Church should be the fathers of the poor, of orphans, and widows.[†] And the Council of Trent renewed all the ancient canons prohibiting the expenditure of the goods of the Church upon relations and friends of the dispensers.[‡]

When the son of a certain count was elected bishop, Peter of Blois, fearing the temptations that his rank and family would occasion to him, wrote a long letter of counsel to him, “Ad honorem vocavit te Deus propter onera, non ad multiplicandum numerum, familiæ, aut equorum, non ad dandas parentibus dignitates, sed ad dandam scientiam salutis plebi ejus.§—Si quia filius comitis aut consobrinus regis es, manu effusiore teneris expendere, necessitas hæc Christi patrimonium non contingit.” Yet this very bishop became so charitable and liberal, that Peter himself wished that he would moderate it, or rather regulate it better.||

In the general chapter of the Cistercian order in 1134, in whose churches the splendor of monastic poverty shone most remarkably, it was decreed that the goods of the Church were not to be expended upon the vessels and furniture of their temples, but upon the poor. Yet St. Bernard, even in his censure, furnished an apology for the magnificence of other churches, “Dicite pauperes in templo quid facit aurum, &c. Expenditur, ut augeatur; et effusio copiam parit. Ipso quippe visu sumptuosarum, sed mirandarum vanitatum, accenduntur homines magis ad offerendum, quam ad adorandum. Sic opes opibus hauriuntur, sic pecunia pecuniam trahit, quia nescio quo pacto ubi amplius divitiarum cernitur, ibi offertur libentius. Ostenditur pulcherrima forma sancti, currunt homines ad osculandum invitantur ad donandum.” Well does Thomassinus observe here, ^{*} Baron. An. 1013.

[†] Decreto 5.

[‡] Sess. 25, 61.

§ Epist. 15.

|| Epist. 20.

after relating the zeal of St. Bernard, of Pope Alexander III., of Hugo Victorinus, and of Peter of Cluny, in condemning the acquisition of wealth in monasteries, "Cautiously and wisely were these decrees instituted: and yet we ought not to be angry at these holy congregations if, in course of time, other counsels were followed which seemed to militate against them, while they departed not from the rule of piety and sobriety, which they always professed, that each, contented with necessaries, might dispense the superfluity to the poor. It is not of such consequence whether the riches of these abbots and bishops were little or great. Virtue is not always a faithful companion of poverty, nor does vice necessarily accompany wealth. It often happens that even heroic virtue arises from wealth; but it is of the greatest consequence that these riches should be dispensed according to canonical custom; and with that practice, they who abounded in riches might have retained all that belongs to evangelical poverty." Pope Innocent III., in this age of monastic and episcopal wealth, changed his golden and silver vessels into wood and earthen, and would not suffer more than three dishes upon his table.* And the Chapter of Rheims went so far as even to sell many reliquaries of gold and silver to contribute to the ransom of king John.† But when Francis I. required the canons of that cathedral to sell for his use many pieces of silver plate belonging to it, saying that he would secure them a rental for the sum obtained, they replied, "that the king might dispose of their treasure, but as for us," they continued, "we should regard as a sacrilege the converting to our own profit any thing which had been consecrated to God." The king was admonished, and restrained his impatience.‡

When the plague and famine desolated Rheims, in the year 1521, Robert de Lenoncourt, the archbishop, refused to abandon his languishing flock: his granaries were open to the poor; every day he fed three hundred people in his palace, and he made a general remission of all debts due to him.§ During the famine in Normandy, consequent upon the wars of England and France, the abbey of Jumièges was a resource for a multitude of unhappy people.|| There was another similar occasion in 1538, when the citizens of Rouen would have perished by famine had it not been for the generosity of the same monks.¶ At this very time their farms and granaries were pillaged by riotous people, and an order was dispatched to hang a troop of the seditious who had committed this outrage, but the abbot, François de Fontenai excused them, saying, that it was to be ascribed to the distress of the times, and petitioned for them, and succeeded in obtaining their pardon. An instance of the same kind is related of St. Remi, who, foreseeing a year of scarcity, had made large provisions of corn for the sake of feeding his people. For this action the holy man was ridiculed and reviled by some, who used to say over their cups, "What means this old man, this jubilee priest? (for

* Rainaldus, An. 1216. † Anquetil. Hist. de Reims, Lib. III. 236. ‡ Id. Lib. IV. 100. § Id. Lib. IV. 96. || Deshayes, Hist. de l'Abbaye de Jumièges, 61. ¶ Id. 118.  Id. 118.

he had been now a priest for fifty years) does he wish to found a new city?" A mob was collected and inflamed by these leaders; they set fire to the bishop's granaries, which were all consumed when the holy man arrived at the spot. What then think you did he say and do? He alighted from his horse, and as it was the winter season, he approached as near as he could to the fire, as if to warm himself, saying, "A hearth is always good, especially for an old man." This was all the vengeance he took.* In the seventeenth century a troop of four hundred poor people from Orleans, driven out by the civil war, came to Jumièges, and the monks supported them, at the expense of 15,000 livres. I mention this last instance for the sake of repeating the remark of their historian, for he says, that "in consequence of their having received the reform of the congregation of St. Maur, they were enabled to accumulate at the very season of their greatest expenditure: so true is it that austerity and holiness were often the chief source of ecclesiastical riches."†

Thus then we are warranted in concluding from the whole, that the wealth of the Church in these ages of faith, was in its extent, in the mode of its acquisition, and in the rule of its dispensation, consistent with that spiritual poverty which belongs to the attainment of beatitude. But our meditations must not terminate with our enquiries respecting those who lived in external poverty or riches. We must proceed to examine from other sides in what manner men in these ages corresponded with the injunction from the Mount, following the first counsel that Christ gave; and the next point of view which offers itself for this purpose, is that which regards their humility, and the manners to which it gave rise.

* Drexelius, de Conformitate Human. Volunt. cum Divin. Lib. IV. cap. 8.

† Deshayes Hist. de l'Abbaye de Jumièges, p. 143.

CHAPTER IV.

WE are arrived at a passage where an opinion must be expressed, that many will deem groundless and extravagant; but notwithstanding the prospect of such a reception, it must be expressed, though it should overwhelm me with ridicule and the reproach of incapacity, as Socrates used to describe it, coming upon me as if it were a laughing wave, ὡσπερ κύμα ἐκ γελῶν.—Be it affirmed then that to one who has studied the history of Christian ages, and the character of the present times, there can be no conclusion more certain, than that the real and practical adoption of the humble spirit in ages of faith is one cause to which must be ascribed, in a great measure, the contempt with which the modern writers are so inclined to speak of them, as it was certainly one most influential in placing them in opposition to those examples of proud glory which men had formerly been told to admire, and to which they have so often in later times recurred with approval and expressions of applause, for different results needs must be the fruit of principles formally opposed. Rome, as the mistress of the Pagan world, and Rome as the capital of Christendom, might be produced as symbolical of the two opposite characters into which ages and nations, as well as men, individually, may be divided; for as Plato says, “There are the same things, and the same number, in the state, as exist in each separate soul.”* Thus in the dark and sanguinary annals of Tacitus, we behold the combats of contending despots, or of the more despotic and capricious legions. We are present at the atrocious triumphs, we see the chained captives, the heads borne aloft on spears; we hear the horrid rattle of the martial car, and the subdued groans of those that read the list of proscriptions which is to complete the conqueror’s glory. Or if we look to the condition of the same people at a period more remote, as described by the historians of the republic, we find the same restless humor of perpetual wars, along with an interminable contest between the different orders, which led at short intervals to crimes of the greatest atrocity and horror; we hear of nothing but the camp and the forum; abroad we behold proud and merciless oppression in its most hateful form of affected protection; and at home, the ceaseless war of separate parties and interests, whose mutual accusations sufficiently exposed the delusion of that pretended liberty which could yield such small protection to the majority of the poorer citizens. All this is now changed for the Catholic type of felicity. We now have nothing but images of quiet wisdom, sanctity, and innocence; symbols of infinite love, of divine and everlasting peace, the daily sacrifice, the evening hymn, the sweet music of the pilgrim's litany, the portals that open to receive the living to joy, and the dirge of requiem, to supplicate rest and deliverance for the dead. The one is the result of the world's theory of grandeur; the other, that of the Christian philosophy; and in ages of faith men were sensible of its superior advantages. Thus it was with a view to this latter kind of greatness, that the humble St. Isidore, when in the article of death, predicted to Spain, that if it ever fell from the true religion, it would be brought to ruin; but that if it persevered in observing it, its greatness would rise above that of other nations, and as Don Diego Savedra Faxardo remarks on this in his Christian Prince, from the time that Don Pelayo and his little band of faithful Christians had retired into the cavern of Covalonga, Spain has always increased in grandeur as the reward for its perseverance in the Catholic religion,* that is to say, in the Christian and real sense of grandeur; for a saint would have wished no other for his country. There will seem to many in this proposition (more shame for human wills disordered), something false or overbold; but the difficulty may be solved, or the hopeless nature of the mistake detected, by recurring to first principles. The fact is then, (not according to Paley, that there are two opposite descriptions of character under which mankind may always be classed,) but that the Christian faith has created a character which passes from men to nations, and even to ages in the history of the world, and which is diametrically opposed to that of animal, or, as religion expresses it, unregenerated men whether developed in the lives of men, or in the ages of nations. "The one," as the same writer says, "possesses vigor, firmness, resolution; is daring and active quick in its sensibilities, jealous of its fame, eager in its attachments, inflexible in its purpose, violent in its resentments. The other meek, yielding, complying, forgiving, not prompt to act, but willing to suffer; silent and gentle under rudeness and insult; suing for reconciliation, when others would demand satisfaction; giving way to the pushes of impudence; conceding and indulgent to the prejudices, the wrongheadedness, the intractability of those with whom it has to deal. The former of these characters is, and ever hath been, the favorite of the world. It is the character of great men," he continues, without observing the opposite idea of greatness in the ages which beheld a St. Louis and a Godfrey on the thrones of the world. "There is a dignity in it," he adds, as if almost acknowledging his own identity with the character he describes, "which universally commands respect. The latter is poor-spirited, tame and abject. Yet so it hath happened, that with the Founder of Christianity, this latter is the subject of his commendation, his precepts, his example; and that the former is so in no part of its composition." Beati pauperes spiritu,

* De Repub. Lib. IV.

The strains came o'er mine ear, e'en as the sound
Of choral voices, that in solemn chant
With organ mingle, and now high and clear
Come swelling, now float indistinct away.*

With St. Luke, who places only four beatitudes, and with St. Matthew, who hath eight, the first is that of the poor in spirit, for as St. Ambrose says, "it is in fact, the first in order, and as it were the parent of virtues.†" The character of the middle ages may be estimated in respect to it by referring to what was taught and believed, and to what was practised. Now it was taught and believed that humility adopted with sincerity and practised in all the circumstances of life, was the basis of all virtue and happiness, of all temporal honor, and of all eternal hopes. The truth of this proposition is so clear, from the slightest acquaintance with the history and learning of Christian antiquity, that one would rather comment upon it than proceed to prove it; one would rather fondly gaze "upon those patterns of meek humbleness" which they place before us, than bring forward reasons to believe that they existed. Throughout the whole literature of the ages of faith, we might in vain search for any of those ingenious speculations with which so many modern philosophers have sought to make the Christian rule of life reconcilable with worldly views of grandeur and elevation. It is clear that it continued to be received in the spirit in which it was first proposed, and we see that the whole Christian life in the first ages, when it was confronted with the proud seductive forms of heathen philosophy, was regarded by all men who did not embrace it as a poor servile form of life. Thus in the office of St. Agatha, which the Church reads on the fifth of February, we find that Quintianus, the Roman Prætor, said to her, "Nonne te pudet nobili genere natam humilem et servilem Christianorum vitam agere?" To which she only replied that the Christian humility and servitude were better than the wealth and pride of kings. There is never any attempt to represent it as reconcilable by any views of human philosophy or of earthly wisdom, with the proud ideal of intellectual greatness which is so flattering to the mere reason of man. If we proceed to examine their doctrines in detail, we find all their arguments and meditations directed to the same end. St. Augustin wonders why Eve should be called by a new name after her condemnation; and that then, for the first time, she should be styled, the mother of all living; and he concludes that "it was on account of her having been humbled and deprived of celestial gifts, that she might feel her own wretchedness; for humility is the commencement of spiritual life."‡

Nor was it forgotten, that she too, that pure and wondrous creature

Created beings all in lowliness, Surpassing, as in height, above them all,

that she, ennobler of her nature, through whom that spiritual life was to be restored to the children of men, was indebted for her exaltation to the humility which was infused into her spotless soul. "Vide humilitatem, vide devotionem," cries St. Ambrose, alluding to the reply of the blessed Virgin to the angel. "She that is chosen to be the mother, styles herself the handmaiden of the Lord. She is not moved to high thoughts by the promise, but styling herself the servant, she vindicates to herself the prerogative of unprecedented grace." The same mind remains to her throughout the astonishing period which succeeds; for, as another holy writer observes, on no occasion of the miracles of Christ does she come forward to claim the honor of being his mother.* Let this serve to indicate the mark at which desire in these ages aimed. The facts which so repeatedly present themselves, in the history of the middle ages, of men declining and flying from honors and posts that offered great private advantage, not like the moderns, who sometimes refuse to accept dazzling prizes only from a cool calculation of selfish interests, but from a simple spirit of humility, and desire of obeying the precepts of Christ, can best be appreciated by contrasting them with all that the world, before Christianity, had beheld in men, placed in similar circumstances; and also, it must be admitted, with the recognized principles of action which now govern the multitudes which have refused to hear the Church. In this respect, the influence of the Christian spirit, in the middle ages, among the nations of the West, seems the more astonishing, because from the first there was no passion which offered so great an obstacle to its reception as the love of honors and separate distinction; and there was no offence against heaven, which so soon and so fatally opposed the happiness of the race of men, and the fulfilment of the beneficent and wondrous designs of their great Restorer, as the same passion developing itself in the East. The apostles, James and John, nourished in the school of Christ, the master of true humility, who gave not the pre-eminence to the disciple whom he especially loved, and imbued with his divine precepts, after such a discipline of wisdom and humility, were instigated by their mother to demand from their Lord the privilege of sitting, the one on his right hand, and the other on his left, in his kingdom! "So hardly," observes Lewis of Grenada, "can the thirst for honors and principality be quenched in the soul of man."† And in the ninth century, the same thirst impelled the learned Photius to invade the see of the illustrious Ignatius, which was the original cause of the most deplorable event that is found in the records of history: for what followed after the lapse of two ages, was but the consummation of that first pride.

* Dante, Purg. IX.

† Hom. Lib. V. in Luc. 6.

‡ In Genes.

If we proceed to the review of manners, and the intercourse of private life, the character of the ages of faith is perhaps equally admirable: all the other good effects, domestic, that would follow from this spirit, one can already see; for the humility of men then was not a feigned sentiment, such as Sismondi ascribes to them,

* Arias de Imitatione B. Virginis, p. 43.

† Ludovic. Grenadensis in Festo B. Jacobi, Concio II.

which he says was united with a most insulting contempt for others. They knew of no such humility, though their invincible patience may have seemed insulting to the pride of irritable spirits. Hear the gentle strains of their soul—"Humble yourself, and with sincerity regard yourself below all men. 'And how can I do so,' you reply, 'when the majority of men, rejecting all fear and shame, live in such disorder, from which I turn in horror? What! can I regard myself below these wretches?' Yes, yes, I repeat it: for if you only consider that the men who are the most perverse to-day may to-morrow be more near perfection than you; that if they had received from heaven the same assistance as you have had, they would have led a much more holy life than you have done, and that you would have sunk into much deeper crime than theirs, if you had not been preserved by a more abundant grace; if, I say, you pay attention to these things, you will easily acknowledge, that there is no sinner whom you ought not in justice to prefer to yourself. Oh, if you knew the secrets of God, how willingly would you yield to others the first rank! With what sincerity of heart would you take the lowest place! With what pleasure would you prostrate yourself at the feet of your brethren! With what zeal would you serve the lowest of them! with what joy would you honor them! with what affection would you obey them!" These are the words of Louis de Blois.* "We owe it to the grace of God," says Father Lewis of Grenada, "that we have not committed all the sins for which we see others punished; for there is no sin that one man commits of which another may not be also guilty."†—The same remark had been made by St. Augustin. Moreover, all ecclesiastical customs, manners, and institutions which gave a tone to the whole form of society, were framed with a view to eradicate pride from the souls of men. It is only by keeping this in mind, that we can learn to understand the character of those ages, in which all things that we behold are of humble seeming. Thus the rules of Crodegange, Bishop of Metz, made by the Fathers of the Council of Aix-la-Chapelle, in the year 816, are introduced by the sacred texts which prove pride to be the origin of all sins. "Ut omnes homines ad amorem humilitatis provocemus, et detestabilem, inimicamque Dei superbiam ab eis retrahamus."‡ Hence, the want of humility was regarded as a sure sign of not having had a regular education. It is true that men were shown great honor in these ages; but, as Father Diego de Stella says, writing on the contempt of the world, "The honor which the saints of God had, both here on the earth and also in heaven, was not gotten by the seeking of it, but by the flying away from it."§ For their own sentiments were always those expressed by St. Ambrose—"I in royal grandeur, and the cross of Christ in the dust! I in princely courts, and the triumph of Christ amidst ruins! How shall I consider myself redeemed if redemption itself is not beheld!" The humility of the learned in these ages was truly

* Spiritual Guide, Chap. VI.

† In Festo B. Mariæ Magd. Concio II.

‡ Apud Dacherii Spicileg. Tom. I.

§ Part I. 122.

admirable. Hugues, of St. Victor, says, "Wise men learn willingly, though it were a child which showed them the way : they regard not the person who speaks, but the doctrine which he delivers : if it be good, they retain it ; if evil, they abandon it." St. Gregory says, "Ab omnibus corripī, ab omnibusemendari paratus sum :"^{} and that great doctor, St. Augustin, says, "Ego et senex et Episcopus, paratus sum a puero doceri." The men whose genius and immense learning seemed so sublime and astonishing to their contemporaries, were approached with the utmost familiarity and affection by the youngest and most simple student. In fact, the titles bestowed on them were all founded rather on their spiritual graces than on their wondrous acquirements in human science ; for these are the men who were known only as the Angel of the School, the Seraphic Doctor, the Master of Humility. If we open their writings, their style is always marked with the utmost meekness, presenting so great a contrast to that of the proud men who now condescend to publish the result of their studies. Whenever they venture to express an opinion of their own, it is in the spirit of that sentence of Ives of Chartres—"Dilecti forsitan fortiores, fortiora, meliores meliora ; at ego, pro mediocritate, sic sentio."^{} Even when they had it not in their power to doubt the justice of their own views, they were still far from wishing to propagate them at the risk of that peace, which should be sacrificed to nothing but the truths which bring salvation. Theirs was not the fierce contention of lofty-crested words ;—

ὕψιλόφων τε λόγων κορυθαίολα νείκη; †

so that their mere opinions were in this respect Divine, and opposed in their nature to all those of human wisdom, which latter, as Bonald observes, "like the Minerva of the heathens, come out ready armed for battle, from the brain of their founders."[‡]

"Be not obstinate," says Louis de Blois, "in your own opinions and private judgment. Avoid contradiction, if truth and justice do not oblige you to use it. Yield easily to others. Suffer all the world to correct you and to instruct you, and do you acknowledge your faults with candor."[§] How many authors offend against this counsel of the middle ages ! How impatient are they of censure, while they cruelly insult others in a strain of affected politeness ; saying hard things softly, like artful Creon to Œdipus, σκληρὰ μαλθακῶς λέγων; || how tenacious of applause ; how full of themselves ; how quick to reprove those who are not filled with admiration at their works ! they remind one of Pindar's line,

He that breathes humility, secretly rages.

ὁ δὲ χαμηλὰ πνέων, ἄφαντον βρέμεται. ¶

This was Pagan lowliness.

^{*} Ivi Carnotensis. Epist. CLXXI.

† Aristoph. Ranæ. 818.

‡ Législation Primitive, Tom. III. 268.

§ Institution Spirituelle, Chap. ii. § 4.

|| Sophoc. Œdip. Col. 774.

¶ Pyth. Od. XI.

There were, indeed, some traces to them of a gentle character in the writings of the ancient sages, from whom they loved to extract the gold of natural or traditional wisdom. Thus the Athenian, with Plato, in reasoning with the youth who had been so perverted as to affect a disbelief in the Divinity, proceeds to teach him better things, ἐν πραέσει γόλοις. "We must approach him mildly," he says, καὶ λέγωμεν πράως, σβέσαντες τὸν θυμόν.* Let no one, he says again, speak any evil of another, but if arguing with any person in a discourse, let him teach and convince the person with whom he argues, and those that are present; but let him carefully refrain from calumny and opprobrious words; for from curses and spreading women's tales by the use of shameful epithets, the most heavy enmities take their rise. And it is an ungracious thing to let the soul again grow wild after it has been tamed and made gentle by education.† Thus, too, Pindar describes the first address of Jason, who "instilling a placid speech with a gentle voice laid a foundation of wise words," βάλλετο κρηπίδα σοφῶν ἐπέων.‡ Who need to be told that humility belonged also to the heroism of these grand ages? When the Turks raised the siege of Clisson, and fled in dismay upon hearing of the approach of the Christian army under Josselin, though this brave count was carried in a litter to command it, the humility of the Christian hero was nobly expressed in the prayer which he uttered upon hearing of the flight of the infidels. I will give it in the old French of Brother Nicole, because his great work, "Le Grant Voyage de Hierusalem," in which he relates it, which yet exists in Gothic letters, was both a history and a book of instruction for secular nobles, so that it furnished means of extending the spirit it so often describes. "He caused himself to be set down on the ground, and then with joined hands, he made this prayer to God. 'Tres doux Sauveur et Redempteur Jesu Christ sans lequel n'est aucun bien fait, je vous rends graces et mercis humblement de tous les benefices et graces qu'il vous a pleu me donner et conferer tant en guerre que en autres lieux. Et mesmement que de present a moy qui ne suis que ung ver de terre prest a rendre l'esprit, avez fait telle grace de chasser de mon pays ung si puissant princee comme le Souldan de Turquie. Lequel au sceu de ma venue s'en est fuy devant ma face comme l'aigneau devant le loup et tout par une digne vertu, non pas par ma force ne de mes gens d'armes. Et au surplus souverain Dieu je vous recommande mon ame vous priant devotement qu'il vous plaise la recevoir lassus en paradis.' And with these words he departed and humbly rendered up his spirit to our Lord."§

We must remember that poverty of spirit, in all the circumstances of its development, was not unknown even among the great in the worst ages of Christian antiquity. "How many persons, even in these deplorable times," says Lewis of Grenada, writing at the period of the great religious innovations, "how many persons of great quality, generously despising all the greatness and riches of the earth,

* Plato, de Legibus, Lib. X.

† Ibid. Lib. XI.

‡ Pyth. IV.

§ F. cxxix.

have chosen to live despised in the house of God, rather than enjoy the riches and advantages of the world!"* Humility was even embodied and shadowed forth in a multitude of customs, amidst the very pomp of secular courts, of which Dante might have said as well as of David dancing before the ark,

——— in that hap they seem'd
Less, and yet more, than kingly.†

These occasions might serve to explain the saying of St. Anselm, that "perfect humility and perfect pride have some works in common."‡

The ages of faith differ in no respect more from modern times than in the total absence of that activity in matters of earthly and material interest which is now regarded as the criterion of excellence, whether in an age, a nation, or an individual, and of which the origin is pride. There was not that interminable contest for superiority in rank, riches, or fame, which now keeps every nerve of society in full stress, without intermission, till snapt by some overwhelming destruction. Men were poor in spirit, that is, they were content to obey and follow the will of Providence, and the footsteps of their Saviour.

Dante, in representing the state of blessed spirits in Paradise, borrowed the sentiments which he ascribes to them from the doctrines of the school which had an influence then upon all the thoughts and ways of men, beyond any extent that would now be believed possible. Thus he addresses one of them :

——— Yet inform me, ye, who here
Are happy; long ye for a higher place,
More to behold, and more in love to dwell?
She with those other spirits gently smiled;
Then answer'd with such gladness, that she seem'd
With love's first flame to glow: "Brother! our will
Is, in composure, settled by the power
Of charity, who makes us will alone
What we possess, and naught beyond desire;
If we should wish to be exalted more,
Then must our wishes jar with the high will
Of him who sets us here."§

And besides, in ages of faith, when multitudes of souls on earth clothed in saintly flesh, were each a Paradise, men saw too much of heaven to feel any great anxiety or admiration for earth and its brief accidents. Jacob, after he had wrestled with the angel, remained lame of one of his legs, and was after called Israel, which is as much as to say, "the man that seeth God." "And so," observes father Diego de Stella, who wore the humble cord, "he that seeth and knoweth God must be lame outwardly to the world. If, therefore, thou do see worldly men going carefully and diligently to get honor and worldly riches, do not thou mervle thereat,

* Catechism, Part II. cap. xi. †Purg. X. ‡De Similitudinibus, cap. cxxxvii.

§ Parad. III.

if they go not lamely nor haltingly about that business, for they have but a small knowledge of God. The just men that do see God, as Jacob did, through the knowledge that they have of our Lord, are, as it were, lame in the knowledge of earthly things, and those doth the world think fools because they be wise before God.”*

For the clear and full insight into this mystery we are indeed indebted to the light of the Christian doctrine; but yet this and nothing else is the meaning of those remarkable passages which so frequently occur in the writings of Plato, where on a comparison between the effects of injustice and justice, the advantage is ascribed to the former, and it is shown to be more powerful, more spirited, and more despotic.† Dante, in the passage where he describes the imagery upon the ground in Purgatory, which exhibited various instances of pride recorded in history, does nothing but express the view which men in ages of faith generally entertained of the nature of national pomp and glory :

—————Troy I mark’d
In ashes and in caverns. Oh! how fall’n,
How abject, Ilion, was thy semblance there!

And the same popular and scholastic judgment, respecting the sinfulness of pride in separate men, is expressed in that passage where he describes the proud loaded with the weight of vast stones that crushed them. Upon first seeing them bent down beneath the dreadful weight, he cried out in astonishment to his guide, —————“Instructor!” I began,

“What I see hither tending bears no trace
Of human semblance, nor of aught beside
That my foiled sight can guess.” He answering thus.
“So curb’d to earth, beneath their heavy terms
Of torment stoop they, that mine eye at first Struggled as thine. But look intently thither;
And disentangle with thy lab’ring view,
What, underneath those stones, approacheth now.
E’en now, may’st thou discern the pangs of each.”
Christians and proud! O poor and wretched ones,
That, feeble in the mind’s eye, lean your trust
Upon unstaïd perverseness: know ye not
That we are worms.‡—————

* On the contempt of the world. St. Omers, 1622. l. 160. † De Repub. Lib. I ‡ Purg. X.

CHAPTER V.

AND here I must pause awhile, and from this mount "which healeth him who climbs," look back upon the scenes which so often arrest the early steps of men while conversing with the forms of mundane chivalry. Many, like Stesichorus in classic story, have had, before the course was done, to sing their palinodia. Cornelius Agrippa, practised in every slight of magic wile, lamented his vain labor in books of dangerous science : Erasmus, whose pleasant shafts have often wounded piety, expressed himself afflicted at the result of many of his writings : others of more antique days, whose names are too venerable to mention here, have left whole books of their retractions ; and, in sooth, whoever has eulogized the chivalry of this proud world, returning unto the holy triumph, may well add himself to the number, and smite upon his breast ; for, although he may hope to have avoided gross offence, yet is there always ground to fear that somewhat has been uttered not in harmony with lowliness, meekness, poverty of spirit,—the weapons of the just, who must conquer by yielding,*—peacefulness, and the awful sanctity of the school of Christ, whose sweet food can hardly then be tasted "without the cost of some repentant tear."

It is true the motive of honor is not always vicious. The doctrine of St. Thomas, the angelic teacher, and of the school is, that honor being despised meritoriously, when we refuse to commit a bad action, in order to possess it, may be also desired with praise, when we commit no evil that can destroy it : but so is also true that sentence which in lower regions is but seldom heard, "Sunt viæ quæ videntur hominibus rectæ, quarum finis usque ad profundum inferni descendit :" and there is an honor to be gained on earth which no favor wins in Paradise. It is not that I am willing to level those images of dignity and grace which so essentially belong to every form of chivalry that presents itself to the young imagination. It is not that I would add my puny efforts to aid those who are laboring to destroy every relic of the antiquated shrine of heroic virtue that has been left in the world. A modern writer, who seems to think, that to understand the spirit of the middle ages it is merely required to observe that of the nineteenth century among the people of the north, says, "the truth is, a very large number of the knights errant, comprising the chivalry of every country, were mere idle adventurers, bent only on the gratification of their own passions and seeking to enjoy life in the easiest and best manner possible." No coarse destruction of beautiful and ennobling thoughts is my object in this retrospect. A son of ancient chivalry was often extravagant, proud, intemperate, sensuous, and yet he was not what our modern sentimental pigmies would represent him; I rather hold with the wiser poet, where he says of his ideal hero,

* St. Ambrosii Officior. Lib. 1. 5.

" Yet in his worst pursuits, I ween
That sometimes there did intervene
Pure hopes of high intent ;
For passions link'd to forms so fair
And stately, needs must have their share
In noble sentiment."*

But from this station, on which we now stand to survey the ways of men, one feels the importance of distinguishing broadly between the modern idea of chivalry as an institution self-existing, and the source, as it is thought, of the greatest benefit to mankind, extending its influence even to our times, (for to this length do many writers now proceed in speaking its praise,) and that which represents it under the forms of Christian knighthood, the humble and constant dependent upon religion, drawing all its excellence from the faith and influence of the Catholic Church, in its specific character and peculiar circumstances, framed only to meet the particular evils which, during a certain period, existed in society, and in its general and primary state presenting nothing but a ground more than commonly favorable to the reception of that religious instruction, without which, its best faith, however beautiful when seen from far, would be delusive even as the apples on the Dead Sea shore, which, when touched, are discovered to be only ashes and bitterness. It is in this latter sense alone that chivalry can be defended with truth and justice, as being a Christian form of life, and consistent with the first qualifications for beatitude. Whereas, in these latter times, when men have begun to recur to the days of chivalry with a poetic admiration, contrasting them with the wretchedness and sensuality around them, the system is invariably represented under the former character; and against this manifest error, or rather perhaps this artful invention of proud men, who concert every ingenious measure to deprecate the benefits of that religion whose graces were common to the rich and poor, it is the solemn duty of every Catholic Christian who has ever loved the real spirit of the ancient chivalry, to express his convictions without disguise.

To begin then with the impressive formula of the Homeric heroes :

αλλο δέ τοι ἐρέω, σὺ δ' ἐνὶ Φρεσὶ βάλλεο σῆσιν.

chivalry was a noble and beneficial mode of life, so far as it was a Catholic mode of life ; but out of those limits it was only one of the many forms in which pride and sin ensnare the hearts of men ; it was evil and unholy, and on that ground alone not deserving of the ridicule of which some have thought it the proper object. For, in the first place, to return to that love of honor which is thought to have been its soul, there must be always danger here, not only of forgetting to glory in the cross, but even of falling short of the natural magnanimity of which we find traces in the ancient sages. Thus Crito's argument to persuade Socrates to leave the prison was, that the world would say that he had been neglected and forsaken by his friends, who might have enabled him to escape if they had chosen, but that they preferred their money to their friend. "O good Crito!" replied Socrates, "what is it to us what the world may say? for they who are honest and wise, whose opinion alone is worth considering, will conclude that these things have been done precisely as they have been done."* Cicero, even though he had said man was born for glory,† yet, coming to speak of true magnanimity, bids men remember, "unam esse omnium rem pulcherrimam, eoque pulchriorem, si vacet populo, neque plausum captans, quin etiam mihi quidem laudabiliora videntur omnia, quæ sine venditione et sine populo teste fiunt : non quo fugiendus sit, sed tamen nullum theatrum virtuti conscientia majus est."‡ And in another place he reckons those who seek glory among men who are opposed to philosophers.§ Codrus, indeed, was really devoted, for if he proposed to die for his country, he was willing to forego the honor, and therefore he took effectual measures to enable him to accomplish the offering of himself, by assuming the habit of a slave. But with men who speak of honor, with these admirers, I do not say with the actual possessors of the chivalrous spirit, it is often more the fame than the substance which they regard. It is only a respect for fame which actuates them : they speak in the Homeric style to their own conscience, "if I do so and so, men will accuse me of such and such things ; men will say that I am poor-spirited, superstitious, extravagant," ὥς ποτέ τις ἐρέειν τότε μοι χάνοι εὐρεῖα χθών.‖

* Wordsworth

Ibycus wrote a celebrated sentence, "I fear lest I should commit an offence against the gods and receive in return honor from men."¶ So just a sense had even this heathen of the essence of human honor.

With respect to those philosophers who have of late endeavored to conceive a purer and more spiritual idea of honor, as a self-existing principle, it seems to the Christian ear as if the subtilty of their words may have only aggravated the evil, spreading a thin varnish over the wide separation between pride and that spirit with which they attempted to unite it, if indeed such an union was in their thoughts; and such seems to be the case in that passage

* Plat. Crito.
‖ Il. IV. 182.

† Tuscul. Lib. II. 41.
¶ Suidas.

‡ Id. 26.

§ Tuscul. V. 3.

where Fichte says, that the hero whom the world supposes to be influenced by glory, "is only actuated by his own private judgment of right, and that in acting as he acts, he is no way led by the hope of applause, but that he achieves the act which bursts forth in all its purity within his own mind from the primal fountain of honor, and imposes on mankind the obligation of approving of it and honoring it; that is, provided he takes any thought about their judgment; utterly despising both them and their judgment, in case it is not the echo of that which he himself has pronounced for all eternity."

If this be the only language with which chivalry could prove that it had a humble spirit, the cause must assuredly have been hopeless: but we may believe, that in ages of faith it was often with men in the ranks of temporal chivalry as with the saints; they gained honor more by flying from it than by pursuing it. Among the papers of the Archduke Leopold of Austria, son of the Emperor Ferdinand II., was found certain rules of life which he had drawn up for himself in 1639, on taking the cross of the Teutonic order. Among these we read as follows: "I resolve to have in aversion and hatred of heart, which shall be shown by my deeds, as far as my condition and profession will permit, all that the world possesses of honor, glory, pride, vanity, ambition, commodity, and power, and I wish to live with great joy in detachment and poverty of spirit, stript of affection, for all that the world esteems, that I may possess God alone, my infinite treasure, and that I may be useful to others, desiring, so far as is possible, to follow the example and traces of my Lord Jesus, who was put naked on the cross, for my love."*

Nevertheless, the opening to dangerous abuse was broad. Hear the sentiments of a daughter of Spain, who had once drunk deep of the high spirit of that knightly land. It is St. Teresa who speaks: "As we forgive those, &c., Remark here my sisters, that it is not said, as we shall forgive, but as we forgive; for it is not to be conceived that any one would approach the eternal majesty to supplicate forgiveness, without having previously forgiven all that have injured him. It was for the saints a subject of joy to suffer persecution and injuries that they might have something to offer to God: but alas! what can a poor sinner like myself offer, who has so seldom had occasion to forgive, and who has such need of forgiveness? Let those who have the misfortune to resemble me reflect seriously upon this. I conjure them to estimate, according to their real value, these miseries to which we give the name of insults and affronts; these false honors of the world, with all these little sensibilities, which are only toys and plays of children, and that in things so vain they may never make a merit of their pretended acts of forgiveness. O my God, my God! if we did but know the real worth of this wicked honor! Alas! there was a time when I esteemed it without knowing what it was, carried away like so many others by the torrent of opinions and customs. What things did I then convert into subjects of trouble and vexation! With what shame do I now remember it ! Certes, I knew not then true honor, the only honor which is profitable to our souls, the only honor which merits our research. O my Saviour, thou who art once our model and our master, what was thy honor in this world? In what didst thou make it consist? Didst thou forfeit it by thy humility in humbling thyself to death? No, truly, and so far otherwise, that this abasement, to which thou didst consent, has become for all mankind a source of glory and honor ! Alas ! my sisters. Do we believe ourselves offended at what does not even merit the name of offence, and for having forgiven things which are neither injuries nor affronts, and which are not worthy of being named, do we fancy that we have performed something considerable, and do we suppose that God ought to forgive us, as if in reality we had forgiven others? O Lord, diffuse light amidst this darkness. Lighten our ignorance ; give us the grace to know that we do not know ourselves, that we come before thee with empty hands, and forgive us our trespasses only by the effect of thy goodness and thy mercy.*

* Les Vertus Héroïques de Leopold d'Autriche, par N. Avancin, 141.

Again, in another place, resuming her saintly strain :—"O my God, how clearly doth a soul see here the sense of that verse of the Psalmist, and that both he had reason, and that all the world should have reason, to desire the wings of the dove. For it is easily and clearly understood of that flight which the spirit makes, by which it raises itself up above all creatures, and in the first place, from above itself. But this is a sweet flight, a delightful and pleasant flight, and a flight without noise. What kind of dominion doth such a soul possess, with our Lord doth once conduct to this pitch, that she may be able to look down upon all things without being once entangled by any of them ! And how full of confusion will she now be, for that time wherein she was entangled before ! And how much will she be amazed to look back upon that blindness of hers ! How full of compassion will she be for such as do yet remain therein ! She is now much afflicted with the thought of that time wherein she had any regard to the point of honor, and for the gross error wherein she was to imagine that to be honor, which the world calls honor ; for she now sees that it was all an abominable lie, and yet that every body lives in the practice of it. But now this soul understands that right honor is built, not upon a lie, but upon truth ; esteeming that to be worth something, which indeed is so ; and holding that, which indeed is nothing, in no account at all, since all is nothing, and less than nothing, which comes to have an end and pleaseth not God."†

In these magnificent passages, where the piety of a saint is expressed in language as noble as that of Plato, he must indeed be slow who does not recognize some shade which did occasionally stain even that fairest and noblest chivalry, which claimed the admiration of mankind. Dante must have had deeper thoughts than meet the ear, when he speaks of having seen in Paradise, though in an inferior star, some good spirits,

* The Road of Perfection, Chap. xxiv.

† The Life of the Holy Mother St. Theresa.

Whose mortal lives were busied to that end,
That honor and renown might wait on them.

adding,—

And, when desires thus err in their intention,
True love must needs ascend with slacker beam.*

That some under knightly banners were busied to that end is more probable, than that such spirits could afterwards be raised at once so high. With greater justice does the same poet describe such spirits among the members of the suffering Church, to whom these words are spoken :—

Because ye point your wishes at a mark,
Where, by communion of possessors, part
Is lessen'd, envy bloweth up men's sighs.
No fear of that might touch ye, if the love
Of higher sphere exalted your desire,
For there, by how much more they call it ours,
So much propriety of each in good,
Increases more, and heighten'd charity,
Wraps that fair cloister in a brighter flame.†

Among the stains incident to the chivalrous soul in which its whole spirit is now often supposed to consist, was noted that attention to little sensibilities which St. Theresa describes as only toys and plays of children. Here was a source of bitterness which argued no proximity to the first beauteous circle of sweet life, the beatitude of the humble and the poor. The heathen portraits were strongly marked with this dark feature. Medea prepares to murder her children most dear to her, to destroy the whole house of Jason, and to commit, as she admits, a crime of impiety and horror, after which life will be intolerable to her, and all this for what reason? She declares it thus,— the motive that was sufficient to make Sir Walter Raleigh command a number of wretched people to be massacred! Goëthe, in his celebrated drama, entitled Torquato, Tasso, represents his hero as under the same influence. The quarrel with Antonio would be ludicrous, if one did not pity the agony of the poor victim to his own morbid sensibility. It is a quarrel of Germans, which seems noble to the hero who fancies himself injured, and which fills the dispassionate beholder with alternate commiseration and disgust; so true is the saying, that a man who is not perfectly dead in himself is quickly tempted and conquered in little and vile things.§ Now in opposition to this tone of mind, which is supposed to belong to chivalry, they who would hear a blessed voice, inviting them to the Mount, must be ready to renounce all claim to the honor that waits upon these quick and delicate sensibilities ; and as St. Ambrose says, they must be careful never to betray passion by their words, whatever may be the provocation.*

Οὐ γὰρ γελαῖσθαι τῷ τὸν ἐξ ἐχθρῶν, φίλαι,‡

* Parad. Canto. VI. † Purg. XV. ‡ Eurip. Med. 795. § De Imit. Christi, I. 6.

Delicacy and nobleness of mind, when well directed, and kept subservient to the ends of piety, were indeed regarded as a great treasure, but it was one which was known to require more than ordinary direction, and which exposed the possessor to a peculiar danger of incurring guilt and misery ; guilt in forfeiting divine charity, refusing to forget and forgive little things, from which the heaviest enmities so often arise, and misery, in depriving himself of the friendship of others ; for the number of such minds as could comprehend that intensity and delicacy of feeling must have been small, in comparison of those with whom were given a thousand occasions of offence and of saying, "Non irascendum sed insaniendum est." It was in proud silence, the delicate heart received the wound, whereas if there had been humility to leave a free course to the complaint of nature, the coarse dart might have been extracted, and no interruption caused to friendship and peace. The wise Spaniards say "a cheerful look and pardon are the best revenge for an injury ;" and again, they say, "If thou art vexed, thou wilt have two troubles." And if, after all, there had been no disposition to make amends, there would have been then an opportunity to remember St. Theresa's exclamation, and to renounce such vanities, following Christ through sacrifice and mortification. But uncorrected heroes of this noble stamp, who were left merely to nature, were for immediately withdrawing in silence, like Achilles, to sit alone and eat their own heart, under the intolerable pain of outraged feeling and a wounded imagination. Such persons, indeed, were often reminded, that after all, their conduct was only that of the vulgar, of the weakest and basest character ; and, on the contrary, that it would be a rare and noble testimony to the qualities of their soul, if it could be always said of them, by men of coarser minds, "I can do this, I can break this engagement, give this sign of indifference, for I know that man to be one who never takes offence, or who is always ready to forgive little, as well as great offences against him." "Grow angry slowly," say the Spaniards, "for, if there be cause, time will not fail thee to become so."

In the sphere of morality this morbid sensibility may have been productive of great evils. It is a just remark of a modern writer, with regard to the mind of chivalry, if we suppose it undirected by religion, that is, taking it in the sense in which men now understand chivalry. "The beauty of the virtue itself," he says, "was lost sight of, under the specious coloring of ambitious fancy. It was not truth which obtained the praises of the chevalier, or which he sought to exhibit in his conduct, but the extravagant imitation of her effects." Thus we have the ridiculous spectacle of these admirers of chivalrous honor pretending to have a greater regard for truth and sincerity, than the saints and the Christian doctors of the school. A great historian of our times, who, in this single instance, seems to have borrowed their language inadvertently, affirms that no defence is available in the case of one who, being innocent and about to suffer the last penalty of an impious law, should, on a review of his own conduct, during the mock trial, persist in maintaining that it was lawful for a man to equivocate, if an inhuman judge endeavored to force him to accuse himself; but, on the contrary, this is an opinion which has been approved of by the whole Church. Saints, like Athanasius, blessed spirits that may not lie, since they everdwell near the source of primal truth, are expressly recorded to have acted in conformity to it." The Just One said, "non ascendo ad diem festum hunc,"* and he meant "manifeste," for he went in secret. The proud Herculean openness which rushes upon destruction, may be esteemed sinful as well as a sign of ignorance and want of just discipline. We see that there was no direct answer given to the crafty chief priests and elders of the people, who asked by what authority those things were done; but that in reply, a question was addressed to them, which they could not or durst not answer.† Indeed, the sober judgment of the universal reason has sometimes been able to prevail, even over the extravagant fancies which the moderns seem to regard as inseparable from chivalry. Thus De Argentine, in order to save Bruce, when attacked in the hall of the Island-chieftain's castle, is represented by the poet as pretending to claim the prisoners, in his sovereign's name, as vassals who had borne arms against their liege lord, and then we read—

Such speech, I ween, was but to hide,
His care their safety to provide;
For knight more true in thought and deed,
Than Argentine ne'er spurr'd a steed.‡

Yet every barbarous Cyclops would exclaim here,—“This is deceit, not manly force.”§

The justice, however, of an opposite conclusion was not unknown to the knight of chivalry. Don Diego Savedra Faxardo did not want to be instructed in honor, and yet he proves, in the very book which is to teach honor, that it may be lawful sometimes to dissemble; appealing to the conduct of David before King Achis, || to Samuel's pretence of sacrifice, ¶ and to the hair applied to the hands of Jacob, which latter instance, however, is interpreted by St. Augustin as having been a mystery prefigurative of the atonement.†† The conduct of Abraham too might have been added, of whom St. Ambrose says, “Truly, a great man, illustrious, with many virtues, whom philosophy, with all her vows, could never equal.”‡‡ But all this is widely different from the spirit ascribed by Homer to

* Joan. vii. 8.

† Matt. xxi. 24.

‡ The Lord of the Isles.

§ Od. IX. 408.

|| I Reg. xxi. 13.

¶ Ibid. xvi. 2.

 Gen. xvii. Christian Prince, l. 452.

†† Lib. cont. Mendacium. Cap. iv.

‡‡ Lib. de Abraham. Patriarch.

his heroes, and even to his divine personages, who are not in error, but in total want as to the principle of truth.*

Another danger to which the chivalrous mind may have been exposed, consisted in men affecting to have higher and purer motives of action than belonged to ordinary Christians, so that in fulfilling a real duty, they appeared to obey only their own will. Of this we have an instance, in the custom of bearing those rings of iron, silver, or gold, which signified that the wearer was the slave of his word. They are described by Olivier de la Marche, Monstrelet, Mabillon, and Ducange, and even by Tacitus, whose testimony to the fact might of itself lead us to trace their real origin. In many instances, however, whatever may have been their origin, the use may have been sanctified. But if this extreme delicacy of the chivalrous mind may have sometimes been an evil, in pushing virtue to extravagance, what must it have been when it made a virtue of indulging, even to excess, some of the most vicious passions of the corrupted heart! Yet it is too true, that it sometimes did so; though by pity may the mind be overpowered, when it hears this affirmed of those dames and knights of antique days. It was only the powerful and incessant action of the Catholic religion, which induced them to renounce the sentiment of nature, as expressed by Medea, when she glories in the crime she is about to commit, and declares that she is of this character, to be terrible to her enemies and benevolent to her friends, adding, that this is the most glorious praise,— τῶν γὰρ τοιούτων εὐκλεέστατος βίος.†

And so it will always be in the judgment of the world; for it is the sentiment of uncorrected nature which Callicles expresses in addressing Socrates,—“It is not the part of a man to suffer injuries, but only of some slave, to whom it is better to die than to live.”‡ It was from a far higher source that Socrates drew his maxim, saying, “We must never retaliate by doing evil for evil, and we must never injure any man, though we may suffer ever so great injury from him.”§ This is not what is now supposed to be the spirit of chivalry, nor what it really is, if we consider it as self-existing and in its primary state; in man, cholerick and bloody, in his partner, reckless, spurring others on maliciously to strife. We can form a more correct estimate of it, by referring to that sad picture of the scene in Tantalion hall:—

On the earl's cheek, the flush of rage
O'ercame the ashen hue of age.

Or even to that hero described in Tasso, who, as a hot brand, flames most ere it goeth out.

So he, when blood was lost, with anger wroth
Revived his courage, when his puissance died;
And would his latest hour, which now drew nigh,
Illustrate with his end, and nobly die.||

* Odyss. I. 179.

† Eurip. Med. 808.

‡ Plat. Gorgias.

§ Plat. Crito.

|| XIX. 22.

Such may be an Homeric death, or chivalrous, if men will; but theology would teach us to admire other portraits and other modes of spirits' passing. All this acquires additional force, when it is remembered that the soul may continue under the influence of these passions, even to the extreme verge of life; and what an image is then presented by men, like the master who translated into French the history of Gyron le Courtois, who is represented as an old knight in a very advanced age, coming to king Arthur's court to enter the lists with young knights, "et à scavoir lesquels estoient les plus vaillans ou les jeunes ou les vieux."* and who is subsequently described in mortal combat, acquitting himself in such a manner, that "he seemed no longer a knight, but thunder and tempest?" In truth, it cannot be denied that there is a great deal of this blind world in all the affectation of chivalrous sentiment, as it appears in the discourse and writings of the moderns. The very use which is made of terms to express it, proves this; for what Thucydides relates of certain miserable times in Greece, takes place here: the usual worth of names is transferred to other and contrary deeds, for irrational boldness is styled manly courage and good companionship; temperance is called effeminacy, and prudence in every thing, idleness in every thing. Or, as Plutarch says of flatterers, dissipation is called liberality, rashness activity, licentiousness the love of society and warmth of natural affection; and the love of mankind entitles men to the charge of being abject and contemptible. What does all this indicate but the approach to those straits which none have passed and lived? Then, too, the crimes and injuries of unholy men, are sung and extolled in legends and in poetry, although even the heathens would have shown the evil of this. For Pindar says, "Whatever thing is done without God is not the worse of being consigned to silence and oblivion;"—

"Ανευθε δὲ θεοῦ, θεοιγα-μείνον γ' οὐ σκαιότερον χρεῖμ'
"Εκαστον.†

a principle, which, if observed by writers in our time, would leave their splendid histories as meagre as many of the monkish chronicles, which they deem so insipid. And Euripides says,

Σιγαῖν ἄμεινον ταῖς χάρι' μηδὲ Μοῦσά μοι λέγουιτ' αἰδοῖς, ἥ τις ὑμνήσει κακά.‡

With idle fables, in which "there lurks a still and dumb-discursive devil, that tempts most cunningly," the mind is ever occupied.

——— Dangerous food
For knightly youths, to whom is given
So much of earth, so much of heaven,
And such impetuous blood.

* L'Histoire de Gyron le Courtois, f. 1.

† Olymp. IX.

‡ Troad. 388.

Nor is it to be overlooked, that the importance attached to birth exposes men under this influence to the danger of contracting a thousand stains of pride. “Nobilitas generis sæpe parit ignobilitatem mentis,” said St. Gregory.* It was well for many to resemble Bernardin di Fosco, as described by Dante,

A gentle scion from ignoble stem.†

The heart, on that account, was often lighter, the conscience less oppressed. This is shown by the very bard of chivalry, where he describes how to the mind of Marmion, the wild and innocent song of youth sounded as if disgrace and ill and shameful death were near.

Her wing shall the eagle flap
O'er the false-hearted;
His warm blood the wolf shall lap,
Ere life be parted.
Shame and dishonor sit
By his grave ever;
Blessing shall hallow it Never, O never!

So sung the simple Fitz Eustace, hoping to amuse his lord, in whom, on the contrary, it awakened all the pangs of horrible remorse.

Not alone nobility of birth, but the being placed in the condition of the rich and powerful, and even that very excellence of disposition which gave rise to chivalry, and which we have seen to be peculiarly favorable to the reception of the Christian doctrine, required more than ordinary assistance from heaven, to prevent it from becoming the very source of the greatest evil. To understand this position, which at first may seem partly to contradict itself, we need only attend to what Socrates says in the sixth book of the Republic, and every one will perceive that his argument receives additional force from the philosophy of Christians. He speaks thus, “I think that all persons must admit that the qualities which are required to constitute a true lover of wisdom, are imparted but seldom, and to very few men, and see how many and great are the causes of corruption even to these few. For in the first place, that which is most strange of all to hear, each one of the qualities which we have lately praised as requisite for philosophy, destroys the soul and tears it from philosophy, such as courage, temperance, and all the other virtues of which we spoke. In addition to this, all the things that are called good, corrupt the soul and tear it from philosophy, such as beauty and riches, and strength of body, and the having powerful relations in the state, καὶ εὐγγένεια ἐρρωμένη ἐν πόλει, and all such things, for you have the type of what I wish to describe. This can be made to appear most clearly. For we know that every seed, whether of plants or of animals, which does not meet with the nourishment proper for it, neither the seasons nor the locality,

* Lib. II. Dialog. cap. xxxiii.

† Purg. XIV.

by how much the more vigorous it is, by so much the more does it want what is proper for it. It is reasonable, then, that the best nature, when it receives an education improper for it, should become worse than an evil nature; so that the souls which are of the best disposition by nature, when they receive an evil education, become eminently bad. The greatest crimes spring from such natures, spoiled by a bad education; for a weak nature is capable of nothing great, either in virtue or in vice. If, then, the philosophic nature should obtain the education proper for it, of necessity it will grow up to all virtue; but if it experience a contrary, it will proceed to the very reverse of this ἐὰν μὴ τις αὐτῇ βοηθήσας θεῶν τύχη. If, then, any one should come softly up to a man in this condition, and should say truly, that there is no sense in him, and that he wants sense, and that this is not a thing to be acquired by any one unless by him who is content to make himself a slave for the sake of its acquisition, μὴ δουλεύσαντι τῇ κτήσει αὐτοῦ do you think that he would take pleasure in hearing this, while oppressed with so many evils? Far otherwise indeed. But, on the other hand, if through the excellence of his natural disposition by birth, from being well born, and from his natural affinity to what is delivered, any one should be enabled to perceive what a thing philosophy was, should be bent and drawn to it, what think you would those men do who would know that the use for them and the grounds on which they had enjoyed his company would perish if he yielded to the love of wisdom? Would they not do and say every thing respecting him, that he might not be persuaded, and respecting those persuading him, that they might not be able, conspiring against them in secret, and even calling them before the tribunals? How then can such a man attain to the exercise of philosophy?—We see, then, that the parts of a philosophic nature, when they meet with an evil education, are the very cause why the men who possess them fall from their vocation to philosophy; that the things which are commonly called good, riches and all other attendants, conduce to the same effect,—so great is the facility of destruction and corruption to the best natures, which are themselves but so few in number as we have shown,—and that it is from these men that the greatest evils are produced, both private and public, as well as the greatest good whenever they happen to flow in that direction οἱ ἂν ταύτῃ τύχῳσι ρυέντες whereas a little nature never does any thing great to any one, either in private or in public.”* This remarkable passage might be illustrated by many memorable events in the intellectual history of the middle ages, by showing the perfection to which men of noble natures did sometimes attain, the difficulties which they had always to surmount from the very causes above enumerated; the persecution of those who converted them to a life of sanctity, respecting whom the world made as anxious enquiries as the suitors of Penelope did after Minerva, who, in disguise of a guest, had reminded Telemachus of his father;† and the number of those whose evil and extravagant deeds of robust prof-

* Plato, de Repub. Lib. VI.

† Od. I. 705.

ligacy appear in such dark contrast with the generous and brilliant actions of the just, and whose crimes and follies may be traced to the misdirection of noble qualities, proving the justice of what Dante also says, that

The more of kindly strength is in the soil,
So much doth evil seed and lack of culture
Mar it the more, and make it run to wilderness.*

Indeed, this position is no novelty in the schools. "The blindness of fallen nature," says a famous book, "judged a life of pleasure and licence to be the best and happiest. Nature adheres to this as most agreeable to it. And this results most powerfully in those who are endowed with an excellent natural reason—for this ascends so high in its own light and in itself, that it thinks itself to be the eternal and true light, and proposes itself for that; and being deceived by itself, proceeds to deceive others along with itself."† The conclusion, therefore, is the same, that the very best qualities, and the very choicest intellectual and moral treasures are changed into evils, and obstacles to virtue, by the pride and self-sufficiency which they generate; and that in this respect the only possible safety, reserved for the chivalrous nature, was in its complete and unreserved submission to the influence of that Catholic doctrine, which taught and enabled men to embrace practically poverty of spirit—which taught the monarch on his throne to say, with the son of a poor laborer, "Let others, like the Jews, seek honor one from another: I will desire that which is from God alone. All human glory, all temporal honor, all mundane altitude, compared with thy eternal glory, is vanity and folly. O veritas mea et misericordia mea, Deus meus, Trinitas beata! tibi soli laus, honor, virtus, et gloria, per infinita seculorum secula.‡

And now, in passing from this retrospect of the ways and thoughts of pride, may we feel that joy which Dante experienced, when he had traversed the first division of the suffering Church, where this sin was expiated and purged away:—

———We climb the holy stairs:
And lighter to myself by far I seem'd
Than on the plain before; whence thus I spake:
"Say, Master, of what heavy thing have I
Been lighten'd; that scarce aught the sense of toil Affects me journeying?" He in few replied:
"When sin's broad characters, that yet remain
Upon thy temples, though well-nigh effaced,
Shall be, as one is, all clean razed out:
Then shall thy feet, by heartiness of will,
Be so o'ercome, they not alone shall feel
No sense of labor, but delight much more Shall wait them, urged along their upward way."§

* Purg. XXX.
§ Purg. 12.

† Theologia Germanica Cap. xviii.

‡ De Imit. Christ. III. 40.

CHAPTER VI.

THE line of this argument presents a changing scene, and brings before us men of very different classes in one succeeding order. From knights who were exposed to the danger of seeking glory in their deeds, I pass to the consideration of the learned and the holy writers, whose indifference to fame, though theirs were souls wanting nothing of great praise, furnishes a subject of itself instructive and suitable to the present inquiry. Here are presented two objects most characteristic of Christian ages—the motives, and object, and expectations of men in writing books, and the style and general tone of their composition. The great writers of heathen antiquity have generally taken care to acquaint us at once with their motives in writing, and the expectations which they founded upon their labors. With one,

——— Eximia laudis succensus amore, it is to transmit his own achievements to posterity ; with another, to beguile a period of exile, or to divert his mind from public calamities ; with another, to amuse his leisure, and prepare glory for his own name : thinking with Pindar, “that he is happy whom fame celebrates”—

————— ὁ δ' ὀλβιος, ὅν
 Φᾶμαι κατέχοντ' ἀγαθαί.*

“I am persuaded,” says Dionysius, “that those who would wish to leave monuments of their genius to posterity, ought in the first place to choose a splendid and illustrious theme, which can afford much utility to those who study it : for they who undertake to write upon obscure, ignoble matters, or such as are evil, and of no importance, whether from a desire to show their knowledge and to make a name for themselves, or merely from a wish to display their skill in writing, are never the objects of emulation to posterity, in consequence to this knowledge, nor are they praised on account of their eloquence.”† Cardan seems to express the sense of nearly all Pagan writers on this point, where he says, “In universum nil prosunt literæ ni tympanum pulset aliquis. Infelix autem conditio tua est quum ipse cogeris pulsare.”‡ They nearly all indicate the sentiment expressed by Janson

* Olymp. VII.

† Antiquit. Rom. Lib. I.

‡ Prudentia Civilis. Cap. xc.

in the tragedy—"May I never possess treasures without the applause of men."

μητ' Ὀρφέως κάλλιον ὑμνήσαι μέλος, εἰ μή πῖσημος ἢ τύχη λένοιτό μοι.*

A result which they deemed adequate compensation for any previous injury; so that Jason reminds Medea of the advantage he has already conferred upon her in causing her to reside in Greece, where every one praises her talents and wisdom; whereas if she had lived ἐπ' ἐσχατοῖς γῆς, there would have been no talk of her.† In the ages of faith, the motives and views of men who were authors of books, were totally opposed to these: and therefore, without proceeding to enquire farther, it would be but reasonable to expect, a priori, that their works themselves would have a new and distinctive character. There were also external and accidental circumstances, which contributed to secure this result. Many of the chronicles, and other books of the middle ages, were written by monks for the use of their brethren in the cloister. "The greatest number of these writers," says a learned historian of the Crusades, "believed that their books were to live and die like themselves in solitude. Hence the simplicity of their narrative, and sometimes its indiscretion. What would have been their surprise if it had been announced to them, that on a future day their volumes were to be judged before the tribunal of the proud world, or of the age, and that the invention of printing would multiply copies of their manuscripts! As they never thought that the public would behold them, their style was frank and natural. Piety prescribed to the writers of the cloister to fly from all falsehood; and that fact should be a warrant to us at least of their good faith. Some condemn themselves to the punishment of hell if they should ever write in the spirit of prejudice or of hatred; others in their preface implore the charity of their readers, and addressing themselves to the Divine clemency, hope that, if they should commit any errors, God will pardon them when they appear at his dread tribunal. In relating events, they are accustomed to date from the festivals of the Church, for religion was always in their thoughts. After the interests of the Church they attend to those of their respective monasteries. In speaking of heroes or princes, they represent them rather according to their physical than their moral qualities, unlike those 'who look not at the deed alone, but spy into the thoughts with subtle skill.' They relate only facts, and make no speculation as to causes or effects; only they sometimes conclude the account of a mournful event with a pious reflection—as when they have related the fall of an empire or the death of a great king, they exclaim that the glory of the world vanishes like a vapor, that it passes like the water of a torrent, or decays like the flowers of the spring. A wet season, an inundation, a drought, a storm, would then occupy the attention of history, for the public prosperity depended upon the harvest; and they even descended to the least particulars, as when the monk of St. Denis says, that the lightning fell upon the gilt cock on the belfry of the abbey. To observe their attention in recording eclipses, comets, and all remarkable phenomena of the atmosphere, one would suppose that they were writing the history of the seasons. Nothing embarrassed them in the natural or political order; for whatever seemed unaccountable and horrible to reason, was ascribed by them to the secret designs of God.”*

* Eurip. Med. 542.

† Ibid. 540.

In describing the evils of their age, their intense sense of justice, writing as if before the divine altars, may have led them to adopt language, from which we can at present argue but little; for though they judged no man personally, they might freely condemn a general misery: and it was kindred spirits to theirs which Dante had in view when he exclaimed,

——— O clear conscience and upright!
How doth a little failing wound thee sore.†

The spirit with which these men wrote may be inferred from the circumstance of their having so often succeeded in concealing their names from posterity. They were content to be forgotten or unknown if they could but save their readers, unlike so many writers of later times, who are ever anxious to secure for themselves a name; and if they can but further this object, scruple not to excite the passions, and to expose their readers to eternal ruin! The author of the Imitation of Christ is unknown. Some ascribe it to Thomas à Kempis, others to the Abbot Gerson; and this diversity of opinion has been the source of long, and, as the Abbé de la Mennais says, useless controversies; “but no object,” he observes, “is too frivolous for human curiosity. Immense researches have been made to discover the name of a poor solitary of the thirteenth century. What is the result of so many labors? the solitary has continued unknown; and the happy obscurity in which his life glided has protected his humility against our vain science.” The historian of the Abbey of Jumièges is obliged to confess his inability to do justice to the admirable men who pursued learning and the arts within that cloister, “because,” he says, “their modesty and humility rendered them unambitious of being known to posterity.”‡ “The monks,” says the Chronicle of Richarius, “greatly cherished St. Filibert, as being the most fervent disciple of the late St. Richarius. At that time faithful men, holy and good, took no great care to commit to writing the things which were done, because they only attended to this end, how they might deserve to be inscribed in the books of life; therefore we should not have known even the names of the abbots who succeeded, had not the venerable Abbot Angeleran made a catalogue of them, thinking that such men ought to be remembered.”§ And in the same manner Desguerrois, in his history of the Diocese of Troyes, observes of the ancients, that, “they were more desirous of being saints, than learn-

* Michau sur le Caractère et l'Esprit des Chroniques du Moyen Age.

† Purg. Cant. III.

‡ Deshayes, Hist. de l'Abbaye de Jumièges, 154.

§ Chronic. Centulensis sive Richarii, Lib. I. cap. xxviii.

ed historians, and that there is therefore much obscurity in their accounts of the early saints of God." A great theologian laments that Pagan authors, such as Diogenes Lærtius, and Suetonius should have given more exact histories of the philosophers and Cæsars than many Catholic writers have left of martyrs, virgins, and confessors.*

The cloister had its poets too, but they sought not to follow that Theban eagle, "to walk," as Pindar says, "high in the paths of life."† It was enough if they could compose some hymn or melody for the glory of God and the utility of the Church. The author of the sublime hymn Salve Regina is said to have been Herman, a Benedictine monk in the year 1059, who was altogether devoid of polished literature.‡ The names of those who composed some others are unknown. "Whatever you do," says the father of the Scholastic Theology, "do all for future benefit, in expectation of the eternal recompense : a future, not a present recompense is promised to the saints ; in heaven, not on earth, reward is promised to the just. What is to be given elsewhere must not then be expected here. Be dead to the world, and let the world be dead to you. As if dead, look upon the glory of the world ; as if buried, be not careful for the world ; as if dead, cease from earthly cares. Despise, living, what you cannot possess after death. Study nothing on account of praise, nothing on account of temporal opinion, nothing for the sake of fame, but all things on account of eternal life, which may be grant you who liveth in heaven blessed for ever and ever."§

What a contrast is here to the spirit of men who do nothing from these supernatural motives, whose writings, alms, and even prayers, are all for the sake of the world ; and of whose devotional literature it may be said with truth, that "gainful merchandise is made of Christ throughout the live-long day !" The muse of Pindar would perhaps have disdained the sanctuary of the Christian soul, "Who of those that are destined to die would wish to cover in vain an inglorious old age without a name, sitting in darkness ἀπάντων καλῶν ἄμυρος."|| This is a darkness in which the holy writers of past ages were willing to sit expecting the manifestation of the Son of God. "Unknown to the world," says Louis de Blois, "they conceal themselves in retreat. Hardly do men without perceive their interior application to the things of heaven, and their conversation so Christian, so heavenly, which they maintain with God ; unless, indeed, they be men who have received from heaven the same grace, for they avoid letting appear without any thing extraordinary or singular. In the commerce of life they are gentle, beneficent, and full of sweet humanity ; they study to become the most amiable of men, but in such a manner as to preserve themselves pure from all sin ; they are full of indulgence for all men. Such are the obscure children of God, who never utter any words but those of humility, and who comport themselves always

* Melchoir Canus, Lib. II. de locis Theolog. † Olymp. I.

‡ Card. Bona de Divina Psalmodia, 406. § S. Anselmi Lib. Exhortationum. || Olymp. I.

in all things as if they were worthless, being often despised even by those who appear externally to have some sanctity.”*

Do not these inhabitants of the cloister seem like those of a higher world, to which the poet alludes :

I might relate of thousands, and their names
Eternize here on earth; but those elect
Angels, contented with their love in heav’n,
Seek not the praise of men.—

Were these writers in the ages of faith deceived in their estimate of the value of human fame? Ah! there are some who seem to think so, though even there were heathen sages who abstractedly made the same.

“Ornat hæc magnitudo animi,” says Pliny, “quæ nihil ad ostentationem, omnia ad conscientiam refert.”† “Multi famam,” he says again, “conscientiam pauci verentur.”‡ If fame were not vanity in itself, its capricious and unjust dispensation would prove it worthless. Pliny thought that the verses of Martial would not pass to posterity; “and yet,” says the philosopher with an air of deep reflection, “he wrote as if they were to endure to future ages.”§ They did endure, and will probably last with the world, while no one knows who were the authors of the two most sublime books that exist, the Poems of Homer and the Book of Job. How many holy wise men are forgotten! how many fools and villains immortalized! Ælian has immortalized the names of several great eaters.|| How many base calumniators of truth and goodness have we seen rise up whose volumes will descend to the latest posterity with the applause of a blind world, though Justice, if she had a voice on earth, would cry,

“Cancell’d from heav’n and sacred memory
Nameless in dark oblivion let them dwell!”

If we turn now to consider the style of their compositions, we shall find that it corresponds with the motives which induced them to write: their standard seems to be expressed by Raban Maur, where he says, “Magis cligo sanctam rusticitatem, quam eloquentiam peccatricem.”¶ St. Gregory of Tours apologizes for having undertaken to write upon the glory of the confessors, acknowledging that he has no genius or eloquence to qualify him for such a task, and adding, of himself, “whom no worldly boasting hath lifted up to write, but whom shame admonished to be silent, the love and fear of Christ hath impelled to relate these things.” Nothing can be greater than his reluctance to presume to write concerning the miracles of St. Martin: he wishes that Severus or Paulinus were alive to continue their histories; but he is impelled to do it by a vision, and by reflecting that the Saviour

* Louis de Blois, Institution Spirituelle, chap. xii. § 4. † Epist. Lib. I. 22. ‡ Lib. III. 20. § Epist. Lib. III. 21. ¶ Var. Hist. ¶ De Institutione Clericorum, Lib. III. 27.

 De Gloria Confessorum Præfat.

of the world chose poor illiterate men for his apostles, and therefore ne undertakes the task without being dissuaded by the conviction of his own rusticity.* It does not enter into their idea of writing to begin as if constructing a palace, by raising a vestibule of golden columns, and thus making the frontispiece beautiful ; to their humble books nothing can be more simple than the entrance. "I have made a little treatise respecting the mode of preparing for a happy death, and I have said something respecting our heavenly country, and also concerning the divinity and the rational creature." It is in this style that Louis de Blois introduces one of his books.† The prologue to the four books of Sentences, by the celebrated Peter Lombard, Archbishop of Paris, who was known by the title of the Master of the Sentences, begins with these words, "Desiring with the poor widow, to cast something out of our poverty into the treasury of the Lord, we have presumed beyond our strength, moved by the zeal of the House of God, opposing our faith to the errors of carnal and animal men." Dante alludes to this in describing him in the choir of Paradise :

Peter, he that with the widow gave
To Holy Church his treasure.‡

With the same simplicity they allude to the works of their contemporaries. Thus the blessed John of the Cross, Director of St. Theresa, says in one of his books, "I leave this matter to some one else more worthy : especially since our blessed Mother, Theresa of Jesus, has written admirably on this subject ; and I hope from the Divine goodness that her works will be printed and given to the public before long ;" they saw the Divine goodness and they trusted to it in every thing. Petrus Celsensis, Abbot of St. Remy, says, in a letter to a monk of St. Bertine, "You desire to have our letters, which, like useless feathers, are borne in every direction by the four winds of heaven, though you sit at the rich tables of the Augustines and Gregories and Jeromes, the Ambroses and Bedes and Hilaries and Origenes, whose crumbs I am not worthy to pick up. If you are pleased with new things behold the works of Master Hugues and St. Bernard, of Master Gilbert and Master Peter, in which neither roses nor lilies are wanting ; but our writings have no depth or fertility."§ The moderns, who so loved moral abstractions in their misguided desire to be spiritual that they would have us to believe them humble, while using the proudest words, will object to these passages, and accuse them of affectation ; but yet a natural and unvitiated taste will agree with Pliny where he says, "Nescio quo pacto magis in studiis homines timor quam fiducia deest."|| A distinguished professor in the Academy of Paris has lately written a book, and styled himself on the title page "Philosopher." Epictetus would have taught him better, Μηδ' αὐτοῦ σεαυτὸν οἶπης φιλόσοφον.¶ To their humility of style was added that certain tone

* Epist. Ante, Lib. Miracul. D. Martini. † Ludovic Blosius Enchiridion Parvulorum Prefat.

‡ Paradise, X. § Epist. Lib. VII. 19. || Epist. Lib. V. 17. ¶ Manuale, cap. xliii.

of deep conviction and stability, amounting even to playfulness, which necessarily belongs to those who are established

—————In that holy faith
Which vanquishes all error.

Thus Petrus Cellensis, the Abbot of St. Remy, writes as follows: "Brother Nicholas, in jesting you have said the truth, when, in allusion to my name, Peter, you have called me a stone, and I grant you it suits me, if you understand constancy and not hardness, for I am by nature and profession, in age and in will, as well as in name, petrine, rocky, rooted and founded in the mountains of the holy authorities, and in the midst of the rocks, where mother Church builds her nest in the clefts and caverns."* Hence there is often more solid instructions in the mere titles of their works than we could gain from all the frothy contents of modern volumes, which are nothing to the touch but clouds and vapor. Such was that adopted by Rodolphe le Maître in 1635, expressing so much in few words, "Treatise on Catholic Constance, against the floating errors of this time.†" In later times an author would be anxious to add a long list of honorable distinctions to his name; where the most learned and illustrious writers of the middle age are contented to sign themselves, like St. Anselm, a monk and a sinner; the title by which St. Peter Damian was distinguished while he dwelt beside the Adriatic, in the house of our blessed Lady, as he reminds Dante on appearing to him in Paradise. It is remarked by Father Lewis of Grenada, that he, "into whose keeping, from the cross, the mighty charge was given," might have called himself an Apostle, a Prophet, an Evangelist, and the son by adoption of the Virgin Mother; but he passes in silence over all these magnificent titles, and calls himself the disciple whom Jesus loved. Thus, in ages of faith, to be his humble disciple was deemed more glorious than to be celebrated as an historian or orator, a poet, a general, or a king.

On the other hand, the chronicles and lives written in the middle ages are simply written, and in an unguarded, artless style which requires a Catholic interpreter. Thus sentences, often follow sentences, apparently with but little, or even with a false connection; but here we must not, like the moderns, immediately commence a charge of error, of superstition, or of inhumanity. The author of an amusing history of Grenada, would lead his reader to form an uncharitable opinion of the illustrious Mariana, from his concluding the account of a loss sustained by the Christian army with the words, "but as these latter were chiefly people of low rank, baggage carriers, and such like, the loss was not of great importance." Similar to expressions in Froissart, which have involved him equally in the like charge. But in these instances do not the words merely express the fact? Is not the loss to an army of some great captain greater than that of a private soldier? Mariana is not preaching a sermon, but writing a history; and indeed I do not believe that even this writer, who accuses him, and who is generally so estimable, would maintain that the great historian of Spain required to be taught humanity by the modern philanthropists. In all similar instances, to the page of the monkish chronicles, a closer attention would enable us to discover the writer's goodness and purity of intentions, though a hasty glance at the passage might furnish ground to a modern reader for accusation against him. What Dante sings of higher matters is applicable here:

* Epist. Lib. VI. 23. † Gouget. Biblioth. Française. Tom. xv. 357.

——— Things oft appear
That minister false matter to our doubts
When their true causes are removed from sight.*

But the fact is that these writers never contemplated the possibility of men so mistaking their meaning, or that these inaccuracies of style would become of consequence. "He founded a monastery, for he was most pious," says a chronicle. So then, will the Robertsons and their followers observe, this was the grand proof of piety! Attend a little, you hasty judge. "For he was most pious, a lover of the poor, and of all that appertained to God." Here the meaning is clear; but frequently the sentence would not have been completed, and thus a ground would have been left open to these suspicious, uncharitable, and overknowing readers to condemn the holy men of these simple ages. Where they do err it is not the fault of their intention, their language clearly shows this. Thus the monk Richerius, in his Chronicle of Sens, says, "Because I have found little or nothing recorded of the acts of the successors of the blessed Gundelbert, expecting only their names, I have not presumed to add any thing of my own, lest I should be accounted a new author of rumors."† And again he says of the Abbot Magneramnus, "quia nihil plus invenio, nihil scribere possum."‡ Facts that seem contrary to this view should be interpreted, bearing in mind that these books were written for a confined and almost domestic circle of readers, to whom the object and intentions of the writer might be known or transmitted. That love of sacred antiquity which inspired Mabillon went hand in hand, as he declares, with the love of truth.§ Not that in this respect he differed from those who went before him, but that as soon as men could foresee the danger, we find that they took care to provide against it. For others who never contemplated such a result, as Mabillon says of Trithemius and Arnoldus Wion, who first attempted to put in order the history of the great and holy men who followed the rule of St. Benedict, they are to be excused if amidst such difficulties and obscurity they erred sometimes. Yet, continues the great Mabillon, "Imprudent and precipitous admirers," (like those who claim saints that do not belong to their order,) "may be as opposed to truth as unjust calumniators. Unde

* Purg. XXII.

† Chronic. Senoniensis, Lib. III.

‡ Id. Lib. IV. 20.

§ Præfat. in 1. Sæcul. Benedictinum.

mihī semper maximæ curæ fuit hunc scopulum vitare, et quamvis eruditione et scientia inferior, nulli tamen sinceritate verique studio cedere umquam sustinebo.”*

But there remains to be considered a class of writers who form a distinctive feature of the middle ages, whose lives and labors were especially directed by the view of that beatitude which is promised to the poor in spirit. Louis de Blois, of the ancient house of Blois and of Châtillon, was from childhood a model of piety and virtue; educated at the Court of Prince Charles, afterwards Charles V., the world was always a strange country for him; he had a distaste for pleasure, riches, and grandeur. At the age of fourteen years he renounced the world, and entered into a monastery of Benedictines. At the age of twenty-four he was named to preside over the Abbey of Liesse, which he continued to edify till his death, which happened in 1566, for no persuasions had prevailed upon him to accept the archiepiscopal see of Cambrai. The admirable translator of his spiritual guide, in the Preface which he has prefixed, speaks in general of the ascetical writers of the middle age, and says “It is allowable to suppose that these men, or rather these angels on the earth, enlightened within by eternal splendor, refreshed and vivified by that dew of light, of which the Prophet speaks,† have let fall some of its drops in their writings, and that it is less their words which we hear than the very words of God himself. Their thoughts, their language, all bespeak a celestial origin. It is not thus that men speak. Man has not along with so much grandeur, such simplicity; nor with so much love, such peaceful calm. This Divine mixture of innocence and sublimity, of ardor and quiet, is a distinctive character of these ascetical authors; they alone know how to touch and to move the soul profoundly, without causing it to lose its peace. The eloquence of man, all passionate, because addressed to the passions, “inflames, exalts, and overwhelms; its strength is in its violence; it is a torrent which, in its course, breaks and carries away hearts; but hear a poor monk speaking of the Saviour Jesus,—his countenance is calm and serene—his words are simple and sweet; and yet hardly has he spoken two words when you feel yourself affected, and you let fall some delicious tears. With means so weak in appearance, how are such wonderful effects produced? To explain this spiritual miracle, it would be necessary to unveil the very foundations of the pious and fervent soul, to enter into the secret of grace, and show by what concealed ways, by what mysterious channels, it communicates itself, and passes from one heart into another, things almost ineffable, or which but very few men are enabled to know and to reveal; for us, who are but infants in Jesus Christ, we shall confine ourselves to acknowledging here the finger of God, and to adoring in silence his incomprehensible power and his ravishing goodness.”

The Greeks had a saying that every man lived as he spoke; and Quintilian

* Præfat. in 1 Sæcul. Benedictinum.

† Isai. xxvi. 19.

tells us that it used to be said of Cæsar, that he always spoke with the same mind as that with which he conducted war.* The same may be said of these ascetical writers of the middle ages; they wrote as they spent their innocent lives, in the house of God. That ravishing calm, that inexpressible peace which we experience, in reading their writings with a docile faith, and a humble love, place us, as it were, within the very sanctuary of the secluded spot, amidst woods and mountains where monasteries stood. It is as if the noise of the world had died away around us. What are the pleasures of the world compared with these unutterable joys? These books, like the Cantica Canticorum of Solomon, "Seraphicall in fervency," seem to begin with a kiss of peace; they could not have been written by men who studied only the virtue which is known by means of lofty song.† It must have been by men who drew all their science from benign goodness, like St. Dominick, who, when he was asked where he found all the admirable things which he preached to the people, replied, "in the little book of clarity."‡ Well is discerned,

How in their intellect already shines
The light eternal which to view alone
Ne'er fail to kindle love.§

St. Bernard comments thus upon the words of the Evangelist: "He was a burning and a shining light," &c. and adds, "It is not said shining and burning; because the light of John was from his fervor, not his fervor from his light; for there are some who shine not because they burn, but rather they burn in order that they may shine; these men burn not with the spirit of charity, but with the ardor of vanity."|| Such men have need of the caution of Antony, of whom Cicero says, "that he never wrote his discourses, that in the event of his own words being opposed to him, he might have it in his power to deny them."¶ It was the predominance of such characters among those of his sect, which made Fuller exclaim, "How easy is pen-and-paper piety for one to write religiously!" He would have deemed it writing religiously, to compose books like those we see entitled, "Piety without asceticism," that must be, in other words, how to love both God and the world, and how to avoid the cross, taking up a kind of natural and amiable temper, for which the highest expressions may be found in Plutarch or Seneca. All this, indeed, is easy; but to write like the holy authors of the ages of faith, there must be the solemn and irrevocable will to live like them, in poverty of spirit.

It is this renouncement of intellectual possessions which gives the distinctive character to their writings. Following him, "qui semetipsum exinanivit," through humility, they might have expressed the fervor of their desire to imitate him, in the line of the poet,

* Instit. Lib. X. 1. † Pind. Pyth. III. ‡ Ludovic. Grenad. in Festo B. Dominici, Concilio III.
§ Dante, Parad. V. || In S. Joan. Bapt. Nativ. Sermon. ¶ Pro. Cluentio, 140.

*εἰς τοῦτο γὰρ δὴ προὔδός εἰμι πᾶς ἰγώ.

"Take from me, O Lord," cries St. Anselm, "if it be thy will, my substance ; take from me the members of my body, my hands, my feet, my eyes, only leave me a heart with which I may be able to love thee !" Their highest rapture is derived from beholding some saintly man, and it is only to make an instant offering of it to God, without the least thought of its being made serviceable to answer any proud purpose of their own hearts ; unlike that poet, who sang his vision of the future world, and whose unerring style seems for once to fail him, when he says—

There, on the green enamel of the plain,
Were shown me, the great spirits, by whose sight,
I am exalted in my own esteem.

They knew their wisdom not to be their own, and whatever store they had, freely they ascribed it to the grace of him who had heard their prayer. What a contrast was here to the judgment of all mortal men ! if the ancient philosopher has truly described it ; for he asks, "Did ever any one thank the gods for being a good man ? but was it not only for being rich, for being honored, for being preserved ; for this is the judgment of all mortal men, that fortune is to be sought for from God, but wisdom to be obtained from one's self."†

St. Anselm, in his sublime meditations, prays to God that he may be delivered from that curiosity which desires to know every thing.‡ To such an extent did these men carry their detachment and humility, taught by the blessed spirits, who, though they see their Maker, yet know not the scope or essence of his mysteries, and "esteem such scantiness of knowledge their delight ; for all their good is in that primal good concentrate, and God's will and theirs are one." In a lower respect, their humility was but the natural consequence of their choice, as reason herself can in some sort discern. Thus the ancient sage said, "If you wish to advance, be content to suffer, that you should appear to others senseless and stupid as to external things. Do not wish to seem to know any thing. You must either renounce your resolution or neglect external things."§ And Seneca complained, that as in every thing else, so also in study of letters, the men of his age were intemperate ;|| by which he meant that they were not endowed with real wisdom. "J'ay prens plaisir," says Montaigne, "de veoir en quelque lieu, des hommes par devotion, faire voeu d'ignorance, comme de chasteté de pauvreté, de penitence ; c'est aussi chastier nos appetits desordonnez, d'esmausser cette cupidité qui nous espoince à l'estude des livres, et priver l'ame de cette complaisance voluptueuse qui nous chatouille par l'opinion de science ; et est richement accomplir le voeu de pauvreté d'y joindre encore celle de l'esprit."¶ This must sound very strange to the modern lover of learning, who seeks to fly as a conqueror upon the tongues of men,

* Eurip. Med. 720.

† Cicero de Nat. Deorum, Lib. III.

‡ Medit. cap. i. § 2.

|| Epicteti Manuale, cap. xii.

§ Epist. 106.

¶ Essais, Lib. III. 12.

"Victorque virum volitare per ora."*

However, such a vow required great simplicity of intention ; for with these ancient writers it was not learning, but the pride and spiritual riches consequent upon it, which offended them. Thus Louis of Blois, in giving rules for the direction of studies, says, "Seek not superfluous science and eloquent words, for the kingdom of God consists not in eloquence of language, but in holiness of life. Yet this elegance need not be disdained when it is found, for it is also a gift of God. Receive it then with thanksgiving, and all will be useful to salvation. It is not necessary that you should be able to remember the words, but that you should appropriate to yourself the substance of the doctrine."† Nay, by choosing ignorance they show that men may be rich in spirit, so as to be examples of spiritual riches or spiritual pride, and of the inordinate false liberty consequent upon it. "With this," they say, "a man supposes that he has no need of learning from books or other instructors ; not only he counts them for nothing, but he even derides all rites, institutions, laws, precepts, and sacraments of holy Church, as also all men who use them and attribute aught to them ; he concludes that he knows more than all other men, and therefore he always loves to talk and dictate to others, and he will have his sayings alone esteemed, and all other men's words to be regarded as false, or rather to be scorned as ridiculous and absurd."‡

St. Jerome had expressly argued against the disparagers of learning, and had said, "venerationi mihi semper fuit, non verbosa rusticitas, sed sancta simplicitas."§ And, in fact, there are many passages in the ascetical and other writings of the middle age, than which as nothing can be wiser, so also it will be found that nothing can be more eloquent.

Guizot, who, in such a question, is an authority not to be suspected, says of the writers of the middle ages, who recorded the deeds and thoughts of holy men, "If we consider them in a purely literary point of view, we shall find their merit no less brilliant, and no less varied. Nature and simplicity are not wanting in them ; they are devoid of affectation, and free from pedantry."|| A slight acquaintance with them will, with most minds, generate a distaste for those innumerable books of later times, which bear undoubted signs of having been written by men who were full of themselves, and who, in composing them, were really no otherwise occupied than in worshipping their own miserable image. "Et quia magis eligunt magni esse quam humiles, ideo evanescent in cogitationibus suis." The very language, all neglected and unpretending as it may be, will please more than that apparelled eloquence, "or rather disguised in a courtesan-like painted affectation, made up of so far-fetched words, that they seem strangers and even monsters in the tongue," with which the writings so many of the moderns are recommended to the half-

* Georgic. III. 8.

† Guide Spirituel, chap. iii.

‡ Theologia Germanica, cap. xxiii.

§ Epist. xxxiii.

|| Cours d'Hist. Mod. Tom. II. 180.

learned and superficial public, which is to be amused with sounds and flattered into a conviction of its own wisdom.

Our subject at least seems now fulfilled in having shown what were the effects of poverty of spirit upon the writings of men in ages of faith.

CHAPTER VII.

HE first beatitude answers also to the mind and state of youth, and this shall be the subject of our next meditation. The justice of this proposition may be inferred from the assurance given by Truth itself, that no one shall in any wise be permitted to enter into the celestial city, unless he approach in this character of youth : sicut puer*, or velut parvulus : † for there can be no doubt that this testimony in favor of the young had in view the absence of all proud adherence to private judgment, and of all worldly ambition, a readiness to submit to authority, simplicity, and poverty of spirit, which we must therefore admit to be, through a singular grace, generally the inherent and distinctive qualities of the young. Our object here must be to review the character of youth, in reference to these qualities, as exhibited in the history and institutions of the ages of faith. It must be admitted, that many of the wise ancients have left in their writings admirable instructions respecting the education of the young, and the end to which it should be directed. It is curious to remark, that there is hardly any one point on which the opinions of the moderns differ more from those of heathen antiquity, than on this head of the mode and object of education. The ancients say that “the essential things in the education of the young, are to teach them to worship the gods, to revere their parents, to honor their elders, to obey the laws, to submit to rulers, to love their friends, to be temperate in refraining from pleasure;‡ objects, not one of which the moderns would think proper for entering into a philosophic plan of education, since it is notorious that with them the direction of the energies and passions is always excluded from it. Aristotle, however, says of this direction, “it is not a little matter whether it be in this manner or in that from youth, but it is a very great matter, or rather it is every thing, μᾶλλον δὲ τὸ πᾶν.§ The moderns, again, have determined, practically at least, that the whole of education consists in acquiring knowledge, and that the only subject for deliberation is respecting the mode best calcu-

* Luc. xviii. 17.

† Marc. x. 15.

‡ Plutarch de Educat. Puer. cap. xix.

§ Ethic. Nicom. II. 1.

lated to further that end in the shortest time, and with the least possible expenditure. With them, the person who can speak or argue on the greatest number of subjects, with the air of knowing all about each of them, is the best educated. Hence, within the very hallowed walls of the ancient theological schools, have arisen philosophical colleges and universities, which after a time, most parents have been induced to regard with the same eyes as those with which Strepsiades, in the old play, looked upon the school to which he had foolishly sent his son, supposing it to be an admirable academy to teach men all that ought to be known, but which he soon regarded very differently, when his son came home to him, and seized a trifling occasion to fly in a passion, and on his remonstrance, proceeded to inflict stripes upon him, his own father; proving, at the same time, that children ought to be allowed to beat their fathers. Then the poet laughs at the poor old man, who is now so changed in opinions, that he is for setting fire to the school-house! * This opinion of the ancients, which identified education with the direction which was given to the passions, will explain the sentence of Socrates, when he says that "the soul departs to Hades, taking nothing along with it but its education and nourishment." †

If we proceed to enquire into their ideas respecting this direction, we shall find that here also they differ totally from the opinions of the moderns. Plato constantly speaks of it as the great object of education to make the young mild and gentle, to tame that savage spirit which he seems sometimes to suppose is natural to them; whereas the moderns generally applaud that system of public education which nourishes what they call a manly spirit, by which a boy is made bold and insolent, and constantly ready to fight, or to contend with any one that offers the smallest opposition to his will, which makes them resemble the son of Strepsiades returning from the school of the Sophists, of whom his father says with joy, "In the first place, I mark the expression of your countenance; your face indicates at once that you are prepared to deny and to contradict. Yours is the Attic look, Ἀττικὸν βλέπον. ‡ Hence many of their young men are like those who were disciples of the Sophists, of whom Socrates says, that they were fair and of good natural dispositions, what the moderns would term of polished manners, but insolent through youth, μάλα καλὸς τε καὶ ἀγαθὸς τὴν φύσιν ὅσον μὲν ὑβριστῆς δὲ διὰ τὸ νέος εἶναι. § To this system Socrates seems to allude, when he says, "What should we say of a breaker-in of horses, asses, or oxen, if, receiving them not addicted to biting, or kicking, or butting with their horns, he should return them, doing all these things through ferocity? Is it not the sign of an evil instructor, whether of a man, or whatever may be the animal under his care, if he should render what was mild and gentle more ferocious than when he received it?" ||

Indeed, Plato has continually in view the necessity of softening and making

* Aristoph. Nubes. † Plato Phædo, 107. ‡ Aristoph. Nubes, 1171. § Plato, Euthydemus.

|| Plato, Gorgias.

mild the nature of men, by directing the education of youth to that end. Thus it shown in his writings, that music should be instilled into the young with rhythm and harmony, ἵνα ἡμερώτεροί τε ᾦσι, καὶ εὐρυθμότεροι καὶ εὐαρμωστότεροι ἡγνόμενοι χρήσιμοι ᾦσιν εἰς τὸ λέγειν τε καὶ πράττειν.^{*} He says, “that man, when he has received a right education, is the most gentle of all creatures, ἡμερώτατον ζῶον, but when not sufficiently, or not well educated, he becomes the most savage that the earth produces, ἄγριώτατον ὅποσα φύει γῆ.[†] Pindar seems to have had the same opinion of education, in praising that of Demophilus :

*κεῖνος λαῖρ ἐν παισὶ νέος, ἐν δὲ βουλαῖς πρέοβυς
ἔμαθε δ' ὑβρίζοντα μῦθεῖν, οὐκ ἐρίζων ἀντία τειῆς ἀγαθοῖς.‡*

Such, indeed, was the importance of a similar direction even in heroic times, that Homer, when he represents Ulysses finding himself in a strange country—a circumstance which must then have been of frequent occurrence to many men—makes him express anxiety on no other point but that of ascertaining whether the natives had been trained to gentleness and piety, or were disposed to haughty insolence.

*ὦ μοι ἐγὼ, τέων αὖτε βροτῶν ἐς γαῖαν ἰκάνω;
ἦ ῥ' οἷγ' ὑβρίσται τε καὶ ἄγριοι, οὐδὲ δίκαιοι,
ἦ ἐ φίλόξεινοι, καὶ σφιν νόος ἐστὶ θεονδής;§*

This was the Homeric criterion of civilization ; and though it does not of necessity comprise a great extension of what is termed knowledge, perhaps it would not suffer much in comparison with the theory of some of the moderns on the same subject ; the influence of whose doctrines would often lead a stranger to fear that he was in the neighborhood of the Cyclops, ἀνδρῶν ὑπερηγορούντων.

It may be observed also, that the rules given to youth by Plutarch, for conversation, in his Treatise on the manner in which men should hear, approach nearer to the mildness and delicacy of Christian charity, than perhaps any other passage in the heathen writers. He inculcates, what approaches to its modesty, its patience, in attending to others, and in waiting for the voluntary self-corrections of those with whom they converse, and its slowness to contradict and give offence. But all this falls very short, and, indeed, can yield not the slightest idea of the effects of education upon the young in the ages of faith, when the Catholic religion formed its basis, and directed the whole system in all its objects, manners, and details ; and to make the truth of this observation apparent, I shall proceed to adduce instances from the histories of the period, and to suggest the conclusions which necessarily must be drawn from other passages of ancient writings which relate to this subject ; reserving, however, for a future place, what belongs immediately to the discipline of the great institutions of the middle age, schools, and colleges, since it is only with the disposition and character of youth as resulting from it, that we are at present concerned.

^{*} Protagoras. [†] De Legibus. Lib. VI. [‡] Pyth. Od. IV. vide etiam Isocrat. Panegyrg. § Od. VI. 119.

In the delightful and instructive memorials which have reached us of the lives of men in ages of faith, there is no part more refreshing, and, as contrasted with the present scenes around us, more curious, than that in which is described the manners of the young, the flight of innocent wings, the elevation of the youthful heart to God. This will best be understood by giving examples, the force of which will consist in taking them collectively.

St. Boniface, writing the life and martyrdom of St. Livinus, describes his education and early life as follows: "This boy of excellent disposition, and adorned with many divine gifts—distinguished by the spirit of humility, and engaged in admirable contemplation of the future state—chose the contemplative life, according to the law of ecclesiastical discipline, and lived with the blessed Benign, a priest of Scottish nation, a man of lofty blood as to nobility, but conspicuous by the still more lofty illustration of holy virtues. Seeking to be instructed by him in the melody of psalms, and in the mellifluous readings of the holy Gospels, and in other divine exercises, his tender age was conformed to his likeness, so that, as if in a wide garden of paradisiacal beauty, he walked from day to day, and by the degrees of virtue, passed into glory. The subtilty of his intelligence was wonderfully developed, so that, by the co-operation of divine grace, he found no difficulty in the study of so many divine things, and in the application of the examples of the just."*

If some of the instances that follow refer to an age which might seem too tender to merit consideration, it must be remembered that the mind even of infants was trained to piety. "The soul of the child," says St. Jerome, "is to be educated with a view to its becoming a temple of God. It should hear nothing but what pertains to the fear of God. Let there be letters of ivory," he continues, "with which it may play, and let its play be instruction. No learned man or noble virgin should disdain to take charge of its education."† Children, as he says, were to learn to chant the Psalms, and at seven years of age should know the Psalter by heart; but as for the songs of the world, they were not to know them. In the same Epistle, on the education of an infant, there is something added about frolic, and hanging on its mother's neck, and kissing friends; but there is no mention, as with the moderns, of infants being taught to sing the deductions of arithmetic. Many pious customs observed with children, which do not even want the recommendation of a high degree of poetic grace, will show the care with which their spiritual interests were attended to in these ages. Thus an Irish monk of the twelfth century relates of St. Patrick—"And a certain woman who was strong in the faith, brought unto the saint her little son, named Lannanus, to be instructed in letters ; and as she believed that his blessing would render the child more docile and ready unto learning, humbly she besought on her son the benediction of his grace ; and he signed the boy with the cross, and delivered him to St. Casanus, that he might be instructed in virtue and learning. And the boy soon learned the whole Psalter, and afterwards became a man of most holy life." The piety of children, therefore, under the influence of this faith, may be entitled to our regard. "Every age is perfect in Christ," as St. Ambrose says, adding "that even children have confessed Jesus against persecutors."*

* Page 238.

† St. Hieronymi Epist. LVII. ad Letam.

These observations will have prepared us to feel the beauty of the examples following. Thus of St. Blier we read, that while a child, he gave admirable signs of piety and grace. Nothing could be imagined more sweet, benign, gentle, and agreeable, than his whole manner : he seemed like a little angel in human flesh, who used to pray devoutly, visit holy places, converse with saints, and obey the commandments of God with the utmost diligence.† Christine de Pisan says of Louis duc d'Orleans, son of King Charles V. that the first words which were taught him were his Ave-Maria, and that it was a sweet thing to hear him say it, kneeling with his little hands joined before the image of our lady, and that thus early he learned to serve God, which he continued to do all his life.‡ The loyal servant who wrote the life of Bayart, says also, "However young the child was the first thing that he used to do, as soon as he was risen, was to serve God."§ And Dante, in the Paradise, commemorating the youthful graces of St. Dominic, says of him,

Many a time his nurse at entering found
That he had risen in silence, and was prostrate,
As who should say, "My errand was for this."¶

Such children were regarded with a kind of reverence, as representing the infant Jesus and all their little sufferings, sanctified by reference to his, were proposed as a subject of instructions to men. Thus St. Bonaventura says, "Behold and meditate how the Lord, in the person of the infant Jesus, experienced things prosperous and adverse ; and therefore, be not impatient when you find the valley near the mountain. For behold, in his nativity, Christ is magnified by the shepherds as God ; and soon after his birth he is circumcised as a sinner. Then came the magi to worship him, and again he remained in the stable weeping, like any child of man. Afterwards he is presented in the temple, and extolled by Simeon and Anna ; and now it is revealed by an angel, that he must fly into Egypt."¶

From the age succeeding childhood, we have an example in the life of St. Peter Damian, by Joannes Monachus ; for he relates that Peter, when a little boy,

* Epist. XXX. † Desguerrois Hist. du Diocèse de Troyes p. 170.

‡ Livre des Fais et Bonnes Meurs du sage Roy Charles V. Liv. II. chap. xvi.

§ La Tres Joyeuse Hystoire, &c. Chap. xi.

¶ Canto XII.

¶ Meditationes Vitæ Christi, Cap. xii.

happened one day to find some money, and, as if suddenly enriched, he began to rejoice, and to ask himself what he should buy with it. After revolving this matter for a long time, at length he said, "It is better to give it to a priest, who may offer sacrifice to God for my dead father." The same motive which made the child an object of reverence, continued to secure respect and tenderness for the boy. St. Bonaventura, in his Meditations on the life of Christ, and Sermons on the festivals of the infant Jesus, will show what tenderness for youth was entertained by holy men, from an especial regard to the sufferings of Jesus, in that age; and his reflections on this subject will serve more, perhaps, than any other passage that could be produced, to give an idea of the beautiful halo which was thrown around it by the spirit of religion. "The angel of the Lord appeared to Joseph in a dream, saying that he should fly with the child Jesus and his mother into Egypt. So Joseph, without delay, informs the mother, who is all obedience and zeal to save the life of the child, and they set out in the night to go into Egypt. See and meditate on what is said, and how they raise the sleeping child Jesus, and feel compassion for them, for then the tribulation of the mother and Joseph was great, when they found that there was a design against the life of the child; for what could they hear more grievous, since, though they knew that he was the Son of God, yet through their sensuality* they might be troubled, and say, 'Lord God Omnipotent, what need is there that thy Son should flee? Can you not defend him here?' Moreover, there was tribulation from the length of the journey before them, and their ignorance of the way through rough places, and from their being but ill able to travel; from the youth of Mary, and the old age of Joseph; and the infancy of the child which they had to carry; and they would have to dwell in a foreign land as poor people, having nothing—for all these are matter of affliction. Consider the benignity here shown, how soon he suffers persecution, and how he yields to the fury of men, and refuses to attack in his turn. The Lord flies before the face of his servant. They fly into Egypt by a way woody and dark, rough and solitary, and very long. For them it was a journey of about two months or more. How did they procure food and lodgings for the nights? for rarely did they find houses in that desert. Compassionate them—because the labor was difficult, and great, and long—and go with them, and help to carry the child, and serve them in every way that you can imagine. Now let us behold them arrived; and here will be another ground of meditation. For how did they live during all this time? Did they beg? The mother earned what was needful by spinning; and when the child was five years old, did he not often carry her work for sale? and perhaps at times some proud and loquacious woman would take the work, and send him away empty, without the price. Oh what injuries await strangers; and the Lord is come, not to avoid, but to endure them! What, and if returning home, and having hunger, after the manner of little boys, he asked for bread, and his mother had none to give him? Must not her bowels have yearned at this? But she consoled her son, and procured work, and perchance deprived herself of part of her food, that she might reserve it for him. On these and similar things you can meditate respecting the boy Jesus. I have given you the occasion—do you extend and pursue it, and make yourself little with the little boy Jesus—and do not disdain such humble and puerile things. For they seem to give devotion, to increase love, to kindle fervor, to excite compassion, to confer purity and simplicity, to nourish the vigor of humility and poverty, to preserve familiarity, to make conformity, and to raise hope. For we cannot ascend to sublime things: but the foolishness of God is wiser than men; and such meditations cut off pride and weaken cupidity, and confound curiosity. Therefore, I say, be little with the little, and grow tall with him, as he grows in stature, and always follow him whithersoever he goes, and always behold his face.

* Sensibility. Am Ed.

“At the end of seven years, the angel of the Lord appeared to Joseph in a dream, saying, ‘Take the boy and his mother and go into the land of Israel; for they are dead who sought the life of the boy.’ Now let us meditate on this return of our Lord, for it is full of pious fruit. Let us suppose ourselves in Egypt, for the sake of visiting the boy Jesus, whom you will find perhaps, amongst other boys; and he seeing you, will come up to you, because he is benign and affable, and courteous; but you bending a knee will kiss his feet, and receive him in your arms and rest with him. Then, perhaps, he will say to you, We have leave given us to return home to our country, and to-morrow we are to set out from hence; and you will answer joyfully that you are glad of it, and that you are to go with him wherever he may go, and with such words be delighted with him. And then he will lead you to his mother, who will receive you with courtesy; and you bending a knee will show her reverence, and also St. Joseph, and you will rest with them. The next morning you will see some good matrons of the city, and also some men coming to see them set off, and following them without the gate of the city, on account of their amiable and holy conversation; and from their having talked of their journey some days before. So they walk on, and Joseph, with the men, goes first, and our lady follows from a distance with the matrons. But do you take the boy by the hand, and walk in the midst before the mother, for she does not wish him to be after her. And when they had passed the outer gate, Joseph will not allow the rest to follow them any longer. Then some one of the richer sort, pitying their poverty, calls the boy to give him some pieces of money towards the expense of the journey, and the boy is ashamed to take it; yet through the love of poverty he prepares his hand, takes the money, and returns thanks; many of the rich friends do the same; the mother is called by the matrons, and they do the same. Nor has the mother less shame than her son, albeit humbly she thanks them. At length, thanking them all, they wish them farewell, and proceed on their journey. But how is the boy Jesus to return, who is still but a tender child? It seems to me that the return is more difficult than the first coming; for when he came into Egypt, he was so little that he was carried: but now he is so big that he cannot be carried, and yet he is so little, that he cannot go by himself. Perchance some one of these good men accommodated him with an ass, upon which he might go. O admirable and delicate boy, King of heaven and earth ! how thou hast labored for us, and how soon thou didst begin ! well did the prophet predict in your person, 'Pauper sum ego et in laboribus a juventute mea.' Great poverty, arduous labors, and afflictions of body, thou didst constantly assume and thou hadst thyself, as if in hatred, for the love of us. Certes this single labor ought to have been enough for our redemption. Take, then, the boy Jesus, and place him upon the ass, and lead him faithfully, and when he wishes to alight take him joyfully in your arms, and let him wait for his mother, and then he will go to his mother, and she will have consolation in receiving him. So they travel onwards, and then pass through the desert by which they came, and during that journey, you may often compassionate them, having so little rest ; and behold them fatigued and spent with labor by night as well as by day. And when they were near the end of the desert, they found John the Baptist, who there was doing penance, though he had done no sin. It is said that the place of the Jordan where John baptized, was the same as that where the children of Israel passed when they came from Egypt ; therefore it is propable that the boy Jesus, in returning found him there. Meditate, then, in what manner he received them, and how they tarried a little with him, and did eat with him of his raw fare, and at length took leave of him spiritually refreshed. Do you also, in advancing and retiring from him bend the knee to John, kissing his feet, and asking his blessing, and commending yourself to him : for that boy was excellent and wonderful from his cradle ; for he was the first hermit ; he was a most pure virgin, and the greatest preacher, and was more than a prophet, and was also a glorious martyr. And thence Joseph passed into Galilee to Nazareth. And when the child was twelve years old he went up to Jerusalem with his parents, still going through labors ; and he went to honor his heavenly Father in his festivals, and so he stood observing the law, and conversing humbly along with others, as if he had been only any other poor little boy. And when the days were accomplished his parents returned, and he tarried in Jerusalem.

"And now attend well, for you will be shown a devout and fruitful matter. Nazareth was distant about fourteen or fifteen miles from Jerusalem, so when the mother and Joseph, returing by different roads, had reached the place where they were to lodge, it being late, our lady seeing Joseph without the boy, whom she believed had been accompanying him, she asked him, where is the boy ? And he replied, I know not ; he did not return with me, for I thought he had returned with you. Then she burst into tears, and said, he did not return with me. I see that I have not well guarded my child, and so immediately, that is, as quickly as might accord with decent grace, she went about to all the houses, asking for him and saying, have you seen my son, did you not see my son ; and scarcely through grief and ardor did she feel her desire. Joseph followed her in tears. Not finding him, you can judge what rest that mother had. And though encouraged by her acquaintances she could not be comforted. For what was it to lose

Jesus? Behold her, and compassionate her, because her soul is in straits; never since her birth had she been in such. Let us not, then be disturbed when we suffer tribulation, since the Lord did not spare his mother; for he permits them to come, and they are signs of his love, and it is good for us to have them. At length, our lady, shutting herself in her chamber, had recourse to prayer and complaint, saying, 'O God and eternal Father, most element and benign, it was your pleasure to give me your Son; but lo! I have lost him, and I know not where he is. Give him back to me. O Father, take away my bitterness, and show me my son; have regard to the affliction of my heart, and not to my negligence; I was imprudent, but I did it ignorantly; but give him back to me, for without him I cannot live. O dearest child, where are you? What is become of you? with whom are you? Are you returned to your father who is in heaven? I know that you are God, and the Son of God, but how, would you not have told me? O say where are you that I may go to you, or that you may come to me. It is but a moment since I have been without you, and I know not how it has happened. Never since you were born was I before alone.' With such words did the mother mourn all the night for her dearest son. Early the next morning they sought for him through all the ways, for there were many ways of returning, as if he that would go from Sienna to Pisa, might go by Podium Bonichi, or by Celle, or by other places. On the third day they found him in Jerusalem, in the temple, in the midst of the doctors. Then she rejoiced as if she had been restored to new life, and bent her knee, and thanked God with tears. But the boy Jesus seeing his mother, came up to her, and she received him in open arms and kissed him, and put face to face, and holding him to her bosom, remained without moving for a short time, because through tenderness she could not then speak. At last, looking on him, she said, Son, what hast thou done? thy father and I have sought thee sorrowing. And he, wherefore didst thou seek me, knewest thou not that I must needs be about my Father's business? But they understood not his words; therefore his mother said to him, Son, I wish to return home, will you not return with us? And he, I will do what you please; and he returned with them to Nazareth.

"You have seen the affliction of the mother; but what was the boy doing during these three days? Mark him attentively. He took up his lodging with some poor people; himself poor. See him sitting among the doctors, with a countenance placid, wise, and reverend, hearing them and asking them, as if he was ignorant; which he did through humility, and lest he should make them feel ashamed by his wonderful answers. But you must consider here three things very remarkable. First, that he who wishes to adhere to God, ought not to have his conversation with his relations, but to depart from among them; for the boy Jesus dismissed his beloved mother from him when he wished to be about his Father's business, and afterwards he was sought for among his relations and acquaintances, and was not found. Secondly, that he who would live spiritually ought not to wonder, if he should be sometimes left by God, since this happened to the mother of God. Let him not, therefore, despond, but diligently seek him in holy meditations, and persevering in good works, and he will find him again. Thirdly, that he ought not to follow his own will ; for when the Lord Jesus said, that he must needs be about his Father's business, he changed his mind and followed the will of his mother, and departed with her, and was subject to her. On his return, then, from the Temple and from Jerusalem, he lived with his parents in Nazareth, and was subject to them till the thirtieth year of his age. What do we suppose he was doing during this time ? It is not said in the Scriptures that he did any thing which seemed wondrous. What do we suppose he did ? Was he unemployed, that the Scriptures should have recorded no action of his then ? It seems altogether amazing ; but mark well, and you will perceive that doing nothing he did things magnificent ; for none of his actions are without mystery. But as he labored virtuously, so he kept silence, he remained quiet, and withdrew himself. He went to the synagogue, that is, to the church ; he prayed in a humble place, he returned home ; he assisted his mother ; he passed and returned amidst men as if he did not see men. All were surprised that so comely a youth should do nothing worthy of praise ; they expected that he would do magnificent things, for when a boy, he grew in favor with God and men ; but growing up, and advancing to thirty years of age, he did nothing remarkable or manly ; they began to deride him—he is a useless fellow—good for nothing—a fool. You see, then, what he did while doing nothing : he became abject in the eyes of others. But does this seem little to you ? Certainly in all our works this is the most difficult ; for he has reached the highest grade of perfection, who, from his heart, and with a mind not feigned, has conquered himself and subdued the pride of the flesh, and is willing to be despised. Greater is that man than he who has conquered a city. Consider, therefore, that you have done nothing until you have effected this ; for we are in truth all unprofitable servants, and until we are in this mind, we are not in truth, but we walk in vanity.

“ But let us return to a view of the life of our great pattern, our Lord Jesus. Consider, therefore, the poverty and humble state of that blessed family, the mother working with her hands, and the son endeavoring, as far as he was able, to assist her, for he came not to be ministered unto, but to minister. So you may consider him arranging the table, and fulfilling all kinds of offices ; see how the three sat at one little table every day, and partake not of exquisite fare, but of the commonest and vilest ; and consider how holily they conversed together, and how, after some little recreation, they applied themselves to prayer, having no place to meditate but by their beds, for it was but a small house ; and consider our Lord Jesus composing himself to sleep upon a poor bed on the floor, as if one of the poorest sons of the people. O hidden God, wherefore dost thou afflict that innocent body, for the travel of one night ought to have sufficed to redeem the world.

Immense love impelled him to this, the fervor of zeal for the lost sheep which he was to carry back to the celestial pastures. Where, then, are they who seek their bodily ease, with curious and varied ornaments? We who desire such things have not been taught in the school of this master; and yet he is the highest master, who neither wished to deceive nor who could be deceived.

“Having thus completed the twenty-ninth year of his age, our Lord said to his mother, ‘It is time that I depart to glorify and make manifest my Father, and work the salvation of souls, for to this end was I sent. Be comforted, good mother, for I shall soon return to you,’ and, bending his knee, he besought her blessing, and she similarly bending, with tears embraced him. So he departed and took the road from Nazareth to Jordan, where John was baptizing. But the Lord of the world goes alone, for as yet he had no disciples. Behold him, then, how he goes alone diligently for God, bare-footed, on so long a journey. O Lord, whither goest thou? Art thou not above all the kings of the earth? O Lord, where are thy barons and counts, dukes and soldiers, horses and camels, elephants and chariots, servants and officers? Where are they who may encompass and defend you from sudden attacks, according to the custom of other kings and great men? Where are the blast of trumpets, and the sound of instruments, and the royal banners? Where are they who go before to provide what is needful? Where are the honors and pomps which we worms use? Are not the heavens and earth, O Lord, full of thy glory? Do not thousands of thousands minister to thee in thy kingdom? Why, then, goest thou alone thus beating the earth with bare feet? I think the cause must be, that you are not in your kingdom, for your kingdom is not in this world; you have humbled yourself, taking the form of a servant; you are made one of us, a pilgrim and a stranger, as all our fathers were, and this in order that we may be kings. But why do we neglect such an example? why do we not follow you? why not humble ourselves? why seek for pomps and honors? Certainly because our kingdom is of this world, and we do not consider ourselves strangers. O vain children of men, why do we thus studiously embrace vanity for truth, perishable things for what are secure, and temporal for eternal?”*

The whole spirit of the middle ages, seems to have been infused into this beautiful meditation of St. Bonaventura. Here are expressed almost in painting, their affectionate piety, their intense interest in all that relates to our Saviour and his blessed mother, their sublime sense of the wondrous mysteries of faith; and, on the other hand, their tender humanity, their sweet simplicity, their innocent and holy manners. Moreover, in especial reference to the present purpose, it furnishes us with the model and type of the youthful character in these ages, illustrating also the grace and dignity with which it was invested in the eyes of men, from a consideration of its being a period of the human life, peculiarly sanctified by the patience and sufferings of Jesus. “Qui suscepit unum parvulum talem in nomine meo, me suscepit.” Who could enumerate or imagine all the kind, affectionate things, which used to be said and done to poor little innocents from the remembrance of this one sentence! It is related of St. Felix Valois, of that royal house of France, who gave proofs of great piety and charity, while a child, that, in his early youth, he used to select the choicest dishes which were placed on the table, and send them to the poor; and the Church, in her office, does not disdain to add, that he used to recreate poor little boys with nice food, pauperulos pueros recreabat. This was he of whom we also read, that when grown up to youth, he more than once gave the clothes off his person to clothe the needy; and who, afterwards, in order to avoid succeeding to the crown of France, to which he had a title by the Salic law, became a priest. It was even deemed worthy of record in a monastic chronicle, that a certain holy monk of Villars, named Godfrey, used to go into the orchard, and whatever fruit he could gather, would hasten with them to the poor children for their refreshment.*

* St. Bonaventura, Meditationes Vitæ Christi.

The old writers love to dwell upon the description of this age. Thus the young Archduke Leopold of Austria is described as having the looks as well as the innocence of an angel; and it is said that the mere sight of him in the church used to inspire people with devotion.† The young St. Francis Regis, while at college at Puy, was known to all the inhabitants of the town under the title of the Angel of the College.‡ There might have been seen a young nobleman, a modest novice in a religious order, employed in collecting the poor little boys of a town and explaining to them the Christian doctrine. What school of ancient philosophy ever conceived any thing like this?

The exquisite grace with which the old Italian painters represented the youthful form in the angelic character, could only be the result of having beheld living models imbued with that grace and celestial sweetness which the Catholic religion is capable of yielding to the human countenance. Witness the picture by Francesco Albani, of the school of Bologna, of the Repose in Egypt, which is in the gallery of the Louvre at Paris, where two angels, as youths, are offering fruits and flowers to the infant Jesus, whom they regard with an expression of the utmost interest, of innocent curiosity and child-like love, as he plays on the knees of his mother; a picture which seems to breathe perfume, and which might have inspired Tasso in his beautiful description of the gentle Gabriel when he is sent to Godfrey.

A stripling seem'd he thrice five winters old,
And radiant beams adorn'd his locks of gold.
Of silver wings he took a shining pair,
Fringed with gold, unwearied, nimble, swift,

* Hist. Monasterii, Villariensis, Lib. II. cap. viii. apud Martini Thesaur. Anecd. Tom. iii.

† Les Vertus de Leopold d'Autriche, par Avancin, 13. ‡ Vie de St. Francois Regis, p. 16.

With these he parts the winds, the clouds, the air,
 And over seas and earth himself doth lift,
 Thus clad, he cut the spheres and circles fair,
 And the pure skies with sacred feathers clift;
 On Lebanon at first his foot he set,
 And shook his wings with rosy May-dew wet.*

Men were impressed with such a sense of the respect due to youthful piety, that even the title of martyr used to be granted to such young persons as met with death from the hands of unjust men. Thus St. Kenelm was regarded as a martyr, though all that is related of his death is as follows: "Ingulphus, abbot of Crowland, says that St. Kenelm was the son of Kenulphus, king of the Mercians, and a great benefactor to the monastery of Crowland, which had been lately founded by King Ethalbold. Kenelm was left heir to the crown in his seventh year; he was enticed into a wood by the craft of Quendreda, and it being late in the evening that most innocent boy was cruelly martyred by Ascebert, his tutor." William of Malmesbury indeed supposes that such men as St. Dunstan would never have allowed Kenelm or Egelbrith to be venerated as martyrs unless God had confirmed their title by miracles;† but devout people were willing at all times to have recourse to the holiness of youth as possessing a grace that was self-evident. Thus, in the church of St. Hilary at Paris, there was the tomb of a young student of the college of Harcourt, called Louis Pelet: his death was stated to have taken place in the year of 1747, without mention of the month or day, but the inscription was terminated with these words, "Sancte puer, ora pro nobis."‡

In like manner all the sufferings of that age were regarded with great tenderness, and inspired somewhat of reverence. In our times, the young English students in the distant schools of Spain and Portugal used to be regarded with wonderful interest by the devout people of those lands who commiserated their condition in being sent so far from their country. It used to be a common opinion with the captains of vessels from England to Bilboa, that it was a good pledge for men when they had on board an English student for Valadolid. On one occasion of a storm in the Bay of Bisquai, the captain hearing that a certain youth was one of these students going thither, became quite cheerful and composed, observing, that since this student was on board they had nothing to fear. Generally too, on the death of young persons, it was obvious, that in certain minor customs established by the Church, it was her intention to indicate her sense of the peculiar innocence and purity which belonged to that age. But to proceed. The young who were in the walks of secular life became subject to the prevailing influence of chivalry, and in this respect the duties of their condition were enforced with a systematic attention to the preservation of innocence and humility. Homer makes Minerva address Telemachus in a style the converse of that which is adopted by the modern

* Book I. 14.

† De Gest. Pontif. Anglic. Lib. V.

‡ Lebeuf, Hist. du Diocèse de Paris, Tom. I. chap. v.

guides of youth, though similar to that which was common in Christian ages : she says to him, "Few sons are like their fathers ; the greatest number are worse, and but very few better.* The young were willing to admit the justice of the ancient sentence, "In antiquis est sapientia, et in multo tempore prudentia." To respect age and every superior rank, and to be gracious and kind to inferiors, were duties from the observance of which the natural benevolence of youth was not prevented by any false theory of sophists or conventional rules of society. As for public and political affairs, even Socrates, though such a friend to the young, says that they are never qualified to take a part in them ; and he alleges as a reason, that they admire and will follow any artful intriguer who may pursue his private ends under a specious show of virtue, whom good men will hate and fly from.† Aristotle also denies that young men can have political wisdom : "they can be geometricians and mathematicians, but not wise statesmen ; for it is experience alone and length of age which can give political wisdom."‡ With respect to reverence for age and kindness towards inferiors, we have abundant testimony to the disposition of the young during ages of faith. Eliu, who does not presume to speak to Job before his elder friends, might be taken to represent them in the former respect ; and an instance of the latter kind may be seen in what is related of St. Martin, for when a youth, being forced to go to the wars along with the other sons of old soldiers whom the emperor Constantius commanded to be enrolled, he was sent by his father with a servant to wait upon him ; the young Martin, however, treated him not like a servant but like a companion, serving him as much as he was served by him, pulling off his boots, cleaning his clothes, and serving him at table.§ Indeed, by the laws of chivalry, youth was trained to such services, and in this respect it was retained in that condition alluded to by St. Paul when he says, "Dico autem quanto tempore hæres parvulus est, nihil differt à servo cum sit dominus omnium."|| It was also a maxim of religion, expressly inculcated, that young people should be obliging, willing to serve, doing readily the duty which presents itself, and helping also a servant in his work as occasion may require.¶ The remark of the cautious and selfish Cardan on this point is amusing : "Boys," he says, "are much better for your service than men, 'pueri sunt in omnibus, (præterquam gravibus) ministeriis, viris meliores ; quia magis assidui, prompti, diligentes, obedientes, mundi, minoris sumtus ; et verberari possunt.' " But on the other hand, while youth was maintained in its proper degree of subordination, there was no concealment of the real benefits which an attention to its disposition might yield even to men of mature wisdom. There would have been wise men to agree with Plato without his implied censure where he says, "The old men, sitting with the young, are filled with cheerfulness and grace of manner, imitating the young that they may not seem disagreeable and imperious."†† Sir Henry Sidney says, in advice to his

* Od. II. 276.

† De Repub. Lib. VIII.

‡ Ethic. Lib. VI. cap. viii.

§ Ribadeneira, Lives of the Saints, Novem. X.

|| Ad Galat. IV.

¶ Christian Instructions for Youth, p. 10. Prudentia Civilis, cap. xxxix. ††De Repub. VIII.

son Robert, "In your travels seek the knowledge of the estate of every prince, court, and city that you pass through. Address yourself to the company to learn this of the elder sort, and yet neglect not the younger: by the one you shall gather learning, wisdom, and knowledge, by the other acquaintance, languages, and exercise," an advantage so feelingly appreciated by the bard of chivalry in the simple lines—

And much I miss those sportive boys
Companions of my river joys,
Just at the age 'twixt boy and youth,
When thought is speech and speech is truth

St. Bernard begins his letter to a young man named Fulco, saying, "Inde lætari in adolescentia unde in senectute non pœniteat."* Under this direction there was nothing condemned or despised by the men of these ages in the simple pleasures of youth. Perhaps they too, at whose feet now sat disciples, were once the nimblest of the jocund band, used, long as it suited the unripened down that fledged their cheek, to be the foremost in every wild adventurous game, used to ply the hearty oar, to head the mimic chase, to sing, swimming, to the sound of the broken rushes, and each would now apply the poet's direction to himself—

It was then that around me, though poor and unknown,
High spells of mysterious enchantment were thrown;
The streams were of silver, of diamond the dew,
The land was an Eden, for fancy was new.

Their wisdom would have approved of Heraclitus, when, after resigning the government of his city, which was torn with factions, and being found playing with some boys in a porch, he asked those who wondered at him, whether it was not better to play with such boys than govern such men? The writers of the middle ages indicate continually how deeply they can feel, from the purity and simplicity of their lives, the beauty of whatever belongs to the innocent joys of nature. Without any gloomy reflection on their own advanced progress in their human course, they love to describe the sportive raptures of the young. "Youth's smiling morn," they say, "enjoys a beautiful horizon; that magic distance is wondrous fair, so long as the soul has never been soiled by the world's base affection." The good abbot Desnay gave the money for Bayart's horses to his companion Bellabre, saying of the young page, "Car il a encore la barbe trop jeune pour manyer deniers."† Here was assuredly a happy privilege, and one which the spirit of "the scholastic romantic ages" then secured for the young! Theirs was but one sentiment, "Bref. c'est un diablerie quant avarice precede l'honneur."‡ The selfish prudence of Cardan saw clearly the distinctive quality of the young in this respect, and was for turning it to account. "To retain boys or youths to serve you well," he says, "it is necessary that they be excited either to wisdom or to music, or to conjunctions for the sake of play, or to huntings, for with such things you will command them, viros definebis stipendiis."*

*Epist. II.

† La tres joyeuse, plaisante et recreative hystoire des faicts, gestes, triumphes et pronesses du bon chevalier, sans paeur et sans reprouche, le gentil Seigneur de Bayart. Chap. vii.

‡ Ibid. Chap. xxvi.

The dexterous ingenuity of youth was often employed by holy persons to facilitate the success of their charitable and saintly labors. An amusing instance of this kind is related by St Theresa. While she was at Toledo, in great difficulties, and at a loss to find a house in which to establish the convent she intended to found; "One day," she says, "there came up to me a young man named Andrada, who said that he had been sent to me by his father confessor, a Franciscan, named father Martin of the Cross, who was aware of all our difficulties. He came up to me in a church, where I was hearing mass, to offer me all the service in his power which, however, could not exceed that of his personal labor. I thanked him; and my companions, as well as myself, were somewhat amused to think that this holy man should have sent such an assistance, because the young man did not appear to me to be exactly the person proper to treat with barefooted Carmelites. Some time after, when I received permission to make the foundation, but still had no assistance, and being greatly at a loss, I began to call to mind this young man, and I spoke of him to my companions; but they could not help laughing, and bid me have a care how I trusted him, for he would only disclose our secret. Nevertheless, as he had been sent to me by a great servant of God, I determined to send for him. After charging him to be very discreet, I asked him if he thought he could hire a house for us in Toledo! Without an instant's hesitation, he engaged to do it, with great joy, and, in fact, the next morning he came to me in the church of the Jesuits, and told me he had hired a house close to ours, and that he had brought the keys in his pocket. We found, upon trial, that it suited our purpose perfectly, and there we established ourselves. Now how strange was all this! Here had been rich and important people, giving themselves constant trouble, for two or three months, to seek a house for us, without being able to find one in all Toledo, and this young man, who has nothing but his good-will, procures us one immediately!"†

During these ages, the condition of youth in secular life, with respect to happiness, has struck the imagination even of modern writers; one of whom says,— "If there be any thing, indeed, in the poetry of old romance, in which we may indulge, as a true picture of chivalrous delight, it is in its representations of the pleasures of a young and noble squire, occupied incessantly in some pursuit that added to the graces of his person, or to his hilarity of feeling: he had the brightest visions that hope could possibly possess." And in the same page, he is obliged to record, that this happy youth was taught to avoid pride, anger, envy, idleness, gluttony, and luxury; to keep the commandments inviola-

* Prudentia Civilis, Chap. xxxix.

† Foundation at Toledo.

bly ; to treasure in his heart the XII articles of faith ; to exercise the VII principal virtues, in contradistinction to the VII mortal sins, and to perform the VII works of spiritual mercy, in saving people from error, as well as the VII works of corporal mercy, which embraced all works of charity done to the body. So far this writer. In fact, the habit once acquired of directing the intention to the glory of God, according to the spirit of these ages, every thing in the life of men was sanctified, and even the joys and triumphs of youth were enhanced, as well as rendered innocent ; for the extinction of selfishness rendered joy and triumph pure and glorious to the heart. Religion to them was fidelity, obedience, chivalry ; and all the noble and joyous sentiments of nature were cherished. In the lowest, as well as in the highest dignity, to be the servants of the servant of God was the great object of this spiritualized and refined ambition. The youth was happy and innocent, even amidst the pomp and exultation of his moments of triumph ; for all his grace and glory were to impress the minds of others with a sense of the dignity and importance of his master, who was himself the minister of Divine Providence, to maintain the order and felicity of the holy state of a Christian people. In himself he was nothing ; his heart was never for an instant directed to his own selfish interests, for his interests were all lapsed into those of his order, of his fellow Christians, of his God. How beautifully this is shown in the expression which occurs in Perceforest, where there is a description of a young man being knighted : “ Now said the king, it only remains that I give you the accolade, which I am willing to do ; but you must first promise me, that you will above all things, honor God, who made heaven and earth. After that you must swear to follow the lessons and doctrines which have just been given you. Then answered the youth, his eyes being tearful with devout thoughts, ‘ this I have promised to do.’ ” Here is an admirable trait of nature. Men now say, “ thoughtless youth ; ” whereas in fact, youth runs wild in superabundance of thought, and it was to give this culture and direction that the various parts of Catholic discipline were framed and exercised.

The description which Christine de Pisan gives of Louis duc de Bourbon, fourth brother of king Charles V., in his youth, is peculiarly interesting from her continuing to show his character, in after life, was affected by his early manners. She says, “ he was a vessel of all goodness, clemency, benignity, and sweetness. En sa juenece fu prince bel, joyeux festoyant et de hounorable amour amoureux et sans pechié : joyeux gentil en ses manieres, benigne en parolles, large en dons, d’acueil si gracieux que tiroit à luy amer princes, princesses, chevaliers, nobles, et toutes gens qui le veoyent ; but when this good duke came to maturer years, all this joyous and innocent youth turned into sense and moderation, good counsel, devotion, and constancy, and though his manners were always praiseworthy, yet now the degrees of his virtue increased still more. The virtue of charity shone forth in him ; he used to succor poor gentlemen, and give great gifts to poor monks and poor clerks, and to poor scholars, and to all poor people of every condition he is piteous and a great almoner ! he gives great alms in secret, has great faith towards God and even turns to him in his necessities."* Yet it often happened with young persons in secular life, that the least circumstance was able to inflame them with a desire of passing immediately to a state of Christian perfection. Thus we read in a Chronicle : "There was a monk of Villars, named Daniel, whose father was the uncle of the lady Clemence de Rixensart. Upon leaving the schools, he wished to have recourse to the vanity of tournaments at Senges, and there he became a soldier ; but being attacked by sickness, his resolution was changed, and he determined to militate for God in the monastery of Villars ; for seeing the world to pass and its concupiscence, he remembered his Creator in the days of his youth, and redeemed the time by living innocently."†

So far we have attended only to the condition of the young in the walks of secular life, where it cannot be denied, if in those times there were many things to assist and preserve innocence and poverty of spirit, there were also many peculiar sources of danger. "The youthful aspirant to chivalry," as a modern writer observes, in extolling the happiness of such a person, "did not want occasions of great excitement. He fought in presence of princes, shared in triumphs to which royalty lent its pomp and magnificence, heard his name shouted amidst the proud blasts of clarions, and in the fiercest onset felt his ardent spirit rejoicing in deeds, the fame of which his gallant followers would publish through every quarter of the land." But amidst all this pomp of mundane glory are we not sometimes tempted to recall to memory the humble saintly student, so far from the world's eye, in the cloistered shade ? Are we not sometimes tempted, in presence of so many obstacles, to virtue, so many dangers to innocence, to exclaim with St. Bernard, "Quid facitis, juvenes, qui flores juventutis vestre offertis Diabolo, et fæces senectutis vestre Deo ? Securius esset cum Abel primitias Deo offerre ; and then to say with the Christian poet, in allusion to the image before our mind,—"O thrice happy the child whom the Lord loves, who hears his voice betimes, and whom God himself deigns to instruct : nourished far from the world, adorned from first youth with all the gifts of heaven, the contagious company of the wicked taints not his innocence. So grows the young lily, in a retired vale, on the banks of a limpid stream, sheltered from the wind of the north, the object of Nature's love !"‡

To believe that the piety of youth was something eminently celestial and gracious, seems to have been according to the universal sentiment of mankind. Will you hearken to the Hebrew rabbins ? "Your young men shall see visions, and your old men shall dream dreams ;" say they, youth is the worthier age, for that visions are nearer apparitions of God than dreams. This is what Lord Bacon remarks.§ The ancients too have left some engaging portraits, illustrative of their

* Livre des Fais, &c. Tom. II. Chap. xiv.

† Hist. Monast. Villars. Lib. II. Cap. xiii. Apud Martini Thesaur. Anecd. Tom. III.

‡ Racine. Athalie, II. 9.

§ Of the Advancement of Learning.

views in this respect. Thus Æschylus says of one, "When his eyes first saw the light of life, and in the growth of infancy, and in the advancing years of youth, and in the riper age that clothes with gradual down the manly cheek, did justice and love divine mark him for their own."* And Euripides beautifully introduces the innocence of the sacerdotal youth, when it is made the instrument of preserving Io from poison; for he represents him as about to lift the fatal cup to his lips; the boy was about to depart from life, and no one knew it; but as he held the goblet in his hands, one of the servants, who stood near, uttered a blasphemous word, but he, having been nourished in the temple in holy discipline,— ὁ δ' ὥς ἐν ἱερῷ μάντεσιν τ' ἐσθλοῖς τραφεῖς, οἶωνόν ἔθετο.

immediately moved it back, and called upon them to fill for him another fresh cup; and that which he had before in his hands, he poured out upon the ground. Thus was his life preserved; for that draught contained the deadly poison, which is soon discovered, by the torments of the doves which taste it.† But that the gentleness and piety of their youth was rather a constitutional disposition in a few, than the result of any moral discipline or religious belief, capable of transforming and directing it, may be interred from a passage in Plato, where Theodorus says, in alluding to the young, "It is very difficult to find the same person ingenious, quick to learn, and at the same time mild; and, in addition to all this, manly. Truly I do not think that there ever was such a person, nor do I behold any one so constituted by nature. For they who are sharp and sagacious, and endowed with memory, are prone to anger and subject to be carried away by passion, like ships without a cable; whereas the grave, when they apply to learning, are oblivious, and slow, and torpid."‡ and Ulysses, in his reply to Euryalus, makes a remark somewhat similar, observing, that the gods seldom give to the same person beauty of person, and gentleness and wisdom in conversation to correspond to it.§ From a remarkable passage in Cicero, indeed, it would appear that the majority of men in those times entertained sentiments which would have made the sanctity of Christian youth, appear to them in no amiable light. His words are these, speaking of Cælius; "Truly, O judges, if he were a youth of such strength of mind and continence that he would reject all pleasures, and speed all the course of his life in labors of body and contention of mind, whom no repose or remission, no pursuits of his equals, no plays, no banquets, delighted; who would think that nothing was to be sought for in life but what was joined with praise and dignity; I should regard him as endowed and adorned with certain divine goods, and perhaps a few other men would consider him as one to whom the Gods were propitious. The multitude would suppose that he was one with whom they were angry."|| However, the sentiments which seem generally to prevail with the moderns on the subject of youthful virtue, are rather lower than above the standard unfolded by Cicero in this celebrated Oration. Leaving them to argue in support of their respective views, I turn to contemplate the lives of the young under the influence of religion in Catholic ages, and to produce examples, which will show with what peculiar justice the Christian poet might exclaim with Chaucer, Sweet is the holiness of youth.

* Sept. cont. Theb. † Io. 1200. ‡ Plat. Theætetus. § Od. VIII. 267. || Pro M. Cælio. 17.

But to introduce these, a few observations may be needful. In the first place, then, let it be remembered that the mind of the young must ever be devoted either to an idea or to sense, either to an object of faith, (and youth is peculiarly qualified for possessing faith), or to that visible form of good which ministers to animal excitement. If the citadels of the souls of the young be left void of pure and noble images, they will be taken possession of by those that are contrary to them: if not guarded by the bright symbols of beauteous and eternal things, error and death, moral death, with all its process of intellectual degradation, will plant their pale flag there. The best guards, Socrates said, "are in the thoughts of men who are loved by God:" *οἱ δὲ ἄριστοι Φρουροί τε καὶ φύλακες ἐν ἀνδρῶν θεοφιλῶν εἰς διανοίας. But if the young are not guests at the sacred banquet of pure and angelic spirits, they will go to the Lotuseaters, and dwell with them in stupid sensuality. As with the intellectual direction, so is it with the manners and intercourse of youth—for these will ever be directed after one or other of two types—either by the spirit of sweetness and love, or by that of insolence and malignity. All systems of education that are merely human, and under the guidance of rationalism, will ever nourish and fortify, when they do not even recognize and extol the latter; for being formed on merely natural principles, all that belongs to man's unkindness will have free scope to be developed and exercised within their dominion; and therefore cruel mocking, dissipation, disobedience, tyranny, and the will and ability to oppress weaker companions will entitle the youth who has sufficient tact, to know how far precisely these qualities may be exercised with the applause of animal minds to the enviable character of possessing a manly spirit. He will discover too that his father may have only one desire respecting him, like that of Jason, in the tragedy, whose sole prayer for his sons is, that he may see them grown to manhood, well nourished and vigorous, that they may be a defence to him against his enemies.† In studies also, emulation will be carried to an excess which renders the youthful mind obnoxious to all the worst attendants on ambition. So that, under these modern systems, while education conduces to victory, their victory, as Soerates says, will often undo the work of education; for, through victory, many are rendered insolent and obnoxious to a thousand evils. And education, that which deserves the name of education, "is never Cadmeian; but many victories are and will be such to men."‡ In days of old chivalry, the place for a tournament was generally selected in a part which had the city on one side and a forest

* De Repub. Lib. VIII.

† Eurip. Medea, 918.

‡ Plat. de Legibus, Lib. I.

on the other. The vanquished knight is generally represented as quitting the scene of his humiliation, and hastening to the forest, to afford him the shelter which was the object in view when making this particular disposition of the lists; and during the same period it was the constant assurance of religion, that, in the various trials of life, from youth to age, it was often better to return as if by way of the forest, rather than hasten to the city with the exulting multitude of admirers. But, according to the rational, or merely natural view of education, such an opinion will be wholly inadmissible; and not only will success be pursued with an utter recklessness of its moral results; not only will the soul become less mild and less humble, but the exact converse will ensue of what Socrates represents as the great and only end of all discipline, saying, "We have two qualities in our souls, which we must preserve with equal solicitude; the one which prompts us to dare, and the other which constrains us to fear—to be bold for virtue and to be afraid in respect to vice."* They will at best be but timid friends to virtue, and bold in the applause of every theory that wears the semblance of an impious spirit. But in the schools of Christians, in ages of faith, neither victories, nor any other part of discipline, were Cadmeian; nor was there any disposition generated opposed to the utmost humility; but the buoyancy of youthful spirits was directed in such a manner, that it developed itself in all the innocent and engaging expressions of gentleness and friendship. There was, indeed, something most divine in the temper and manners which this discipline imparted to the young; for nature alone could never have possessed such acuteness, joined with so much simplicity, and joyous frankness, such warmth and energy, along with such purity and angelic innocence. The stranger, who approached their assemblies, received a greeting like that which Dante met with from those bright spirits which he beheld within a circle of paradise, from whom one came forth and said,

We all
Are ready at thy pleasure, well disposed
To do thee gentle service.†

In every country, the youthful mind was molded to this type, as long as education continued to be purely Catholic, and untainted with the influence of the modern spirit and examples; but wherever these were able to exercise any sway, there was introduced more or less of pride, and reserve, and a desire of seeming to be peculiarly knowing, with a disposition to depreciate others and give pain, to ridicule and suspect; in other words, there was a return to the mere natural qualities of youth, when those were not even perverted still farther from primal goodness; there was a return to that temper alluded to by Socrates, where he says that "boys, when they first begin to taste the pleasure of words, use them as a kind of play, continually employing them in contradiction, and imitating the disputants, they dispute with one another, rejoicing like young puppies, always dragging and

* Ibid.

† VIII.

tearing whatever is near them by words ; and he warns elder men from following this mode of puerile contradiction :”* instead of humility and penitence there was pride, and the sharpness of a pert and nimble spirit—

Pro molli violâ, pro purpureo narcisso,
Carduus et spinis surgit paliurus acutis.

In the second place it should be borne in mind, that in the ages of faith men felt the impossibility of educating souls for God and for the world also ; and therefore the latter had, no doubt, grounds to make many objections against the system which they adopted. It had reason to complain of youth being kept in ignorance of its maxims, without any knowledge of some books, and other objects which it admired, and even, perhaps, without the ability or the spirit to secure many of its interests, which it might deem most important. Plato had so sublime a sense of a just education, that he acknowledges that the good, when young, will appear to be weak and simple, and that they will easily be deceived by the unjust, ἄτε οὐκ ἔχοντες ἐν ἑαυτοῖς παραδείγματα ὁμοιοπαθῆ τοῖς πονηροῖς : for he too would not allow the young to acquire that knowledge of the world which was so carefully excluded from Catholic schools, but which is now thought so essential to children. “If he is to be a good and honorable man, fair and good, and able to form a sound judgment of what is just, he must, when young, be without experience and wholly without a mixture of evil manners ; † for he only is good who has a good soul, ὁ γὰρ ἔχων ψυχὴν ἀγαθὴν, ἀγαθός, which he cannot possess who has a personal acquaintance with evil.” Are we disposed to question this proposition ? Hear what Fuller acknowledges, a writer only remarkable for his candor in publishing of himself what other men would conceal of their own experience : “Almost twenty years since,” he says, “I heard a profane jest, and still remember it.” “I lost honor, say the Spaniards, by speaking ill and hearing worse.” The old poet, Claude de Morenne, acknowledges in one of his pieces that he had read certain poems in his youth which had done an injury to his imagination and to his heart, which nothing could repair.‡ This is the dreadful effect of renouncing the ancient discipline. Such is the stain which reading of this description impresses upon the mind, that the moral consequences seem among those “which never may be cancelled from the book wherein the past is written :” once blighted, the bloom of innocent fancy is faded for ever. It remains only for the sufferer to say, after the manner of Pilate, what I have read I have read, and to warn others from the rock against which he has made shipwreck of that imagination, of which every flight had been an ecstasy, and every expression a hymn of praise. But if there were restraints and privations in the discipline of Christian antiquity, though it is incorrect to style that privation, which was only a measure to prevent the loss of good, there was full liberty for the exercise and development of every gracious and noble faculty. "The gardener," says St. Anselm, "gives space and freedom to young plants, that they may grow and spread forth their sweet branches, and so should masters provide indulgence for the young, who, by oblation, are planted in the garden of the Church, that they may increase and bear fruit to God. They ought not to be cramped and restrained by terrors, threats, and stripes."* Would we hearken to an old monk who relates an instance amusing for its simplicity? There were in the Abbey of Ramsey four boys who had been formerly placed there by St. Oswald, before they were seven years old, and they had now grown up to puberty like branches of the olive, promising abundant fruit in due season. These were Æthericus, Ædnothus, Oswald, and Æthelstan. They were all youths of good birth, of innocent manners, and of beautiful form. That they might not be overfatigued by the rigor of the order, and according to the proverb, "quod caret alterna requie durabile non est," they were allowed at certain times in the week to go, with leave of their masters, without the cloistral walls, for the sake of juvenile play. On one of these occasions they ran to the cords of the greater bells which are in the western tower of the church, and one of these they rang with all the force of their weak arms, until, by the unequal motion, it was suddenly cracked, which became instantly perceptible by the sound. This being discovered, the masters and the other brethren were excited to anger; even to threaten the infliction of stripes on the boys, who were weeping bitterly, till at length they remembered the sentence which they had so often heard read in chapter, as prescribed by St. Benedict, "Ut qui perdidit quicquam aut fregerit, alios in delicti sui accusatione festinet prævenire," so hastening to the feet of the Abbot, with many tears, they related what they had done. That discreet man compassionating their distress, consoled them, and calling the brethren, said, "These innocents have committed a fault, not intentionally, but contrary to their intention; not willingly, but against will. They ought to be spared, therefore, and that will not be neglecting the duty which we owe to our community, for when these boys come to years of maturity, being of noble houses, it will be easy for them to indemnify us for the loss." Then dismissing the monks, he secretly admonished the boys, who, entering the church with bare feet, made their devotions and vows; and that their pure prayers were favorably heard, was sufficiently seen at a subsequent time, when being grown up and exalted to honors, not forgetting their vows, they conferred signal benefits upon that church.† The care of religious men to educate the young was not confined to supplying them with oral or written instruction. It was for them especially that religion loved, under the form of the fine arts, to impress on the material elements around, the stamp of ideal humanity, that as Fichte says, "at their very awakening into life, they might be environed by noble objects, such as by a certain sympathetic power, would educate the outward senses, whereby the education of the inner man might be greatly facilitated." It was the object of education not so much to impart a variety of knowledge, as to cultivate that mind which would be able either to reap the benefit of knowledge subsequently obtained, where an extraordinary degree of knowledge was required, or to discharge the ordinary duties of life with honesty and perseverance to the end, where there was no occasion for acquiring such a distinction. Agreeable to this plan, the young were to be thoroughly imbued with a delicate and profound sense of every thing noble and gracious, which would be alike useful to all; that, to borrow a simile from Plato, as the young who inhabit a healthy spot are benefitted by every thing around them, so whatever was thrown before them from beautiful deeds, whether in the way of seeing or of hearing, like an air from pure places bearing health, might lead them to a similitude, and friendship, and harmony, with what is good and fair; * and, as Plutarch says, "What they heard and saw in youth without understanding it, in all its exact relations and detail, they learned to comprehend fully in maturer life, like the inhabitants in that city which Antiphanes used to describe, where all words that had been spoken in winter, froze in the air, and were not heard till the summer came to thaw them, but then not a syllable was lost, for every one heard what had been said to him the winter before."† No doubt, to the world's eye, the prospects of Christian youth were poor-spirited and obscure: but the question from the Mount, the only question we have here to answer, is this, were they inconsistent with the beatitude of the poor? "Our life, says a Catholic poet, "is like the chrystal flood, which leaves its native rock humble and unnamed. While it sleeps at the bottom of the basin which nature has made for its bed, all the flowers of the fields perfume its path, and the azure of a beautiful sky descends wholly into it, but hardly escaped from the arms of its hills, hardly are its waters enabled to spread themselves over the plain, than its wave becomes corrupt and pale with the filth of the soil which its course disturbs; the shade which once sheltered it flies now from its banks, the naked rock confines its fugitive waters; disdaining to follow the gracious windings of its paternal valley, it proudly aspires to engulf itself under profound arches, where it may receive a name brilliant as its foam; with precipitous bounds it bears along with it dark rumors, the filth of cities: each river which swells it is a new source of defilement, till it arrives at the term, when swollen with so many adulterous waves, it moves on great but troubled, parting with a vain name as it rolls into the bosom of the sea its pollutions and its glory. Happy in the depth of the wood is the pure and humble spring, happy the lot which is concealed in a life of obscurity."‡ It should be observed moreover, that the ancient discipline was not framed upon calculation of the spiritual being subordinate to the material parts of nature, but in conformity with the opposite conclusion. In this respect again it was in accordance with that excellent reason which guided Plato, for he says in speaking of the necessity of gymnastics and music in the education of youth, that the latter is still more important even for the body: "For," he says, "it does not seem to me that when the body is good, the soul will by its means become good; but I hold the converse to be true, that the good soul will by its virtue enable the body to become as good as possible."*

* Plato, de Repub. Lib. VII. † Ibid. Lib. III. ‡ Gouget, Biblioth. Franc. Tom. XIV. 54.

* De Similitudinibus. Cap. clxxvii.

† Hist. Ramesiensis, Cap. lxxvii. apud Gale. Hist. Brit. Tom. III.

* De Repub. III. † How to perceive one's progress in virtue.

‡ De Lamartine, Harmonies Poétiques et Religieuses, l. 12.

I must proceed now to produce examples, the beauty and force of which perhaps without the preliminary observations might not have been immediately understood; but all this humble matter is intended for the ear of those who are themselves children of the first beatitude. "When Clotaire, son of Clovis, held the sceptre of France, there lived," says an ancient writer, "a nobleman named Florentin, rich in possession, wise in council, valiant in war while employed in it, but always desirous of maintaining peace. Above all he lived as a true gentleman and greatly Catholic, and his wife yielded to no one in piety and all grace. They had a son, Evode, whom the holy mother bred up to all virtue and Catholic piety, as well as to the civil decorum of nobility. On being put to school he was well instructed in both human and sacred learning, and from this time charity took her seat in his innocent heart, benignity on his tongue and purity in his body. His parents seeing him all devoted to God, loved him the more, and placed him in the Church of Rouen to render the services which his devout heart loved, where he lived in great justice and piety towards God, and in sweetness and patience towards men. Every one that saw him judged him to be a little angel in human form so pure was he in life, so serene and smiling of countenance, so sweet in words, so beautiful in person, so filled with all goodness."†

The sanctity of the youth of Wala, who was afterwards abbot of Corby, is described by Pasesiasius: "During the day he used to moisten the earth with his sweat, and during the night with his tears. At night, both before and after the vigils of the brethren, he used to lie prostrate on the ground before the holy altar; and I have myself often seen his tears fall upon the pavement while he was at prayer." St. Jerome says, "that from the moment Hilarion first saw the blessed man, St. Anthony, he resolved to dwell with him in the desert, and the devil beheld himself vanquished by a boy."‡ St. Bernard, in his youth, had celestial visions. On one Christmas eve, after he had been long meditating on the mystery of the incarnation, he beheld our Saviour in a dream, as if still in his human infancy, and the sight so charmed him, that he thenceforth could think of nothing but how to serve God in the best way he might. When St. Bernard, with his brethren and companions, had prepared to set out for a monastery of Cistercians, it happened that Guy, the elder brother, found Nivardus, the youngest of all the brothers, playing in the street with other boys, and said to him, "Nivardus, God be with thee: we go to religion and leave thee heir of all our goods."

* De Repub. III. † Desguerres, Hist. du Diocese de Troyes, p. 409. ‡ Vita ejus.

To these words the child answered, "What! do you take heaven for yourselves, and leave me earth? this is not an equal division." And accordingly, some day after, he also followed his brothers and entered into the monastery. This is one of the many instances to which I alluded in the beginning, as furnishing an insight into the character of an entire generation of men; for the occurrence of a scene like this assuredly indicates a very remarkable state of society.

But to return to history. "In the days of Hugues Capet, king of France," says an ancient chronicle, "Aderal was born at Troyes, of noble parents, who were both devout; he was a child of a sweet disposition, so that he no sooner ceased to be an infant than he conducted himself like a little saint. He studied not under masters who teach only worldly civilities, but under pious priests and clerks of the church of St. Peter, at Troyes. He remained with these good men, who, seeing in him so many indexes of a holy life, had great care of him, and loved him for his docility and promptitude to correspond with the grace of God. He was soon made an acolyte in the church of Troyes, in the discharge of which office he gave content and edification to every one. On the holy day of Easter, and during its octave in the church of Troyes, it is the custom for the two acolytes, who carry the lighted tapers before the celebrating bishop, to be presented with these tapers after the office, to do with them what they like. The holy youth on this occasion, receiving the gift of the tapers along with his companion, after the pious rites of the day, sold them, and with the money gave alms to the poor, and procured for himself a small reliquary to contain some bones of saints to wear on his person. Such was the piety of this innocent soul, offering its first fruits, and all that it possessed, to God."* It was not alone the young men who were regularly received into houses of religion and churches, that were employed to serve at the divine altars. The faithful were one family, and every little son was trained sufficiently to exercise, upon occasion, this angelic ministry, to which he might be invited even where he was himself a stranger, and to offer to God in the morning that silver voice, the pure and limpid echo of his youthful soul. His sweet and gracious image was in the mind of other children of the town, who, as the poet says, would pray that they might be good, though little like him whom they saw each morning in the temple. Benignity and grace they seemed to learn even from the movements that the holy ritual prescribed, as in beholding acolytes, who in choirs make their artless bow, and then give each other the kiss of peace. In the beautiful poem of Friedolin, by Schiller, the page is represented stopping on his way to enter a church, where he finds a priest going to the altar, and there being no acolyte arrived, he instantly offers himself and serves the mass. This was the first employment of each day for numbers of young men living in towns in every rank of society from the highest to the lowest. The annuable and learned Rollin, rector of the University of Paris, was the son of a cutler, and already exercising his father's trade as his apprentice, when a good Benedictine monk of the Blanesmauteaux, whose mass he was in habits of serving, observed his happy dispositions, and obtained a subscription which enabled him to commence his studies in the college of Duplessis. What St. Bonaventura has written on the duty and happiness of those young men who serve at mass, in which holy function they are associated in the occupation of angels, in which they represent the assembled faithful, in which they have the honor of waiting upon the minister of Jesus Christ, and the inestimable advantage of having an especial part in his memento, will convey an idea of the sanctification and joy which were reserved for the innocent zeal of youth.*

* Desguerrois, Hist. du Diocèse de Troyes, p. 247.

Here it may be well to make a short digression, for the purpose of observing how these customs and rules of discipline respecting the young, ordained in the society of Christians, recommend themselves to the natural reason and piety of men; the judgment and dictates of which, emanating from that implicit faith in Divine Providence which St. Thomas ascribes to many of the Gentiles,† ought not to be disdained or rejected merely because we must be at the trouble of disengaging them from the detestable errors and corruptions of Paganism, which had misapplied and perverted them. This is a distinction, the justice of which no one who has had any moderate degree of instruction will contest, and therefore I pass at once to establish the truth of our proposition.

The Athenian, in Plato, lays it down as a maxim, that no one has received a sufficient education, who is ἀχόρευτος; and that whoever has been initiated, as it were, in the choir, in music, and in gracious movements of the body, is sufficiently educated; which may be taken to show the necessity of educating the external senses, or rather of the soul being imbued with that Divine harmony which will even impel the body, by prescribed movements, to exercise its external homage. Scipio Africanus, who vanquished Hannibal, and all the power of Carthage, and who was so devout that he never began any public or private affair of consequence, without first consulting heaven and imploring its assistance, had, from his early youth, according to the report of St. Augustin, been educated in the temples. If, for a moment, we turn our eyes from the dark side of the ancient philosophy, and consider only the testimonies which it bore to truth, we may be permitted to contemplate with a certain pleasure the following passage in the tragedy of Ion, where Euripides has represented, in a most gracious form, the ideal of youth devoted to the service of heaven. The innocent boy comes forth from the temple, and says, “Now shines upon the earth the bright chariot drawn by the four horses of the sun; the stars fly from this fire of heaven into the sacred night; and the insurmountable cliffs of Parnassus being lighted up, receive the lustre for mortals. The smoke of the dry myrrh now flies to the roof of

* St. Bonavent. de Reformat. Hominis exterior. Cap. x. † II. 2 q. 2. Art. 7.

Apollo: but as for me, I go to discharge the labors which I have undergone continually from a child, with branches of laurel to sweep the sacred pavement of Apollo's temple, and with my arrows to drive away the little birds which might injure it. Beautiful is the labor, O Apollo, to serve in thy house, in reverence of the prophetic seat: glorious the task to minister with my hands to gods, to the immortals and not to mortal men. Never shall I be weary in performing such well-reported labors; for Apollo is to me a father, and I will praise him, who nurtures me. O Pæon, Pæon, mayest thou be happy, happy son of Latona. But I cease this labor of the laurel branches, and now from golden vessels I scatter the pure wave which gushes from Castalian spring. O that I may never cease thus ministering to Apollo, or ceasing, may it be for a happy end. Ah! see, now the winged tribe are leaving the cliffs of Parnassus. Dare not to approach this cornice, or these golden roofs. I will overtake thee with my arrows, O thou herald of Jupiter, thou that excellest in thy talons the strength of birds. Here comes the swan, too, rowing towards the temple. Will you not, then, move elsewhere that purple foot of thine? The lyre of Apollo which accompanies thy song will not be able to save thee from my arrows. Turn thy wings, then, and seek the pools of Delos. If thou disobeyest me, thou wilt ensanguine thy melodious chants. See, see, what new bird is this which comes near? Is it about to deposit sticks and straw as a nest for its young ones under the sheltering cornice? The flight of my arrows shall keep you at a distance. Will you not be persuaded? Go and rear your children on the banks of the Alpheus, or in the Isthmian grove, that the temple and precincts of Apollo may not be injured. I fear to kill you, you who are the messenger of gods to men, but I labor in the service which I owe to Apollo, and I will not cease ministering to those that feed me.* In this brilliant picture, we see, that even under the deplorable error of Pagan superstition, human reason was able to recognize the beauty of devoting the youthful heart to what is divine, and of employing little inoffensive hands to minister in the service of heaven. In the passage following, we may observe, how it could inculcate the happiness resulting from such a condition. When Xuthus claims his son Ion from the priests, and desires him to leave the temple of Apollo, in which he had spent his first youth as the servant of the god, after encouraging him with the prospect of the wealth and honors which await him in the magnificent Athens, observing what passes in the mind of the youth, he breaks off suddenly, and says, "Are you silent? Why do you turn your eyes upon the ground and seem absorbed in care, as if sadness were to succeed your late joy?" And Ion replies, by saying, that things when near do not appear in the same form as when seen from afar; that he foresees many difficulties, dangers, and certain evils, which will arise to him at Athens; and then he continues, "But you will answer, perhaps, and urge that riches can compensate for all this; but I do not love to hear those empty speakers who can hold their happiness in their hands, and have no labor. May there be to me only a moderate supply of what is necessary to preserve me from suffering the pains of want. But, O my father, as to the good things which I enjoy, in this temple, hear me speak. In the first place, I have that dearest blessing, leisure from being importuned by men, and at the same time a moderate degree of society. No evil person ever drives me from the way involving me in the intolerable calamity of having to yield to the base: but I spend my days in prayer to the gods, or in ministering joyfully to those of mortals who rejoice. And some arrive, and some depart, and it is sweet to be new to those that are themselves new; and besides this, what should be the object of all men's prayers, the law of this place and nature both conspire to present me in innocence to the Deity. Considering, these things, O my father, I esteem it better for me to be here than to remove thither. Suffer me, therefore, to enjoy my condition, for it is not more grateful to rejoice in great things than to possess those that are moderate with sweetness."* His conclusion resembles that of Joas with Racine,

* Ion, 103. 155-180.

This temple is my country; I know no other.

But to return to the ages of faith, those really golden ages which combined every thing that the imagination of man could conceive of beauty with all that is pure, and holy, and Christian. The discipline and institutions for the young, with respect to studies and learning, will be a subject for our consideration in a future place. It only remains, for the present, to notice the circumstance often presented in ages of faith, so affecting to all who are not perfectly rooted in the love of eternal things, because in their view the misconceptions of sense necessarily represent it invested with a certain melancholy,—of the complete detachment of the youthful heart from creatures, not from vile disdain, but through the love and foretaste of higher good. The annals of the middle age can furnish many such instances, combined too with wild and romantic imagery, in which the youth, whom but for a short date the world possesses, has already emancipated himself from the attractions of this earthly life, and thereby become fully convinced of its nothingness, so that "he prevails on himself to engage in its concerns only on account of the connection between those concerns and the one permanent eternal principle which religion lays open to him." And in this placid resignation of the young, this mild angelic constancy which allows grief and pain, amidst the hard labors and sufferings of their lonely way, to wear only the garb of tenderness, this inherent love which has not time to put forth more than blossoms, there is a certain poetic tone of sadness and of joy, a certain plaintive sweetness of ideal humanity which is gazed upon with an intense interest by such persons as are capable of discovering those more exquisite tones which, both in the natural and intellectual world, are always the most unobtrusive and subdued. This is one of the many tender mysteries to be found in the writings connected with ages of faith.

* Ion, 590

"How often," exclaims the unknown writer of the Manual ascribed to St. Augustine, "how often, when a youth, have I said without thinking that it was also the sentiment of a Christian soul : How this world is burdensome to me ! What I behold makes me sorrowful ; the conversation which I hear on all sides on such mere vanities as the good things of this life, inspire me with a profound disgust. O sweet felicity to behold the saints, to be with the saints, to be one's self a saint, to enjoy the presence of God, to possess God for all eternity !" "Behold a boy," says St. Jerome, "instructed in all the honest arts of the world, having riches and dignity, who despising all that he possessed, hath gone to inhabit, as a paradise, an island in the midst of a dangerous sea, whose rough cliffs and naked rocks, and solitude are sufficient to inspire terror ! There, alone, nay not alone, for Christ is his companion, he beholds the glory of God, which the Apostles themselves beheld not, excepting in the desert. He sees no towered cities ; his limbs are clothed in hideous sackcloth : around the island rages continually an insane sea, which echoes through the caverns of the hollow shore ; no blade of grass grows there, no shrubs cast any shade ; steep rocks enclose it as a prison. He, secure, intrepid, and armed with the Apostle, hears God while he reads of things divine, speaks with God while he prays to him, and perhaps, like St. John, beholds somewhat while remaining on the island."

In the middle ages there is repeated allusion to saintly youths, pure and innocent in life and every virtuous lore, who wander in poverty, or tend a flock upon the wild mountains, till by accident they are discovered by some holy man, who finds them possessing souls that are like temples in which divine and ineffable mysteries are celebrated. Will you hearken to an old chronicler, who does as one that weeps and tells his tale ? Arnulph was a child of God, a native of Lotharingia, and of a most innocent and holy life ; as yet a youth, faithfully serving God in fear and justice, growing more and more to perfection, like the palm which increases daily, like the lily which sends forth a sweet odor, he grew up a plant destined for the celestial courts. But as by the Divine grace he disposed himself to shine as a light in the house of God, to give light to all that entered it, he applied himself to the studies which were necessary. Already he began to cast beams which were lighted by divine love, when hearing what the Apostle says, that as long as we are in the body we are travelling from God, that we walk by faith and not by sight, and that we have not here a remaining city, but that we seek one to come he understood this life to be a journey, not his country ; a prison of captivity, and not a hall of freedom ; a state of banishment, and not the kingdom of supernal habitation. So the good youth undertook a journey beyond the Moselle, into Celtic Gaul, for the sake of praying and of frequenting the suffrages of the saints there. What business he discharged in that country, what commerce he had with them, what pious tears and holy sighs accompanied his prayers, it is not necessary to say, since it is sufficiently obvious that what he holily proposed, he efficaciously fulfilled : and now, with innocent hands and guileless tongue and pure heart, because he had not applied his soul to vanity, nor sworn to deceive his neighbor, he was on his way returning, and approaching a city, called Agen. What were his holy thoughts, his innocent little hopes, his beautiful meditations, as he walked along at that moment, are known to God and to his angel ; to himself they were broken off, for lo he is suddenly attacked by robbers, who dart from the wood, beaten, and torn with cruel stripes. At length, with difficulty, he crawled to the village called Grueria, and there the devout people took care of him, and the matrons contented with each other who should receive him into her house like a son ; but he told them, with a sweet and placid look, that his last hour was come, and that he was about to be presented to the mercy of God. “Subvenite potius ut subveniat vobis Deus :—Procure a priest, that I may receive from his hands the Eucharist of our Lord’s communion.” The priest arrived, and administered to him. “A traveller, ”says the youth, “you see me; a stranger and a traveller in this place, and therefore, on this road of my pilgrimage bury me.” Then raising his hands and eyes, he said , “O Lord Jesus Christ, who hast made and redeemed my soul, I deliver it up, and commend it to thee, that it may be numbered among the elect souls of thy redemption.” So he died, and the people buried him by the side of a royal road, that his grave might be seen by those that passed along, and during a long period his name was forgotten, and it was only pointed out as the grave of a certain faithful stranger : but in the year 971 the body was translated.*

What shall I add to this example of youthful humility which so ingeniously sought to be in the grave a monitor, καὶ ἐσσομένοισι πυθέσθαι, of the vanity of all earthly good, of all human hopes, of every thing that is not God ? That the tomb in which he was about to lay his innocent limbs might be an object to remind the future wanderer that all his journeys and pilgrimages, all his recollections of different places, of beauteous temples, and of the shrines of saints, all his sweet hopes of enjoying the day of return, and even his seemingly devout prospects of shining as a light in the Holy Church, would be to no purpose if they did not spring from higher sources than the mere curiosity of man, and the desire of the eyes and the secret pride of life ; to remind him that in such provision there would be nothing substantial, nothing durable ; that, as even the ancient poet sang, “Delight may increase with mortals for a short time, but then it falls to the ground, overthrown by unfortunate counsel. Men are of one day. What is any one ? What is no one ? Men are the dream of a shadow !”

*ἐπαύμεροι, τὶ δὲ τίς, τὶ δ' οὐ τίς;
ὅκτι ᾧς ἄνθρωποι.*†

Let us pass on then, without further delay, though we could say with Homer,

* Chronicon Mosome nse apud Dacher. Spicileg. Tom. VII. p. 628.

† Pyth. Od. VIII.

that "a desire arises of weeping;" let us pass on, lest we should seem willing to grow old in meditating on the state of youth. "Do you not perceive," says St. Jerome, "how you have been a child, a boy, a youth, a man of robust age, and how you are now already an old man? We die daily; we are changed daily. This moment which I occupy in writing is so much taken from my life: we write, and we write again in answer, letters pass the sea, and ships plough the deep, and with each tide of age our moments are diminished. We have gained nothing but what we can appropriate to ourselves by the love of Christ."† It is enough. We have seen how eminently the young in ages of faith were poor in spirit; nothing remains but to wish devoutly that we too may be children of that beatitude, and that as the Church sings in the anthem at Lauds on Palm Sunday, "Cum angelis et pueris fideles inveniamur, triumphatori mortis clamantes: Hosanna in excelsis."

CHAPTER VIII.

THUS far we appear to have overlooked the close of the Divine sentence from the Mount, which pronounced of the poor in spirit that theirs is the kingdom of heaven, that is, the fulfilment of all the hopes and aspirations of the heart of man; the accomplishment of the end for which he was created; and though by incident we have already seen in each detail how a sweet and blessed end was theirs, whether we regard them in their capacity of the poor, whose external condition corresponded with that spirit, or of the great and noble, who studied humility, of the learned who retained it, or of the young in whose nature it seemed inherent, it yet remains to direct our thoughts formally to the many and great sources of felicity which appertained to all, even in the present life, the sphere to which these enquiries are confined, in consequence of their moral dispossession and spiritual poverty; and this must be the subject of our last meditation in reference to the beatitude which is the first in order.

"Felicity," says the master of divine wisdom, "is the ultimate end of man, and for which all other things are ordained in their due course."‡ On this point there is no dispute, but, as Dante says,

* Epist. XXXV.

† Diego de Stella on the Contempt of the World. Part III. 508.

"All indistinctly apprehend a bliss
On which the soul may rest ; the hearts of all
Yearn after it ; and to that wished bourn,
All therefore strive to tend."*

But before eternal truth had spoken to the wearied spirits of men, who would have sought for it under the yoke of servitude, and dereliction, and poverty ! Plato indeed had attempted to show, by painful reasoning, that the most virtuous life was the sweetest life.† True, indeed, he says admirable things on this head. "It is necessary then to praise the most excellent life, τὸν κάλλιστον βίον, not only because in its form it surpasses all others in point of honor, but also because it excels in this, which all seek, τῷ χαίρειν πλείω, ἐλάττω δὲ λυπεῖσθαι παρὰ τὸν βίον ἅπαντα.‡ And again, in the Platonic dialogue it is said, that "whoever lives a holy life must be happy either below or above ἢ κάτω ἢ ἄνω εὐθαιμονεῖν σε δεῖ, βεβιωκότα εὐσεβῶς."§ But how many forms might be conceived of that excellent life which would have involved men in misery while they looked for happiness ? In Plato, therefore, there is nothing save the statement of an abstract proposition, and the real secret is nowhere in his writings found. Pindar, too, says that "if any mortal should possess in his mind the way of truth, he must needs obtain happiness from the blessed gods."|| But how far his conception of happiness was capable of satisfying the immense desires of the human soul may be inferred from what he says in the same ode, "It is necessary to seek from the gods things suitable to mortal minds, knowing, with regard to the present, of what nature we are. O my soul, do not aspire after an immortal life, but apply to the labors for which you are qualified."

I know, indeed, that it would be as vain for the tongue to attempt to describe, as it would be impossible for the uninitiated heart to conceive that afflation of eternal bliss which is granted to the lowly spirits of those who bear the twelve precious fruits ; but it may be allowable to contemplate, as from a distance, the indications of its possession in men during the ages of faith, and with submissive eyes to trace some of the visible and external sources through which it would seem that this water of life was made to flow into their souls. The indications of its existence present themselves in whatever way we bend our steps through the history of Christian ages. The instance which first suggests itself to the memory will render useless any particular research. Thus St. Francis Xavier, whose first cry was "Still more, O Lord, still more, amplius, Domine amplius," when with a prophetic eye he contemplated the sufferings which awaited him, and wished them to be still greater, was heard to exclaim in after-life, as when he walked in the gardens of the College of St. Paul, at Goa, "It is enough, O Lord, it is enough, satis est, Domine satis est ;" alluding to the celestial consolations, which were vouchsafed him in such abundance, that he felt as if he could not endure them long.¶

* Purg. XVII. † De Legibus, II. ‡ Id. Lib. V. § Axiochus. || Pyth. Od. III.
¶ Vie de S. François, Xav. I. 281.

St. Thomas says, that no words can express the happiness of such souls, even in this world.* It remains only to exclaim with the great poet—

——— O born in happy hour !
Thou, to whom grace vouchsafes, or ere thy close
Of fleshly warfare, to behold the thrones
Of that eternal triumph !

When Angelran, abbot of the monastery of St. Richarius, was sick and confined to his bed with paralysis, he used at times to evince singular joy : and when people would ask him the cause why he appeared so elevated, he used to reply, that he derived this delight from the joys of the heavenly angels and from the perpetual felicity of the saints.†

Dante attempts to express this upon meeting with the spirit of Cacciaguida in Paradise, to whom he says,

“Through so many streams with joy
My soul is fill'd, that gladness wells from it.”‡

This felicity, where it was not raised into ecstasies, diffused a perpetual sunshine over the conversation and manners of men, for sweet love inspired by holy thoughts must always apparel her in smiles. “Can the good and evil be distinguished by any sign?” asks the disciple in a dialogue ascribed to St. Anselm : “They can,” is the reply ; “for the just, at peace in their conscience, and full of future hope, are cheerful in countenance, their eyes indicating a certain grace, modest in their walk, and sweet in their words, which spring from the abundance of their heart : but the evil, from a bad conscience and bitterness of heart, are cloudy in countenance and unstable in words and deeds ; immoderate in laughter as in sadness ; irregular in all their motions, and they pour out the venom of their hearts in bitter and impure speeches.”§ Thus Dante speaks of those that “harboring in the light supreme, brought from thence a virtue that, sparkling in their eyes, denoted joy.” How well this agreed with the good that is inherent in nature may be inferred from that beautiful answer which is recorded by the ancients of a certain wise old man, who, on being asked what he found the chief result of having become blind, replied, “Pueri ut uno esset comitator.”||

“Our young students,” says the father-guardian of a Franciscan convent, at La Fleche, “must evince externally the odoriferous fruit of rejoicing and of celestial consolations ; for there is nothing more agreeable in a soul which professes piety and desires to lead a spiritual and angelic life, than to display, in all its actions, the smiling and joyous face of an angel. I never deem it a good sign when I see a novice who puts on the dismal air, and follows the phantasy of his young brain ; he should obey those who have charge of his conduct, and learn to be gay

* III. Part ix. 79. Art. I.

† Chronic. Centulensis, Lib. IV. cap. ii. apud Dacher. Spicileg. Tom IV. ‡ XVI.

§ II. Cap. xix. || Cicero. Tuscul. V. 39.

and joyous in God, during the time of honest and holy recreation. St. Francis recommended his brethren to have always a cheerful air, and never to give way to sadness, which is a murderer of the soul and body. In our seraphic order, numberless examples may be produced. It is said of St. Bonaventura, that he was cheerful and full of consolations for himself as well as for others, and that his address was so engaging, and his countenance so joyous, that he inspired every one with confidence to approach him, and that no one ever departed from him dissatisfied. God had implanted such a degree of love in the heart, and such sweetness on the tongue of this favored creature.”*

This is what that good father says ; but the same remark is suggested in almost every book which relates to ancient manners. Thus, the conversation of Madame de Chantal, the blessed foundress of the order of the Visitation, is described as being so cheerful and full of sweetness, that even people of the world were enchanted to find themselves in her company ;† and the Church reads in her office on the feast of St. Romuald, abbot of Camaldoli, that amidst all the penance, and austerity, and tears of that holy man, he used to be always so full of joy in countenance, that he made the beholders cheerful. Indeed, the spiritual writers generally agree with the opinion expressed by St. Theresa, that, in a vast majority of instances, melancholy is only the result of pride.

In the middle ages, a poem, or other book of religious instruction, was always called the joyous book. Thus the author of the Calendrier des Bergeres, which was printed in 1499, says,—

Hommes morts, qui desirez sçavoir
Comment on peut en ce monde bien vivre
Et mal laisser ; approchez, venez voir
Pour visiter ce present joieux livre
A tous estats bonne doctrine il livre.‡

In attempting now to trace the particular sources which were employed to produce this happy state of mind, and commencing with its lowest indications, as in this cheerfulness, freedom, and even playfulness of manner, to which there is such frequent allusion, it may be shown that here the immediate cause in operation was humility, and the total absence of all that stoical affectation of gravity, which loves to be distinguished from the vulgar, by its severe and unchanging tone. The gravest theologian would have agreed with Octavien de Saint-Gelais, where he says, in one of his poems,—

Bien licite est à l'homme humain
Après devote contemplation
Soy occuper à prendre soir et main,
Au monde aucune recreation.§

* Le sacré Mont d'Olivet, par F. Elzeare l'Archer. 276.

† Marsollier, Tom. II. 35.

‡ Gouget, Bibliothèque François, Tom. X. 200.

§ Gouget, Tom. X. 232.

Piety, in this sense, seemed to make old men young again, and to realize what is said in the Platonic dialogue of those whom Jupiter and Apollo love, that they never come to the threshold of old age. Humility is thus a source of joyful inspiration; it is humility which gives joy to youth, which makes it quick to learn and graceful to practise. Grown men are too proud to gather the sweet flowers of nature,—too proud to stoop for them. The proud are slaves to the tyranny of the world's opinion and the world's custom, and therefore can have no peace or joy within themselves; but, as Plato said, "The souls of those who imbibe the divine draught, like iron in the fire, are rendered soft, and as it were young again; so that they became plastic and docile as when they were young, under the hand of him that would now form them to goodness."*

Is it not admirable to observe how, in this instance, the reason of Plato agreed with the Divine wisdom, which declared that men must become like children, in order to obtain beatitude? Were examples to be produced of the gayety of men in these ages, so innocent and from the heart, there are formal pedants who would turn away in disdain; yet even the most refined taste need not prescribe silence on this head, for Virgil, in his heroic rhapsody, introduces the ludicrous misadventure of Menoetes and the laughter of the spectators, yet without loss of dignity and grace,† and real piety would assuredly take no offence. When Dante, who well understood its spirit, enters into conversation with Cacciagnida, upon subjects which had no connection with what is sacred, he only intimates the change by saying, that Beatrice, who represented heavenly wisdom, stood at a little distance,—

And Beatrice, that a little space
Was severed, smiled.‡

Our ancestors seem to have delighted in contrasts, in order to relieve, or, perhaps, rather to increase and deepen the solemnity of the august and awful objects with which they loved to be surrounded. The exterior of churches exhibited strange grotesque monsters, and even the borders of their books of hours were decorated with figures expressive of so playful and delicate an imagination, that one would have thought "not even the inward shaping of the brain had colors fine enough to trace such folds." From the brief but piercing glance which they cast upon nature, it seemed to them as if there could almost be detected something corresponding to this principle in the works of the Divine Architect; and even in their contemplation of the most solemn mysteries of faith, affecting and tremendous as they felt them to be, still they evinced a certain smiling astonishment, in looking into the skill that fashioned the events of this lower world, with such effectual working, and in beholding the triumph of the eternal counsels; there was with them, as with the spirits which Dante saw in Paradise, "mirth," or as it is expressed in the XXth Canto, "game-some mirth," not for the fault, which on these occasions did not come to mind, "but for the virtue, whose overruling sway and providence had wrought thus quaintly."* Moreover they delighted in poems and paintings, and eccentric fabling, which exhibited the human and sportive side of the gravest subject. Such was the Fabliau, entitled La Bataille de Charnage et de Carême, in which these ideal personages are represented as kings summoning their vassals, and engaging in dreadful combat. Carême, armed cap-à-pie, advances, riding on a mullet, carrying a cheese for his shield, his cuirass is a ray, his spurs are a fish bone, and his sword a broad sole; his munitions of war are peas, chestnuts, butter, cheese, milk, and dry fruits. Charnage has his helmet of a vast pâté of wild boar, with a peacock for his crest, a bird's bill serves him for spurs, and he rides on a stag, whose horns are loaded with larks. Carême is defeated, and only escapes on terms, that he is never to appear excepting during the forty days of Lent and two days every week, and thus Lent becomes vassal to Charnage. The scholastic mock procession of whipping out Lent may be remembered as another instance. Here the triumph consisted in one boy being able to tread upon the herring, which was dragged by the next who ran before him, who used, in turn, his efforts to save it.

* De Legibus, Lib. II.

† Lib. V. 180.

‡ Paradise, XVI.

Being void of all hypocrisy and conscious of innocence, the good men of these simple ages could enjoy a little playful raillery directed against themselves. Of this an instance may be witnessed in the Fabliau of the Battle of the Wines, in which one look from the chaplain was enough to disconcert those of Argence, Rennes, and Chambeli. Indeed, it is obvious, that the ludicrous pastimes of the Abbé de Malgouverne and the Abbot of Fools could be to none more amusing than to those who had been most thoroughly imbued with the love of order. From the same cause arose that distinctive feature of their conversation and writings; in one respect, full of meek reverence, and in another, fearless, and frank, and jocund, producing an effect which resembled more the Socratic irony than any thing which we can find amidst the universal chill of pedantry which prevails among the moderns; and an attentive analysis of its nature would of itself point out the source from whence it sprung. Horace speaks of irony as a declining to use one's strength, and an extenuation;"† it is an unwillingness to push the victory, and to show the immensity of one's possessions. Hence Aristotle says, that ironical persons are of more gracious manners than other men. Irony with him is in an ἐλλειψις, as opposed to the hyperbole and the μεσότης. It is a manner of understating what we believe, either from a profound sense of the inadequacy of language to express it, or from having so perfect a conviction of its truth, that we rest satisfied with our own interior conviction. Hence we see how naturally this style became characteristic of those who had the greatest faith, and who, in the spirit of humility, cherished the noblest sentiments; and that, on the other hand, the hyperbole, the style that is continually prolonged in tedious announcement of the immensity of one's conceptions, would have been significant of the very opposite character.

* Canto IX.

† Sat. I. 10, 13.

In allusion to the former, St. Theresa says, "The graces and light which the soul enjoys pass without noise, and in such great tranquillity, that it often reminds me of the construction of the temple which was built by Solomon without one blow of a hammer being heard."* This is not the case with the progress of those minds which are continually proclaiming their internal operations. Within those precincts, the noise of alteration and repair never ceases, but we should wait in vain with the hopes of seeing the temple. An instance illustrative of the two different styles of expression, may be shown from one of those romantic descriptions of ancient manners, in which Sir Walter Scott represents the pedantic puritan as shocked at the playful language of her prisoner, queen Mary, in speaking to her page and to her women. I allude to that passage where the poor queen, oppressed with the gloomy silence of the Lady of Lochleven, turning round to them, observes, "that if the latter should have adjusted her dress amiss, or if Roland Græme should have missed a wild duck on the wing, and broke a quarrel-pane of glass in the turret window, as chanced to him a week before, now was the time to think on their sins and to repent of them:" upon which the Lady of Lochleven, after assuring her that she speaks with all reverence, says, with great solemnity, "Madam, methinks your followers might find fitter subject for repentance than the trifles you mention, and so mention, once more, I crave your pardon, as if you jested with sin and repentance both." The language of Mary in this passage affords an example of the precise irony of which we speak, instances of which might even be produced from some of the most sublime writings of saints. The delightful account which St. Theresa gives of her various foundations in Spain, is not without them. Sir Thomas More continued his irony to the scaffold, and we are presented with the same character in the accounts which have reached us of the death of some of the first blessed martyrs.

Frederick Schlegel makes some beautiful observations on this subject: "We also find," he says, "in the classical works of antiquity, at a time when that depth of a loving sentiment was not so generally revealed, this same phenomenon amidst the highest spiritual clearness and serenity, in the most charming attire of exquisite language. I mean that characteristic irony which belonged to the discourses and instructions of Socrates, as exhibited in the Platonic writings. For what else is that scientific irony of thought, and of the highest knowledge in the Socratic or Platonic sense, but the secret contradiction of conscience and thought brought to a harmony, and become clear to the soul in its inmost striving after the highest object? I must here, however, observe that this word, in the modern usage, has sunk to a degree lower than its original meaning; insomuch, that it now only signifies common mockery," and certainly does not fulfil Aristotle's idea, when he says that it makes manners more gracious; "but in that original Socratic sense," continues Schlegel, "as it appears developed in the Platonic works, and in the whole of their inward structure, irony signifies nothing else but this astonishment of the thinking spirit at itself, which it expresses by a gentle laughter: but besides this deeply involved sense, this laughter of the spirit has also another still higher signification, that of the most exalted earnestness concealed under the smiling surface;"* an instance of which may be remembered in Livy, where he relates the reply of Hannibal to those who expressed their astonishment at his laughter, on beholding their despair for the calamity of their common country.

* The Castle of the Soul, VIIth Dwelling.

It may be remarked here, that Lactantius seems not to have understood the loving irony of Socrates, reproaching him for it harshly, as if he had been a mere buffoon.† Better informed or more judicious was the scholastic theologian of the middle ages, who says of Socrates, alluding to his irony, "that in this respect he was a dissembler, non solum absque vitio, sed etiam cum laude."‡ Indeed, this theologian has shown that there are various instances of its usage in the holy Scriptures.§ "True irony," says Frederick Schlegel, "is the irony of love. It arises out of the sentiment of a finite state, and of its own real limits, out of the visible contradiction between this sentiment and that feeling of eternity which is essentially included in true love."|| "How great," he says, "is the difference between the two kinds of irony in the conversational works of philosophy, between its mode and form in the Socratic school and in the writings of the moderns, where endless doubt in the highest extravagance of the sceptical sagacity, is held fast as the ultimate object, so that this cruel and bitter irony rests upon this general system of denial and negation, presenting such a contrast to that good-natured and loving irony of the Platonicians, inwardly associated with the highest inspiration for the divinity of truth, and become one with it, or at least inseparable from it, while it proceeds from the feeling of its own incapacity to comprehend and express in words the fulness of that divinity, as far as the soul is conscious of it."

These observations may be applied with the strictest truth to distinguish the joyous simplicity which characterized the lighter compositions of Christians, in ages of faith, from the heartless pleasantry of our more recent literature.

While we are tracing the development of the lowly principle in the diffusion of these minor graces, it may be well to remark the absence of that restless anxiety to be thought the constant and intimate associate of the great, which keeps so many proud minds in perpetual agitation. This wretched and deplorable weakness was counteracted by humility. There is a beautiful instance of the contrary spirit in one of the books of St. Theresa, where, endeavoring, to frame a comparison from things of earth to illustrate her heavenly theme, she says, "Imagine that you enter the cabinet of a great king filled with a number of rare and precious objects, and containing a number of mirrors, that can be all seen at one view, as it happened once

* Philosophie der Sprache.

† Lib. III. de Falsa Sapientia, Cap. xix.

‡ Melchior Canus de Loeis Theologicis, Lib. II. Cap. iv.

§ Ibid. Lib. II. Cap. ii.

|| Philosophie der Sprache, 63.

to me, when on my travels, obedience obliged me to visit the Duchess of Alba, and to remain with her for two days. I was surprised on beholding such a vast number of curiosities, and I am now very glad that I saw them, as it will serve me for the present subject." * Nothing is trifling which belongs to the possession of peace and simplicity, and few persons can have been so wanting in observation as not to be capable of feeling the charm of such a passage as this. But if humility could thus give to the conversation and external manners of men a cheerful smiling grace, which harmonized with a bright and innocent spirit, it was still more conducive to happiness, by delivering them from that ambition, more or less concealed, of being regarded as the most worthy and learned and skilful, which is so often the torment of ingenious but proud minds. What peace must have accompanied the genius of one who could leave such a sentence as this in the works which had secured immortal renown. St. Theresa writes as follows in the beginning of her Treatise on Prayer. "I do not see what I can add to what I have already written, and I fear lest what I shall now say, in obedience to the commands imposed upon me, will be only a tedious repetition—for I am like the birds that are taught to speak, and which, through want of sense, repeat always the same words. I cannot, without confusion and tears, think that I write for persons who are capable of giving me instruction; and herein I see clearly that it is the power of obedience which constrains me to write. God grant that you may derive utility from it: and I conjure you to beg of him to pardon the miserable creature who thus dares to undertake it."† A mind like this was not in danger of being disturbed by finding the productions of others preferred before its own. A great spiritual writer makes the following remarks, which will show not only what tranquillity belonged to the humble scholar, but also what facilities for advancement in every noble pursuit were imparted by poverty of spirit. "How many persons," he observes, "are deceived here! They will risk nothing for fear of losing the reputation they may have gained of ability and wisdom. Hence they renounce a thousand holy enterprises. They would rather do nothing all their life, than do moderately what they do: they abandon their labors lest they should labor without success! Whereas, they who are really humble, forgetting themselves, apply with diligence to many objects to which they may often feel their talents unequal—for they argue thus with their own minds, 'I shall at least gain humiliation, if I gain nothing else;' and in the end, God permits the very contrary; for while others languish in a criminal idleness, and after immense preparation remain in obscurity, these men, who seek humiliation, are crowned with success which they never contemplated."‡ Quinctilian counts it among the virtues of a grammarian, "aliqua nescire;"§ and our profound and feeling ancestors, in extending the confession to every science and branch of knowledge, as well as of moral discipline, with particular reference

* The Castle of the Soul, Vith Dwelling.

† The Castle of the Soul, Chap. i.

‡ Le P. Judde Œuvres Spirituelles, Tom. IV. p. 172.

§ Lib. I. 9.

to themselves individually, while they often verified the truth of what was said by the holy recluse, “Plus profecit in relinquendo omnia, quam in studendo subtilia,” were also delivered from many perturbations and miseries, which become the torment of those who seek to be noted in the annals of fame. Even the heathen Epictetus had prescribed something that resembled this exercise of humility: for his advice was thus expressed—“If any one should say to you, this man accuses you of such and such things, do not try to refute what is said, but answer, he is ignorant of my other vices, or he would not have confined his accusation of me to that point.”* This was cutting off vexation by the roots. “The humble,” says the holy recluse, “are in peace, because they stand in God, and not in the world and its opinion.” That the profession, or even the actual possession of a more exact knowledge, even of a multitude of those accessory reasons which may be drawn from the depths of philosophy in support of faith, would have contributed but little to their happiness, may be inferred from the indignant question of the poet in reference to the modern philosophers, who are conscious of no deficiency in science:—

———Shall men for whom our age
Unbaffled powers of vision hath prepared,
To explore the world without and world within,
Be joyless as the blind ?†

But who can describe that profound and calm felicity of a humble, passive spirit, which was able to draw refreshment and sublime inspiration from the very objects that pride would have converted into gall and bitterness! This was secured to men, in ages of faith, by the lessons of religion—for these proceeded at once effectually to extirpate all the roots of an unhappy life to their most minute fibres, by imparting that general temper and disposition which was exercised in receiving the gifts of God, whether conveyed in the way of instruction or of the divine mysteries, without cavil, criticism, or prejudice; and herein lay the great secret of attaining to that happiness which was first forfeited to the human race by the presumption that dared to question the will of its Creator. All graces and all beatitude were attached to this repose and humiliation of mind. Thus St. Bonaventura said—“Speak willingly of God, and willingly hear those who speak of him; but avoid all contestation on the subject, and hear peaceably whatever good thing is said, without opposing any thing of your own, and be not like those who are never content to hear without contradicting and disputing, from a fear lest they should be thought less knowing than those with whom they are.”‡ The same humility preserved men from being cast down by the sense of their own misery in the occasional experience of blasphemous fancies and thoughts, which they were told to chase away as flies, without even grieving for them; and in this manner there was peace to men of good will.

* Manuale, Cap. xxx.

† Wordsworth.

‡ De Reformat. Hominis Exter. Cap. xxx.

This was what Albertus Magnus recommended.* To the poor in spirit belonged a blessedness which flowed from a source that was pure and unfailing, because it did not consist in any proud possession of their own, but in the consciousness of their constant dependence upon God, and in keeping themselves "within the Divine will, by which their wills with his were one." St. Augustin asks, "What is it to be happy?" Many, he replies, have spoken much respecting it in many works; but what need have we to apply to many works and to many authors, when the holy Scripture tells us in two words, and with truth, that happy are the people who have the Lord for their God.† This fear, which made men submit to his sovereign authority corresponds to the first beatitude; for, as St. Augustin says, "Timor Dei congruit humilibus." God, as their King, made their law his will; "and in his will was their tranquillity." He was their fear and their love. "The earth," says the Père Judde, "is a paradise to whoever seeks only to please God; but, on the contrary, it is an anticipated hell to the man who rejects his invitations."‡ Of St. John, the precursor of our Lord, his holy mother said, that he rejoiced in gladness. "This," says Father Diego de Stella, "is the difference that exists between good and evil men's joys: these do joy in their vanities and the other do rejoice in a good conscience before God. This is the rejoicing of St. John in joy."§ Albert the Great makes divine reflections on this head. "Nothing," he says, "can be happier than to place all things in Him, in whom there is no deficiency. Therefore, with all study, diligence, and labor, simplify your heart, that you may be converted from phantasms, immovable and tranquil, and that you may stand always within yourself in the Lord, as if your soul were in that now of eternity, that is, of divinity. If you continually and truly revolve these things within your mind, they will confer more upon you towards a happy life than all riches, delights, honors, nay, and besides, than all the wisdom and knowledge of this deceitful life and corruptible world, even though in these things you were to excel all the men that ever existed."|| St. Augustin, speaking of men converted to God, says that they lose the things which they loved before; "et donec fiat in illis amor aeternorum non nulla molestia sauciantur."¶ But where that love enters, the loss is remembered with additional joy and thankfulness; for in order to approach their primal source, it was necessary that they should part with the weights with which other men do vainly load their feet, toiling in hopes of happiness, which even the wise ancients knew could never be derived from such things: as Cicero, when he says of Antony, "he was happy, if there can be any happiness in such a mind." They had thought to find peace and gladness in the love of creatures; and in them even Cicero could exclaim, "O how many and how bitter are the roots of sorrow."†† And now from these they are delivered by embracing poverty of spirit, which expects and finds

* De adhærendo Deo, Cap. ii.

† Epist. ad Prob.

‡ Retraite Spirituelle, I.

§ On the Contempt of the World, I. 116.

|| De adhærendo Deo, Cap. v.

¶ Lib. I. de Serm. Dom. in Monte.

 Phil. 11.

†† Tuscul. Lib. III. 83.

light out of darkness, and, amidst privation, food on which they live, and never know satiety. That joy which might spring from natural sources, was exalted and secured to them by being sanctified; for they learned to offer the expansion of their hearts to God as well as to their earthly friend, and they looked up to him in their mirth and playful hours, as well as in times of serious meditation; for even in the lowest things they saw, as Dante says,

—— The printed steps
Of that eternal worth, which is the end
Whither the line is drawn.*

In this respect the Church had taught them very differently from what is held by some writers of systems in our age; for even an acquaintance with her ritual had imparted that benignity which Cardina Bona describes as being “a certain sweetness of mind, excluding all anger, envy, and malice, dressing the whole soul to benevolence, tolerance, and internal joy.”† The office for lauds breathes joy and humanity, expansion of heart, and the simplicity of innocence. At the view of its gracious forms one is tempted to ask “quæ est ista quæ progreditur quasi Aurora consurgens?”‡ To the humble, again, belonged the happiness resulting from that rule of faith which they received with such gratitude from the Church of God; and “it is a pleasure incomparable,” as a great English philosopher says, “for the mind of man to be settled, landed, and fortified in the certainty of truth.” All other blissful gifts fall short in comparison of this, which is no sooner received than the soul finds rest and joy in the tabernacle of the living God, and like the dove which Noah let fly from the ark after the deluge to see if it had subsided, she brings back a branch of olive to signify that she has found some firm ground amidst the waves and tempests of the world.

Theirs was also in an eminent degree that delight of communion which is not weakened by the number of the happy to which Dante alludes in the lines.

O man! why place thy heart where there doth need Exclusion of participants in good!

St. Bernard applies to the proud the prophecy, “Erraverunt in solitudine in iniquosa;—for the proud,” says he, “wander in solitude because they wish to be alone and singular in all things, to be either more noble, or more prudent, or more learned or better than all others. Such was the Pharisee, Deus, gratias ago tibi, quia non sum sicut cæteri hominum.” St. Bernard adds, “gratias agit, non quia bonus, sed quia solus.” O, how unlike the mind of those who are children of the first beatitude. “To cast it to the dogs! What a humiliating comparison!” Yet the woman of Cana was touched by it. “True Lord!” she replied; she was a Pagan, and she humbled herself; she was a Pagan, and through poverty of spirit, resigning all the prejudices of her nation and family, she procured for herself the riches of Divine peace.

* Parad. I.

† De Divina Psalmodia, 301.

‡ Cant. VI. 9.

St. Theresa, in relating the foundation of the monastery of Carmelites, at Alba of Tormez, mentions that the father and mother of the foundress, Theresa of Lays, being of a very ancient nobility but not rich, had taken up their residence in the village of Tordilla, which is two leagues distant from Alba, upon which she makes this observation, "I cannot, without compassion, remark how great is that vanity which rather than stoop to the least thing from what it names honor, can induce persons to retire thus to places where they are deprived of the instructions which may contribute to their salvation." Such a life was then uncommon; for humility caused men to avail themselves of the numerous and gracious provisions which the Church had made for the edification and happiness of her children: and of this we may still witness proofs in the situation of the ancient houses of the nobility, which are seldom far distant from the places of greatest devotional attraction. It is not only, however, in order to partake of the great and supernatural consolations derived from the ineffable mysteries of the Catholic Church that such a spirit is absolutely indispensable; but it may be said in general, that all the natural rewards of virtue are the fruit of a disposition which approaches to that Christian humbleness or poverty of spirit which submits to the discipline of virtue with a cheerful and child-like obedience.

This seems to have been present to the mind of Socrates when he said, "It is necessary to understand that in each of us there are two ruling and leading ideas, one or other of which we follow, the one a desire of pleasure, the other an implanted sentiment, desiring whatever is best. There are times when these two agree in harmony, and times when they are in opposition to each other, and at mutual war; one time this conquers, and at another that: when the sentiment which desires whatever is best gains the ascendancy, then temperance rules; but when we are ruled by the desire which irrationally draws us on to pleasure, then follows the reign of insult, and insult has many names, for it has many members and many forms."* Then, as Drexelius says, "even cupidities themselves are clamorous against each other, and opposed in combat: and there are continually in the mind, as if legions and armies of foul and bitter thoughts."† This answers to the condition of the proud, whereas the state of harmony corresponds with what St. Bonaventura describes, saying, "all that the soul of man can desire must have relation to these three things, either to what we believe is agreeable, or to what we think honorable, or to what we suppose is useful, and all these characters of good are found united only in spiritual delights,"‡ which belong only to the humble. To the same effect speaks a modern philosopher, who in his last work, written but a short time before his death, seems to have expressed the sentiments of a Catholic Christian, "The divine origin of our religion," he says, "is marked no less by its history than its harmony with the principles of our nature. Obedience to its precepts not only prepares for a better state of existence in another world, but is likewise calculated to make us happy here. We are constantly taught to renounce sensual pleasure and selfish gratification, to forget our body and sensible organs, to associate our pleasures with mind, and to fix our affections upon the great ideal generalization of intelligence in the one Supreme Being."* In this passage the philosopher does but express in modern phrase the sum of what was taught by the ascetical writers of the middle age, respecting the prominent part which humility, obedience, and self-renouncement should play in the operations of religion. But the effects of such a disposition of the soul become still more apparent as we ascend the scale of felicity, and endeavor to trace the causes and operation of those extraordinary raptures which refreshed and animated the holy men of these faithful ages. "God," said they, "ordains that our hopes should arise from our very poverty and weakness; as the Church sings on the eve of St. John, Ex utero senectutis et sterili Johannes natus est præcursor Domini." The prophecy which said "thy light shall arise in darkness,"† was fulfilled in their souls; and, as brother Elzeare l'Archer observed, in allusion to its lustre, "the stars never appear brighter than in the middle of the darkest night." Assuredly what during these intervals they saw, as Dante says,

* Plato, Phædrus.

† De Conformitate, &c. Lib. III. 2.

‡ De Sept. Grad. Vit. Spiritual. Cap. lxxv.

Was not for words to speak, nor memory's self
To stand against such outrage on her skill.

But, on the other hand, they felt the necessity of ordaining that these raptures of devotion should be of short duration, "because," said St. Macaire, the Egyptian, "if man were to remain continually in them, he could no longer discharge the ministry of the Word nor accomplish his other duties, nor hear the Word of God, nor even attend when it would be indispensable to his own conservation. It would be necessary for him to remain seated in some retired spot where he would have no other occupation but to taste the sweetness of these transports. Therefore God has not wished that this high degree of perfection should be more frequent, in order that man might accomplish his duties and his destinies on the earth."‡ Not merely was poverty of spirit conversant with these happy intervals, but it taught men to appreciate the advantages of being left without them, and even the danger of desiring to enjoy them. "O humility, humility," cries St. Theresa, "I can never believe that they possess thee who seek consolations and raptures in prayer."§ Here it is impossible not to be struck with the wide distinction between the minds of men in the ages of faith and that of those modern professors of piety who seem to consider as an undisputed point that it consists in the ardent desire of spiritual enjoyment and in the horror of all interior pain

* Sir Humphrey Davy, the Last Days of a Philosopher, 218. † Isaiah lviii. ‡ Hom. VIII.
§ The Castle of the Soul, Chap. i.

and of all poverty of spirit, not in the renouncement of private possessions, but in what the blessed John of the Cross calls "spiritual gluttony,"* being desirous rather of their interior pleasures than of purity of heart and true devotion; or, as the holy recluse of the thirteenth century says, "following Jesus to the breaking of the bread but not to drinking the cup of his passion." "Whereas true piety," says John of the Cross, "seeks what is insipid, suffering deprivation of all things for the love of God, dryness and affliction. For to seek only consolations and interior transports is to seek one's self and not Jesus Christ. It is the will of God that the faithful soul should experience intervals of dereliction, that it should suffer these interior desolations which, so far from being contrary, are favorable to perfection, when endured with the Catholic spirit of sacrifice. Our Saviour was deprived of all interior consolations when he spoke those affecting words. I wish, therefore, to persuade those who apply to the interior life, that the ways which conduct us to God, do not consist in our feeling great transports, but in renouncing ourselves, and being ready to take from God's hands both dereliction and joy."†

St. Bonaventura, speaking of the two descriptions of men, those whom grace comes to meet, inflaming their will with fervor, and crowning them with constant peace and joy, and those who are left without sensible consolations, though ever ready to say with the prophet, "Lord, my soul desires nothing but to be inflamed with the love of thy law," observing, that the former are more happy than the latter, adds, "Who can decide which has the most merit? Both may arrive at the highest point of perfection; only let the latter beware how they murmur in passing the desert of this life."‡ At the transfiguration, Peter, James, and John, were admitted, to behold Christ, but Andrew was excluded. So again at the reviving of the daughter of the ruler of the synagogue, these three were let in, and Andrew shut out. Lastly, in the agony, the aforesaid three were called to be witness thereof, and still Andrew left behind. Yet he was St. Peter's brother, and an apostle. Fuller, who makes the remark, confesses, in his quaint, profane style, that he seems more offended at this than Andrew himself was, whom he finds to express no discontent. In the trials of the spiritual life, such ordinations have a specific end. Thus we read of the internal agitations of St. Theresa, in that cruel moment when she was constrained by her director, fearing the scandal and calumnies of the world, to refrain from those pious exercises which had become her only joy, after generously sacrificing to God all that had been dear to her, at the moment when Jesus Christ, to reward such efforts, allowed her to experience the most lively transports in the operations of grace, she was obliged to renounce them, and thus was left between heaven and earth, without an object, and without support, the most sensible, and the most tender heart that ever existed.§ St. Bonaventura, however, says, "The state of apparent dereliction, in which the soul

* The Ascent of Mount Carmel, Lib. II. c. vii.

† B. John of the Cross, Ascent of Mount Carmel, II. 7.

‡ De Reformat. Hom. exter.

§ Villefore, Vie de S. T. Tom. I. p. 80.

is left without spiritual refreshment, is highly useful, in order that our faith may rest more upon the authority of the holy Scriptures, than upon our own experience; and thus our faith has more merit, and hope becomes more illustrious.”* “When the soul experiences these extraordinary operations,” says John of the Cross, “it often conceives a secret self-esteem, and imagines that it has already some merit before God. Such is the fruit of these sensible delights, which are supposed to be spiritual.”† “Quid præclarior est quam vera spiritualis paupertas? atqui cum ea vobis proponitur, nolumus eam.”‡ We must have interior consolations! Coming like Hercules to the temple, and growing impatient and furious because we do not receive an instant answer from heaven;§ because we are not immediately exalted to that state of animal enthusiasm which we mistake for piety. Thus the moderns turn away from the assemblies of the faithful as if never satisfied, according to the confession of a celebrated German philosopher, who speaks of his having entered a Catholic church. The reason is obvious. It is because the passions, the movement of which they mistake for zeal, are not excited; it is because there is nothing to nourish the secret pride, which is the atmosphere essential to the continued existence of that species of piety so falsely deemed spiritual, merely because it has no influence upon the conduct of life; it is because, on the contrary, there is every thing to humble them, and to remind them of their own nothingness, and to mortify vanities and impatience. The blessed John of the Cross makes sublime reflections on this head in his book on the obscure Night of the Soul. “God often refuses,” he says, “this taste of sweetness, in order that the soul may regard him more purely with the eyes of faith. Men wish to feel God, and to taste him in the participation of the holy mysteries, and in other spiritual exercises, as if he were capable of being taken and touched in a material and sensible manner. All that is certainly very imperfect, and opposed to the nature and perfections of God, who demands from us a very simple and pure faith.—They follow the same method in prayer—thinking that, to be good, it ought to inundate the heart with a flood of sensible consolations. Accordingly, they fatigue their imagination and weary their head, to obtain these interior delights; and because they do not succeed, they are in trouble, and they think that they have lost their time. Thus they lose true devotion, which consists in perseverance in prayer, in humility, in distrust of self, and in the sole desire of pleasing God. Such souls have great need of passing through the obscure night of the soul, in which it is stript of every possession.” At present, as St. Louis de Blois says, “even when they appear to serve God, it is only their internal consolations that they seek: they serve themselves: and thus in every thing, and at all times, they prefer their own will to that of God. They make holiness consist in the sweetness of their consolations, rather than in the mortification of the senses and the

* De Sept. Grad. Vit. Spiritual. Cap. V.

† Theologia Germanica, Cap. x.

‡ The Ascent of Mount Carmel, II. xi.

§ Pausanias, Cap. xiii.

destruction of vice. Whereas, these sensible tastes are often nothing more than the simple movements of nature, and far from being really a true spiritual affliction ; they produce a secret pride, a self-satisfaction, and a fatal security, a disposition also to judge others, and to believe themselves holy : they are pursued exactly as any other terrestrial pleasure, and they pass with them. Thus vanish away in their own thoughts those who seek sensible graces rather than the Author of grace.”* In another book he speaks as follows. “Some imagine themselves lost when they are deprived of sensible consolations, and when they are restored to them, they fancy themselves to be saints : but herein they deceive themselves—for dryness of heart is often better for man than sweet refreshment. Sweetness is sometimes granted to those who, living ill, are far separated from God ; and therefore it is no infallible index of sanctity. It is even an imperfection to pray for it—for the gifts of God are not God himself—and therefore we must not rest in them. We should be willing to be led through the shadow of death, and the darkness even of hell, not alarmed at being deprived of the sweets of sensible devotion, but only anxious to be always united to God with an intellectual love, and a right will, and finding in his good pleasure our supreme consolation.”† All this is expressed by Dante in a most sublime figure, where he represents Beatrice at first smiling upon him, and casting forth beams from her celestial eyes ; but when he ascends with her to the seventh heaven, where are the souls of those who had passed their life in holy retirement and contemplation, his near approach to the perfection of that splendor is indicated by relating that Beatrice then wore no smile, and that all was silent : and when he humbly asks the reason,—

Mortal art thou in hearing as in sight,
Was the reply. And what forbade the smile
Of Beatrice, interrupts our song.‡

Either would have overcome him ; but still the ascent to that perfect state was accompanied with a diminution of sensible delight.

This may seem to have been a long digression ; but it was very important to mark the doctrine on this point of the ages of faith, because, as we shall have occasion hereafter to observe, it will account for a number of characteristic traits in ancient institutions and rules of life, which have been lost and reversed in later times, and which are even an offence to the followers of the new religions ; if, indeed, any thing be new which relates to the errors of men.

It remains, in the last place, to speak of the consolations belonging to the poor in spirit, which more immediately had regard to the sorrows and calamities of life. “Pauper et humilis spiritu, in multitudine pacis conversantur,” says the holy recluse. It is a trite sentence in the schools, “Nulla regula sine exceptione ;” but the rule of submitting humbly to the divine will, which opened a source of

* Guide Spirituelle, Chap. ii.

† Louis de Blois, Institution Spirituelle, Chap. vii.

‡ Par. XXI.

unfailing tranquillity, was known to be without any exception. St. Bernard comments upon this truth, and says, "Hear the man whom God found to be after his own heart." Paratum cor meum, Deus," he says, "paratum cor meum :" prepared for adversity, prepared for prosperity, prepared for being humbled, prepared for being exalted, prepared for all things that thou prescribest. Dost thou wish to make me a herd of sheep? Dost thou wish to constitute me a king over the people? Patarum cor meum, Deus, paratum cor meum. Lo, I am ready—let him do with me according to his good pleasure. Admirable was this abdication of his own will. For what, if God should say, 'I do not wish that you should be a king, I do not wish that you should live.' 'I am ready,' replies David: if God should say, 'I wish you to be a second time an exile, a second time a fugitive, and to have a most wicked son, who will seek both the crown and the life of his father.' 'Yet still, I am ready,' cries David. If God command, saying, 'I wish you to be again in the dens of wild beasts, again to live by begging alms, and daily to incur danger of death,'—'Nevertheless, I am ready,' says David. If God should say, 'I wish instead of consolations, that you should be cut off from all that were subject and dear to you, to be sought after in order to be stoned, to be devoted to all dire calamities,'—'Yet I do not decline this,' says David. Dominus faciat quod bonum est coram se." So ready was he to sacrifice freedom, children, riches, kingdom, and even life, rather than not please God, rather than not say, "Paratum cor meum, Deus, paratum cor meum."*

Hieremias Drexelius, the Jesuit, wrote a divine book, never to be sufficiently praised, entitled, "De Conformitate Humanæ Voluntatis cum Divinâ," which will explain the consolations in affliction, which belong to the poor in spirit, in the present world of trial. The philosopher whose work, as being written with the sentiments of a Catholic, has been already quoted, had evidently made this discovery for himself, and probably was indebted for it to his residence in that capital of the Christian world, whose stores of learning and sacred wisdom are seldom lost upon men of noble capacity. "Religion," he says, "has always the same beneficial influence on the mind. In youth, in health, and prosperity, it awakens feelings of gratitude and sublime love, and purifies at the same time that it exalts; but it is in misfortune, in sickness, in age, that its effects are most truly and beneficially felt, when submission in faith, and humble trust in the Divine will, from duties become pleasures, undecaying sources of consolation: then it creates powers which were believed to be extinct, and gives a freshness to the mind, which was supposed to have passed away for ever, but which is now renovated as an immortal hope." To which sudden and mysterious change, if it were allowable to compare things divine with human, we might say that some weak resemblance can be traced in the mere natural feelings which many persons must have experienced, when, in days of heaviness and desertion, in the dark and cheerless sky of winter, the eye, at eve or morning, discovered some fair and lovely tint painted in an adverse cloud,—some sweet or glorious lustre appearing faintly beyond it, and instantly the mind remembered some trait or feeling of happy days gone by,—some aspiration of youth,—some rapture of friendship,—some sweet fancy of innocence and memory was changed into hope, and the heart seemed relieved from some long oppressive load, which had sunk it down, and the face was once more lighted up with a smile of joy. But it is time to close this first retrospect, whose humble theme relates to the ways and thoughts of the spiritually poor. It only remains to observe in conclusion, that to this poverty of spirit were obliged to come in search of content and peace' not merely the saintly men, whose desires from the first aimed at perfection, but even these mighty heroes, who had wrought so many a deed to merit earthly glory, and, as Homer says, inextinguishable fame. To them, at length, seemed especially to sound the words—"Aufer cydarem, tolle coronam, sede in pulvere."* And it was not for those who had already felt the bitterness of pride to remain deaf to the voice which breaks the cedars. Behold, then, the knightly limbs prostrate, the swords, the crowns, and banners laid at the steps of the altar. No more haughty state, no more esteem of themselves, no more desire of honor. What ! and did these design at last to approach the mountain ? Did they discover too, that their happiness was there ? Yes, and with the deeper sense of conviction, as they had so long tasted by experience the reverse ; for, "all our peace in this miserable life is derived rather from suffering humbly, than from not experiencing contrary things," and this remark of the holy recluse is peculiarly true of men who possess the most delicate and susceptible minds. It is only in poverty of spirit that they can find support against the scorns and ills of life, and rest for their wishes. Without that rest to visit in time their afflicted hearts, shattered by the world's tempests, they must succumb amidst unutterable and incurable woe, a sorrow that is irresistible, and even, as Homer truly says, deathless. Well does the poet represent them, in describing Tasso :—

*Serm. III. de Resur. Dom.

——— from my very birth
 My soul was drunk with love, which did pervade
 And mingle with whate'er I saw on earth ;
 Of objects all inanimate I made
 Idols, and out of wild and lonely flowers,
 And rocks, whereby they grew, a paradise,
 Where I did lay me down, within the shade
 Of waving trees, and dreamed uncounted hours ;
 Though I was chid for wandering, and the wise
 Shook their white aged heads o'er me, and said,
 Of such materials wretched men were made,
 And such a truant boy would end in woe,
 And that the only lesson was a blow.†

They judged rightly ; for they took not into account the resources of faith, and

* Ezek. xxi. 26. and Isa. xlvii. 1.

† Byron, Lament. of Tasso.

they saw that, in a world of incurable disorder, so intense a love of what is beautiful and perfect, must needs of natural necessity bring with it disappointment and the keen bitter sense of discord, and the cruel pangs of having to witness, and perhaps endure the triumph of injustice and wrong. Had they, indeed, looked upwards and conceived the charm of that substance of things not seen; had they remembered the offers of eternal truth, to give rest to the wearied spirits that would follow him who was meek and lowly of heart, that end of woe would not have seemed inevitably awaiting the object of their solicitude. For oh! what a balm has the Catholic religion provided for these eagle spirits, when confined in the net of earthly calamity! Its effects may be witnessed by referring to the words which the same poet ascribes to Tasso, where he represents him afterwards in the dungeon, saying,—

I once was quick in feeling,—that is o'er;
My scars are callous, or I should have dashed
My brain against these bars, as the sun flashed
In mockery through them.

He once was quick in feeling. How much is expressed in these few words! Could we behold a heart thus delicate and susceptible, Ah me! what wounds would it display, recent and old, as if inflicted by those flames which had already begun to prey upon it; tormented as if by demons, whose instruments are every brief and vile contingency! But he adds, “that is over.” In fact, all is changed, all is reversed: he is no longer what he was. No one can now tear the impatient answer from his tongue, no indication of neglect, no cruel injustice, no merciless wrong, can any more trouble that heart; for it has found rest and peace unutterable, peace everlasting. That rest has been found by entering upon the way of the holy cross; he has been taught how to endure, how to sanctify sorrow. Objects have been made familiar to him, before which he loves to kneel and weep in lonely reverence. The passion of his Saviour, the crown of thorns, the drink of vinegar, and gall,—these have taught him what he could never have gained from all the consolations of philosophy,—these

Have from the sea of ill-love saved his bark,
And on the coast secured it of the right;

teaching him to estimate the value of being condemned to suffer bitterness, and yielding him in return, for that proud and lofty spirit which he renounced, the power of preserving his peace while beholding man's unkindness; the power of reducing to a sweet calm that once restless and troubled sea of the heart, swollen and agitated with a thousand passions; nay, even the faculty of converting pain and misfortune, and the dire events of a calamitous life, into images of quiet beauty, on which the memory and imagination may dwell, almost with a poetic fondness; for now he can say with Love-lace, that

Stone walls do not a prison make,
 Nor iron bars a cage,
 Minds innocent and quiet take
 That for a hermitage :

or apply to himself what Richard Plantagenet says of Mortimer :—

In prison hast thou spent a pilgrimage,
 And like a hermit overpass'd thy days.*

Who would exchange this privilege, which requires nothing from those who desire to possess it, but a humble and patient spirit, for the anguish and disappointments that inevitably await the proud, who disdain to suffer, still impenitent though scourged? Who would barter it for those intellectual acquirements which only aggravate the distress of their self-tormented possessors, whom we behold so often like the spirits in Dante, which “hung on the wild thorn of the wretched shade?” Who would not wish to have known, from the first moment of life, this great divine secret, proclaimed, indeed, from the Mount, and yet to many still a hidden mystery? Then youth would have been gentle as the breath of spring, and age as gifted as the sweet luxuriant season when the powers of nature exhale a living balm for every sense; then, as each one proud follower of earthly glory might exclaim with Dante,

Devoutly joy ineffable as these,
 Had from the first, and long time since been mine.†

SUCH then was the character of ages of faith in the middle time of history, with regard to the disposition proposed in the first of these divine sentences from the Mount, which teach the means of attaining to celestial beatitude. The examples which have been given are drawn from histories and other works which date from that period, and the reflections and comments, which express the belief and sentiment, are, for the most part, either those of authors, whose writings were received as law from a more remote antiquity, or those of men who lived during the time, and who are known to have exerted a most extensive influence in directing the thoughts and conduct, not only of men individually, but even of entire nations: or, in fine, they have been drawn from the verses of that great Christian poet of the middle ages, whose mind was so thoroughly imbued with the theology of the school, and with the sentiments that prevailed among all ranks of the people, and who is always so precise and accurate in his expressions of them, that wherever the peculiar prejudices of an unhappy political party do not break out, his

* Hen. VI. I. ii. 5.

† Purg. XXIX

sublime and wondrous creation may be received in one sense as a view of the intellectual condition of mankind during the period in which he lived ; and here the genius of Cary had facilitated the task by supplying me with thoughts already clothed in the English tongue as nearly as possible as they had been first conceived in the mind of the great master of mysterious song, who is assuredly not more admirable as a poet than as a kind of divine instructor to repeat the eternal truths of revelation to the forgetful and thoughtless race of men. These passages might have been multiplied to almost any limits, but to serve the purpose of a general outline, intended rather to suggest than to develope the meditations of others, there has been enough already offered, in giving the more important among the forms into which the leading principle was found to pass. In the ensuing books the reader will often have occasion to recur to what has been proposed in this place, in order to attain to a more clear conception of the subject on which he will then be occupied, and in like manner the subjects to be hereafter considered will continue still farther to illustrate and confirm the view which has been taken of the spirit and manners of Christian antiquity : so that I would recommend the postponement of objections until all has been seen : for the grace of the eighth division has something common in general, but specifically different for each beatitude ; and, in fact, they are all so closely interwoven, that each must necessarily involve something which might have found admission, perhaps, with equal justice, under a different head ; but it will be sufficient for all purpose of arrangement, if we keep the great leading features of each distinct within its proper and immediate limits. Therefore, without employing myself on every occasion to meet objections, and anticipate their solution, I shall continue to sit a silent spectator of the representation before us, and wait until the personages shall speak for themselves. The first development of the one original principle which has been proposed in an eight-fold division, has necessarily been less conversant with facts and the positive side of things, since its consequences, as its essence, were primarily and professedly spiritual, or at least foreign from our present conception of the material works of the mighty Creator of the universal frame, and wholly without the sphere of those tangible objects, which have been hitherto submitted to the perceptions of man ; but in what is to come there will be occasion to approach much nearer to the present external and material world, for the development can only be attained by an exhibition of the impress made upon this earth, in the forms, manners, and institutions of society.

For the present, I must pause with an internal conviction that those whom I undertook to lead through this retrospect of past times, will have reason to repent their having consented to follow me ; they must feel wearied and disappointed ; but as the rude peasant who guides the pilgrim ventures at times to promise shortly a less steep and slippery path, so I presume to suggest here, that the ensuing books hold out a prospect less discouraging to one who has already had such experience of the weakness and incapacity of the stranger, who with no other recommendation but a good and cheerful will, has offered to lead him through these high mysterious regions ; for besides that there will be so many material objects on every side to lay hold on, and grapple with, which will therefore render less necessary the qualifications of a spiritual order to which we can lay no claim, the view must be felt to possess more, perhaps, of a human interest, and almost one which is present and personal to us all in these times, when we behold the work of general destruction so fast proceeding under pretence of that new religious and revolutionary principle of reducing all things to what is supposed to be spirituality, though, in fact, it is synonymous with annihilation ; the principle which rests on the idea that there is nothing pure and divine but what is ἀσωματῶτατον, to use the expression of Aristotle ;* that, be it remembered, which was the great instrument in the hands of the ignorant innovators of the sixteenth century, and which seems to be prepared in the wise dispensation of the Supreme Ruler, as the grand solvent to be employed by their worthy, but far more acute successors in removing every thing which had been created by religion in ages of faith for the use and enjoyment of men, churches and states, cathedrals and abbeys, colleges, and institutions of mercy for the poor, thrones, degrees, and privileges, wisely and admirably contrived for the common benefit, sublime and joyous ceremonies to be interwoven with the whole order of social life, and the application of earthly and visible objects to promote spiritual and eternal good. However, although in what is now past, there may have been but little that was tangible to excite the attention of those who love curious research, still it may be conceived that there was a certain degree of interest even amidst a mere didactic exposition of doctrines and sentiments, which is not wholly without the province of those who contemplate the history of these ages of the race of men ; for the facts and events which mark the different stages of the human course are intimately connected with the spirit, and, as it were, the system of philosophy of each period, and it is impossible to estimate these without taking a review of the doctrines publicly and generally taught, which can only be known by simply and patiently listening to what we find was delivered. In conclusion, we may be allowed to anticipate a reflection which will subsequently be often suggested, and to observe even from the little progress we have already made, how groundless is the surprise expressed by those, loving the ages of Christian antiquity, when they find them now by proud unbelieving men in such wondrous sort despised. The law of the mortal world, we know, cannot be arrested, but fulfils itself without regard to any one's wishes. Human honor is yielded only to those who court it by corresponding thoughts and actions, and the world will love its own, and that exclusively. How, then, is it possible that it should admire and reward, with the vain honors of its applause, these simple and strangely super-human ages, when nothing was written or done for glory, but all in hopes of an invisible good, and of a future eternal recompense? To the eye of a proud earthly philosophy, there was nothing worthy of being described in elaborate histories, nothing to point the sentence of a splendid rhetoric, nothing to make men feel higher in their own esteem, or to support any of the inventions by which so many at present hope to extinguish for ever the torch of faith, and almost to dethrone the Almighty, as far as respects his government, of that earth which he gave to the children of men. For if there was grandeur in these ages too evident to be contested, and greatness more than human to which the most sublime geniuses that ever moved in the intellectual system of man have paid homage, it was accompanied with such manifestations of the lowly idea, often to the eye of sense so trivial and ignoble in the form of its development, such symbols of humbleness and poverty of spirit, that independent of all ulterior designs of opposition, the sentiments of mere animal men are necessarily shocked rather than elevated at the remembrance; and the real glory—the glory worthy of an immortal being, created only to love and to adore—is overlooked in the humiliation of the cross. They who now profess such a regard for the appearance of material consistency under every circumstance, are highly offended at the contrasts presented in the institutions, manners, and character of the middle ages; but it should be remembered, that to them also the question of St. Fulgentius, which the Church reads in her office, would be a scandal if some of them were not themselves the type of inconsistency. “Quis est iste Rex Judæorum?” asks that holy bishop. “Pauper et dives, humilis et sublimis, qui portatur ut parvulus, adoratur ut Deus.” So was it with these ages in conformity to their divine model; they were at the same time poor and rich, humble and sublime; below the standard of human glory, and marvellous in the manifestations of the power and majesty of God. As St. Leo says of the great mystery from which their whole spirit and form emanated, “they were in such a manner tempered, that all humility was comprised in their majesty, and all majesty in their humility.” But in the prevalence of the judgment which now condemns them, there is assuredly nothing that ought to seem strange to those who have attained to a real knowledge of their character. So far from it, if the case were otherwise, if it were taught that these were annals, the study of which would furnish ambitious men with the science of the world, and the multiplied arts of glory, they might reasonably fear that their whole view of the history of these ages had been mistaken; for it is not within the mortal power to ordain against the law of highest God, that the heavenly crown should be reserved for those to whom the world has adjudged its own, and who by loftiness of spirit have secured a present recompense of gratitude and fame. Ages of faith are stigmatized as a period of darkness and barbarism; no sign of hate is unemployed by those who mention them; they are spoken of as presenting nothing but an universal blank, cheerless, disgraceful; but it is either by men illiterate, who let out their ears for hire to declaiming sophists who adopt the strain of ridicule, chiefly because it is the easiest process to win the character of being acute and judicious, or fanatical who merely repeat one after another, though, indeed, with all the sincerity of their hearts, what they have been told by founders and propagators of sects who sought to justify their schism, by publishing abuse and scandal, or else it is by men of higher capacities, but who still to lowliness have been willing strangers, persons evidently under the domination of the world, and of the philosophy which soars not above its brief contingencies ; or else, what ought not to be forgotten, or spoken of in palliative terms, it is by men bound together in secret league against whatever is holy, whatever is divine, speaking in the language of that city which has so thriven in the warfare which the tongue dreads to designate, that we might almost apply to it the fearful words of the great poet, and say, that its name spreads over hell ; men of undisguised impiety, guilty souls, that, if they change not, in the fire, must vanish. These are the teachers, who, from different motives, all agree in affirming that ages of faith were ages of folly, that piety was superstition, that contemplation was idleness, that humility was the extreme of degradation, that the world was in darkness, until the rise of modern philosophy, or as one who has written on the life of Philip Augustus says, "that heresy must be considered as the first cause of the march of the human mind."*

*De Anima A.

And are humble Christians to be deceived by such clamors as these ? Are the bold assertions of such men to prevent the memory of the just from being in eternal remembrance ? When this cry of darkness is not too artless to merit reflection, ought it not rather, on any point, to lead the faithful to suspect the existence of spiritual light ? And where it may so easily be confronted, as in this instance, with the unquestionable evidence of ancient writers, whom we can behold teaching and acting without any regard to what judgment posterity would form of them, ought it not to be received as the unsuspicious testimony of enemies of the consoling truth of the existence, during that long period, of a race of men eminently Christian, eminently deserving of the scorn and hatred of the enemies of the cross and grace of Christ ; who, as true pilgrims and strangers on the earth, took no thought for leaving on it trophies of glory behind them, but only passed humbly on, as if in a solemn and continued procession, supporting and encouraging each other to persevere in following the royal road of the holy cross through a world which was not their home, through a world which they looked upon as a vale of tears, through a world which always stood aloof when it did not persecute, only scowling upon them in disdain and hatred, in the hopes of being able to reach in safety the portals of the celestial city, those gates through which had passed the King of Glory, and which were again to open, only to admit the humble and the poor ? It will be time enough to prepare for joining in the accusations against them, when we shall find these supported by persons who unite in themselves the learning requisite to conduct an historical enquiry with the spirit and the sentiment, which are no less requisite to enable them to estimate

* Tom. II. p. 278.

rightly the result, and to know what they have really found—for it is not assuredly men who have relapsed to a heathen philosophy, who can respect or even comprehend, amidst the various institutions and manners of past ages, the humility of those who followed Christ. Meanwhile we are fully warranted in concluding from the whole, that these ages were, in an eminent degree, endowed with that poverty of spirit, which is so completely opposed to every form of the development of human pride. That they were ages of glory, in the heathen or revolutionary sense of the term, though they were ages of most singular heroism, may, indeed, be denied; that they were ages of any predominance of political dignity, in particular nations, according to the theories which have grown out of the extremely complicated relations of modern civilization, though the grandeur of their state is often admirable from its simplicity, may admit of question; that their philosophy did not admit of being clothed in that pompous and seductive language, with which sophists persuade society that it has advanced in general intelligence—though, as we shall have occasion to see hereafter, it was not on that account to be noted as deficient; finally, that their moral instructions were not recommended with eloquence, though they were endued with a power greater than all eloquence; that their system of education was not calculated to make great men, in the worldly sense of the term, though it was eminently calculated to make the young gentle and engaging, and to bring back a primal age beautiful as gold; all this may indeed be argued with more or less plausibility. That they were ages of humility, or of what the divine sentence terms poverty of spirit, in public and in private life, in the institutions of states, in philosophy, and in education, no one can deny who has regard to the facts of history and to the whole tone and tendency of the contemporaneous writings; it was, in reality, the spirit of the times, the spirit which governed the lives of individuals, and which from thence extended its influence even over the affairs of nations: it was a spirit which on several occasions broke forth amidst the pomp and circumstance of royal courts; it was seen in many instances on the thrones of the world, and repeatedly in the triumph no less apparently calculated to involve it in danger, of unrivalled genius, and of an acknowledged intellectual sovereignty.

END OF THE FIRST BOOK.

MORES CATHOLICI ;

OR,

AGES OF FAITH.

BOOK II.

MORES CATHOLICI;

OR,

AGES OF FAITH.

THE SECOND BOOK.

CHAPTER I.

ISING to that second period of the heavenly strain, which said the "meek are blessed," a view at once so lovely and extensive in range of gracious objects presents itself, when we turn to mark how far this can be illustrated and verified in the annals of Christian history, that we seem then only beginning to enjoy the sweet consequence of meditating on the spirit and ways of faithful times. Still as we continue to ascend this delicious mountain, at every stage we shall find the air which gently smites our temples embalmed with some new fragrance, and at our feet we shall mark some new odoriferous and exquisitely painted flower which adorns the path of innocence; we shall be saluted with some new ravishing prospect which for a moment will make us forget the past, though it seem only to feed and strengthen that infinite desire which prompts us to press forward to enjoy other, and perhaps higher splendors, the splendors of the saints, which are reserved to bless even those eyes that are unworthy to behold the height of heaven. The first direction which our thoughts naturally take is towards the mild courtesy which characterized the manners of the middle ages so eminently, that even the least instructed are accustomed to consider them as synonymous with gracious manners, to which meekness gave the captivating charm. All works which represent the days of chivalry have occasion to be often conversant with this theme; but it was from the schools of holy men that the spirit of grace and harmony descended to shed a soft lustre on the ways of secular life; for as St. Augustin says, it is piety which leads to the second beatitude, "Beati mites."* A great poet of antiquity well distinguished between urbanity and the virtue which alone makes it precious; "I would labor in dressing the garden of the

* De Serm. Dom. in Monte.

Graces, for they give delight, but men are good and wise by means of the divine assistance."

————— Ἀγαθοὶ δὲ
καὶ σοφοὶ κατὰ δαίμον' ἄνδρες ἔγνοντ.*

"Urbanity when separated from religious charity, is rather the law of war than a treaty of peace between men." This is what Manzoni says.† Without that charity a man may appear courteous at times, but as St. Bernard said of Peter Abailard, he will be unlike himself—externally a John, and within a Herod.‡ Even his apparent kindness will be sometimes exercised with a view to wound more deeply. Don Alonzo the wise, king of Naples, hearing one day a certain man praising his enemy, "Remark," said he, "the artifice of the man, and you will see that his praises are only for the purpose of doing him more injury." And such was the fact, for he pretended to approve of his designs during six months, in order that afterwards people might be more disposed to give credit to the calumnies which he was preparing against him. Urbanity in the world seems only a kind of symbol to satisfy those who would have nothing to say in first accosting each other but words like those with which Louis XI. approached the duke of Burgundy, "Mon frère m'assurez vous ? mon frère m'assurez vous ?" The love of God and the direction of the intention to his glory is the only source of real, and sincere and lasting courtesy. Divine love beholds Jesus in the person of the lowliest brother, and, therefore, prompts a thousand kind, generous, and amiable actions, to serve, benefit, and please others, such as men unvisited from on high, would have been discouraged from performing by many obvious earthly reflections and interests, which are never directed by any higher motive than that of personal and selfish benefit even when they seek to gain respect and love. It is very curious to observe, how the religion of Catholic Christians tended to form the character, not only of a courteous and humble gentleman, but also to dictate actions of that kind of generosity which seems so amiable in young persons of noble, open and warm hearts. For it taught men to be generous and liberal, not indeed through vanity and the desire of passing for a person of a higher order, but for Christ's sake, reminding them that it was better to give than to receive ; and that it was often as great charity to be liberal to humble persons as to give alms to the poor. The great apostle of the nations furnishes a beautiful example in point when writing to Philemon concerning his poor servant Onesimus, he says, "If he hath wronged thee or oweth thee ought, put that on mine account. I Paul have written it with mine own hand, I will repay it." Moreover the eye of faith has regard to the ineffable mysteries of the Christian altar, of which every one may be a partaker ; and the thought of this seems to entitle the very persons of men to somewhat of veneration. The meek courtesy and loving address of holy men is so invariable an attendant upon sanctity, that the Church at the second vespers of a Confessor Pontiff sings the Psalm which begins with "Memento Domine David et omnis mansuetudinis ejus," words which had also formed part of the introit for the day. The kindness and expressions of affection with which a stranger is received by those who live a heavenly life, might be described in the words of Dante, where he says of one spirit which approached him in such guise :

* Pindar, Olymp. IX.

† Osservazioni sulla Morali Cattolica, 56.

‡ Epist. exciii.

So bright, that in my thought I said : The love
Which this betokens me, admits no doubt.*

Such was the greeting that St. Paul gave to St. Anthony when he received him into his cell in the desert, when there followed even a gentle strife, each contending who should give the other greater honor. Such too is the greeting which one is always sure to receive from a man of the interior life on entering his humble dwelling. In the chapels of Vallombrosa, the affability of its holy eremites is attested on their tombs. May it be allowed me to mention an instance of the courtesy of religious men which occurred to me on a journey through the forests of Lucerne. Perhaps so lowly an instance will best accord with the present argument. It is one of those many humble themes which rest in the memory as if to mock the ambition of elevated musings. One evening then, arriving at the little ancient town of Sursee, I took a walk outside the wall, and finding a convent of Capuchins on the way-side, I went into the church. Two old friars with long white beards were at their devotions. When it struck eight it seemed a signal to them to withdraw, but as they rose up and saw me kneeling near the door, one of them returned and resumed his position. After a while he again rose and whispered to a servant who knelt by his side. It was not till I rose to leave the church that the brother advanced with the keys to lock the doors ; for so great was their delicacy that they would rather abate a little of their rule than appear to act discourteously to an obscure and youthful stranger. Such were those barefooted meek ones, who sought God's friendship in the cord.† Meekness must follow the humility which we have seen was the spirit of religious men ; for the doctrine taught was this "non nocet, si omnibus te supponas : nocet autem plurimum, si vel uni te preponas ;"‡ and it was even observed by writers of these ages, that the positive precepts of religion inspire politeness. Thus, speaking of our Lord's rule for those invited to a feast, John of Salisbury says, "Although this might seem rather the edict of religion than of civility, yet, 'ego religionis formam à civilitate non divido cum nihil civilius sit quam cultui virtutis insistere.'"§ St. Boniface, in his Mirror of Novices, gives them instruction in politeness at table, which comprises every thing that would now be desired to qualify men for the most refined society. It is curious to find him noticing a thousand vulgarities which have been infused into the manners of France by the sophists, and which shock every well-bred

* Parad. XIX.

† Dante, Parad. XII.

‡ De Imit. lib. 1. 7.

§ De Nugis Curialium, lib. VIII. c. ix.

stranger, rendering the connection between a religious education and real good manners very striking. Men of this world are so full of all unkindness, so steel-ed in proud selfishness and mistrust, that they cannot believe the gentle courtesy of monks and holy persons of the interior life to be sincere. They cannot believe that these men of God should, as they profess to do, really feel joy in serving a stranger, concern at not being able instantly to relieve each of his slightest wants, that they should really think themselves honored by receiving him into their poor cell, and afflicted at the thought of his going away : all this seems to them as something hollow, affected, ridiculous, hateful, "abominatio est superbis, humilitas," says St. Bonaventura. Alas, for them who know not what it is to love men in and for Jesus ! "And why do you suppose," asks the Father guardian of Franciscans at La Flèche, in the Paradise of the Seraphic Religion of St. Francis,— "Why do you suppose are our friars so gracious and gentle to every one who approaches them ? Do you imagine that it is in order that they may conciliate their friendship, and take advantage of their good opinion, like those money-catchers whose kindness lasts so long as the good fortune of those whose purses they envy ? No ; but it is the property of these sublime souls to live always contented, and this interior joy of their conscience cannot but break forth outwardly, since it is out of the abundance of the heart that the mouth speaketh."* The beautiful passage in the Morals of St. Gregory, which condemns the false civility of the world, and commends the gracious simplicity of the just, comes in part of the office which every man separate to the Church recites in due course.

"The wisdom of the world," it says, "teaches to conceal the heart by machinations, to veil one's sense with words, to show as true what is false, and to prove false what is true, to love under a palliated name the wickedness of duplicity, for perversity of mind is called urbanity. Whereas, on the contrary, the wisdom of the just is to feign nothing, to be open in words, to love what is true, and to avoid all falsehood ; but this simplicity of the just is derided by the wise of this world, to despise innocence and truth ;"† and thus that sweet benignity, soft as young down, which encompasses the saintly, and even heroic character, loses that title of respect "Which the proud soul ne'er pays but to the proud." As when one traverses the Campagna of Rome, and on some sudden fear hastens to a house which seems to offer shelter, but finds it desert, empty, shut up, or open only through decay, one feels that the desolation is more horrible and fearful to the imagination than the wildness of the waste where there is no such mockery of walls, so does the heart sink within one at the sound and show of that hollow courtesy which smiles at a distance, but which on approach suffers all to be barred and silent. But such were not religious manners in ages of faith, and warmth of affection was not excluded, but expressed by gracious manners. The description which Pliny gives of Fuscus Salinator applies to them. "Puer simplicitate, comitate juvenis, senex gravitate.”* The Catholic religion, by enabling men to live without being slaves to the world, facilitated the acquisition of this youthful grace. The chorus says to Trugœus in the old play, that if he could finish his labors he would be seen to lay aside all his former harsh manners, and he would appear gentle.

* Le Sacré Mont d'Olivet, par F. Elzeare l'Archer. Paris, 1614.

† Lib. X. cap. XVI. in Job xii.

Καὶ πολὺ νεώτερον, ἀπἀλλαγέντα πραγμάτων.

“Man,” as Leo the great says, “created in the image of God was to be an imitator of his Author, and this is the natural dignity of our race, if there should shine in us, as if in a certain mirror, the form of divine benignity.” The social state in the middle ages had a degree of refinement from the influence of religion which, at the time delighted and surprised reflecting men. Thus Petrarch describes his arrival at Cologne on the vigil of St. John the Baptist, and says, “I was astonished to observe in that barbarous land such civility, such a beauty of buildings, such gravity in the men, and such elegance in the matrons.”† The greatest attention was even paid among the lower classes to the observances of civility, as the regulations of their own society show; for in the fourteenth century in France, if a mason uttered an uncivil word, he paid a fine of ten farthings to the person he had offended. But the engaging manners of the poor proceeded from a very different principle from the fear of punishment, as may still, indeed, be seen in those happy Catholic cantons of Switzerland and the Tyrol, of Styria and Carinthia, where the children come forth to kiss their little hands to the stranger, the youths receive him as a brother, and lead him to the deepest pool, or to the wildest path that promises the sport most dear to them; the old men, like Homeric fathers mild, pass him by with smiles and looks of affection; the matrons invoke the adorable name of the Saviour to bless him, and where the form of greeting with all is to say, “Praised be Jesus Christ,” that the sweet pledge of everlasting union may be returned in the answer, “for ever.” Ah! it is here that God, through the meekness of his children, gives joy to the heart of youth. What traveller in Italy has not been struck with the meekness and benignity of the holy men who receive strangers to monastic hospitality! Dante, in Paradise, remembers

———The bright courtesy
Of friar Thomas and his goodly lore.‡

For one, at least, I can never omit an occasion to praise those venerable priests in the peaceful cloisters of Camaldoli, who with the noble air and imposing majesty of princes, waited like humble domestics upon me unworthy, disdaining no kind of servile office; men who knew how to unite the utmost dignity with the utmost grace, so that whom I venerated as angels I began to love as brothers: men of such rare benignity, so disinterested, so unearthly, that to one who before had friends they could give a new idea of friendship: men in short, who had

* Epist. VI. 26.

† Epist. iv.

‡ Cant. XII.

learned to believe with Pope St. Leo the Great, that "the love of our neighbor is the love of God."*

To observe their habit one would have supposed them ancient sages from the groves of Plato, but the sweetness and heavenly calm of their countenances, proclaimed that they were of the school of Christ. Ah ! since it cannot be given me to recompense them, may I be allowed to leave this frail memorial of their goodness, and to satisfy the demand of my heart by testifying what an impression it wrought there. To recompense them is the privilege only of the Author of benignity, of the Source and Inspirer of love. I took leave of them with sighs, but it was only for myself, with wishes as fruitless that I could have added to their happiness ; but the brief contingencies of the mortal course could not affect those who moved already in another sphere of being—they were already possessors of that peace which is to last forever—"justi autem in perpetuum vivent et apud Dominum est merces eorum." The Church in the most imposing of her ceremonies, and in the person of her supreme pontiff takes occasion to express this divine charity. The holy father on creating a new cardinal, before the solemn and august assembly of the sacred college, throws aside, as it were, his dignity, receives him in open arms, and twice bestows the kiss of peace. Each venerable brother then salutes him with the same marks of tenderness. Thus even in the most stately and formal parts of her ritual, there is some development of the loving principle, some sweet manifestation of charity, of a friendship that is to be eternal. For the general instruction of her children, the precepts and manners of the Church were express and uniform. The sweet evening hymn, in the little office that was so dear to men in the middle ages, that all the efforts of art were unceasingly employed in multiplying beauteous copies, in addressing her, who, above all, was meek, made equal account of meekness and of purity :

Mites fac et castos.

"O my soul," cries Bellarmin, "if thou art a garden of the celestial Husbandman, take heed lest thorns should be found in thee ; but let there be the tree of charity, and the lily of chastity, and the violet of humility." Behold the model in all ages held up to the faithful. Men will speak vain things, and use violence, and study deceits all the day long, and speak great things against them, and challenge them to argument—but they are to remember him who "as a deaf man, heard not ; and was as a dumb man, not opening his mouth ; who became as one that heareth not, and that hath no reproofs in his mouth."† St. Anselm, in his sublime Meditations, prays to God that he would take away obstinacy from his sentiments, and rudeness from his manners.‡

"Behold what is meek courtesy," says St. Ambrose. "The superior comes to visit the inferior, that the inferior may be assisted : Mary to Elizabeth—Christ

* Serm. ix. de Jejun.

† Psalm xxxvii.

‡ Medit. sop. I. § 2.

to John.”* Behold another divine example. St. Jerome remarks, that the other Evangelists, through respect for St. Matthew, are unwilling to call him by the vulgar name of his profession, but use a word of double sense, Levi; whereas, St. Matthew names himself at once the Publican; showing his readers that no one should despair of salvation, if he be converted to better things.† St. Jerome gives a beautiful instance of Christian courtesy towards the great. “No one,” he says, “ever surpassed Paula in goodness towards all the world; no one could be more gentle and kind to humble inferiors. She never sought the society of the great; but whenever she found herself with them, she was never observed to blame with a severity that might have seemed out of place those who sought the glory and perishable honor of this life. In every thing she knew how to preserve a just moderation.”‡ The same courtesy, from the same principle of charity, was inculcated by St. Francis. “If a friar,” says one of that meek order, “should find himself at the table of some prince, or great lord, and should perceive the sweet odor with which the cloth and napkins are perfumed, he ought not to show his contempt for such luxury, but he should make it the subject of internal contemplation. We teach our scholars, on such occasions, to take all from the hand of God, and to judge all in good part, according to the command of our glorious father, St. Francis; who, in his rule, warns us, that, although we be poor and austere in our lives, we must not judge evil of men in the world, who live delicately, and feast well; for who knows, if, under these purple habits, there may not be concealed hair shirts and sackcloth. Was not that the custom of the king St. Louis, and of many other princes?”§ “A man should endeavor to gain the minds of others, and to render himself agreeable and amiable in all the occasions when it is his duty to instruct, to exhort, and to correct. No necessity will ever justify rudeness or bitterness.” This is what St. Basil says in his Epistle to St. Gregory Nazianzen.

“The intention of afflicting a man is always a sin. The most lawful action, the exercise of the most incontrovertible right, becomes a sin, when directed to this horrible end. It is with this view,” continues Manzoni, “that the Catholic Church lays down her morality.”|| What a contrast, then, was here, to the spirit of that people among the ancients, who in many respects approached nearer to the discipline and character of our ancestors than any other! For at Sparta the young were expressly taught to impart a peculiar sharpness and brilliancy to their sayings; and in later life, the public manners prescribed ridicule, the being able to endure which was considered the mark of a Lacedæmonian spirit; though, if any person took it ill, and asked his atagonist to desist, (and he would suffer much before he would avail himself of such a privilege,) the other was forced to comply. That the power of ridicule was not undervalued, may be inferred from the circumstance,

* Hom. in Luc. cap. I.

† St. Hieron. Hom. lib. I. Com. in Matt. cap. ix.

‡ Epist. ad Eustoch.

§ F. Elzeare l'Archer, Le Sacré Mont d'Olivet, p. 648.

|| Osservazioni sulla Morale Cattolica.

that in the code of Charondas public ridicule was assigned as the penalty of the adulterer and busy-body, the sycophant and coward.* It is hard, therefore, to conceive any thing more opposed to the Christian manners in ages of faith, than the discipline which encouraged such a spirit; which, though it may sometimes assume a form of gentle courtesy, when it is used in loving mood, to chase away black humors, yet oftener it doth indicate "harsh rage, defect of manners, want of government, pride, haughtiness, opinion, and disdain."

"The servant of Christ," says St. Chrysostom, "is to be called rather from the mildness of his manners than by the name given to him by his parents." And St. Ambrose showed the moral benefit which resulted, by observing, that, "a mild man is a physician of the heart."† "Would not the true philosophic nature possess mildness?" asks the disputant in Plato.‡ It was found so in after ages; for the utmost meekness appeared in all the discourses of the clergy, distinguishing their eloquence from that which Plato ascribes to the democratic orator, "who says the most severe and acrimonious things; and when speaking from the tribune—βομβεῖ τε καὶ οὐκ ἀνέχεται τοῦ ἀλλὰ γέλοντος."§ The courtesy of the Christian writers, uniting the most uncompromising firmness with delicate and condescending language is most remarkable. For instance, St. Jerome thus writes to Læta: "Witness the family of your illustrious father; a man, without doubt to be commended, for the nobleness of his sentiments, and for his great knowledge on every subject; but unhappily still imbued with the errors of Paganism."|| St. Augustin, in his correspondence with the pagan people of Madaura, calls them his relations and his brethren: "fratres mei, et parentes mei."¶ And the letters of St. Basil to Libanius the Sophist, present a still more striking instance of the courtesy and gentleness with which a doctor, full of Christian zeal, would address a Pagan. This spirit is evinced, also, by the chivalrous writers of the middle age. In Gyron le Courtoys, Phebus remains with a certain Payen, named Harsaan, of whom the romance says, "Il estoit moult gentil homme en la loy Payenne." Tasso commends, in glowing terms, the constancy and valor of Argentes, an Infidel:†† and he even goes so far as to acknowledge the virtues of Emireno, a false Armenian,

That, in his youth, from Christ's true faith and light,
To the blind lore of Paganism did slide.‡‡

A beautiful instance of this ancient Christian courtesy, united with fervent zeal, combining the gentleness and innocence of the evangelical spirit with the polished refinement of the Platonic dialogue, and with a little of the Socratic irony, is furnished by Manzoni in his reply§§ to the objections advanced by Sismondi against Catholic morals, in his History of the Italian Republics.

* Diod. XII. 12.

† Epist. lib. X. 82.

‡ De Repub. III.

§ De Repub. VIII.

|| Epist. ad Lætam.

¶ Epist. 232.

 F. cccxlviii.

†† Cap. xix. 1.

‡‡ xvii. 32.

§§ Osservazioni sulla morale Cattolica.

It may be remarked, that the development of the courteous principle was, in many respects, similar even to the form of more recent manners. Thus in the sixth and seventh centuries, it was common to give the title of Abbot to any venerable or learned priest. Pope Adrian thus styles Angilbert, who was but a simple chaplain of the king's chapel; and Cassien applies it to many solitaries, who never had any command over a community. As it was become the custom of the Romans to give certain titles of honor to Bishops, such as the pious, or the blessed, or holy,—the delicate courtesy of the fathers, which we have spoken of, induced them to apply these even to men whom they had to condemn.

In the Conference of Carthage, St. Augustin speaks of the holy Emeritus, and the holy Petilien, although these were Donatists. An author had often occasion to evince the same modesty as a knight of chivalry. Thus Suger, in his work on the Gestes of Louis VII., though he describes minutely the events of his time, says not a word respecting his own administration as Regent, nor the choice made of him to govern the kingdom, such was his modesty in not publishing his own merit and services. And where merit had raised persons of low and obscure birth, like this celebrated Abbot, the meek sincerity inspired by religion must have preserved their manners from all that offensive vanity which would otherwise have so inevitably attended their sudden elevation. Willegisus, Archbishop of Mayence, being son of a carpenter, had wheels painted in all the chambers of his house, with an inscription, reminding him of his origin. Pope Urban, being son of a shoe-maker, decorated the churches of Troyes with paintings of his father's stall; and Cardinal Maieus, in the time of Paul II. having been a shepherd's son, had painted a lamb, with a book on its head, to show his origin and his profession.* Suger, when Regent of France, repeatedly alludes to his own origin,† and says: "Representing to myself in what manner the strong hand of God raised me poor from the dunghill, and made me to sit with the princes of the Church and of the kingdom, in what manner he hath exalted unworthy me."‡ John of Salisbury, in the prologue to his great work "De Nugis Curialium," takes occasion to speak of himself as "a plebeian man." Indeed, St. Anselm says, that a man really humble seeks the lowest place with as much eagerness as a proud man seeks the highest: of which Palladius gives an example in the blessed Pasuntius, who, finding himself held in great honor, fled to unknown regions, and far-distant monasteries, dissembling his name, that there, as if a rude and new monk, he might discharge the lowest offices.

Isocrates, in his Panegyric, says, that philosophy forms the manners of men, and "makes them mild to one another."§ But here we must distinguish: if it be the philosophy, or the love of God and truth, which saved men, and made saints, before the prophets and before Moses—this may be true: if it be the philosophy of the proud schools of Athens, this is but an empty boast, not in the least degree borne out by what we know of the manners of the ancients ; for to the men who came from those schools, as well as to the moderns who have lost the faith, we can only apply the phrase of Tacitus, "Ex suo quisque ingenio mitius aut horridius."* There is no security.

* Hier. Garimbert, 1. 2. de Vit. Pont. † Const. l. ‡ Sug. Testam. § Panegyric, 50.

To the meekness of saintly men in ages of faith, belonged an outward expression of gentleness and benignity, which one cannot pass over in silence. "The saints," says the blessed John of the Cross, "have a certain air of dignity, majesty, sweetness, which draws the veneration of the whole world to them." This is what struck me when I came first to Camaldoli, on the eve of the exaltation of the holy cross ; for there I unwilling, was humbly waited upon by men, who had in their looks and air the majesty of princes : to portray them on canvass would have required the pencil of another Andrew Sacchi. It is recorded of St. Bernard, that he had an admirably sweet and gracious look, which proceeded rather from his "spirit than his flesh." The portrait of William of Wyckham, in the College which he founded at Oxford, is singularly expressive of meekness, intelligence, and sanctity. Indeed, on the monuments of these ages, we can seldom trace those countenances which now present themselves in every direction, bearing looks Alien from heaven, with passions foul obscur'd.

They are such as rather might serve for angels, that would seem to say, with Beatrix to Dante, "I come from a place whither I desire to return, but love has conducted me here : " or like that spirit which appeared to Dante, who showed "in look and gesture, seemly grace of reverent awe."†

The ancients seem to have had no models of this beauty of sanctity, notwithstanding their deep and lovely conception of grace ; as, in fact, there was nothing in their philosophy to correspond with it. Cicero says, that in the countenance of a public orator, there should be a modest expression mixed with acrimony.‡ There is not a passage in all the most admired writings of their philosophers, which was capable of inspiring the sense which was expressed in these mild looks of Christian holiness. These looks are all derived from the Christian mysteries. No one who had not beheld the initiated, could ever have conceived the countenance of that deacon in Domenichino's painting of the communion of St. Jerome : that expression of deep, subdued, unaffected, unimpassioned piety, is exclusively to be found within the Catholic Church. At the first sight of that young priest who advances to the altar with joined palms and down-cast eyes, to sing mass, there are many present who cannot prevent their tears from bursting forth : it is a look of such profound humility and sweetness ; such resignation and readiness to die for Christ : it is the countenance and air of a holy martyr. And remark here, that the least skilful artist in a Catholic country, can give an idea of this expression, and that the noblest genius among the moderns, in no instance, has ever succeeded.

"There have been many in this holy order," says Father Elzeare l'Archer, "who have converted great sinners merely by means of their manner and outward appearance. If I may speak of what I have myself seen, I can say with truth, that having been in company for twelve hours, three or four times, with a saint, whom all Italy holds for such : one as Dante says, 'visibly written blessed in his looks,' I have learned more respecting the duties of my profession from marking his countenance, than if he had entertained me for three days with a continuous discourse upon mystical theology. Every one who knows him, will confess with me, that he is a man rather of heaven than of the earth, and who converses more with God than with men ; and, nevertheless, he is of so sweet and agreeable a conversation, that he captivates every one. To see him when he is not performing his exercises, during which he appears as an angel of heaven, one would say that he was but an ordinary man, and nothing more than another : so well has he learned how to cultivate that holy cheerfulness and joyous modesty."* Armed only with a crucifix and the looks of an angel, "service in youthful beauty," St. Francis Regis stopped a troop of heretical soldiers, who were about to burst into a Church, and prevented them from profaning it.

* Hist. lib. I. 82.

† Purg. XII.

‡ Ad Herennium, lib. III.

The writers of the middle age generally ascribe beauty to an internal excellence of the mind ; thus Holinshed says of Henry VI. "His face was beautiful, in the which continually was resident the bountie of mind, with which he was inwardly endewed." "Where is now that beauty of countenance," asks St. Jerome, alluding to a young friend lately dead, "where that dignity of person, which like a beautiful garment, clothed the beauty of the soul?"† In speculation, the ancients had nothing to learn here ; the beautiful and good were expressed by the Greeks conjointly in one term. Socrates says of bodies, arts, and domestic economy that, "in all these things there is a just order and a deformity, and the deformity and discord are sisters of evil speech and evil manners, in like manner as the contrary are of the contrary, being sisters and imitations of temperance and virtuous manners."‡ In fact, a life at enmity with God, seems of necessity to produce in the human countenance an expression of deformity, which is not found in any of his innocent creatures. The eye naturally turns aside in disgust from the face of the heartless libertine, the avaricious slave of wealth, the epieure, the unfeeling minister of law, the haughty proud man, or the energumen of any of those political theories connected with impiety. The countenance of the moderns is characteristic of their philosophy and of their manners,—cold, stiff, affected ; it wears a tone of cunning and malice, of duplicity, curiosity, and disdain. There is nothing in it playful, natural, and benign : it is subject, like that of Julian, to immoderate changes of gloom and laughter ; and betrays the inward and almost ceaseless storm of passion : not like that of the king Don Alonzo IX., who, in the bloody battle of Las Navas del Toloso, evinced throughout an equable serenity of countenance. Savedra mentions that no accident was ever known to develop the least symptom of passion in the person of king Don Fernando the Catholic.*

* Le sacré Mont d'Olivet, 279.† Epist., xxxv.‡ De Repub. lib. III.

The countenance of the middle ages is now chiefly to be found among the peasantry in Catholic countries,—the look of manly dignity, with innocent abandonment—the joyous and yet modest expression—the free and benign look which is never disconcerted by the presence of grandeur, and never clouded by the artifice of pride. All travellers remark the graceful dignity of the Tuscan peasant, and the respectful sweetness of expression which belongs to the youth of Ireland. It was, no doubt, these considerations, which made the holy men of ages of faith so indulgent and favorable to beauty. They would have reproached no one for being beautiful, but would have repeated the Homeric lines against those who should do so.

οὐτοὶ ἀπόβλητ' ἐστὶ θεῶν ἐρικυδέα δῶρα,
δόσα κεν αὐτοὶ δῶσιν, ἐκῶν δ' οὐκ ἄν τις ἔλοιτο.†

In proof of which assertion, it might be sufficient to appeal to that passage, where St. Ambrose evinces such a delicate sense of beauty and grace, in describing the human body; ‡ a subject which always draws from holy writers remarks of a similar kind. The ancient fathers had predicted evil of Julian, from observing the deformity of his countenance.

It is impossible to pass from this view of the meekness of men, during ages of faith, without delaying to cast a glance at the spirit and manners of that renowned chivalry which appeared in them, and which was the result of religion acting upon heroic minds, under circumstances which drew forth all the energies of human nature. So great was the meekness of noble manners, that spiritual writers used even to propose it as a model to those who wished to embrace a religious life. Thus brother John, a Carmelite, says, in his instruction to Novices: “There are as many degrees of patience as of gentleness, and noble manners rest on patience. How common is it in the banquet-halls of the world, where the sense of honor is so delicate, that there should arise many provocations to anger, by looks, words, and actions, et tamen quo quis nobilior est et honoris expectatio major, eò patientius adversa ferre discit. Therefore the servants of God, who aspire to eternal honors, may well repress their anger, and show a pacific heart, to the contradictions of men.”§ The knightly portrait is never without this feature, whether we look for it in history or in romance. From the former we are presented with an early instance in Boëmond the Franc, as described by Anne Comneneus, who observes, that he united in his person all the perfections of the human form; adding, that “he stooped a little, not from any defect of the spine, but from a custom of youth, which was a mark of modesty.”|| This is curious, as the portrait of a youthful barbarian by a Greek; but even the heathens knew that, as Plautius says, “modesty became the young.”

An example more to our immediate purpose, is that of John duc de Berry,

* Christian Prince, I. 351.

† Il. III. 65.

‡ Hexæmeron, lib. VI. cap. ix.

§ Instructio Novitiorum, 209.

|| Liv. XIII. cap. 6.

brother of Charles V. given by Christine de Pisan : "Il est prince de douce et humaine conversacion, sans haulteineté d'orgueil, benigne en parolle et responce, joyeus en conversacion, et en toutes chose très traitable."* Again, of Louis duc d'Orleans, son of King Charles V. she says "Douce responce et amiable rent à toute personne qui à luy a à besoingnier."† And respecting prince Charles, afterwards Charles VI., she dwells at greater length. "In his greater benignity, sweetness, and clemency, he is past compare ; humane to all kinds of people, without the least pride ; and, to speak briefly, so full is he of great benignity, and sweetness, and love, that God demonstrates it even on his countenance to such a degree, that he has so singular a grace of Divine Providence, that all people, who see him, whether stranger, prince, or others, become in love with him, and are rejoiced in his presence ; so that, oftentimes, I have been seized with admiration, to see how the people, of all sorts, women and children, have flown through the streets, to see him pass."‡ Don Diego Savedra Faxardo says, that in Spain, the royal young princes were always to be visited familiarly by every one, until Philip II. abolished the ancient custom, on occasion of his anger against Don Carlos.§ The writers of the old romantic histories love to paint the gracious meekness of their heroes in its most engaging colors, though it often presents a singular contrast with the scene which their imagination created for the development of their energies. Here we are only concerned with what is amiable in these extravagant portraits, and with what was most assuredly drawn from living manners. Of these books one of the most celebrated was the History of Gyron le Courtois, which seemed compiled for the express purpose of exhibiting the grace of courtesy, under every variety of circumstance, and of showing what a revolution had been effected in the manners of those same Gauls, with whom the vae victis ! had once been the style of conquerors. Here both knight and varlet are equally meek, resembling Spenser's gentle squire,

Of myld demeanure, and rare courtesee.

Their respectful manner of address is always described in this style : "Il le salua moult doucement et humblement." Gyron's favorite expression is, "Je ne vaulx ung garçon au regard de vous." On one occasion such honor is shown to an old worthy, that the narrator is obliged to borrow a similitude from devotion : "Tous luy faisoient si grant honneur comme se il feust ung corps saint."|| The scenes which follow are not without beauty and instruction for those who regard gestures as proof of noble spirit. Brehus being interrogated respecting a strange knight, who accompanied him, replied, "Sire, I do not know his name ; for he so carefully conceals it wherever he goes, that to no man of the world will he ever say any thing respecting himself. So he travels about, concealing himself. And if he is among knights he is so humble, and so coy, and so silent, that he never says a word, and never holds any parliament respecting any deed that he has performed. If you were to see him, then you would certainly think that he was not and could never be worth more than a poor boy. And when he is armed, and comes to perform any great feat, then you would behold wonders openly. We do not know whether he be of a king's lineage, or that of a count, or of low people; but he is the best knight that I know of at present among errant knights. And, in addition, he is so handsome a knight, that I do not believe there is another equal to him in all the world. Sire, I tell you of this man, that in my judgment, he is a perfect knight, and he has borne arms for xv. years." This was Gyron himself.* Dante evinces the same humility, when, on being questioned by Guido del Duca, he modestly declines giving his name :

* Livre des faits et bonnes meurs du sage roy Charles V. chap. xii. † Liv. II. chap. xvi.

‡ Chap. xv. § Christian Prince, Tom. I. 78. || F. IX.

To tell ye who I am were words mis-spent,
For yet my name scarce sounds on rumor's lips.†

To the manners of Dante, in this respect, Philip Villani bears a beautiful testimony, where he says, that "if it had not been for the courtesy which he always evinced, his countenance would have worn a melancholy tone." How admirable is that trait of a delicate and courteous heart when he beholds in purgatory the wretched souls of the envious, and being himself invisible, scruples to advance.

It were a wrong, methought, to pass and look
On others, yet myself the while unseen.
To my sage counsel, therefore, did I turn.
He knew the meaning of the mute appeal,
Nor waited for my questioning, but said,
Speak, and be brief, be subtle in thy words.‡

But let us return to Gyron, the pattern of courtesy. When a contrary spirit was evinced, there is an amusing passage related, to show that it ought to be ascribed to some deformity of constitution, and only pitied as incurable. Messire du Luc knocks at the gate of a tower in the forest, and begs to enter : a voice from the top of the battlement begins to insult him : the knight replies that this person is not too courteous whoever he may be : the voice from over the gate answers, "Je suis tant courtoys en toutes guyses que je nay mye de longueur cinq pieds non mye quatre se comme je croy. Je ressemble a vous trop malement qui estes grant et long comme ung dyable et cayde certainement que tout ainsi comme vous estes plus grant que ung autre, aussi estes vous plus mauvais du tout. Tous ces grans vilains toute suoyes et tous ces grans chevaliers veons nous mauvais, pour quoy je croy que vous soyez du tout mauvais. Et pour ceste raison vueil je que vous aillez vostre chemin et delivrez la nostre porte qui nest gueres plus grant de vous. Autant estes vous grant comme elle est. Cest ung grant ennuy de vous veoir tant estes grant." The knight sees it is but a dwarf who thus speaks, a little old man, not four feet high, with a head as large as a horse.—"Sire, chevalier," cries the dwarf, "ne vous est il mye avis que je soyes beau bachelier et bien fait de tous membres ? Vrai est que vous avez en vous de vostre part la grandesse du monde et je ay de ma part toute la petitesse du siecle. Mais je ay tant de reconfort que je pourroye encores croistre, si Diën vouloit pourcee que je suis encores trop petit, mais vous ne pourriez croistre, car vous estes plus grant que ung geant." Du Lac cannot help smiling ; but the dwarf continues to revile him, and to imprecate evil on him : "et messire Lac ne respond a ceste chose ne a ses parolles car il congnoist bien tout clerement que en ceshuy me pourroit il troner nul bien ne nulle courtoisie en nulle maniere du monde."* The hero of chivalrous fable was, in this instance, more true to meekness than Don Alonzo III. in real history, who so resented the trifling incivility of Sancho of Navarre, in withdrawing after the battle of Arc without taking leave of him, that he had never rest afterwards till he deprived him of his state.

* F. CCXXXVIII.

† Purg. XIV.

‡ Purg. XIII.

When Gyron le Courtois and the king Melyadus are engaged in battle, and some one leads a horse, and offers it to Gyron, that knight immediately presents it to his adversary, and says, "Sire, take that horse and mount upon it, and I will take another for myself and mount. You are so good a knight, that were I to mount, and leave you here on foot, it would be too great villany." When the king heard this word, he was abashed and replied, "Sir knight, do you really offer me this courtesy ?"—"Sir knight," answered Gyron, "certes I say truly, for I ought not to leave such a preudhomme as you are on foot."—"But, sir knight," continues the king, "I think that you ought not to offer it to me here, since I am in this place your mortal enemy : and if I were mounted, and found you on foot, do you not suppose that I would seek to revenge the shame to which you put me at the tournament ?"—"Certes," said Gyron, "I believe verily that you are my mortal enemy, as I have lately seen quite clearly : but for all that you mortally hate me as I see, I do not believe that so good a knight as you are would do villany to me or to any one else, car bon chevalier ne doit faire autre chose que bonte et courtoisie pour nulle advantage du monde."†

All this representation of meekness and courtesy might be drawn from real history. At the magnificent tournament which took place at Florence in the square of the holy cross, Lorenzo de Medicis was declared conqueror. He speaks of himself on this occasion, with the modesty of a knight of romance : "I jousted upon the square of Santa Croce, and although I was not strong in arms or in blows, the first honor was still adjudged to me ; that is an helmet all furnished with silver." Du Guesclin on his death-bed, after he had devoutly received the last sacraments, called the Mareschal de Sancerre and Messire Olivier de Manny, and other knights, and said to them, "Seigneurs, par vos vaillance et non par moy m'a tenu fortune en grant honneur en toute France, en mon vivant, et a vous en est den l'honneur, qui mon ame a vous recommande." The same style, so gracious from its humility, was employed in speaking also of friends, as in the Homeric instance, where the son of Nestor says weeping, "My brother perished," and only adding of him, οὔτι κακίστος Ἀργείων.* And Homer, in allusion to Patroclus, even furnishes language which might convey an idea of that mildness of manner, which belonged to men in Christian ages :

* Fol. LXX.

† Fol. XXX.

‡ Chronique de Du Gues. c. 442.

———πᾶσιν γὰρ ἐπίστατο μείλιχος εἶναι,
ζῶός ἐών.†

To all equally mild, not like those who have ever a smile for the great and a frown and denial for the poor, but one of those souls which Montaigne calls souls of different stories or floors, which can be shown freely to all men ; which can converse with a neighbor about his building, with a carpenter about his work, with a gardener about his plants, which can make itself one among the least of the persons that are present. John the Deacon relates a saying of St. Simeon a short time before his death. "Mi optime Joannes, neminem mortalium unquam sperne : sunt etiam inter rusticos et mendicos qui Deo sint charissimi." A French nobleman, who lately died, used to salute every poor person that he met on the way, and was the first to evince respect. Spenser describes a scene, drawn from the ancient manners of the Christian society, which might be studied with advantage by the moderns, who show so little regard to strangers when they do not find themselves in the vein to meet them in exchange of gracious conversation ; and who seem to think with the old pagan :

Lupus est homo homini, non homo
Quum qualis sit, non novit.

Spenser says.

He coming neare gan gently her salute
With curteous words, in the most comely wise;
Who, though desirous rather to rest mute,
Then termes to entertaine of common guize.
Yet rather then she kindnesse would despize,
She would herself displease, so him requite.‡

In the middle ages, the respect shown to strangers was perfectly Homeric. It was not then in the higher classes studied as a noble art to render to all persons unknown such aspect as cloudy men use to their adversaries. All were similarly disposed in this point ; the poor man, or the domestic, said, "gaber chevalier estrange est trop grant vilennie."§ The nobleman said, with the Roman poet,

Cum te non nossem, Dominum regemque vocabam,
Cum benè te novi, jam mihi Priscus eris.¶

St. Pacomius was a young Roman soldier, whose conversion originated in his observing the extraordinary kindness with which he was treated by some Christians, who received him to hospitality. At the same time the ancient manners possessed a civility which was not forgotten or unimproved by the Christians. Father Bouhours remarks in his dialogues, that the graces were represented always of little stature, in order to show that this virtue consisted in little things, in a gesture, a smile, or a respectful air. The traveller, indeed, might have learned humility and meekness of demeanor, from the verses of that Roman poet, who, exiled amidst the desolate wilds of Thrace, had yet the sense and candor to admit, that it was he who was the barbarian, since he was not understood by the natives :

* Od. IV. 200. † II. XVIII. 671. ‡ Faery Queen, V. 6. § Gyron le Courtoys, LXVIII. ¶ Martial, lib. I. epig. 113.

Babarus hic ego sum quia non intelligor illis.

It belongs rather to a particular review of chivalry, than to the general glance which we are now throwing upon ancient manners, to dwell upon the courteous interchange of words, which strangers used to practice to each other : but in a history relating to the middle ages, there is one instance associated with a name of such poetic interest, that I cannot forbear adducing it. When Petrarch was on his road from Vaucluse to Montrieux, between Aix and St. Maximin, he met with a company of Roman ladies, who were going on a pilgrimage. By their air and gait he distinguished, at a distance, their country and their birth. Drawing near, he stopped and politely asked them from whence they came and whither they were going. The sound of an Italian voice spread joy through this little company. The oldest of them answered, "Rome is our country ; we are going on a pilgrimage to St. James. And you sir, are you a Roman ? are you going to Rome ?" "I am not going there immediately," replied Petrarch, "but my heart is always there." This answer inspired the pilgrims with confidence; they surrounded Petrarch, and replied to a thousand questions which he asked them concerning the state of the republic: Petrarch then asked these ladies if he could be so happy as to serve them in any respect. "Every thing," says he, in a letter to Lelius, "urged me to make them this offer, God, their virtue, their country, and their love of you. I wished to divide with them the sum I had brought with me for my journey : their answer was, 'pray to God that our journey may be successful : we ask only this of you.' This reply delighted, but did not surprise me : I perceived in it the dignity and disinterestedness of Roman ladies." Petrarch, charmed with their discourse, would have passed the day with them ; but they were bent on hastening towards their pious design : and he was also eager to behold his brother, the monk at Montrieux. "While our discourse lasted," adds he, "I thought I saw those holy virgins who made so distinguished a figure in our Christian annals : Prisca, Praxedes, Prudentia, and Agnes."

Shakespeare ascribes to Theseus a most delicate regard for humble persons offering their honest but unskilled civility, where he says,

Our sport shall be, to take what they mistake:
And what poor duty cannot do,

Noble respect takes it in might, not merit.
 Where I have come, great clerks have purposed
 To greet me with premeditated welcomes;
 Where I have seen them shiver and look pale,
 Make periods in the midst of sentences,
 And in conclusion, dumbly have broke off
 Not paying me a welcome: trust me sweet,
 Out of this silence, yet, I pick'd a welcome:
 And in the modesty of fearful duty
 I read as much, as from the rattling tongue
 Of saucy and audacious eloquence.*

It must be admitted, however, for such courtesy there is less occasion in countries under the influence of the modern spirit, for there the poor are themselves sufficiently disdainful; reminding one almost of that potrait in the Odyssey, though, indeed wanting all its dignity, where Ulysses, though in the dress of a begger, is ready every moment to assume a countenance that strikes the beholder with terror, ὑπόδρα ἰδών. But this subject of the gracious courtesy of manners in past ages, must not detain our steps. It has been, in fact, exhausted in other works, and, after all, respecting the form of manners in which the principle of meekness developed itself, there can be no enquiry of any great importance instituted; for this is subject to the changes to which every thing that relates to the conventions of men is exposed.

The Christian society has survived many revolutions in the form of manners, as well as of languages, philosophy and empire. It beheld the hollow professions of flatterers and sensualists, under the Roman Cæsars; the savage roughness of the barbarians of the North; the courtesy of the chivalrous middle ages; the politeness and refinement of the court of France, in later times; and finally, since the revolution in that country, and wherever the new philosophy has spread, it has marked a strong tendency to affect a certain tone of proud isolation and personal insensibility to the ancient harmonies of a social state. Undeserved importance should not be attached to these things, which have no relation whatever with beatitude, beyond what they may derive from that one living source of meekness and benignity, which will never be sought for in vain among those who have raised their eyes to the mountain, whose conclusion will always be that of the wise king, saying, "it is better to be humbled with the meek, than to divide the spoils with the proud."†

That spirit may, indeed, yield to the impression of different external forms; for the fancies of men, which give birth to the language of signs, are capable of being as various as their wants and miseries; but no change in this respect, that the caprice or circumstances of mankind may hereafter demand, will ever be able to efface the traces of its constant operation in the manners of our ancestors, or render doubtful the fact which is so beautifully attested by all kinds of concurrent evidence, that under the simple and manly discipline of ages of faith, modesty and gentleness were virtues belonging to all classes of society, admired in a Bayard or a Chandos, as constituting the courtesy of the accomplished gentleman, revered in an Ambrose or an Anselm, as being the result of saintly meditation, and of holy prayers; as proving the sincerity of a faith which has no lovelier fruits than those which are offered to the Creator in ministering to the necessities of men, to diminish the multiplied wants, and to form even some sweet harmonious tones out of the very discords of our common nature.

* Midsummer Night's Dream, V. I.

† Prov. xvi.

CHAPTER II.

THE history of the middle ages, for reasons which we cannot now stand to discuss, may be considered as a continuation of that of primitive Christianity. We must be prepared, therefore, to meet with the same contrast to the whole spirit and manners of heathen times, and of all nations who subsequently have cast off the authority, and the traditions of the Christian Church. The development of the principle of religious obedience, as belonging to the character and to the blessedness of the meek, is the subject to which our attention must now be directed. History bears testimony to the wide extension and efficacious operation of this principle, during the ages of faith: it was the key-stone of the whole fabric of the spiritual society, and the test by which all efforts to advance were estimated. Disciples of him who was obedient unto death, who came from heaven not to do his own will, but that of him who sent him; in whose heart was written the desire of doing the will of God, men in these ages believed with St. Gregory the Great, that, "it is obedience which produces in the soul all other virtues, and which after producing, preserves them." Accordingly, those who entered the orders of the Carthusians, and the Benedictines, that is to say, those who aspired to Christian perfection, made no other vow but this, on their profession, "Promitto obedientiam secundum regulam;" for that they conceived was to vow every perfection. "Be subject one to another in the fear of Christ," said the Apostle of the nations.* Implicit obedience, where neither religion nor common sense can discern a sin, was prescribed by St. Basil,† by St. Fulgentius,‡ by St. Bonaventura, St. Jerome, St. John Climachus, Cassien, the Abbot Sylvain, St. Bernard, and St. Francis de Sales. It is prescribed, not alone

* Ad Ephes. v.

† Sec Reg. xxviii.

‡ In Vita, c. xxvii.

to the Jesuits, but to all the religious orders, not merely as a distinction, but as being one of the primitive and fundamental characteristics of all who embrace Christianity. Let us hear their sentiments: "What perished and is dead in Adam, hath risen and lives again in Christ. Whatever rose again and lived in Adam, hath perished and is dead in Christ. But what is that?—true obedience and disobedience."* Disobedience and sin, are one and the same. There is no sin but disobedience; and what springs from disobedience.†

What is sin, unless the creature wishing contrary to the will of God?‡ "Consider this when we speak of obedience, of the new man, of true light, of true love, and of the life of Christ; all these things are one and the same. Where one of these is present, all are present; and where one is wanting, all are wanting; for all these things are truly and in fact one."§ Let us now hear Louis of Blois; "No action, however pious or laudable, pleases God, if it be contaminated with the sin of disobedience."|| "In all our works, words, and thoughts, we must sincerely seek God, and refer all things to his honor, and have a heart pure and free. It cannot be said, how grateful to God and fruitful to ourselves will be this holy intention; if a man were only to move his foot, or his hand, or his tongue, purely on account of God, or to incline his head, or to have the least thought, or the least desire according to charity, there would be a great reward for him."¶

Original justice is only obedience; for it consists in these three things, in perfect subjection of the will to God by sanctifying grace, in entire subordination of the inferior powers to reason, and in obedience of the body to the soul. This was the philosophy which presided over education. "What, then, will the youth know on leaving the college?" asks Bonald, "Nothing; for what can one know at eighteen? But if nature has seconded education, and education nature, he will have the mind opened and the body disposed; he will have the knowledge of order, sentiments of affection for others, the habit of obedience."

As the test of piety, and the rule of genius, obedience may be seen in continued operation. St. Gregory, of Tours, relates his conversation with the monk Wulfilaich, who had lived the life of a Stylite in the diocese of Trèves, till he descended for the purpose of destroying a pagan idol, a statue of Diana, whom he had persuaded the people to forsake. "I was then preparing to resume my former mode of life," says the humble monk; "but the bishops came, and said to me—the way that you have chosen is not the right way, and it is not for you to imitate Simeon of Antioch. The climate does not permit you to endure a similar suffering: descend, then, and dwell with the brethren whom you have collected. At these words, that I might not be accused of the crime of disobedience towards the bishops, I descended, and went with them, and took a repast with them. One day, the bishop having drawn me far from the village, sent some workmen with

* Theologia Germanica, cap. xiii.

† Id. xiv.

‡ Id. c. xxxiv.

§ Id. cap. xliii.

|| Enchirid. Parvulorum, lib. I. Doc. v. append.

¶ Id. lib. I. 1.

 Législation primitive, III. 100

hatchets, to destroy the pillar on which I used to hold myself. When I came back the next day, I found it destroyed. I wept; but I would not rebuild it, lest I might be accused of disobeying the bishops. Since that time I dwell here with my brethren.”* Behold, now, obedience as the rule of genius. St. Theresa speaks as follows, in the Prologue to the Castle of the Soul. “Of all the things which obedience obliges me to perform, there is not one which appeared to me so difficult as to write upon prayer; both, because our Lord has not given me sufficient genius to do it well, and that I had no intention to undertake it; and, also, that for the last three months I have suffered such weakness of health and disorder, that I can hardly write upon the most urgent affairs; but, as I know that obedience can render possible what appears impossible, I engage in it with joy, in spite of the resistance of nature. So it is only from the goodness of God that I expect assistance.”

Ælred, of Rievaulx’s cloister that Bernard of England, concludes his Speculum Charitatis with the same testimony. Addressing the person for whom it was written, he says, “I beseech you do not introduce this mirror before the public, lest, perchance, charity should not shine in it, but only the image of the author be found there. If, however, as I fear, you should involve me in that confusion, I beseech the reader, by the sweet name of Jesus, not to suppose that I undertook this work from presumption, since I was compelled to do it by paternal authority, fraternal charity, and my own necessity to obey my superior, to converse with my absent brother, and preserve my own mind from idleness.”†

That I have not overstated the importance which was ascribed to the spirit of obedience, will be clear to every one who is conversant with the moral history of the middle ages. Guizot, speaking of the chapters of St. Benedict’s rule De Obedientia and De Humilitate, takes occasion to remark, what a part this monastic rule of obedience, as he terms it, has played in the history of European civilization. “It is,” he says, “in the monastic institute, that it has been truly developed. It is from thence that it has spread itself through modern civilization. This,” he adds, “is the fatal present which the monks have given to Europe.”‡ This opinion of a writer, who on several occasions, had spoken with more respect of the middle ages than many Catholics, should not be passed by in silence. Let us consider briefly the two questions which it involves. What was the origin of this principle. Did the monks invent it? And can we justly regard its effects as injurious? Is it fatal? Words may, indeed, not tell of that blissful certainty, respecting all such questions, which belongs to the initiated in the heavenly courts, yet these will not disclaim the use of human evidence.

And, therefore, let our reasoning serve, though weak,
For those whom grace hath better proof in store.§

* Greg. Tour. I. 440.
§ Dante.

† Speculum Charitatis in fin.

‡ Cour. d’Hist. Mod. II. 75

The virtue of obedience, as far as relates to mortal agency, commenced with the creation of the race of men. In paradise it had its action, and it revived immediately after the fall. "The tree of knowledge was good in itself," says St. Theophilus, "so was its fruit. It is an error to suppose that it had a property of causing death. This fatal effect was not attached to the tree, but to the disobedience of man. There was nothing in the tree but knowledge, which is good, provided it will be well employed."* In paradise was heard that eloquence which now sounds forth on all sides, recommending the contempt of authority in the pursuit of knowledge, artfully or ignorantly passing over the danger of disobedience, which alone rendered it injurious.

———Knowledge forbidden?

Suspicious, reasonless. Why should their Lord

Envy them that? Can it be sin to know?

Can it be death? And do they only stand

By ignorance? Is that their happy state,

The proof of their obedience and their faith?

Envious commands, invented with design

To keep them low whom knowledge might exalt.

———Is knowledge so despised?

Forbid who will, none shall from me withhold

Longer thy offered good ———.†

So reasoned Satan with those primal creatures whose life was in obedience, and from their fall dates the inclination of the human will to resist that of God, which all other creatures obey; for "nothing resists God," says St. Augustin, "but the will of sinners."—"I speak of that worship of obedience," says St. Eucher, "which even creatures, wholly material, render to their Creator. Behold the stars, how equable and constant their course; the flowers and fruits, which succeed, without interruption, to serve for our pleasures and our necessities. Behold, in a word, the whole creation constantly subject, in the interest of men, to the will of God; and, in the midst of this creation, man alone dares to emancipate himself from this universal subjection, and alone revolts, while all obey around him!" Father Diego de Stella says, that "the beginning of all our misery was Eve's curious disputing about the commandment of God. If she had been obedient she would have replied to Satan, when he asked her why did God forbid her to eat, that the authority of God was sufficient for her, but because she went about to dispute the matter at large, and to exercise her private judgment, she utterly undid herself."‡ On the other hand, a converse offering of obedience was known to be the principle of man's recovery. Thus in apostolic times, St. Irenæus pursues the argument of the apostle, and says, "As the human race was involved in death by a virgin, so is it delivered by a virgin. Virginal obedience is weigh-

* Ad Antolye. lib. II. 35.

† Par. Lost. V.

‡ On the Contempt of the World, III. 480.

ed against virginal disobedience.”* Here, then, were sublime, mysterious examples, ever present to the minds of the faithful when they were tempted by heretics, and called upon to examine, with the serpent, with Eve and Adam, and not obey authority, with all the saints who ever passed to life from the beginning of the world. “From the school of the demon,” says Drexelius, “cometh this, Why, quare aut eur hoe?” So also the guide of Dante,

Seek not the wherefore, race of human kind.

Short is the next step of the fatal way, when Eve’s conclusion is approved.

In plain, then, what forbids he but to know ?
Forbids us good ? forbids us to be wise ?
Such prohibitions bind not.

For these ambitious hopes of false freedom religious obedience presented a secure preventative, and the instructions of faithful ages can only be understood by a reference to this knowledge, and profound consideration of the original malady of the human race. “Believe,” says Taulerus, “every day lost in which you have not resisted your own will for the love of God.”†—“Self-will not consenting to the Divine will is the chief evil of man,” says Drexelius. Remark, here, how well they distinguished between our own will, and a will contrary to God. “We ought not,” says St. Anselm, “always to wish what God wishes ; but we ought to wish that which God wishes us to wish. For God wished that the blessed Martin should be taken from this life ; but if his disciples had wished this they would have been cruel. They knew what God wished ; but they wished what God wished them to wish.”‡ The master of the Sentences shows how two wills may exist in man, that of man, and that of the Christian. As Bede says of Christ—“As man he prayed that the cup might pass from him ; yet again,” he added, “Sed non quod ego volo, sed quod tu vis.”§

“Some one may ask,” says the author of Theologia Germanica, “since this tree, that is self-will, is so contrary to God, and to the eternal will, why did God create it, and place it in paradise ? To this it may be sufficient to answer, that a man, truly humble and illuminated, does not wish that the secrets of God should be revealed to him, to know why God does or defers this or that ; on the contrary, he wishes rather that he himself should be reduced to nothing, and should be void of will, that the eternal will might live in him, and be opposed by no other will.”|| God created the will ; not that it should be self-will, but that it should be conformable to his own, yet with such freedom as was necessary to constitute a distinct agent. Then came the Devil and Adam, that is false nature, and arrogated this will to themselves, and rendered it self-will ; and this is the fatal eating which brought death and all our woe—“for as long as there is this self-will, there can

* Lib. adversus hæreses.

† Epist. viii.

‡ De Similitudinibus, cap. clix

§ Sentent. lib. III. distinct 17.

|| Cap. xlvi.

be no rest.”* “God alone,” says St. Anselm, “ought to wish any thing of his own will. When man wishes any thing of his own will, he takes away from God, as it were, his crown; and as the proper will of God is the source and origin of all good so the proper will of man is the beginning of all evil.”† That there is no exaggeration in this statement of the evil of self-will, would appear equally certain, both from posterior and prior reasoning; whether we argued philosophically or theologically. What in fact, can be a greater proof of its involving some great moral disarrangement, than the very circumstance of that disposition which we can always discover in it, to resist and disobey merely for the sake of disobeying? “Made, as we are, by false nature,” says one who deeply studied the human heart, “it is almost always sufficient, that a thing be ordered or forbidden, to make us feel tempted to resist. Nothing can be more strange or unreasonable, but nothing is more true.”‡ Experience, moreover proves that his own will is a source of misery to the mind of man. Voluisti, domine, eries St. Augustin, “et ita est, ut omnis inordinatus animus sibi ipsi sit poena.” “Oh how great a punishment is a man’s own will unto himself! If that would cease, hell would soon cease also. Whereupon doth the fire of hell work, but upon the will of man? And if any trouble afflict thee, what is the cause of thine affliction, but thine own will?” These are the words of Father Diego de Stella. “This will of our own,” says St. Bernard, “is a great evil whence it comes to pass that your good is no good to you; for of this blood-thirsty parent, there are two insatiable daughters ever crying bring, bring; for the mind is never satiated with vanity, nor the body with lust: self-will, subverting the hearts of men, and blinding the eyes of reason, is a restless evil, which always pressing upon the spirit, meditates things that are beyond thought and unattainable.”§

On the other hand, what peace and joy belonged to the ancient fathers, amidst all their tribulations, because they were meek and full of obedience. There were not wanting to them tribulations, “nam quo quis sanctior, hoc plerumque afflictior;” but that equable serenity of mind proceeded from the conformity of their will, with that of Jesus Christ.|| Dear to them were

Soft silence, and submissive obedience,
Both linckt together never to depart,
Both gifts of God not gotten but from thence,
Both garlands of his saints against their foes offence.¶

Christ apprises men that his yoke is a light and easy burthen, although he had warned them before, that the way which led to him was narrow and strewn with pains. A moment’s reflection to an instructed mind, will be sufficient to show the advantage of religious obedience, and the folly of that sentence of condemna-

* Id. lv.

† S. Anselmi simil. c. viii.

‡ P. Judde œuvres spirit. tom. IV.

§ Serm LXXI. in cant. et serm. in verba, Ecce nos reliquimus omnia.

|| Drexelius de Confor. human. Vol. cum divina, III. 6.

¶ Spenser, iv. 10.

tion, which the modern philosophers have passed upon it. In the first place, these men can claim no exemption for themselves from the general law of nature, which condemns all men to serve: we are servants by nature and by purchase. This world is full of obedience; but is the "obedience of cupidity or of necessity, whereas the obedience of Christians is that of charity." "Behold," says St. Bonaventura, "the obedience of those who serve worldly masters: what promptitude, what zeal, what prevention! No regard to danger, or suffering or difficulty; no view even to personal advantage. They obey, and do not even wait for orders; but watch the countenance of their master: and the least sign, or even a look, is sufficient for them."* "Every man, says St. Anselm, "is born to labor as the bird to flying. Does not almost every man serve either under the name of commanding or of serving? Quid refert, exceptâ superbiâ, quantum vel ad mundum, vel ad Deum, quis vocetur servus?"† Ah! when will human weakness serve God as well as it serves the world; serve heaven as well as it serves the earth; serve virtue with as much zeal as it serves vice! This is the exclamation of St. Peter Chrysologus. And what an unjust, ungrateful master is the world! It hateth and despiseth those who love it: it abandoneth its friends. "Peccavi, tradens sanguinem justum," cried Judas to those for whom he had sacrificed friendship, honor, and all that is dear to the heart of man; for whom he had betrayed the innocent, betrayed his God, and condemned himself to everlasting infamy. But they replied, "quid ad nos? tu videris." How exactly the language of the world, in all times, to its deluded slaves! "Quid ad nos? tu videris." But then it is too late, wretched mortal, to enter upon another service.

That golden sceptre which thou didst reject
Is now an iron rod to bruise and break
Thy disobedience.

Better that thou hadst never been born. On the other hand, observe that the obedience of Christians is not that of necessity. "The will is every thing," says St. Bernard.—"Therefore our Saviour spoke those words: 'Take my yoke upon you,'—as if he had said to them, I do not impose it upon you against your inclination, but take it yourself if you will; otherwise I say unto you, you will never find peace unto your souls, but trouble and vexation."‡ "Beatific love is free," says the meek Hildegard. "Free-will is preserved in faith," as St. Bernard says. St. Augustin shows, that man can only believe by willing: and speaking of the Jews, where it is said in Scripture, that they could not believe, he adds, "Quare non poterant? Si à me queratur, cito respondeo: quia nolabant."§ A holy man was accustomed to say, "Whatever you wish, that you are. Quicquid vis, hoc es: for such is the force of our will, joined to the Divine, that whatever we wish to be, seriously, and with a true intention, that we become. No one ardently wishes to be submissive, patient, modest, or liberal, who does not become what he wishes." This is what the holy man used to say. Faith, according to the doctrine of the Church, is a virtue, and therefore it must depend upon the will : thus St. Thomas says, "Credere est actus intellectus assentientis veritati divine ex imperio voluntatis :"* and St. Bernard says, "take away free-will, and there will be nothing to save;" adding, "take away grace, and there will be no means of saving."† As is read in the schools, "This is the true essence of all religion, that it should be the voluntary and free-tribute of the whole man, that he may be capable of merit or of demerit. And therefore the evidence of this truth is such, that they who wish to see, can see ; and they who wish obstinately not to see, do not see."‡ The Christian religion," says Melchior Canus, "is not like the Pythagorean, which obliged its followers to follow blindly the words of a master, without rendering a reason for them.

* De sept. grad. vit. spiritual. chap. xliiii. xlv. † Epist. lib. I. 15. ‡ De amore Dei
§ Tract. in Joan. 53.

"This is the custom of ignorant persons, Saracens, Pagans, and heretics, who embrace the rash dogmas of their sect, without exercising their judgment, and receive them without any reason. These are not instructed, but confined ; not taught by reason, but acted upon as if by charms and incantations ; but God does not will that his disciples should be thus constrained. Eusebius relates, that Lucian of Antioch, being asked by the judge why, being a rational and prudent man, he followed a sect for which he could render no reason, replied : ' We Christians are not, as you suppose, constrained by the error of any human persuasion ; nor are we, like others, deceived by the tradition of parents, received without enquiry,' and then went on to make an eloquent apology for the faith."§ "We say there are three kinds of liberty," says St. Anselm. "There is the liberty of action, which all wish ; that is, that they may do what they like : there is the liberty of the understanding, which all do not wish ; there is also the liberty of right-will, which is always good, and which very few wish ; that is, that they may wish those things which they ought to wish. It is to be noted, that the liberty of action, without the liberty of good-will, is always evil. Libertas actionis sine libertate bonæ voluntatis semper est mala : the liberty of the understanding is mediate, being good, when joined to liberty of right-will, and evil when without it."||

If now, from the abstract doctrine of obedience, we pass to the institutions and rules of life which proceeded from it, we find the same contrast to the ignoble servitude of the world. True, every one, however low in authority, was to be obeyed in the fear of God ; but in this system, no one was tyrannically required to bow down to the superior talents or strength of a fellow creature, according to the principles of those gross politicians and preachers of false religion, who are continually ascribing to visible men the grandeur of the invisible God. Man never felt himself the slave of his equal, nor was he subject to an arbitrary law.

* S. S. quæst II. art. 9.

† De Grat. et Liv. arbit.

‡ La Hogue Tractat. de Religione, cap. ii. præp. 3.

§ Melch. Can. de Locis Theologicis, lib. XII. cap. iv. ¶ De Similitudinibus, cap. clxxxii.

Besides this perfection in principle, the positive exercise of obedience was the highest freedom. Guizot says, that the code of St. Benedict offers a singular mixture of despotism and liberty. Implicit obedience is the principle, and yet the government is elective—the monks are to obey, but the abbot is to consult them. Thus in the third chapter we read, “Whenever any thing of importance is to be transacted, let the abbot convoke the whole congregation, and let him explain the matter, and hear the opinions of his brethren, and then let him judge. Let him call all the brethren to the council, because God often reveals the best advice to the youngest,” and in conclusion, he admits, that within the cloister, that is, where the principle of obedience was in full operation, men were governed by a more reasonable authority, and in a milder manner, than they would have been in civil society.* There was nothing tyrannical in the ecclesiastical theory of rule. Witness what said the Irish synod in the VIIIth century. Non debet facere quietam sine concilio subjectorum, nisi pauca in liberationem vinctorum, et in consolationem pauperum et viduarum.† What mildness and benignity is here ! The sovereign authority of monastic superiors was totally removed from any thing arbitrary, for all was regulated beforehand ; traditions and customs directed the least actions of the monks ; they prescribed to them how they were to proceed to the chapter-house, or to the refectory : how to return from it ; how they were to assist at the nocturnal office. There were laws for speaking and for silence. The monastic code had regulated every thing down to the mortifications of penance and the innocent enjoyments of the cloister. History records at what epoch of the year, in the monastery of Cluny, beans and herbs were to be seasoned with oil or butter, on what occasions the monks were to have fruits, eggs, spices, and fish. The greatest punishment which a superior could inflict upon a disobedient monastery was to abandon it, for his absence was regarded as the being abandoned by heaven. This is what Michaud says.‡ All this may be seen at any time in a Catholic college, where the greatest discipline and order are united with real freedom, and Christian love ; for the Catholic religion teaches men to bear rule in God’s name, so that their superiors need not keep up their authority by an affectation of superiority and mysterious reserve. All assumption of authority in the Christian state was the work of mutual love. This is indicated in many parts of the ritual and order of the Church, which was in ages of faith the model or basis of the ceremonial of civil society, so that a study of it will throw the greatest light upon the whole theory of the ancient civil government.

Thus in every parish church when a new curate was installed, the ecclesiastic who conducted him to the seat of authority, and he who was to take possession gave each other mutually the embrace and kiss of charity. In short, veneration, consisting of love, fear, and shame, was shown by sons to their parents, by subjects to their rulers, and by all men to priests and to God, whose greater glory was known to be always furthered by obedience to superiors. And we may observe by the way, that generally men were left in no doubt to know what was the will of God. "Quicquid abducit à Deo contra Dei voluntatem est : quicquid ad Deum invitat, ad divinam voluntatem est," said Drexelius.* The will of God which Christ taught was thus expressed in the tract, ascribed to St. Cyprian, on the Pater. "Humility in conversation, stability in faith, modesty in words, justice in deeds, mercy in works, discipline in manners ; to do no injury, to keep peace, to love God, to prefer nothing to Christ, to adhere faithfully to his cross." The source of slavery and of disorder lies deep in the heart of man, where it must be sought, and not in the defect of civil institutions., "The general and outward anarchy in a state," says Plato, "proceeds originally from an internal democracy in the mind of each man who belongs to it : when the sentiments of pleasure and pain which constitute that power in the soul answering to the populace in a state are suffered to prevail, there ensues in that mind an intellectual democracy or anarchy, which is the last and most dreadful evil in a state, and in the soul of man."† Against this the principle of religious obedience was directed, and thus anarchy and servitude were attacked in the sphere of intelligence ; and hence the world was not become as in later days,

* Cours d’Hist. II. † Dacher. Spicileg. tom. IX. ‡ Des Monastères au Moyen Age.

A stage to feed contention in a lingering act.

The spirit of religion was essentially the spirit of order, as the spirit of the religion of later times is that of disorder and confusion, according to which every man rejects the guidance of a common legislator, and lives as he likes best, κυκλωπικῶς θεμιστεύων παίδων ἡδ' ἀλόχον.

The ecclesiastical discipline was received as an universal law ; the desire of the ancient sage thus became the mark at which principles were aimed, and anarchy was taken away from the whole course of human life,‡ so that the visible results could justify the rapture of the ascetic, when he cried, "O sweet and grateful service of God, by means of which man is rendered truly sanctified and free."§

"When man arrogates to himself a liberty for the sake of sin, or what is contrary to God, he can endure no disappointment or misery. Then rise up to heaven the interminable murmurs of his bitter discontent. This is not a true divine liberty from a true divine light, but it is a natural, unjust, false, erring, and diabolic liberty, from a natural, false, and erring light."|| It is not strange that men under the influence of this liberty should regard the obedience of faithful ages with aversion and disdain. They are strangers to obedience unless in case of a command, like that of Ulysses telling them to remember eating and drinking, and then they obey as readily as the companions of that hero.

οἱ δ' ὧκα ἐμοῖς ἐπέεσσι πίθοντο.¶

* De Confor. Voluntat. Hom. lib. I. c. iv. † De Legibus, lib. III. ‡ Plato De Legibus, XII. § De Imitat. III. 10. ¶ Theolog. Germanic. cap. xli. ¶ Od. X. 178.

Dante describes them in these terms :

———Nor curb
 Avails you, nor reclaiming call, heav'n calls,
 And, round about you wheeling, courts your gaze
 With everlasting beauties. Yet your eye
 Turns with fond dotting still upon the earth,
 Therefore he smites you who discerneth all.*

The effects of religious obedience in these ages may be considered in relation to the temporal and spiritual authority, in both of which respects they appear equally admirable. With regard to the first. "See what a dignity it is, men said, to acknowledge none over thee but God, and what is greater than to be under him?"† By obeying God in man, I never obey my inferior or my equal; but only him whose service is a kind of empire and royalty. Nothing can be more flattering to all the noble sentiments of nature than to be called upon to exercise holy obedience. In such a service no one is found to pray to heaven like the watchman of Æschylus, for a remission of his knightly and servile labor.‡ I am created for God. All below God is unworthy of me. The ascetical writers observe, "that here we cannot be too proud, since such pride is but justice, and that the natural sense of dignity may be at the bottom only a motion of this true greatness misdirected."§

This is the spirit which entitles a man to the praise bestowed on Job, when it is said "fuit vir unus," always consistent with himself because united to the divine will. Satan and his accomplices having rebelled, God created man, and subjected to his service angel wings, and established him as his representative, and as his knight against the devil. The moral dignity of persons who act from religious obedience, seems something above humanity; they move then like blessed spirits, conformable in all things to the eternal order, and one beholds in them, as it were embodied and shadowed forth, the majesty of him whom they serve. In relation to the spiritual authority, the religious obedience of these ages might suggest innumerable reflections; the first and most obvious is that of Louis de Blois, where he says, "Heresy has no other source but pride and disobedience; for heretics obstinately follow their own sense, and are unwilling to submit their own judgment to the decrees and judgment of the Catholic Church."||

Such were the men described by Dante :

Who journey'd on, and knew not whither : fools
 Who, like to scymitars, reflected back
 The Scripture-image by distortion marr'd.¶

To their reproaches, the Catholic might have replied in the words of Milton :

* Purg. xiv.

† Meditat. for the use of the English Coll. at Lisbo. IV. 3.

‡ Agamemnon, i.

§ P. Juddle Retraite Spirit. 68.

|| Enchirid Parvulorum, lib. I. doc. v. append. ¶ Parad. XIII.

———— Still thou err'st, nor end will find
Of erring, from the path of truth remote :
Unjustly thou deprav'st it with the name
Of servitude, to serve whom God ordains.

———— This is servitude.
To serve th' unwise, or him who hath rebell'd
Against his worthier.

Omitting all higher considerations than those of the present life, what a loss of wisdom and of peace was theirs ! They had no moral dignity arising from a sense of their own position with regard to the universal order. In society they were seen ever hanging upon the tongue of strangers, in hopes of some novelty, ever anxious, and curious, and unsettled, loving debate and discussion μῆστορας ἀϋτῆς: prying into the opinions of others, and ready to acknowledge that they were themselves without conviction ; as attentive to a libertine or an apostate, as our ancestors would have been to a man of the interior life. The Holy Ghost thus describes them : “ Arundinem vento agitatam, folium quod vento rapitur.” *—Having abandoned the rule of truth, they found themselves on a moving soil on which their reason could not find rest. The last extravagance of human error is to make a religion of independence. The sentiments of eternity which the Christian revelation has imparted to men, left without authority in faith, expose the human mind to speedy destruction. Physicians themselves have remarked the fact, that the spirit of sect favors the development of mental alienation, while Catholicism imposing obedience, that burden of Christ which has wings not weight, presents to it the greatest obstacle. The extravagance of a religious zeal without discipline and order, to which every ardent mind without the Church is subject, is one of the primal sources of insanity ; and this is for ever excluded from the meek communion of Catholics : for

In its devotion, nought irregular
This mount can witness, or by punctual rule
Unsanction'd ; here from every change exempt,
No influence can reach us. †

But independent of all temporal considerations, their error was most manifest : and here I must anticipate a theological argument, and give it in the words of Fenelon. Jesus Christ speaks thus : “ If any one hear not the Church, let him be unto you as a heathen and as a publican.” “ Remark here,” says Fenelon, “ that he saith not, if any one hear not the Church of his country, or that to which among different churches he is attached by his birth or by his inclination ; he does not suppose many churches between which each one might choose according to his liking ; he supposes but one, which was to be his spouse for ever. Schism, which establishes many churches in spite of Jesus Christ, who desires that there should be but one, is therefore the greatest of all crimes. In vain do our separated brethren maintain that the ancient Church was fallen to ruin, and into the desolation of idolatry.

* Matt. xii. Job. xiii. † Dante. Purg. XXI.

“ If the visible Church was for a single day to have become idolatrous, Jesus Christ would not have said, absolutely and without restriction of times and nation, ‘If any one does not hear the Church.’ On the contrary, he would have said, ‘If any one hear the Church during ages of error and idolatry, let him be unto you as a heathen and a publican.’ ”* In fact, the moderns have transferred their obedience to a human society upon the principle of the ancient world, “Deos patrio more et ex instituto civitatum colendos :” though according to their own system, obedience to any authority ought to be equally condemned : to recommend it is raising a Doric pæon in the Athenian camp, adding only distrust and confusion to their own allies.† A purely domestic state of religious society is what is called natural religion, and the public state of this society is revealed religion. “One may remark,” says Bonald, “a great parade of domestic affections in all sects who wish to bring back domestic religion into public society, and at the same time a great indifference for public duties.”‡ In the patriarchal times, when the rule of faith was by domestic tradition, to refrain from following the religion of one’s parents would have been a fatal apostasy ; but under the Christian dispensation, this authority was transferred to the public society of the Church, which all the nations of the earth were to obey. “O my daughter, hear and behold ; lend an ear to my lessons, forget the house of thy father, and then the King of heaven will have pleasure in thy beauty.” It is thus that God speaks to the soul of man in the 40th Psalm. Thus does he wish that after the example of Abraham, this soul should quit its country, its parents, should abandon the regions of the Chaldeans, that is to say, the places which are subject to the empire of the demons, to fix its abode in the land of the living, which is the Church, that cherished land, the object of the ardent sighs of the prophet, when he said, “I hope, yes I hope to behold one day the riches and the perfections of my God in the land of the living.”§ To resist this authority and yet retain the title of those who would defend the faith, must render men the very objects of that angelic reproof.

———And could’st thou faithful add? O name,
O sacred name of faithfulness profan’d!
Faithful to whom?

Indeed, in the commencement of the deplorable separation, no such inconsistency could be charged upon the innovators. As they are described by the contemporaries, the son was armed against his father the brother against the brother, the servant against his master.

*Les enfans sans raison disputent de la foy,
Et tout à l’abandon va sans ordre et sans loy :*

* Lettres sur l’Eglise.

† Thucyd. VII. 47.

‡ Législation Primitive, Tom. I. 421.

§ St. Hieron. Epist. ad Eustoch. Virg.

Morte est l'autorité: chacun vit en sa guise;
 Au vice desreglé la licence est permise:

Thus writes Pierre de Ronsard, in his Discourse on the Miseries of his time. "Alas ! how sad is the present condition of Christians," said Fuller, "who have a communion disuniting !" The reply of these men whom no yoke could bow, and no bridle hold, to the invitations so affectingly addressed to them by Catholic pastors, reminds one of that answer given to the Prince of Angels in Milton.

———Err not, that so shall end
 The strife which thou call'st evil, but we style
 The strife of glory ; which we mean to win,
 Or turn this heav'n itself into the hell
 Thou fablest, here however to dwell free,
 If not to reign.*

But it is not strange that disobedience should produce such fruit on earth, when it was able to change into demons those who, full of wisdom and perfect in beauty, were once in the delights of the paradise of God.† Let us return to those that were faithful, found among the faithless, to that one fold of which all the sheep hear the voice of the shepherd, follow him and fly from the alien,‡ to those who had no idea of a perfection that did not consist in obedience, and who were content with the knowledge that the meek are blessed.

* Book IV. 288.

† Ezech. xxviii.

‡ Joan X.

CHAPTER III.

I APPROACH a subject of the highest importance, which demands all our attention : of infinite extent and requiring the tongue of an angel, I can but present a few detached fragments to employ the reflections of the reader, and summon to my aid the sentences of angelic men, who have treated upon it in their writings. As in some vast metropolis, when a civil rage has burst through all restraints, and pushed to open war, a thunder of artillery has shaken its most solid towers, and each man who loved order, has been exposed to death ; if at the drawing on of evening shade, some pious recluse is heard to sound the angelus bell, which recalls the days of meek obedience ; then tears burst from the eyes of many, who before seemed unmoved by all the desolation : so does joy well from the heart of those, long conversant with heretic debate, when their thoughts return to the Church of Christ, to that house of sweet untroubled order, of gentleness and peace.

Religion is the reason of all society, since, without it, man cannot find the reason of any power or of any duty. Religion, then, is the fundamental constitution of every state of society. Civil society is composed of religion and state, as the reasonable man is composed of intelligence and organs. Man is an intelligence which ought to make its organs serve to the end of its happiness and perfection. Civilized society is nothing but religion which makes political society serve to the perfection and happiness of the human race. These are the observations of the illustrious Bonald,* whose theory of government might be taken for a history of what existed among men during the ages of faith.

The Church is defined by theologians, to be "the society of wayfaring men, who profess the true doctrine of Christ." When our eyes are once opened upon the wisdom and providence of God in the establishment and government of his Church, we are filled with astonishment at the new points of view which are unfolded in history ; and, as Bonald says, "we feel confounded at the thought of the number of books which require to be re-written." From whatever side one regards the spirit and the institutions of the Catholic Church, one is ravished with admiration ; as in every thing that relates to it, one perceives the assistance and the action of the Divinity. The more one fathoms the secrets of this mysterious spouse of the Divine Word, the greater are the torrents which seem to burst forth, of a light as dazzling as it is unexpected. There is nothing, even in the smallest detail of its belief and practice, which does not offer more truths, and more real wisdom, than can ever be discovered by the investigations of science or genius. Well may she address her children, in the beautiful words of Dante,

* Législation, Primit. II. 132.

To rear me was the task of power divine,
Supremest wisdom, and primeval love.

The sentiment of their own dignity, as being members of the Holy Catholic Church, made the meek men of faithful ages feel their hearts beat within them. In their faith they possessed all things; they could find all things; while without it, there was only nothingness, fatigue, and affliction of spirit.* But observe well with St. Cyril of Jerusalem, that it is of the Catholic Church we speak, that which possesses throughout the universe an unlimited power. Therefore adds this holy bishop, if you should ever arrive as a stranger in any city, do not ask merely where is the Church? the heretics dare to give themselves this name: but ask where is the Catholic Church; for that is its particular name—that is the special title of this holy mother of all the faithful, of this glorious spouse of our Lord Jesus Christ, only Son of God.† Soon after the ages of faith there arose churches, established by human law, systems raised up like the walls of Athens, bearing marks of having been constructed in haste, and to meet the peculiar circumstances of the moment: for it is the property of all sects to pander to the temporary passions of men; and it is their end to be despised and forsaken by the unstable troop that followed them, as soon as that passion subsides: hence it was easy to detect them. The parts were not jointed into each other; but laid on just as each person, man or woman could throw them; and among them one might have discovered many pillars from tombs, στίλαι ἀπὸ σημάτων, and carved stones which had been brought to the work from a distance.‡ But as for the Church of the ages of faith, the Christian, the Catholic, or if men will, the Roman or papal, for all these mean the same thing, any one could, in an instant, point it out, for there was no other like it. As Nausicaa says to Ulysses, speaking of the house of her royal father, in the city of the Phœcians:

ῥεῖα δ' ἀρίγνωντ' ἰδοτὶ παῖς ἡγήσασατο νῆπιος.§

This was Catholic: not merely, as we shall see hereafter, from catholicity of doctrine and of time, but also of necessity from catholicity of places. There could be no region where its name had not reached.|| This was visible, and men were not then infected with the hatred of all visible authority; but they knew that man, body as well as mind, cannot be governed by pure abstractions without reality. Even its adversaries admitted generally, with Melancthon, that a Church must be visible, of which the Son of God said, “tell it to the Church;” and of which the apostle said that it was made a spectacle to the world and to men.

* Revue Catholique, tom. I. † S. Cyril. Gatechesis, XVIII. ‡ Thucyd. lib. I. 93.
§ Od. VI. 300. ¶ La Hogue tractat. de Eccles. LXI.

They admitted with him, that "the portentous discourses which denied the visibility of the Church, destroyed all the testimonies of antiquity, abolished judgments, and introduced an endless anarchy.*" This Church, in its threefold state of being militant, patient, and triumphant, comprised the three divisions of all that belongs to men, with respect to the earth, purgatory, and heaven. This was commemorated as not having spot or wrinkle; but yet, as St. Augustin says, "such words were not to be understood in reference to its present, but to its future state, when it is to appear glorious: for now" he adds, "on account of some ignorance, and the infirmities of its members, it has daily reason to say, Dimitte nobis debita nostra."† But as a remedy for the woes of man, and a source of needful truth, it was universal and infallible: it was a light to guide his feet into the paths of peace. If it did not remove every shade which rests upon the ways of the mortal life, it furnished a steady lustre, which not only sufficed to guide him safely, but which made him discover even charms in the darkness at his side, so that he might exclaim, in the words of Dante:

O sun! who healest all imperfect sight,
Thou so content'st me, when thou solv'st my doubt,
That ignorance not less than knowledge charms.‡

As St. Hilary said in his book on the Trinity, "The Church offered a remedy against all diseases of the mind and heart, it comprised so great a number of truths, that it could pursue error under all its forms, and in all directions. Its truth was ever manifested by what its adversaries held. It was unchangeable in its essence, but it was known and appreciated better in proportion as the attacks against it were multiplied. It was the sublime prerogative of the Church that it should triumph when attacked: that its truths should most shine forth when men wished to accuse it of error; and that it should repair its losses by new conquests. After separating from it, the adversaries separated from one another; and in attacking each other and gaining victories over each other, they, in fact, conquered for the interest of the Church, whose factors they were; for thus the errors of one sect were overthrown by another; her foes slew themselves, and their controversies ended in confirmation of the Catholic doctrine."

The moderns practically divide the human race into two classes. It is either their country, their political party, their school of philosophy, their domestic circle, their immediate family, and the whole rest of mankind whom they are willing to dismiss from their thoughts, or to speak of them with contempt or anger, as the impulse of the moment may direct them. In the ages of faith also, men divided the human race into two classes, but only one of them had a real, visible, and present existence, and this was the Church of Jesus Christ; that immense society, embracing men of all ages and all nations, and all scholars of philosophy and descending by a series of saints and great men, from Jesus Christ and thence from the patriarchs and the cradle of the universe. The other, the world condemned by Jesus Christ, was known only in theory as an abstraction, and referred to the Omniscient Judge who was to make the final separation. With respect to the institution of the Church, what we are chiefly called upon to consider in this place is the measure employed by the providence of God to preserve it in unity; and here is a theme that demands everlasting admiration, to be described only in the celestial language of the saints. St. Peter and St. Paul are martyred at Rome, "which obtains," says St. Ambrose, "the principality and the headship of nations, that where had been the head of superstition, there might rest the head of sanctity; that where the princes of the Gentiles dwelled, there might inhabit the princes of the churches."*

* Opera, Præfat.

† S. August. Retract. Lib. II, cap. xviii.

‡ Hell, XI.

Celebrated is the passage of St. Leo, where he speaks of St. Peter coming to Rome. "What were the nations of which there were not natives there? Here were to be overthrown the opinions of philosophy; here were to be dissolved the vanities of earthly wisdom; here was to be abolished the worship of demons; here was to be destroyed the impiety of all kinds of sacrilege; for here was collected with the most diligent superstition, all that was ever instituted by vain error. To this city then, O blessed apostle Peter, didst thou fearlessly come; and into this wood of roaring monsters didst thou enter with that companion of thy glory, Paul: trusting thyself upon the ocean of most turbulent depth, with more constancy than when thou didst walk upon the sea."† St. Peter concludes his first epistle, speaking of the Church of Rome, as that which is collected in Babylon; for by Babylon he meant Rome, according to the interpretation of Tertullian, Eusebius, St. Jerome, St. Augustin, Orosius, and others; and it was so designated on account of the influx of all kinds of error and superstition. And now behold, through the amazing grace of highest God, what a change is here. Tacitus said of Rome, "that to that city from all sides, every thing atrocious and shameful flowed in; and we may say of Christian Rome, that thither flowed in from all parts of the world, whatever was illustrious and holy. Do we seek the testimony of genius? Petrarch having to choose between being crowned by the university of Paris, or by the senate of Rome, prefers the city where dwells the pontiff, who holds in his hand the whole race of men that worship Christ with knowledge. V'siede il successor del maggior Piero. Even Dante forgets his prejudices, as a Ghibelin, when he beholds the gracious vision of Matilda. Is it the opinion of the learned that we demand? "Of all the places of the earth that I have visited," says the author of the martyrs, "Rome is the only one to which I should wish to return, and where I should be happy to pass my life." Is it the opinion of those who study heavenly wisdom that we require? "If you approach Italy," says Tertullian, "you have there the Church of Rome, whose decisions and doctrines give to ours all their authority."‡ Do we desire to learn what were the sentiments of the saints? St. Vincent de Paul wrote from Rome, to say that "he was so consoled to find himself in that city, the metropolis of the Church militant, containing the bodies of St. Peter and St. Paul, and of so many other saints and martyrs, who have shed their blood for Jesus Christ, that he counted himself happy in walking upon ground which had been trodden by so many holy personages, and that this consolation had moved him to tears." Is it the judgment of the intelligent and deeply reflecting writers of the middle age that we desire to know? Suger's early acquaintance with the court of Rome, is assigned as one source of his subsequent wisdom of administration, when, as a regent of France, he merited the title of the father of his country. Even John of Salisbury, when relating his first conversation with Pope Adrian IV. at Beneventum, respecting the scandalous reports that prevailed against the administration, founded upon the riches which were drawn to Rome, has the candor to say "unum tamen audacter conscientia teste profiteor, quia nusquam honestiores clericos vidi quam in ecclesia Romana, aut qui magis avaritiam detestentur." The Pope reminded him of the fable of the belly and the members, and concluded by saying, "Such, my brother, is the case in the republic of the Church. Be slow, therefore to condemn, but attend to the general utility."*

* Serm. LXVI. De Natali S. Apost. Pet. et Paul. † S. Leonis Papæ Serm. I. de S. S. Apost.

‡ De Præscript. xxxvi.

May a rude and recent pilgrim be allowed to add his humble testimony? Of all the cities in the world which his eyes have looked upon, there appears most faith, most piety in Rome. In no other place, does human nature as exalted by the religion of Jesus Christ, appear so innocent and so worthy of the grandeur of its Maker. All is spiritual within those holy gates. There one sees the saintly host of men separate to the Church, there walk innocent troops of holy students, angels of modesty; there are the lovers of wisdom, who exercise rule with meekness under the great pontiff who succeeds to Peter's chair; there kneels a multitude of poor continually in the churches, like those described in the mysterious vision of the blessed John, who had no rest day or night, saying, "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, who was, and who is, and who is to come!" Rome, in her monuments, in her traditionary exercises, in her ceremonies, in her inscriptions, in her tone of manners, preserved by the fostering rule of Popes, speaks more forcibly to the reason and to the heart of man, than any book that ever was written to prove the truth of Christianity. While the civil power has imparted a certain tone of paganism to nearly all other states, there religion is made to the eye of all men, the one thing of paramount necessity. There only Christ seems to reign unopposed; from thence only seem to have fled the enemies of our Lord's cross; there only seems to have already conquered the Lion of the tribe of Judah. He who finds himself at Rome, wonders not that he should have past seas and lands from far to visit it, but rather why all men who worship Christ do not flock eagerly thither to supplicate and adore. Thence returning, he looks with careless indifference upon all other cities which now seem to him as only the fit residence for barbarous courts and unlettered merchants; from henceforth there remains only the care of cherishing precious, inestimable recollections; this earth can present no higher testimony; all is seen.

* De Nugis Curialium, lib. VI. cap. xxiv.

But it is necessary to speak more at large respecting the doctrine of the supremacy of Rome, which was universally acknowledged in ages of faith, and which was the foundation of all their spiritual greatness. The language of holy antiquity, adduced in evidence here, will render unnecessary any other explanation or any further comments. St. Ignatius, Bishop of Antioch, the second from St. Peter, begins his Epistle to the Romans, "Ignatius to the Church that is sanctified, which presides in the region of the Romans." St. Irenæus says, "that all Churches of the world are to submit to the Roman Church."* Tertullian again says, "could Peter be ignorant, who was called the foundation stone of the Church to whom was given the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and the power of binding and loosing upon earth."† St. Cyril, of Alexandria, in his book against the Greeks cited by St. Thomas, says, "All bow their head to Peter by divine right, whom the primates of the world obey as if the head Jesus. We, therefore, that are members ought to obey our head, the Roman Pontiff, and adhere to the Apostolic See." St. Chrysostom says, "that St. Peter deserved to become for ever the fixed and indestructible foundation of the Church."‡ "Always remain united in heart and mind, in communion with the chief of the Roman Church," says St. Jerome, "and however prudent, however firm in good principle you may believe yourself to be, never lend an ear to any one who would speak to you of a faith which is not that of St. Peter, of whom the existing Pope is the true and only successor." This is what St. Jerome says,§ and again, he asks Rufinus, "Is our faith that of the Roman Church, or is it that contained in the books of Origen?" If he answers it is Roman—then we are Catholics. "Si Romanam, ergo Catholici sumus."|| Again "whoever you are that assert new doctrines, I beseech you to spare Roman ears: spare that faith which is praised by the voice of the Apostle."¶ "Be it known that the Roman faith cannot be changed." The fourteenth Epistle of St. Jerome to Pope Damasus, proves how universally and completely this doctrine was established at that time. The sermons which remain of St. Asterus, Archbishop of Amasia, who died at the beginning of the fifth century, form a precious evidence respecting the universal jurisdiction of the sovereign pontiff as well as other parts of Catholic discipline. Even a heathen writer of the fourth age says, "In episcopo Romano positam esse præcipuam Christianorum auctoritatem." Hence arose, in the distant provinces of the empire, a confusion of names, similar to what now exists among the populace of England; for the heathens of Gaul used to call the Catholics, Romans. Thus the pagan king, Theodegisilus, thought to account for

* Advers. Hæres.

† De Præscript. cap. xxii.

‡ Serm. on the 12 Apost.

§ Epist. ad Demetriad.

|| Advers. Ruf. Lib. I.

¶ Epist. xli.

 Ammian. Marcellin, lib. XV. cap. vii.

a miracle by saying, "Ingenium est Romanorum et non est Dei virtus." St Gregory of Tours adds here in a parenthesis, "Romanos enim vocitant homines nostræ religionis."* The constant exercise of primal jurisdiction by the Roman Pontiff is to be remarked. In the second century Pope Victor proposed to excommunicate those who did not celebrate the paschal festival on the same day as the Roman Church. In the third century, Pope Stephen acted similarly with respect to those who held the necessity of rebaptism, and neither the Asiatic nor African Churches ever objected to this as an invasion of their rights. "In the Apostolic See," the fathers of the fourth council of Constantinople recognize "the whole and true solidity of the Christian religion." Prayers were offered up for the Pope in the Eastern Churches until the fifth century, when Acacius, the Bishop of Constantinople, dared to erase his name from the sacred Dyptychs. "The Roman chair," says St. Augustin, "is the rock which the proud gates of hell do not conquer."† "Infidelity can have no access to the Roman and principal See," says St. Cyprian.‡

"It is on St. Peter alone," he says in another place, "that the Lord has founded his Church : it is to him that he confided the care of feeding his sheep, and although after his resurrection, he gave to all his apostles an equal power, saying, "As my Father hath sent me, so send I you," nevertheless, in order to make all enter into unity, he established only one chair, and this chair is that of Peter. Doubtless the other apostles were all endowed with the honor of the same functions, but by this disposition of the Saviour, all is confined to unity, all flows from this unity. The supremacy is given to Peter, in order that there may be only one Church of Jesus Christ, and only one chair whence truth may be extended to all the world. And is he who will not preserve this unity to believe that he can preserve faith? Has he who resists the Church, who abandons the chair of Peter on which the Church is founded, has he the presumption to believe that he is within the Church? As for the Christians of all ranks, as for us above all who are bishops and guardians of the Church, it is our duty to preserve with care, to defend this precious unity, in order to prove by this that the episcopacy also is one and indivisible. Let no one seek by falsehood to deceive his brethren. The episcopacy, I repeat it is one. The Church is one as there is but one light, although the sun has an infinity of rays. And as the innumerable branches of a great oak united with the trunk and roots form but one tree, so the Church has but one chief and one principle. Woe then to those who separate themselves from this unity, without which there can be nothing solid and immutable in the Church. In separating themselves, they detach themselves from the principle of life, as the branches which have been cut off from the trunk whence they derive nutriment, fail not soon to languish, and to lose all the lustre of their freshness and verdure."§ Accordingly, he says of Novatian, that despising apostolical tra-

Greg. Turon. Miracul. lib. I. 25.

† In PS. cont. Port. Donat.

‡ Epist. lv.

§ Lib. de Unitate Eccles.

dition, he rose from himself; and, therefore, he calls him, "Episcopum adulterum et extraneum qui humanam conatur facere ecclesiam." Admitting that he might have had ordination, he had no mission.* In answer to Antonianus who had asked what was the heresy of Novatian, he replied, "Be it known to you that we have no curiosity to enquire what he teaches, since he teaches without. If he were to be slain for the name of Christ, without the Church, he could not be crowned."† According to the universal doctrine of antiquity, schism was a crime which not even martyrdom could expiate. It rendered useless even a right faith. "Why when they believe rightly," says St. Jerome, "do they make themselves Arians by their obstinacy, dividing the Church, though convinced of the truth?" St. Bernard, so deeply instructed in the faith of all preceding ages, speaks as follows to Pope Eugene: "Come let us examine who you are, and what person you bear for a time in the Church of God. Who are you? A great priest, a great pontiff. You are the prince of bishops; you are the heir of the apostles; in primacy you are Abel, in government Noah, in patriarchate Abraham, in order Melchisedech, in dignity Aron, in authority Moses, in jurisdiction Samuel, in power Peter, in unction Christ."‡

Such, then, is the universal sense of Christian antiquity upon this subject. It might seem superfluous to produce similar testimonies from the documents of the middle ages, whose sentiments on this point were so faithful and exact; but the attempt of some modern scholars to claim a sympathy where they might least expect to find it, (for there were more heresies in the primitive Church, than during the middle ages) will render it necessary to prevent their objections by evidence from the very quarter which they have deemed vulnerable. Neander, in eulogizing the character of St. Boniface, the apostle of Germany, has the courage to maintain that he was opposed to the claim of the Roman supremacy; and some English writers have attempted to defend a similar position, with respect to the early churches of Britain and Ireland. These, however, are the paradoxes of controversial writers, which no historian has been found to advocate. Truly, what that time was when England was Christian before being Catholic or Roman, if men would rather, I think scarcely sphynx can tell. Guizot quotes the saying of St. Boniface, that "Rome is the centre, and the Pope the chief of Christianity;" and he even says, that in converting Germany, St. Boniface "gave it as it were to the popedom."

In an epistle to Pope Stephen, St. Boniface says, "If any thing should be found, said, or done, by me, less skillfully or unjustly, with a ready will and humility I declare myself desirous of being corrected by the judgment of Rome;"§ and again he says, "we have decreed and confessed that we will maintain the Catholic faith and unity, and subjection to the Roman Church, to the end of our lives. Moriatur, si Deus voluerit, pro sanctis legibus Patrum nostrorum, ut hæreditatem cum

* Epist. 55.

† Epist. 65.

‡ De Consideratione.

§ Epist. xci.

illis æternam consequi mereamur.”* In another epistle he signs himself a bishop, discipulus Romanæ ecclesiæ.† Such were the sentiments of these Anglo-Saxon missionaries, whom some late writers have attempted to describe as founders of what they term their national liberties. Their maxim recorded, was that of all Christian antiquity, “quid enim prosunt honorum operum emolumenta,” said they, “si extra Catholicam gerantur ecclesiam?”‡ The constant intercourse between Britain and Rome may be well conceived from the sentence of the Saxon Chronicle, “This year there was no journey to Rome; except that King Alfred sent two messengers with letters.”§ To the doctrine of the Irish Church, down to the eighth century, that is long before its reception of the Pallium,|| express testimony is borne by the decree of the synod, published by Daehlerius, in his Spicilegium. “Patricius ait : si questiones in hac insula oriantur ad sedem Apostolicam referantur.”¶ Alas, reader ! forgive me, and speak now as with a friend. Walks there a man this day upon the earth, so remorseless, as to turn away from these testimonies of ancient British faith without some touch of pity, misgiving, or amaze, when he contrasts them with what now passes “through distortion of misguided wills?” Say, how comes it that gentle minds, so formed for truth and love, should still remain closed to such plain accumulated evidences, and that men who have ever stood beneath the mountain should give utterance to such fearful words as we hear :

———Is there no place for union left ?
None left but by submission ; and that word
Disdain forbids me, and my dread of shame,
After so long a course
Of other promises and other vaunts,
Than to submit——

If it had been possible to have followed some of the first seducers into the deep recesses of their hearts, and to have seen the doubt and desolation there, how surely would the strain have changed !

———Ah me, they little know
How deadly I abide that boast so vain,
Under what torments inwardly I groan.
Such Joy ambition finds.——

This would be the place to speak of the meek reverence with which the sovereign pontiffs were treated in ages of faith : clearly it must have corresponded with their elevation, since it was generally the piety of the faithful which gave force to their dignity ; yet the presence of Pope Leo I. clothed in his pontifical vestments, made even Attila tremble, and obliged him to retire and abandon his resolution of destroying Rome. When Pope Stephen V. came into France, the Emperor Lewis repaired to Rheims to meet him. On coming into his presence he prostrated himself three times, and then maintained with grandeur, during the interview, the majesty of the throne. "It is the interest of princes," says Don Savedra, "to have their eyes like the Heliotrope, always turned upon the sun of the pontifical tiara. Don Alonzo V. of Aragon, in the article of death, charged his son Don Fernando, king of Naples, to esteem nothing so much as the authority of the apostolic see; and to take care never to offend the sovereign pontiffs, whatever right might be on his side. Impiety or imprudence make it a point of honor to show fierceness towards the popes; but humility towards them is not a weakness; it is religion: it is no dishonor; it is a glory: the most submissive deference of the greatest princes, is only a pious magnanimity, which serves as an example to subjects, to show respect to all that is sacred: no infamy results to those who render it, but rather an universal praise, as that which attended the Emperor Constantine, when he took the lowest seat in a council of bishops; and the King Egiquez, when he prostrated himself on the ground at another celebrated council in Toledo."*

* Epist. cv. † Epist. xci. ‡ Id. Epist. xlv. § P. cxii. || S. Bernard. vit. S. Malach. c. xv. ¶ Tom. IX. lib. XX. cap. 5.

And here a reflection suggests itself forcibly to the reason of man; for that in every country of the world differing from each other so widely in manners, tastes, opinions, and supposed interests, there should be always in every age, such a number of persons profound in learning, ardent in enterprise, and full of patriotism, entertaining sentiments so perfectly opposed to all natural and human notions of society, all agreeing to maintain and willing to die like Sir Thomas More and Fisher, for the doctrine of the supremacy of the Roman pontiffs; a doctrine such as the heathen world could never have conceived, and which we may, at the same time remark is the object of detestation with all who systematically attack revelation, is a fact assuredly most striking and unparalleled, and enough to make all reasonable men pause before they acquiesce in the judgment of those who lament it as the result of error. The intervention of God in the establishment and preservation of his Church, is the miracle of history.

Mabillon remarks as an instance, that at no time were the faithful of various countries more devoted and reverential in their professions to the Holy See, than in times when unworthy popes had succeeded to the apostolic chair. Thus Sergius, Archbishop of Cologne, and Rogerus Hammaturgensis modestly besought Sergius III. to bestow the pallium. How reasonable might it have seemed to condemn the person with the acts of Stephen VII. in his conduct to Formosus? And yet Auxilius, who wrote to Stephen in favor of Formosus, speaks thus to him: "omni humanæ potestati subditi esse debemus, et quam maxime apostolicæ."† With the same reverence did Fulco of Rheims apply to this unworthy pontiff; and the letters of Hatto of Mayence, and his suffragans, to John IX. contain these words: "Noverit sublimitas sanctitatis vestræ quod nulla Fratrum unanimitas sanctæ Romanæ Ecclesiæ potestati subjecta, fidelior atque devotior ac subjectior apparet. quam nos, qui vestræ dominationi et capiti omnium ecclesiarum omni mentis intentione subjeimur.” Theolmar of Salzburg, and other bishops of Bavaria, wrote to the same John, declaring, that by no reports of perversity, could they ever be recalled from obedience to the Roman See. “We never believe, that from that holy and apostolic seat, which is to us the mother of sacerdotal dignity, and the origin of the Christian religion, any thing of perversity can flow, but only doctrine and the authority of ecclesiastical reason.”* Thus stood erect the pillar amidst the greatest wreck of high ordained spirits, as when the synagogue was most obscured, a more than ordinary sound from the voice of prophets announced that it had not fallen. We may add to the observation of Mabillon, that the veneration of men has also been always most strikingly exhibited towards that primal seat, at moments when, to the eye of the world, its glory seemed to have been nearest to the point of extinction. Cardinal Pacea has described scenes in confirmation of this truth which in point of sublimity and pathos surpass perhaps all instances recorded in the past history of the Church; but the account given by a late illustrious philosopher of what he beheld on the return of Pius VII. will perhaps be most interesting, as the unsuspicious testimony of a stranger. “I went out,” says Sir Humphrey Davy, “with almost the whole population of Rome, to receive and welcome the triumphal entry of Pius VII., that illustrious Father of the Church, into his capital; a man whose sanctity, firmness, meekness, and benevolence, are an honor to human nature. He was borne on the shoulders of the most distinguished artists, headed by Canova: and never shall I forget the enthusiasm with which he was received: it is impossible to describe the shouts of triumph and of rapture sent up to heaven by every voice. And when he gave his benediction to the people, there was an universal prostration, a sobbing, and marks of emotions of joy almost like the bursting of the heart; I heard every where around me cries of ‘the holy father, the most holy father! his restoration is the work of God!’ I saw tears streaming from the eyes of almost all the women about me; many of them were sobbing hysterically, and men were weeping as if they had been children.”† Thus ended the persecution of the eighteenth century, to which one may apply the words of Nieremberg, “Such waves against the Roman Church have never been wanting in any age, which by battering her have broken themselves. Her enemies run to their ruin, swelling like waves against her rock, whose end, though they rage for a time, will prove foam and froth, into which others before them, no less prond and swelling, are vanished.”

* Christian Prince, II. 502.

† In lib. II. cap. 17.

It remains for us to consider the Church in its relation to the civil government of the state, and briefly to describe the controversies to which that relation has given rise.

“The tendency of the independence of the clergy over the body of the people (and by this Guizot means the civil power in general) is, in some manner, the history of the Church from its cradle.”‡ This admission will dispense us from re-

* Præfat. in V. Sæcul.

† The Last Days of a Philosopher, Dial. III.

‡ Cours d’ Hist. Mod. VI.

plying to those reasoners who would date the ecclesiastical power from the age of Charlemagne. Constantine gave great power to the bishops in civil affairs, and wished them to wear crowns, but they refused.

In the time of St. Anthanasius and St. Cyril, the Bishops of Alexandria were invested with much temporal authority. The power of Pope Celestin was great; for he was able to deprive the Novatianists of their churches, and to prevent them from assembling openly.* But as Thomassinus observes, the Popes had a moral dominion in temporals before they possessed the judicial. Kings and people easily threw themselves upon the side to which they inclined. Hence the tears of Pope Gregory the Great, fearing lest so much secular business should separate him from the love of God. In Italy dominion came upon them, as it were, visibly by divine providence; for there was no one to discharge its duties, and they were called upon to save the people by fulfilling them.† John of Salisbury bears evidence to the sufferings consequent upon this pontifical power. "I call to witness," he says, "Lord Adrian, whose times God made happy, that no one is more miserable than the Roman pontiff, for if nothing else should occur to injure him, the mere burden and labor must quickly overcome him; he assured me that all former bitterness was pleasure to what he now experienced. He says the chair is thorny, and that the crown which seems so bright is of fire: had he consulted his pleasure, he said he would never have left his native soil of England, and his concealment within the cloister of the blessed Rufus, but he did not dare to resist the divine appointment; he often used to tell me that ascending to the rank of sovereign Pontiff, step by step, from his cloistered obscurity, he never gained by ascending in tranquillity of life."‡ It was a common saying in the time of St. Ambrose, "that emperors rather desired priesthood, than priests empire."§ "Cum infirmior tunc potens sum" was the rule to the new ambition of the Roman eminence, addressed to a successor of the fisherman, and to a disciple of the cross. His empire consisted in piety, virtue, tears, and prayer.

Men rushed forward to give dominion to pontiffs, who like the kings of the golden world, were pastors of the people. On beholding the solemn grandeur which surrounds the meek father of the Church, it is an emotion full of joy and gratitude, which comes upon the mind unprejudiced, for it immediately draws the inference, that the world has become Christian, and that the warlike youth of nations are deputed to pay their innocent honors to the vicar of Jesus Christ. Never did the world behold in so eminent a degree as in the grandeur of the papal power, the verification of the divine promise to exalt the humble. These Gregories, and Hildebrands, when they did not go forth to meet the wolf, were as meek and humble as the lowliest of their flock. If we would desire an instance of humility in its utmost degree, we shall find it in the acts and language of the chief pontiffs of the Church. Witness that letter of Pius VII. to Napoleon, which I cite not as a more eminent but only as a more recent instance, in which he expressed his sorrow and penitence for having agreed through the weakness of his age and sufferings to the concordat which was injurious to the discipline of the Church, ending with these affecting words, "Our conscience opposes insuperable obstacles to the execution of these articles which we acknowledge, to our confusion and grief, we incautiously subscribed, not from want of a right intention, as God himself is witness, but through human frailty, as dust and ashes."

* Thomassinus, De Vet. et Nov. Discip. III. lib. I. cap. xxvi III. lib. I. cap. xxvii.

† De Nugis Curialium, lib. VIII. cap. xxiii.

§ St. Ambrose. Epist. 35.

With respect to the opinion which prevailed of the origin of this temporal power, it may be well to pause an instant. In France, many modern writers, not excepting even Bossuet, though fit to found upon this supposed opinion, a charge of ignorance against the scholastic doctors of the middle age. With them St. Thomas, St. Bonaventura, St. Anselm, St. Antoninus, St. Raymond of Pennafort—are men who only groped their way in a dark age. Their grand offence consisted in supporting the false decretals. It may be well then to state the simple fact to show the extravagance of this declamation.

The acts of councils and the papal decretals of the eight first centuries, formed the common law of France, as also of England, though Sir Matthew Hale, with singular boldness, appears to know of no obligation prior to the legislation of Henry VIII. and the authority of Parliament.* In the ninth century, appeared a compilation of these decretals and acts, which are truly given as they really existed, excepting that certain dates and names are confounded; but these anachronisms were of no importance, for the substance being still the decretals and acts of the eight first centuries, really was the common law. The scholastic doctors, therefore, had only fallen into the error of a date or a name. This is shown by Marchetti, the Archbishop of Ancyra, in his criticism of Fleury. Even the Protestant Blondel proves that these false decretals were composed nearly in the very words of the ancient canons. But, however defensible, they were always regarded as doubtful by the learned; and Dante might have known that they were publicly disowned in the tenth century. As for the scholastic doctors having believed in the donation of Constantine, it is to be remembered that this donation never passed for certain with them; that Hinemar, Archbishop of Rheims, treated it as supposititious, and that it was two scholastic divines, St. Antoninus, of Florence, and Æneas Sylvius, afterwards Pope Pius II. who first absolutely rejected it. Before them Adrian I., Nicholas I., and Gregory VII. omitted all mention of it in acts where they certainly would have alluded to it if it had passed for genuine. Burchard, Bishop of Worms, who lived at the end of the tenth century, excluded it from his collection, and the gloze upon Gratian's decretals adds, that it is never read in the schools. Dismissing then the question as to the origin of this power, let us briefly notice the attacks which have been directed against it from other sides. "Some men," says John von Muller, "speak against the Pope, as if it had been a great misfortune that there was an authority which had regard to the practice of Christian morals, which could say to ambition and despotism—thus far and no farther." "I know indeed," says Scotti, "that God who calleth the despised things of the world to confound the strong, in the first ages of Christianity, showed innumerable wonders, and made all nations behold the omnipotence of his arm; but the need for prodigies ceasing, and wishing that the operations of grace should be hidden under the shade of nature to increase the merit of faith, he hath wished that his Church should follow a certain natural order for the maintenance of its own independence and influence."* Vain attempts have been made to represent this power as inconsistent with the spirit of the Christian Church: and oft by men with minds at the moment so little open to the light of faith, that when they looked for succor, they spoke of

* Hist. of the Common Law of England, 24.

That high Providence which did defend,
Through Scipio, the world's empery for Rome.

But in the first place, the passage which is quoted from St. John,† is read in the Greek text ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου τούτου, which gives his kingdom is not from this world, but from his father. Besides, it is clear from the passage in the Gospel of St. Matthew,‡ where our Saviour adds, "quomodo ergo implebuntur Scripturæ quia sic oportet fieri?" that his words, as related by St. John "Regnum meum non est de hoc mundo," must be understood as alluding to a temporal kingdom, which would have prevented him from being delivered to the Jews, and from being crucified to save the world. Such a kingdom would be utterly subversive of the Catholic Church, or rather there would in that event have been no Christian people to be governed. Nothing can be more extravagant than to make such a text an argument against the economy and government of the Catholic Church, which rest wholly upon the fact of that death and passion; so that the Church could not have existed if that kingdom had been established which the moderns now so vainly ascribe to the Church. This was a kingdom which ought never to have excited the fear of any other government that was founded on justice. The ecclesiastical and the civil power have been always recognized as essentially distinct, but directed by God to one end, which is, to the eternal and temporal happiness of the people.§ Walafreid Strabo, Abbot of Fulda, in the ninth century, shows that while they differ in offices, they have one and the same end in view, that, "by means of the union and love of both orders, the one house of God may be constructed, the one body of Christ edified."||

"Attentively reflect," says Pope St. Leo to an emperor, "that the royal power has been given to you by God, not only to govern the world, but principally to defend the Church."¶ It may be observed that in a certain sense, the distinction

* Teoremi di Politica Cristiana, I. 298.

† xviii. 36.

‡ xxvi.

§ Scotti, Teoremi, 248.

|| De Rebus Ecclesiasticis, cap. xxxi.

¶ Epist. lxxiv.

of the two powers is founded in nature and discernible in every government of men. Œdipus arriving in a strange country, asks τίς λόγῳ τε καὶ σθένει κρατεῖ; who possesses the moral and physical force, or authority and strength? * Catching at certain expressions, and misinterpreting deeds of meekness, you complain that the civil power was under the dominion of the clergy! σὺ δὲ ταῦτ' ἀνεμώλια βάζεις. For have not other men a right to reply that you only want it to be under the dominion of your philosophy? Since in one sense the civil power must, of necessity, be always under the dominion of the spiritual, so that the only question is, ought it to be for or against the Church of Christ, under the dominion of truth or of error? The distinction of the two powers has been always invariably maintained by the tradition of the Church, although as Catholics in relation to Catholic states, it was impossible to believe them reciprocally independent, since the divine law was comprised in the spiritual order. In the middle ages there were no concordats to regulate the connection of the two powers, because God then reigned over man, and religion over law. Still less were there any constitutions like that proposed for Poland, by the Abbé de Mably, in which the authority of Rome was to be wholly rejected. The lessons given to princes were the necessary result of their professing the Christian religion. It will be well to take examples in proof of the sentiments of the age, though it must be understood that the occasions which gave rise to them, were, after all, remarkable as presenting exceptions to the general spirit of meek obedience which was evinced towards the pastors of the Church. The possibility of a collision between the two powers was apparent from the first ages. When the Emperor Constantius wished to ordain something connected with religion by his authority, the legate who presided at the Council of Nice, wrote to him as follows:—"Do not meddle with ecclesiastical matters, lest you prescribe precepts to those from whom you should rather learn; to you hath God given empire, to us he hath entrusted the things of the Church, and as he who should deprive you of empire would resist the ordinance of God, so fear lest by arrogating ecclesiastical power, you should be guilty of a great crime. It is neither lawful for us to govern the earth, nor for you to touch the censer." †

The laws of Justinian prescribed certain rules respecting ordination, but no attention was paid to them, and in some instances contemporary councils established a contrary usage. ‡ Theodosius the younger, in his Epistle to the Synod of Ephesus, informed the fathers that he had sent to them Candidianus, but with express orders that he should take no part whatever in their controversies, "for it would be most atrocious," he added, "if one who is not inscribed in the catalogue of most holy bishops should meddle with ecclesiastical consultations." So that the princes who were present at councils attended only to protect the peace and freedom of the assembly. When the Emperor Maurice proposed a law forbidding soldiers to profess a monastic life, and wrote to Gregory the Great to publish it, the Pope replied, "I indeed, subject to the command, have caused the law to be transmitted to different parts of the earth, and because the law itself does not agree with what we owe to Almighty God, behold in an Epistle I have declared so. 'Utrobique ergo quod debui exsolvi, qui et imperatori obedientiam præbui, et pro Deo quod sensi minime taceui.'" Vincent, of Beauvais, says, "that they who make iniquitous laws, or statutes contrary to the law of God, and to ecclesiastical liberty, as many princes and counts are accustomed to do, 'ipso jure,' the laws are invalid, for no law can avail against God."* When St Hilary found that the Emperor Constance was resolved to attack even the faith of the Catholic Church, he wrote no more to him, but against him; "the time for speaking is arrived, the time of silence is passed. Let us raise our eyes towards the Christ, for here the Anti-Christ reigns. The pastors ought to make their voice be heard, for the mercenaries have taken flight. We contend against an enemy who seeks to deceive us, against a persecutor who caresses us: he does not deprive us of life, but he enriches us in order to drive us to eternal death: he does not grant us the liberty of a prison, but he honors us with the servitude of palaces; he does not kill with iron but with gold: he professes Christ to deny him; he desires union that there may be no peace; he honors priests that they may cease to be bishops; he builds churches and he destroys faith."

* Œdip. Col. 68.

† Apud. S. Athanas. Epist. ad Solitar.

‡ Chardon, Hist. des Sacrements, Tom. V. c. 5.

Hinemar, Archbishop of Rheims, who enjoyed such favor at the court of Charles-le-Chauve, showed no less apostolic courage, in his treatise on the Divorce between Lothaire and Teutberge. "Some sages affirm, that this prince being king, is not subject to the laws or judgment of any one except God alone who has made him king, so that whatever he may do, he ought not to be excommunicated by bishops. Such language is not Christian and Catholic; it is full of blasphemy. The authority of the apostle says, that kings ought to be subject to those whom it institutes in the name of the Lord, who are to take care of their souls. When it is said that the king is not subject to the laws or judgment of any one but to God alone, this is true if he be king in deed as well as in name: he is called king because he governs. If then he govern himself according to the will of God, directing the good in the right way, and correcting the wicked to lead them back from the evil way to the good, then he is king, and subject to the judgment of no one but God—for laws are instituted not against the just, but against the unjust; but if he be an adulterer, a homicide, unjust, a plunderer, then he ought to be judged secretly or in public by the bishops."† When Louis III., in the year 881, interfered with a canonical election, Hinemar wrote to him as follows: "As for your reply, that you will do nothing but what you have done already, be assured that then God will perform what pleases him. The Emperor Louis le Debonnaire did not live as long as his father Charles;* King Charles the Bald your grandfather, did not live as long as his father; your father Louis did not live as long as his father; and while you are living amidst all this pomp at Compeigne, cast your eyes on the spot where your father rests; and if you do not know it, ask where did your grandfather die, and where lies he: and let not your heart be lifted up before the face of Him who died for you and for us all, and who afterwards rose again and who now dieth no more. Be assured that you will die, and you do not know what day or what hour; you have need then like us all to be ever ready for the call of our Lord—you will soon pass; but the holy Church with its chiefs under Christ, and according to his promise, will remain forever.”† This solemn argument of Hincmar was repeated so late as in 1576, by the canons of the states of Blois when they demanded their ancient liberty of elections. They observed that the Carolingian race had been of short duration, from having arrogated the right of disposing of ecclesiastical offices, while the Capetian, which from its origin, and after the example of its founder, had habitually respected their independence, had reigned for more than five centuries. In fact, Hugues Capet, on his coronation, abolished the dignity of Abbot of St. Germain and of St. Denis, with which he had been invested, and restored in all the monasteries of his dominions the freedom of election, which had been denied them for a century before. “Without doubt,” exclaims John of Salisbury, “whoever oppresses ecclesiastical liberty, is punished either in himself or in his offspring.”‡

* Speculum Doctrinale, lib. X. c. lxxxvii. † Hinemar, Op. de Divort. Loth. tom. I, p. 693.

St. Cœlestin wrote to Theodosius the younger, saying “the cause of the faith ought to be dearer to us than that of the kingdom, and prosperity attends him who has the greatest care of things most dear to God.” And St. Bernard wrote as follows to king Conrad, “Whoever tries to make the cross subject to the throne, either does not love the king, or little understands what becomes the royal majesty, or seeks some interest of his own, or does not much care for the things of God and of the king.”§ In another place St. Bernard says, “May my soul never come into the council of those, who say either that the peace and liberty of the churches are injurious to the empire, or that the prosperity and exaltation of the empire are an injury to the churches.”|| “The office of the emperor,” says the Council of Mayence, “is only discharged when he lives in right faith, and true humility of heart, subjecting the height of royal dignity to holy religion, being more delighted to serve God in fear, than to rule over the people in fear, tempering anger with mercy, and power with benignity; being more the object of love than of dread, and always remembering, than he is a son of our holy mother church, endeavoring to promote her peace and tranquillity throughout the world: for the empire is more maintained and propagated by consulting in every part of the earth, the interest of the ecclesiastical state, than by combating in some one part for temporal security.”*

* The allusion in this particular instance, was not just, for Louis the Pious renounced the right of interference with elections, and restored liberty to the Church, but his immediate successors deserved all the reproach of Hincmar. Chardon, Hist. des Sacrements, tom. V, c. vii.

† Op. tom. II. p. 199. ‡ De Nugis Curialium, vii. 20. § Epist. xxiv. 243. || Epist. cexliii.

At the fourth council of Toledo, king Sisenand devoutly fell at the knees of the bishop and fathers, begging with tears, that they would pray to God for him, and that they would diligently attend to the interests of the ecclesiastical discipline.† It is examples of this kind which made Savedra say, that “it is an heroic obedience, which kings yield to the vicar of Him who gives and takes away sceptres: let kings glory as much as they please in not being subject to foreign laws, but never in being independent of apostolical decrees. It is their duty to give them vigor, and to make them be observed religiously in their states.”‡ In the sainted Isle of England during the ages of faith, we find the same meekness on the tongues of kings. In 694 Wiltred, king of Kent, spoke to the council of Bapleild, and said, “I will that all the ministers and churches that were given and bequeathed to the worship of God, in the days of believing kings, my predecessors, and in the days of my relations, of King Ethelbert, and those who followed him, shall so remain to the worship of God, and stand fast for evermore. For I, Wiltred, earthly king, urged on by the Heavenly King, and with the spirit of righteousness annealed, have of our progenitors learned this, that no layman should have any right to possess himself of any church, or of any of the things that belong to the church. Kings shall appoint earls and aldermen, sheriffs and judges; but the archbishop shall consult and provide for God’s flock.”§ We have also here the beloved authority of Alfred, for “he used to say, that the dignity of a king is real only in that case, where in the kingdom of Christ, that is the Church, he considers himself not as a king, but merely a simple subject, where he does not rise up proudly above the laws of the bishops, but submits with humility and obedience, to the laws of Christ as proclaimed by them.”|| “Princes,” says the great Mabillon, “are but the first children of the Church, and should show an example of submission to her doctrines. Whenever they have attempted to usurp what belongs to her, they have only injured instead of benefitting the Church. All these conciliations, invented to calm rebellious spirits, and to lead them back to unity, have authorized them in their separation and revolt; their authority has perpetuated errors whenever it desired to assume the part of leading them back to truth.”¶

We have heard the sentiments of virtuous princes, in ages of faith, and beheld their meek obedience. Their merit will appear greater as we proceed to notice the examples which were before them, of the oppression of ecclesiastical liberties, and even of systematic resistance. The middle ages were spared the desolation of beholding a king who, like the caliph of England in the sixteenth century, constituted himself the head of both temporal and spiritual power; but yet there were found

* Concil. Mogunt. sub Annulpho, c. II.

† Ribadeneira Princeps Christianus, I. 12.

‡ Christian Prince, Tom. I. 270.

§ The Saxon Chronicle, LIX.

|| Harpesfield Hist. Angl.

¶ Petit careme.

some few Cæsars, who effected a way to Olympus, by persecuting the Church. At one time, it was by interfering, like the present sophists of France, with the rights of the episcopacy, in order to avail themselves of its authority, and to counteract the influence of the Christian freedom. Thus by a law of Justinian, bishops were prohibited from ordaining any colonus or rustic, without the leave of the proprietor of the land to which he belonged ;* and though the clergy soon succeeded in defeating this anti-Christian ordinance, and the same emperor affected to give leave to ordain rustics, even without the consent of their masters ;† yet the spirit of paganism was so infused into the civil governments, that it was not till a very late period in France, that the law formally sanctioned scholastic education of the sons of peasants and mechanics, or permitted them to educate a son for the Church.

At another time, it was by a systematic plan to assume an influence and a power over ecclesiastical discipline ; such appeared in the conduct of the Ghibellines of Italy, and in the doctrines of the Gallicans in France. The Ghibellines were lax in faith : in this character, Ottaviano Ubaldini, who used to be styled the cardinal, is even introduced by Dante :‡ their chiefs were men of an iron and despotic nature. Voigt, in his history of Gregory VII., says, that in reading the Saxon histories of Henry IV., we might imagine we were reading of Nero.§

The student of history must be on his guard, with respect to this subject, against the writings of unworthy ecclesiastics, who, like Otho Von Frisingen, because he was nephew to the sacrilegious emperor Henry V., took part with him against the Church, and wrote as an apologist for the Germans, and not as a Christian author. He must be apprised also, that there were some who were meek and holy men, like Ives of Chartres, who yet did not rightly estimate the importance of the debate between the pontiffs and the empire, respecting investitures ; and who did not generously feel for holy Church, in her combat for freedom. This was not strange, since owing to the providence of God, the first German emperor exercised the power of investiture with great piety. Germany had most holy bishops under Conrad I., Henry the Fowler, the three Othos, Conrad II., and his son Henry the Black. No sooner did Henry IV. rise up, than God opposed to him his intrepid servant Gregory, who undertook not only to prevent the present sacrilege of this wicked emperor, but to abolish for ever the principle of the danger. Frederick Schlegel points out the iron character of the Ghibellines so fearfully displayed by Henry VI. in Naples, the bloodthirsty Ezzelin in Lombardy, and even the emperor Frederick II.|| The same character, in a greater or less degree, belonged also in France to the men, who, under the name of Gallicans, were disposed to look with an eye of jealousy upon the supremacy of Rome ; and in every country, and in all ages, it has distinguished that class of reasoners, who were for

* Cod. Just. l. I. tit. iii. l. 16.

† Nov. Just. CXXIII. c. 17.

‡ Hell, X. 121.

§ P. 276.

|| Philosophie der Geschichte, II. 151.

governing solely by the civil authority ; that is, by human principles, without the intervention of the Church, and what is superhuman. The violence of the clergy of Paris, during the league, must be ascribed to the Gallican principles adopted by the university at that period. But every where such men are marked by the same hard severity of principles, the same insensibility to any mercy which would plead in opposition to a general law : like that veteran described by Tasso, of whom he says, when it is proposed to punish Rinaldo with death,

Old Raymond praised his speech, for such men think
They ever wisest seem when most severe:—
There must the rule to all disorders sink,
Where pardons, more than punishments appear;
For feeble is each kingdom, frail and weak,
Unless its basis be this fear.*

Every where they show the same disposition to exult in the execution of their legislative enactments, despising the unseen power of truth and sanctity, and even addressing the Holy Church in words like those of Kopreus to the suppliant Heraclidæ :

*οὐ γάρ τις ἐστίν, ὃς παροῖθ' αἰρησεται
την θῆν ἄχρετον δύναιιν ἀντ' Εὐρυθέως.†*

Every where also they indicate the same laxity in faith, whatever may be the vehemence of their profession ; though it may resemble the zeal of those who trust the fond belief on every occasion,

That heaven
Will truck its armor for the lillied shield.‡

for they are the ready advocates of that modern wisdom, which discards all consideration of religion in its schemes of policy, and is the last to sympathize with the sufferings of a people who are oppressed by the enemies of their religion. In opposition to the Ghibellines and the Gallicans, the spirit of the Church is now acknowledged by all historians to have been favorable to the freedom and happiness of mankind. Even Machiavel is forced to observe continually, throughout his history of Florence, that the party for the Church was regarded as the maintenance of the public liberty. On this point, our English writers, who alas ! are still the contemporaries of Cranmer, are left alone ; their continental brethren having completely abandoned their favorite positions. All are passed to the side of that Fenelon who wept over the old institutions of his country, and who recognized in the Holy See, the eternal defender of the charters of the middle age, and of the genuine liberty of nations.

In the memorable debate concerning investitures, the grand object of Gregory VII. was to behold the Church free, and the victory of the things of God over those of man. The character of this illustrious pontiff breathes all the energy and self-devotedness of the ages of faith. He alone felt sorrow on being invested with the supreme authority; "Our promotion," said he, "which administers to you and the rest of the faithful, a pious and joyful expectation, produces in us the bitterness of internal grief, and the pressure of too much anxiety."* In his epistle to all the Germans, he expressed himself as follows, "to this end we feel ourselves ordained and placed in the apostolic seat, that in this life we should seek not our own, but the things of Jesus Christ, that by many labors, following the footsteps of the fathers, we may pass with the merciful aid of God to the future and eternal quiet."† What a noble testimony was he able to bear to himself, when he said, in allusion to the emperor Henry IV., "Never, by any prayers or manifestations of friendship or of enmity, could he obtain from us the consent to say or think any thing for his sake, contrary to justice. In this course, by the help of God, we will constantly persist so long as we shall live, not daunted by any peril of life or death."‡

* Book V. 39.

† Eurip. Heraclid.

‡ Dante. Par. VI

In France, the usurpation of the monarchs was often resisted by the meek men of God. In the eleventh century, when St. Gaultier, Abbot of St. Martin, at Pontoise, was installed Abbot, king Philip being present, wished to deliver to him the cross with his own hand: St. Gaultier took it, but laid hold of it at a part above the king's hand, saying, "Non à te sed de sursum." I take this charge, not from you, Sire, but from God. It was said that this action of the holy man filled all the lords of the court, and even the king himself, with admiration. The holy man, however, it must be observed, had only a king of nine years old to deal with. The history of this controversy abounds with scenes of the highest interest, and of the utmost sublimity. Let us view for a moment these Roman pontiffs, in the presence, as it were, of the barbarous and raging kings of the earth. Such an occasion was presented at Chalons, when the ambassadors of the emperor came there to treat with Pope Paschal II. The inhabitants were filled with terror at the sight of this procession of martial troops, escorting the duke of Bavaria, before whom a naked sword was carried. He was a man of gigantic stature, and had a voice which made men tremble when he spoke. His nobles and attendants had so fierce a countenance, and bore themselves with such haughtiness, created such a noise and confusion, that one would have thought they were going to give battle to some formidable enemy, and not to kiss the feet of the Vicar of Jesus Christ.

The holy father replied to them with firmness, and in a strain of the most affecting piety; but when he had concluded, the barbarous Germans became furious, and proceeded even to address insulting words to the pontiff: but feeling that their party would not be the strongest in France, they withdrew, crying out, "Non hic sed Romæ gladiis determinabitur querela." A more remarkable scene followed in the very church of St. Peter, at Rome, when the emperor came there to be crowned, upon a mutual understanding with the pope, that the emperor was to relinquish his custom of investiture, and the bishops of Germany to abandon their dukedoms, marquisites, and other principalities; a proposition originating with the emperor, and eagerly approved of by the pope; but which the emperor had kept secret from his German nobles, hoping to gain all their possessions in exchange for the abandonment of a form. The emperor, after kissing the pope's feet, who received him at the portal, was seated under a royal canopy near the altar, and the pope began the mass. Having finished the offertory, at the moment when the ceremony of the coronation was to commence, he turned to the emperor, and asked him aloud whether he was resolved to observe the treaty that had been agreed to; and if so, he begged that he would then declare his resolution publicly. The emperor, who did not expect this, appeared a little confused; but resuming his presence of mind, he rose from his seat, and said he was ready to do so, provided the prelates of Germany consented; but he must first confer with them: and accordingly, for this purpose, he withdrew into the sacristy. The result was soon known, for the Germans became furious at the first intimation of the ease in agitation, and all returned into the church with great noise and tumult, declaring that they would never part with the possessions which former emperors had given to their churches. In vain did the pope attempt to appease them, by reminding them of the true glory of the Church, which was independent of such privileges. At length a gigantic warrior advanced with a fierce countenance, and addressed the pope with haughty insolence, saying, that it was for him to crown their emperor, as his predecessors had done those who were before emperors, and to make no innovations. The pope seeing himself thus treated at the foot of the altar of his church, spoke as sovereign pontiff, and said that he would never cowardly betray the interests of the Church; and then he rose up from his chair and advanced to the altar, without proceeding to the coronation, to finish the mass.

* Epist. i. 39.

† Epist. iv. 24.

‡ Epist. v. 7.

The emperor greatly irritated, called out from his seat to the pope to crown him; but there was no reply or notice taken of his words. Then making a sign to his guards, they approached and surrounded the altar. The pope perceived their intention, but evinced no fear; and finished the mass with a tranquillity and presence of mind truly admirable. No sooner had he descended to withdraw, than the emperor's guards arrested him, as well as many cardinals and bishops, a great number of priests, clerks, officers, and gentlemen who had served in different functions at the altar. In an instant a fearful noise filled the whole church. The people began to cry out on all sides, "they are taking the life of the holy father!" The German soldiers drew their swords and fell right and left upon the helpless multitude, who fled to the door, where numbers were suffocated and massacred. As the guards were dragging the pope and cardinals to a secure place near the emperor's quarters, one only of the German nobles had courage enough to speak in behalf of justice and piety. This was Conrad, Archbishop of Salzburg.

———faithful only be:

Among innumerable false, unmoved,
Unshaken, unseduced, untterrify'd,
His loyalty he kept, his love, his zeal.

Filled with horror on beholding the pope dragged along like a criminal, he could not keep silence, but expressed his detestation, before all the world, of such an enormous act, saying, in the ardor of his zeal, all that piety could inspire him with, unmoved by the fear of instant death, with which they threatened him; for a German nobleman advanced with a drawn sword, and swore that he would strike him on the spot, if he continued to speak; but the generous bishop offered him his throat, saying, "Strike if you will, let me perish rather than give room only by my silence, for any one to suppose that I approved of such an infamous action." Historians remark that St. Athanasius did not suffer more from the Arians than did this archbishop afterwards from Henry V. In vain did the German writers endeavor to excuse the emperor: all Europe was inflamed with indignation. The escapes and sufferings in the same cause of the holy Pontiff Gelasius II., who succeeded him, would occupy too long a space, but I cannot refrain from mentioning one event. After landing at Caïeta, for he was obliged to fly from Rome in consequence of the emperor's furious return in search of him, the night being wet and tempestuous, and the castle of Ardea, where he was to take refuge, being two leagues distant from the spot, the venerable old man not having sufficient strength to walk, and there being no horses, the Cardinal Hûgo d'Alatre, who had saved him the preceding night from the hands of the emperor, now performed an action deserving of eternal praise: for taking him upon his shoulders he carried him the entire way, and arrived in safety at midnight with his precious burden. The conception of these scenes fills us with horror as we read of them in history: how must they have affected the minds of men in ages of faith! Five centuries have not obliterated the memory among the faithful of that blow given to Boniface VIII., by the hand of a Colonna, and for five centuries have they recognized in the sterility of his vast domains the vengeance of Almighty God. Gelasius II. met his holy death in the monastery of Cluni. The multitude of monks and devout people who flocked to his funeral was almost infinite: they sought to honor the obsequies of a martyr, for in this light he was regarded, since his whole pontificate, which had lasted but a year and four days, was a continued persecution, during which, like St. Paul, he might have reckoned chains, prisons, stripes, wounds, exile, perils by land and by sea, treasons, and false brethren. In France the opposition was more systematic, but attended with less violence. The establishment of the pragmatic sanction, which the popes had never recognized, constituted the clergy of France almost theoretically in a kind of rebellion against the holy See. This was formally abolished in the reign of Francis I., by the concordat with Leo X., though the parliament and university were both violent in opposition to it. The theories of Gerson Almain, Jean Major, and their disciples, began to produce their fruit in the rise of the Quesnellists and Jansenists, the end of whose principles was so clearly pointed out by Fenelon. When the kings of Europe became alarmed, and began to take violent measures against the new spirit of resistance to authority, they were only reaping what they had sowed, for since two centuries they had, as it were, been conspiring against the only power which could protect them from it. While Francis I. was exercising such severity against the Protestants in France he was courting the friendship of the Protestant powers abroad, and making common cause with them; he was intimately allied with Geneva, with the eighth Henry, with the Protestant princes of Germany, and with Turkey.

Charles V, finding it for his advantage that the religious disputes should cease, published the famous interim in which he made concessions that violated the rights of the holy See. Henry II, while he persecuted the Protestants in France as opposed to his crown, refused to receive the decrees of the Council of Trent with respect to discipline. Thus began the development of that artful and criminal policy carried to such perfection by Cardinal Richelieu and Mazarin, and ratified in the peace of Westphalia, which separating its interests from that of religion, finished, as de St. Victor says, by persuading the people that religion itself was only a matter of policy.* What greater contempt for religion could revolutionary agents evince than had been displayed by the government of that brave Henry, on occasion of Jean Châtel, when the Père Guignard was tortured and put to death? Did Julian ever publish a more cruel decree against the Church than that of her eldest son, which closed the nine colleges of studious youth, and said to her in words that seemed like mockery, "thou needest laborers, but more thou shalt not have?" The conduct of that Louis, whose end was glory, towards the holy father, relative to the sanctuary in the hotel of his ambassador, was as dangerous as it was mean and impious. "What a triumph," cries de St. Victor, "for a king of France, to prove himself more powerful than the Pope as a temporal prince, and in this respect to make no difference between him and the Dey of Algiers, or the republic of Holland. Louis, who pushed his conquests to the Rhine, after humbling the temporal princes of Christendom, resolved with the instinct of despotism, to attack freedom itself in the pontifical dignity: and for this purpose, his flatterers stirred up the affair of the régale. The avocat-general on this occasion pronounced a discourse worthy of Cromwell, and the parliament that gave to the will of the eighth Henry the force of law. This was the moment when the dragonades were exercised upon the Calvinists, and when it was resolved to revoke the edict of Nantes. Le Père la Chaise, Jesuit and confessor of the king, opposed this latter measure as far as he was able, and it is certain that in so doing he spoke the sentiments of the Pope. The fatal articles issued from the cabinet of the superintendent solely in consequence of the personal pique of the great king, because the holy father had not thought proper to cringe to all his wishes. Bossuet himself confesses that this was the origin of these famous articles, the basis of the Gallican liberties. Louis nourished from infancy according to the modern system, concluded that he had at length brought the monarchical government to its perfection in himself. "The state is myself," said he, and this political egotism proved that his views were narrow, and that he had but imperfectly understood society as it had been formed by the Catholic religion in ages of faith. The power of Christianity emanating from God, has two principal characteristics—it is universal and independent, for God cannot have two laws or two wills. It is the universality of this law, its independence, and its continual action upon intelligences, which constituted the wonderful social state called Christendom. Christianity, therefore, as an universal ruler has precepts equally obligatory on those who govern, as on those who are governed; kings and subjects live equally in its dependence and unity, and it would be a blasphemy to suppose that there could be any thing in the world independent of God. Louis, as if he had expected to reign for ever, had sacrificed the authority of the Church to the establishment of his despotism, and he died leaving his power isolated amidst all the natural resistances of society. The popular opposition gained strength under the regency, and continued to extend till the last explosion; but the agents of the revolution were not more impious in violence against the authority of the Church than the parliaments had been in 1749, on occasion of the refusal of the sacraments, and in 1754, under the succeeding Louis. Choiseul, of haughty and imperious soul, was as great an enemy to the holy See as the worst minister of Elizabeth, and it was at length reserved to the calamitous times which preceded the fall of empires to behold in the person of a German Caesar, the chief of the conspirators against the spiritual authority. This imperial minister of a base philosophy, who showed, perhaps, the smallest portion of sense of all the wretched men who ever bore a sceptre, descended into his grave unloved, unpitied, unrespected by his own impious advisers, and summoned as if by one voice from the brave and generous people over whom he had arrogated the spiritual authority to account for their injuries before God.

* Tableau de Paris, tom. XI. p. 1070.

But let us hasten to more noble recollections. What a lesson has been conveyed in the history of later times to prove that neither kings nor subjects can be independent, and that the meekness of the ages of faith was after all the wisest and safest policy for them both. In France the opposition which came from kind heaven was crushed amidst shouts of victory, and at the same moment began this other opposition which comes from the cruel earth, and supplies its place. Delivered indeed from the sovereignty of Him who said that his yoke was easy and his burden light, these independent kings soon found themselves in face of the sovereignty of the people, that is to say, of a master "whose yoke breaks crowns, and who at his pleasure, makes them pass from the throne to the scaffold."* One argument of those who condemn the doctrine of the ages of faith is, that “the condition of a Christian and a Catholic prince, was then worse than that of a heathen, for he has God alone supreme, but the other had the chief pontiff.”* Such an argument methinks is enough to make subjects reflect rather upon the real dangers to which they are exposed, than upon those that are imaginary and things of air. Let us hope that the cry of the Jewish Deicides may be no longer that of any people professing to be Christian—“non habemus Regem nisi Cæsarem;” let us hope that none may any longer rush like willing slaves to give execution to the will of some remorseless despot, in order that they may trample on the sweet and gentle yoke of Christ. And if again we look to the character of the popular power when it aspired to independence, and rejected the spiritual authority, is not the same lesson taught in terms irresistible? For who that has studied the history of its assemblies, and that has assisted at its councils, and will not be forcibly reminded of them when he hears the poet sing of the first deliberation of those spirits that highly raged against the highest, hurling defiance towards the vault of heaven? Is it a calumnious comparison, and does history bear no witness to obdurate pride and steadfast hate? Does it record nothing of the fixed mind and high disdain, the unconquerable will and study of revenge? Nothing of immortal hate and courage never to submit or yield? Tells it of no cries like “here at least we shall be free?” Of no orators who uttered “high words that bore semblance of worth not substance?” Of no countenances like that described “cruel his eye, care sat on his faded cheek, but under brows of dauntless courage and considerate pride?” Of no arguments to ridicule the power of him who reigns only “upheld by old repute, consent or custom?” Of no counsels like those “who can think submission?” Let us live to ourselves free and to none accountable, preferring “hard liberty before the easy yoke of servile pomp?” The combat sung by Milton is stated by the prince opposed to angels to be “the contest between servility and freedom;” and are we to fall down in admiration at the feeble parody of still vainer mortals, because it bore no less high a title? If then so fearful a comparison be justified by the evidence of history, was such a power, we may ask, likely to legislate for the advantage of mankind? Could its influence tend to promote a freedom consistent with justice? I have not considered these liberties in relation to the interests of the Church itself, because the delusion attempted to be practised on this point is so egregious that one would feel it a needless indignity to enter upon its refutation. The sophist in Plato who thinks he can be pious while he prosecutes his own father, and affirms that piety or holiness, being only a part of justice, is confined to the worship of God in temples, and that the rest concerned with the conduct of life belongs to another sphere this sophist reasons like the moderns.† But Socrates cuts him short by requesting to know what he means by the worship of the gods, whether like the art of dressing horses or dogs as discharged by the groom or the huntsman, it is the knowledge of exercising a certain service to the gods which confers a benefit upon them? The prince of sophist imbued with these principles would also speak eloquently upon piety; he too would have temples and solemn psalmody, but it would be only a contrivance to save appearances in banishing God from the society of men.

* Documens Historiques concernant la Compagnie de Jesu. 19.

* La Hogue de Ecclesia, 257.

† Ethyphro.

We have seen the steps of this famous process, and from henceforth nothing can be less uncertain than the motive which actuates it; first, religion must be separated from government; then it must be separated from literature, according to the Gallican advice of Boileau; then it must be excluded from the manners of life; the laity must leave it to the clergy, the clergy, to the Jesuits, and finally the Jesuits are to be driven from the earth as opposed to the reign of liberties and legal order. "The liberties of the Gallican Church," says Fenelon, "are real servitudes."* Even Fleury acknowledged that they would furnish ample matter for a treatise upon servitude. These liberties agreed equally well with the views of Louis XIV.; of the Jacobins of the first revolution; of Bonaparte; and of the present sophists, who are endeavoring to rule France exclusively in the interest of their own club at the selfish and unstable city. The real liberty of the Church opposed to these inventions is of faith, and all servitude is heretical by its essence.† By liberties is meant the subjection of the Church to the will of despots or of sophists who legislate against God. The Church abhors such liberty, and considers its freedom to consist in being under the dominion of those rulers who are placed over it by Christ. In this sense the word which is engraven on the walls of the cathedral of Sienna might belong as the rightful motto to every consecrated spot that acknowledges the Roman Pontiff, Libertas. This is a liberty which is favorable and not contrary to all just and rational civil freedom. Historians admit that down to the fifth century, while the principle of authority prevailed, the utmost liberty and activity reigned in the Church of Gaul, while the civil society was in a state of slavery and decay.‡ Revolted governments decree and even oblige men to swear contrary to a matter of fact, when they affirm blindly that the Roman pontiff "hath no jurisdiction within their realms." The power of the vicar of Christ extends necessarily wherever there are any Catholic Christians, to the palaces of emperors and kings, to the castles of nobility, to the towers of knights, to the houses of bishops, to the chambers of the poorest clerk, to the halls of the college, to the cell of the recluse, to the shop of the mechanic, to the hut of the shepherd. Long and uninterruptedly has it been adored in lands where human legislators, in the pride of their collective wisdom, decreed that it had passed away for ever—loved has it been, and submitted to with filial meekness by succeeding generations,

* Epist. cxxv. au Duc de Chevreux.

† Mémorial Catholique, tom. I. p. 164

‡ Guizot Cours d'Hist.

—— Who for the testimony of truth have borne Universal reproach, far worse to bear
 Than violence; for that ~~was~~ all their care,
 To stand approved in sight of God, though worlds
 Judged them perverse.——

One word more to those who are jealous of the exercise of the spiritual power. The wisdom of the ancient world, as expressed by some of the sages who collected the traditions of the human race, and the sense of the universal reason, may often cause to blush men who fall far short of it, though under the light of that heavenly revelation which has purified those traditions, and given security and permanence to that sense. Socrates concludes a discourse on government with these words:—"I say then this, expecting indeed opposition, but nevertheless I say it, compelled by truth, that neither a city nor a state, nor a man, can ever be perfect, until to these few real lovers of wisdom who are not evil men though they are called useless, a certain necessity from fortune should fall, that whether they wish it or not, they may take the management of the state, and that the people of the state may be subject to them, or else until to the sons of those kings who at present exercise the sovereign power in states, or to those kings themselves should fall the true love of the true philosophy from a certain inspiration of God.* Until then the love of wisdom and political power shall be united in the same men, there can be no cessation of evils to a state, nor, I think to the human race; nor can a perfect republic be born under any other circumstances, or see the light of the sun."† Does not this celebrated sentence of the Homer of philosophers, seem almost like a prophetic vision of what afterwards did actually occur during the ages of faith, when a certain necessity from God did fall upon the true lovers of wisdom, obliging them against their wills to take the management of states, and when to kings themselves did fall the true love of the true wisdom from a certain inspiration of God? "I do not say that this is impossible," to resume the discourse of Socrates, "for if so we should deservedly be objects of ridicule as saying vain things resembling vows. It is not impossible that this should be, though it must be confessed we speak of things most difficult; and if such a necessity shall hereafter fall upon them in any barbarous region far removed from our view, it will then be easy to show that this perfect state can exist, when that Muse shall become mistress of the city."‡ A state of perfect order and exemption from evil, is incompatible with the existence of a race of creatures who are placed upon earth as upon a stage of combat, to make proof of fidelity to their Maker; the supposition that such a state would result from the circumstances demanded, is only a proof that the sage who had indulged in it, had never understood the real nature of their difficulties, and the true end of their existence; but his speculation is still a sublime and magnificent testimony to the wisdom of that spiritual government which had so wide an influence in the ages of faith, and the facts of history which show a cessation of so many evils, and of so much misery in states, and to the human race resulting from it, prove, far beyond what he had ever any reason to expect, the extent of its moral advantages.

* Plato de Repub. VI. 138.

† Id. lib. V.

‡ Lib. VI.

CHAPTER IV.

FROM the spiritual let us pass to the temporal government of these ages, and view it with regard to the principles of the meek. In the Church as we have seen all was obedience and liberty. Hence a twofold influence was exercised by the clergy; for while they consoled the lower ranks by their doctrines of independence and evangelical equality, they gave strength to rulers by their principles of subordination; their language might have seemed contradictory without being the less sincere. As a French writer observes, "the priest was near the sovereign to remind him of the equal rights of the children of Adam, and the preference which the Redeemer granted to the poor; and this same priest was near the people to preach submission, and to induce them for conscience's sake to render to Cæsar what belonged to Cæsar." Religion in these ages, as Bonald observes, "placed as the foundation of the public laws of every Christian people, active obedience for good and passive resistance to evil, whereas the modern doctrines inculcate passive obedience and active resistance, and place man perpetually between slavery and rebellion."* St. Thomas says, "that wisdom and power are companions of true religion." Christianity sanctioned the possession and exercise of power, the necessity of which is so obvious to reason, for

Who so upon himself will take the skill
True justice unto people to divide,
Had need of mightie hands for to fulfil,
That which he doth with righteous doom decide,
And for to maister wrong and puissant pride.†

It is an axiom of political science, that when a general power does not exist, every one attempts to establish his own particular power, in which event excess of liberty, as Plato says, will always lead to servitude:‡ for the doing any thing over-much is sure to produce the contrary effect, in times, and in plants, and in bodies, and in political states no less, and therefore a tyranny both private and public results always from an excess of liberty.* But religion did not, according to the theory of Bentham, recognize, in policy, an authority superior to all others, which does not receive the law, but which gives it, remaining mistress of the rules themselves: a maxim which Bonald justly denominates false, servile, and abject; but it declared in the language of Bossuet, that the most absolute power is regulated by fundamental laws, against which, whatever is done, is null of itself. Among the nations that worshipped Christ, in ages of faith, it would not have been thought a subject of praise to resemble that "free people" in Æschylus, of whom Pelasgus says to the supplicants, that they "love to tax authority with blame."† Still less would it have been deemed wise to encourage them to do so. The authority of Paschal is here against the modern sophists: "all the opinions of the people," he says, "are very sound, yet they are not in their heads, because they believe that truth is where it is not. Truth is, indeed, in their opinions; but not in the point where they imagine it to be: it is their sentiments, their feelings which are sound and true. Their folly is made the foundation of the security of states and thrones: for kings and magistrates are strong only in the opinion which they raise by external marks of power. The greatest and most important thing in the world, has thus for its foundation, weakness; and this foundation is admirably sure: for there is nothing surer than that the people will be weak: what is founded on reason alone, is very ill founded, as the esteem of wisdom."‡ It is a mistake to suppose that the wise and heroic ancients placed any moral dignity in the spirit of resistance to just authority. Epictetus says, that it is decorous to yield obedience to a ruler or prince.§ The preference of all the followers of Socrates for the state of Sparta, is well known, not from the supposition that all forms of government were united in its constitution, but because as Müller says, "the animating soul of all these forms was the Doric spirit of fear and respect for ancient and established laws, and the judgment of elder men; the spirit of obedience towards the state and the constituted authorities, πειθαρχία, and the conviction that discipline and a restriction of actions are surer guides to safety, than a superabundance of strength and activity directed to no certain end.

* Législation Prim. 108.

† Spenser, book V. 4.

‡ Epist. viii.

"We moderns," says Müller, "on account of our preconceived notions with respect to the advancement of civilization, do not read, without partiality, the lessons which history affords us: we refuse to recognize the most profound political wisdom in an age, which we believe to have been occupied in rude attempts to form a settled government. Far otherwise the political speculators of antiquity, such as the Pythagoreans, and Plato, who considered the Spartan and Cretan form of government, i. e. the ancient Dorian, as a general model of all governments; whereas the Athenian and Ionic democracy, Plato altogether despises as an annihilation of government, rather than a government, in which every person striving

* Plato de Repub. VIII.

† Æschyl. Suppl.

‡ Pensées, I. part. viii.

§ Sententiæ.

to act as much as possible for himself, destroyed the unison and harmony of the whole.* Nothing is more celebrated than the loyalty of the middle ages, which was an obedience of the heart. Their history derives from it a brilliant page which is familiar to all who have been trained to gentle studies. While attacked, like every other principle of good, by cold and bitter sophistry, this characteristic of ancient manners has generally been admired by modern writers of genius. The loyal attachment of Tasso to the duke of Ferrara, has been represented in glowing terms by Goëthe, and made the occasion of delivering a formal eulogium upon the virtue of chivalrous fidelity.†

The Church lent her sanction to the spirit of obedience towards the prince or government of the state, and by her daily prayers admonished the people that submission was a religious duty, and at the same time, she took occasion to teach important lessons, both to people and to kings. St. Paul, that true apostle of the nations, since he teaches the science of society, commanded that especial prayer should be made for kings, and for all who are placed in authority; and St. Augustin supplied this comment, "because they are at a greater distance from Christian humility by reason of the pomp and pride of their state;" and, therefore, the apostle adding that it is well before God our Saviour, to pray for such men, concludes thus, "In order that no one may despair before our God who wishes the salvation of all men; and that truth may come to the knowledge of all; who wishes to exclude no rank, but who chooses whom he pleaseth in all classes of society, indifferently."‡ No inference was to be drawn from her prayers, with respect to the justice or injustice of the princes who governed.

Following the apostolic precept, she offered constant prayers for the safety of the civil rulers, though these might be heathens, in order that there might be even a temporal peace for her children. "As long as the two cities are confounded together here below," says the venerable Bede, "the peace of Babylon is also our peace. The people of God are enfranchised from the domination of the profane city, only on condition of finishing this pilgrimage within its walls, and the goods of this world are common to the just and to the wicked."§ "The Church," says the angelic doctor, "has a peace peculiar to herself, a peace which cannot be communicated to the impious; but besides this peace, there is another, common to the just and to sinners, and the Church has also need of this peace."|| The decree of the second session of the Council of Trent, assigns for the motive of ordering prayers for kings, "the tranquillity of the Church, its peace, and the augmentation of the faith." So when the Roman Church implores heaven for the person of the emperor, it is in order "that the enemies of peace being put down, Christian liberty may offer to God, in security, the glory which he demands from it."¶ When, at another time, she desires that principalities and powers may recognize her di-

* Hist. of the Dorians, vol. iii. 9.

† Torquato Tasso, by Goëthe. ‡ Enchirid. cap. xxiv.

§ Interpret. in Epist. i. ad Tim.

|| Commentar. in Epist. i. ad Tim.

¶ Missale Rom. Orat pro Imperat.

vine authority, it is in order that her children may accomplish in peace the work of their salvation.* If she prays to be delivered from obstacles that might retard her course, it is that being disengaged from all bonds, she may fulfil with liberty the divine will.† If she prays for spiritual blessings, she no less demands temporal aid, in order that her children may be delivered from the perils of this life.”‡

It should be observed, that in these ages, all persons in authority were regarded with real respect, by those above them, as well as by their inferiors. Even in the persons of men, objects of veneration were multiplied. The mayor of a little town was not looked upon differently by the great and by the poor. Indeed, in France, royal power became jealous of the dignity, so that there was no mayor of Paris, Lyons, or Toulouse. On the election of these magistrates, grand entertainments used to be given, as also when they returned from an annual pilgrimage or procession. The sheriffs of the municipalities used to be addressed with “Monseigneur.” Society was then inexhaustible in supplying men to exercise these municipal authorities, who were truly respectable, like those citizens of the Flemish towns who came to Paris, of whom Victor Hugo says, “personages who all bore written in their countenances, that Maximilian of Austria had reason, as he said, “de se confier à plein en leurs sens, vaillance, expérience, loyauté, et bonnes preudomies.” “The reverence or contempt shown to magistrates,” says John of Salisbury, “passes to the honor or reproach of subjects; hence it is that in the constitutions of princes and edicts of magistrates, by a prolepsis, there is a conception of many persons, that it may seem to be not so much the constitution of one person as of the whole community.”§ In ages of faith, there was less reason to complain in the words of Tacitus, that all things were done servilely for the sake of rule.|| Religion taught men that the office of all social ministry was a service, according to the divine word “Let him that would be the greatest among men, become their servant.” “Sublime words,” adds Bonald, “which passed into all Christian languages, when the highest civil functions were denominated always a service.” The emperor Charles says, in a letter to Petrarch, “you know not the burden of empire: we who are charged with it feel this truth. It is love for mankind alone that can surmount the difficulties of government.” King Charles VII. would have preferred being a private knight, a Dunois, a Poton, a la Hire, or a Xaintrailles. “Every thing,” says Bonald, “conours to prove that in the middle ages there were only public functions, no titles purely personal, functions to maintain the welfare of society, and no titles to amuse the vanity and self-love of individuals.

Those personal titles which indicate weakness of soul, were unknown to the Sieurs de Joinville, Duguesclin, Clisson, and Bayard, who were only distinguished in private life, by the religious denomination given to them in

* Orat. fer. VI. in parasceve.

† Orat. Dom. XIX. post Pent.

‡ Orat. fer. VI. post Dom. IV. quadr. Dom. XXIII. post Pent.

§ De Nugis Curialium, lib. V. cap. 4.

|| Hist. lib. I.

baptism, and in public life, by the political denomination of the office they discharged. When the person became distinguished to the ear by a pompous title, he wished to be distinguished also to the eye by exterior marks, not by the habits belonging to public functions which commanded respect, because they announced a duty, but by ribands and medallions, pure decorations of the person, which wound the sentiments of men, because they have no relation to any duty, and arise from no social motive.”* Men would then have shrunk from a dignity which would not have had a just foundation. It is in the spirit of those ages, that the poet cries,

The scorn of knighthood and trew chivalrye,
To thinke without desert of gentle deed
And noble worth, to be advanced hye,
Such prayse is shame:——

Plato well describes the insane ardor of wicked men, who desire by all means possible to get hold of the helm of the government in a state, being convinced that the getting possession of it and the attaining to the art necessary to manage it are incompatible, and that the essential thing is to get possession of it;† and being full of disdain and anger for all who endeavor to teach that the art is necessary, and that it may be acquired by learning. “In that city,” he says, “the government will be best and most secure from revolution, where they who are to govern have the least desire to rule: in this happy state, the rich only will govern; but what kind of rich men? they who are rich οὐ χρυσίῳ, ἀλλ’ οὐ δει τὸν εὐδαίμονα πλουτεῖν, ζωῆς ἀγαθῆς τε καὶ ἑμφορονος.”‡ The history of the middle ages abound with instances to verify this observation. Such was the scene presented at the memorable assembly of Etampes, when king Louis-le-jeune and the nobles of France resolved upon departing for the holy land. On the third day, after invoking the Holy Ghost, and hearing a discourse of St. Bernard respecting the qualities which should be possessed by whoever was elected regent during the king’s absence, the king chose to waive his right of nomination, and leave it to the decision of the princes and prelates of the kingdom. These retired into a neighboring hall, and after half an hour’s deliberation returned with St. Bernard, having chosen two regents, a layman and an ecclesiastic, the Count de Nevers and the Abbot Suger.

The king and every one approved of the choice; but no persuasion could overcome the resolution of the Count de Nevers to decline the honor. This prince was a man of great piety; and being pressed to assign his reasons, he confessed that he had resolved and vowed to enter into the Carthusian order: wonderful example to confound the pride and ambition of a court. Thus the Abbot Suger remained sole regent of France, and he accepted the dignity only on compulsion. The princes and the prelates declared that they would elect no one else, and still

* Législation Prim II. 309.

† De Repub. lib. VI.

‡ Id lib. VII.

he refused till he was commanded by the pope to accept the charge, for the good of the kingdom.* Nothing can be more affecting than the letters of this great man to the king, pressing him to return, and expressing his own fatigues and sufferings. “Senex eram, sed in his magis consenui pro quibus nullo penitus modo, nisi amore Dei et vestro me consumpsissem.” The crime of usurpation was rare. Pepin, the son of Charles Martel, and Hugues Capet were not usurpers; they had every sanction which the provisions of the age required. The infant Don Fernando, was seen encompassed with glory, and endowed by heaven with many crowns, for refusing to accept that which was offered to him, belonging to his nephew. The infant James of Aragon, refused the crown, though against the will of his father, and preferred a religious life in a cloister. Instances of this kind are endless. In these ages, the magisterial character and office were in harmony with the spiritual tone of society. A painting of the crucifixion was placed in the centre of the great chamber of the parliaments,† over the seats of justice. Those vast solemn paintings of holy subjects, done in the thirteenth century on the walls of the great hall, at Sienna, in which the grand council of the republic used to assemble, are, in reality, an evidence of the tone of government. There you see the adoration of the shepherds, and along with a heavenly portrait of our blessed lady, the saints of Sienna, St. Bernardin, and St. Catherine. The almost sacerdotal gravity of the judicial office might be inferred from the expression which occurs in one of the capitularies of Charlemagne. “Let no count hold his plaids, unless he be fasting and fed with sense.”‡ The plaids were the placita generalia, a kind of council.

The duties of the town sheriff indicate the humane influence of the municipal governments: he had to visit the round of the walls at night, to see that the watch had sufficient firing; he had to inspect the provisions destined for the poor. John de Vienne, the old governor of Calais in the time of Edward III., is represented weeping for the calamities of its inhabitants, and speaking of them as if they were his children. By the canons of the council of Arles, in the year 314, those of the faithful who became governors of provinces, were to receive letters of communion, in order that the bishop of the place of their residence, might have a watch over them, and might excommunicate them if they did any thing contrary to discipline; and by the canons of the council of Mâcon, in the year 585, judges are forbidden to decide any thing respecting widows and orphans, without having previously consulted with the bishop, their natural protector, or in his absence, with one of his priests. We can collect the character of these men, from what is witnessed on their vaulted graves. In the collegiate church of Fouju, was a tomb with an inscription of the date of the thirteenth century, which only stated that it was of a holy man, who was versed in jurisprudence.

*Hist. de Suger, lib. VI.

† Monteil Hist. des François, tom. IV. 155.

‡ Ann. 803. bal. l. col. 393.

Foujueii lumen, pietatis gemma ; volumen
 Justitiæ, cinere jacet hic : Deus, huic miserere !
 Stephanus hic lens fuit, et miserator egenis :
 Virtus vera De noxia tollat ei. Amen.

The magistrates of the ancient Catholic states had been generally tried in pleasure and pain, like gold in the fire, as Socrates had wished ; so that afterwards they were not men to change their opinion in labors or terrors or in any vicissitude whatever.* Plato would have been satisfied also with the absence of all base inducements to desire power : his maxim was, that if men in authority who governed the state, should avowedly receive rewards for governing, they are hirelings ; if they take things secretly, they are thieves ; if they govern for the sake of honors, they are lovers of honors ; whom he thus reckons among hirelings and thieves. In Christian states, good men, compelled by charity to assume offices of power, were, indeed, entitled to receive payment, to enable them to support the proper dignity, and facilitate the exercise of their duties ; but it was not a payment in proportion to the extent of their service. Down to the fifteenth century, the counsellors of the parliament of Paris, those high judges who were entrusted with the reformation of the laws, who received officially the compliments of the pope, to whom princes of the blood showed reverence, who disposed of the sovereignty of provinces, received only fifteen sous per day. Those of the parliament of Bordeaux had no more, and those of the parliament of Toulouse had scarcely the half of it.† A cloak for the winter, and another for the summer, were added to the moderate allowance of the presidents of justice. In Spain the high offices of state were entirely unconnected with emolument ; and even in England the institution of the magistracy still retains this noble feature of the middle ages. Kings themselves, as may be still seen in Spain and Italy, lived in a plain and simple manner, without great personal expense : often their sons were trained to the discipline of common rustic youths. Charlemagne and St. Louis dressed like their subjects and lived like them. even bad princes, in those days, were frugal. Charles VII. of France, did not expend more than sixty livres per day ; and Louis XI. was never dressed in cloth of gold but once in his life, and that was to entertain the constable, saint Pol ; and he told him so.

History is full of examples of the grave and holy manners of men in authority, during the ages of faith, of men truly endowed with patriotism and heroic devotion, qui pro multis perire malunt quam cum multis.‡ Instances may be taken as they occur, for each is the representative of an entire class of men : they appear early in the history of Christendom. Jovin, Citizen of Rheims, and a Christian, made consul by the Romans under the emperors Valens and Valentinus, became a model of heroism, justice, and piety. His tomb was of one the finest monuments at Rheims, in the Church of the Abbey of St. Nicaise, which was built on the spot where his palace formerly stood, it being the house in which St. Remi concluded his treaty with Clovis, in the name of his flock.

* Plato de Repub. VI.

† Monteil, Hist. des François IV. 18.

‡ Cicero ad Herennium, lib. IV. 44.

Machiavel thus describes John de Medicis: "He died generally regretted on account of his great virtues: he was charitable, not waiting till the poor should come to him, but going out to search for them: he loved men; he praised virtue; and he had compassion upon the wicked. He never aspired to honors and enjoyed them all; he used never to go to the palace excepting when he was called thither; he was always the friend of peace; with one hand he supported the unhappy, and with the other he pushed forwards those who prospered: his only passion was for the public good; he was affable: his words were full of sense, but he had no eloquence. He died rich in renown, and in the love of his fellow-countrymen."*

The Catholic magistrates of France, down to very late times, were men of learning and constant study, of simple and even austere habits. John Rotrou, the old French poet, having an authority under the French government at Dreux, in the days of Cardinal Mazarine, spent his time between the exercise of his duty, prayer and study: in a spirit of religion he refused to leave the town of Dreux in 1650, during a contagion which carried off every person that was attacked by it. The lieutenant-general was absent. The mayor was dead, and he was advised to withdraw; but he replied that he would never abandon the inhabitants who were confined to him. "It is true," he wrote to a friend, "the danger is great, since at the very moment I am writing, the bells are tolling for the twenty-second person who has died this day. They shall toll for me when it pleases God."† What greatness of soul was shown by these men when victims to political enemies. In the reign of Charles VI., John Desmarets, falsely accused of being an accomplice to the disorders in Brittany, was drawn to the scaffold. "Master John," some one said to him, "cry mercy of the king that he may pardon you." Desmarets replied, "I served King Philip, his grandfather, King John, King Charles his father, well and loyally, and never had these three kings occasion to grant it to me, and neither has the present if he had knowledge of man. To God alone I will cry mercy." Sir Thomas More, the last Catholic chancellor of England, showed equal magnanimity at his death. Much may be learned from hearing the instructions which used to be addressed to magistrates and persons in authority. About the year 798, Theodulf, Bishop of Orleans, was sent by Charlemagne with Leidrade into the Narbonnaise, to observe and reform the administration of these provinces. On his return, he composed a poem entitled, "Parænesis ad iudices, or exhortations to judges." It opens with a religious discourse, then follows the praise of Charlemagne, a description of their journey, a view of the danger to which magistrates are exposed, and a warning to avoid bribes and corruption. It is full of passages breathing the tenderest humanity Witness this: —

* Hist of Florence, lib. IV.

† Goujet, Bibliothèque Française, tom. xvi. 136.

Qui patre seu matre orbatur, vel si qua marito,
Istorum causas sit tua cura sequi:
Horum causiloquus, horum tutela maneto;
Pars hæc te matrem noverit, illo virum;
Debilis, invalidus, puer, ager, anusve senexve;
Si veniant, fer opem his miserando piam;
Fac sedeant qui stare nequit, qui surgere prenda;
Cui cor, voxque tremit, pesque, manusque, juva;
Dejectum verbis releva, sedato minaccis;
Qui timet, huic vires, qui furit, adde metum.

In more recent times, a certain seigneur of Spain, lieutenant of Seville, had written to the celebrated father J. de Avilla, requesting advice as to the conduct he ought to observe in the exercise of his office. The idea which was then entertained of the magisterial duties may be collected from the following reply.* “Great is the error of those who think that the principal affair of a good government consists in restoring and maintaining the walls of the city, paving the streets, providing for the markets, laying in stores, punishing crimes, and giving justice to all who demand it at the tribunals. These things are good and necessary, but not alone sufficient: the last end of a Christian government should be to promote the Christian virtues of the people, to remove obstacles to salvation of souls, and to contribute to extend the love and honor of God. The government, therefore, can only be good when it is founded upon love: as for the punishment of crimes, this is a sad and miserable office, the necessity of which should be removed if possible. God has compassion even in his vengeance,† and the Son of God wept for Jerusalem that was to be destroyed; and since the Creator inclines to compassion, much more ought a mortal judge when he condemns another man, like to himself or perhaps less vicious. It is not reasonable that he should sleep the night before passing a sentence of death, but he ought to spend it in sighs and prayers, beseeching our Lord to console, strengthen, and compassionate this his poor brother, to whom he is obliged to give the pain of condemnation: he is bound to act thus in such cases, both to satisfy his duty to his neighbor, and also in order to propitiate the mercy of God for himself, when he shall appear before the divine tribunal. Love therefore is required both to prevent and to punish crimes. Moreover, the governor should consult with holy men; for as the Scripture saith, ‘The soul of a holy man sometimes announceth true things more than seven watchman seated on high.’”‡

In the Council of Chalons, it is enjoined to all who govern the people, that they should take counsel of bishops in affairs of importance, and in doubtful cases. The Emperor Justinian commanded this to be done, and the ancient kings of Castille have always observed it, one of whom demanded of the bishops, assembled in the Council of Toledo, that they would give him laws by which he might govern his kingdom well, and they gave them to him. It is not because bishops have a great knowledge of human laws, but because of the celestial light which results from the contemplation of God, by means of which, they acquire a knowledge superior to all human prudence. The governor should also study parts of the holy Scripture, and above all, the New Testament; and also he should read passages from the holy councils and the pastoral of St. Gregory; for there is much to learn from these even with respect to temporal government. The governor should also read the lives of the saints, not only out of curiosity, but for his own advancement in the science of the saints, and by so doing he will not lose, but on the contrary, he will gain time, to govern himself and others. It will be well also that some good monk should speak to the governor once a week, or at least once a month, and oftener during the holy time of Lent. The governor should charge his officers to beware of requiring oaths in cases of temptation and doubt, lest they should give rise to perjury, which will be to oppose the great end of all government; he should be most careful to provide at the expense of the city, good masters for the school of the poor; and for this purpose he should cause them to hear the charge of some good monks, and he should reward the best masters by inviting them to dine at his table, showing humility after the example of our Lord, who did not disdain to wash the feet of his poor disciples. In great cities many children of ten years and upwards, spend Sundays and festivals at play without hearing mass; and it is a great pity to see them afterwards when grown up, publicly committing mortal sin. When the children do go, the churches are full of elder people, who are angry at the disturbances which always attend a collection of children. There should be therefore a church on purpose for this little people, and sergeants should go about the street to collect the little stragglers and lead them to the church, where some good priest after mass should instruct them in their duties. Great care should be taken that the streets of the city, and places of public resort should present no danger to the eyes of unguarded youth, and above all, no profit should accrue to the city from the lives of vicious and miserable men. Prisons should be attended to, and no delay suffered, and justice should be quick in execution. All persons employed in offices should be devout and fearing God. The bull-fights are things very dangerous for the conscience of him who gives orders or leave to have them; and many learned men think that it is a mortal sin. Let the governor then do his duty, and if he cannot prevent the evil, at least he will deliver his own soul from the danger. Lastly, it is right that the governor should show reverence to the Church and to ecclesiastics, not considering how indeed we are unworthy, but having regard to our Lord Jesus Christ, who desires that all who approach him should be treated with respect.* A great distinction between the characters of men in public stations in these ages

* Spiritual Letters of de Avilla, Epist. xlv.

† Isai. i.

* Eccles. xxxvii.

* Id. Epist. xlvii.

and in our time, is the circumstance that they rather disdained than desired the talent of oratory and of public speaking. We have heard Machiavel record of John de Medicis, that he was not eloquent; in the Homeric style, we might say of him, such were his qualities ἀγορῇ δὲ τ' ἀμείνονές εἰσι καὶ ἄλλοι.* It was rather in praise of a public man, as it had been of a Homeric hero, that he was easily vanquished in a debate of words: and perhaps even of a Christian or a philosopher it is but little to say in commendation, that he resembles the son of Andremon, the best of the Cretolians.

——— *ἀγορῇ δὲ ἑ παῦροι Ἀχαιῶν
μικῶν, ὅππότε κοῦροι ἐρίβδειαν περὶ μύθων.*†

Be this as it may, it is certain that in ages of faith, society was not exposed to the danger arising from a multitude of orators. The public men were simple, learned, holy, intrepid, who thought it enough to know that as Homer says, "It is a Deity who presides over the assemblies of men,"‡ or as Pindar says, that popular assemblies ἀγοραὶ βουλαφόοι are ruled by the same divine power which guides the ships on the ocean and the war of armies on the land.§ There was, indeed, the rhetoric of Louis de Grenada, a masterly work thoroughly Christian, which seems as if it had been composed expressly for such men: but after all, in opposition to Cicero, it may be greatly questioned whether that which the Greeks called philosophy would ever be the mother of what is generally considered eloquence.|| Epictetus names as two things opposed to each other, and which cannot be united together, an orator and a philosopher.¶ In the choice of public functionaries, men of these latter times suppose that talents alone are to be regarded; but in the middle ages, fidelity and probity were considered of more importance; for it was thought that a good will is always the first quality and the most indispensable, which of itself could give aptitude to the most moderate talents, and discernment to the understanding. Another observation to be suggested here is, that these ages knew not that prodigious and fearful multiplication of public offices in a state which is found to arise from these new political principles, which impose upon a government the obligation of interfering with every thing, and of directing every thing, agriculture, commerce, the arts, public education, the care of the sick and of the poor. Proceeding to speak of the sovereign dignity, it may be remarked in the first place, that hereditary sovereignty was the work of Christianity: the elective alone was known to pagan Europe.†† Homer's sense of legitimaey is, indeed, seen in Agamemnon's sceptre σκήπτρον πατρώιον.‡‡

But the invention that a king never dies, admirable invention to secure peace and an undisturbed permanence of government, belongs to the wisdom of the pastors of the Church, who even according to the admission of Gibbon, were the found-

* II. xviii. 106. † II. XV. 283. ‡ Od. II. 69. § Olymp. XII. || De Oratore, I. 3.

¶ Manuale, cap. xxvi.  De Haller, Restaurat. de la Science Politique, tom. III, cap. xlvii.

†† Chateaub. Discours. Hist. tom. III. cxliv.

‡‡ II. II. xlvi.

ers of the Christian monarchies. The fourteenth Louis, on his death-bed had forebodings of what would follow from his system of absolute power. "What will become of my kingdom when I shall be no more?" said this unfortunate prince. In the middle ages the death of a king was not attended with danger to the state, for there was nothing personal or isolated in government. In fact, the rights and powers of kings differed from those of subjects who had possessions, only in their degree, not in their nature, so that there was not one which other men did not also enjoy, although in a more confined circle.* The kings of Spain were so subject to the laws, that the domain in causes of royal patrimony had to run the same fortune as the goods of the least subject, and was condemned in every doubtful case. The judges in the presence of Philip IV. gave sentence against him, and he submitted.† All kingdoms and patrimonial estates were little in their beginnings; such were the original monarchies of Arabia, Egypt, Palestine, and Asia Minor, India, Greece, Italy, Germany, Spain and Gaul. It is not just to fix our attention exclusively on the evils resulting from so minute a division, without attending also to its advantages, among which may be reckoned the non-employment of mercenaries and subalterns, as also many circumstances favorable to the freedom of the people, such as the absence of taxes, since kings having their possessions were not obliged to extort money from their subjects. The charm of variety in this respect was highly characteristic of the middle ages. Germany and Switzerland were composed of more than two hundred states, ecclesiastical and secular, monarchical and republican. In general nothing could be more natural and gentle than the assumption of kingly power in these ages. The honor which Pindar ascribes to the Locrians, that they were never governed by foreigners as sovereigns,‡ would not then have been a distinction. The modern transfers of a whole people to a foreign king without any stipulations or provision to protect their ancient interests, not even their religion, are to be ascribed, as De Haller observes, to the new philosophic principles, to the system so much extolled of the revolutionary uniformity.

What has been already seen in relation to the lower branches of administration, in which all office of authority was a service, continues to be witnessed in the doctrine of the royal power. Thus John of Salisbury says, "a prince differs from a tyrant in being obedient to the law, and in governing the people by its dictates; for being its minister, he is preferred before all others, since bearing the burdens of all he serves to the advantage and utility of every man;§ and it is certain by the authority of the divine law, that the prince is subject to the law of justice.|| Vain is the censure of laws if they do not bear the image of the divine law, and the constitution of the prince is useless if it is not conformable to ecclesiastical discipline.¶ With our Christian princes, Theodosiuses and Leos, their deeds are in-

* De Haller, Restaur. de la Science Pol. tom. I. 16, tom. II. 15, 27, 28.

† Savedra, I. 236.

‡ Olympe. IX.

§ De Nugis Curialium, IV. cap. i.

|| Id. cap. iv.

¶ Id. vi.

citements to virtue, and their words are so many institutions of manners. The prince must be aware of pride, and must remember that his subjects are his brethren. Without humility, discretion, and charity, a principality cannot subsist. Whoever therefore loves the rank of his own elevation, let him be humble; for he who departs from the works of humility, falls by the weight of tumor from the height of his dignity.* A prince like any other man, must not seek his own; he must protect the good by severity tempered with mercy towards the wicked, the correction of whom should be felt as the cutting off of his own limbs.† He must decline neither to the right hand nor to the left, neither by excessive benignity nor extreme severity; by justice and innocence thrones stand, but on account of wickedness kingdoms are transferred to others. Read all history, and you will find that the seed of wicked and proud princes has soon been cut off; only to good princes do sons succeed in long and happy order: there is no resisting this decree: the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it.”‡ “A tyrant,” he says again, “is one who oppresses the people by a violent domination; a prince is one who governs by the laws: and law is a gift of God, the form of equity, the rule of justice, the image of the divine will, the guardian of safety, the union and consolidation of people, and the destruction of vice. Whoever opposes the law opposes grace and provokes God to battle. A prince fights for the law and for the liberty of the people; a tyrant thinks he has done nothing unless he make void the law and reduce the people to servitude; a prince is a certain image of the Deity, and a tyrant is the representative of Lucifer.”§ Against the evils of a tyranny these ancient kingdoms were provided in a manner suitable to their faith. They did not think it enough to attack it in the head of the state: they looked for its roots and fibres through even the lowest ranks of society. “Tyranny is a common vice,” says John of Salisbury, “for as soon as men gain power of any kind, they may establish one; for though all men cannot have kingdoms and principalities, yet from the crime of tyranny there is no one or but few wholly free; for while ambition instigates and injustice rages, the birth of tyranny follows of necessity,”|| and the mechanic in his shop, and the fisherman in his boat, may each exercise a tyranny. St. Thomas Aquinas says of a democracy, that thus a whole people may be as one tyrant, “populus totus erit quasi unus tyrannus.”¶ It was in vain to think of securing a legitimate monarchy unless the people were to be formed by the principles of Christian meekness: this is the purport of the advice of John of Salisbury. “The world is over-whelmed with the waters of iniquity, but the rivers of Paradise are sweet with an infusion of the wood of the cross, and they bear refreshment and health to souls. These also give liberty and prevent the incursion of all tyranny or punish it. ‘Non ergo vanæ vires, sed veritas liberat in æquitate consistens, et licet vanitas promittat liberationem, vere

* Cap. vii. † Cap. viii. ‡ Cap. xii. § Id. lib. VII. cap. xvii.

|| De Nugis Curialium, lib. VII. cap. xvii.

¶ De Regim. Princip. l.

liberi nequaquam sunt, nisi quos filius liberavit.' Distinguish the liberty of nature, of grace, and of glory, and you will find that none of them proceeds from vanity, and there can be no condition more servile than that of the tyrant himself; for if where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty: he must indeed be oppressed with wretched slavery whom that spirit doth not govern."* The precautions, therefore, to secure freedom were not superficial, absurd or pernicious, like those of earlier or later times. Where these great principles on which they rested are wanting, the vague desire of a liberty of which no exact idea is ever formed, leads men to commit a thousand acts of folly, and to appear more like children or insane persons than creatures possessing reason and a title to moral dignity. History abounds with examples; witness that disposition of the Athenian people represented by the old poet, which made them ascribe every action to the desire of setting up a tyranny. If a man were buying fish in the market, and asked for a sea-bream, a scarce fish, instead of a loach which was plentiful, the stall woman would cry out that he was for a tyranny. If a man buy anchovies and want leek to dress them with—

The herb woman with eyes askew regards him,
And what! says she, you want a leek! friend, do ye?
Marry come up! you are not for a tyranny
I hope.†

In Catholic states men were not obliged to support through the love of freedom that monstrous and pernicious principle which requires every individual in society to become a politician and retailer of news, a character to which our English Sophocles applies the epithet of base, and which seemed to a wise people of antiquity as deserving of punishment, because it tended to produce novelty and change, and a multitude of offences and evils.‡ Scotti has well shown that the study of politics when become too common, and permitted to youth superficially instructed, endangers both religion and the state.§ Men trusted not their freedom to the voice of sophists, who, as Tacitus says, "ut imperium evertant, libertatem proferunt, si impetraverint ipsam aggrediuntur."|| They trusted it not to the rise of some great Marcellus "in every petty factious villager." Even their most loved poets had taught them better things.

Ah, people! thou obedient still shouldst live,
And in the saddle let thy Cæsar sit,
If well thou markedst that which God commands.¶

But their precautions were solid, natural, and efficacious. De Haller remarks, that Aristotle, after proposing the most odious artifices, and the most revolting to

*Lib. VIII, cap. xvi. †Aristoph. Vespæ, Mitchell's Translat. ‡Plutarch de Curiositate.

§Teoremi di Politica Cristiana.

||Annal. XVI.

¶Dante, Purg. VI.

Polit. V. 2.

strengthen tyranny, passes in silence over all the just and natural means of preserving a legitimate domination.*

Sophists in their pride of intellect are guilty of the same extravagance in the measures which they propose for preserving the people from a tyranny. In the middle ages, it is to be remembered, men worked on the foundation nature lays, and believed in the force of truth, and trusted in a manner the political interests of their country to its influence. The beautiful confiding principles of nature were not obliterated,—such as dictated that famous acquittal of the two youths accused of murdering their own father—they were acquitted because they were found sleeping. All suspicion of their guilt was removed at once, for no one thought, says Cicero, that he who had offended against all divine and human laws could sleep.† It was this confidence which formed the check upon the power of kings. John of Salisbury proposes an instance, for he says, “if Alexander had warred against those just men, on the last shores of the ocean, who explained their mode of life to him, perhaps he would not have prevailed against the innocent; on that very account, because innocence is not easily conquered, and truth confiding in its strength triumphs over armed chivalry.”‡ They believed in the force of meekness and humility, of which the very ideal really existing in her whom all generations call blessed, is said by the Church to have the might of armies. “Terribilis es ut castrorum acies ordinata.” “Behold,” says John of Salisbury, “the end not alone of those kings, who by abuse exercise tyranny, but of those many tyrants in private life, of whom there may be some, even in the priesthood; for the republic of the impious has its head and its members, and, even as it were, its civil institutions, endeavoring to imitate the legitimate republic; a tyrant being its head, heretical and schismatical priests its soul, unjust laws its ears and eyes, violent-armed men its hands. It is useless to dwell on the end of tyrant kings, which is known, but where are the private tyrants, the domestic tyrants, Gaufridus, Milo, Manulphus, Alanus, Simon, Gilbertus, not so much counts of the kingdom as public enemies? Where is William of Salisbury? Where Marimus, who by interposition of the blessed Virgin, fell into the ditch that he had made for others? Of these, as the malice was criminal, so the infamy and horror of their end are known to the present age. You have not, therefore, to read histories, you have only to open your eyes to look on what is around you, to see that the end of tyrants is miserable.”§ Nor should we overlook the force of these fearful denunciations of the punishments of a future life, with which the ministers of religion continually threatened tyrants; of those tremendous visions which they recounted, in which men heard, as from an unearthly voice, words like those of Dante’s guide,

These are the souls of tyrants, who were given
To blood and rapine. Here they wail aloud
Their merciless wrongs:¶

Restaurat. de la Science Pol.* tom. III. 231.
§ Lib. VIII. cop. xvii. xxi.

† Pro S. Roscio Amer.

‡ Lib. IV. cap. xi

¶ Hell, XII.

After showing the heathen examples of tyrannicide, and those of the Old Testament, John of Salisbury concludes in the spirit of meekness, that it is out of limit and true rule to stand against anointed majesty, saying that a wicked king ought to be endured with patience, in the hopes of his repenting like David; and he adds, "if the people are innocent and humble, then God will certainly stand by them."* "Neither is it lawful," he says, "through the favor of new persons to depart from the blood of princes, in constituting empire, to whom, by a privilege of the Divine will, a succession of children is promised, if they walk in the judgments of the Lord; and yet if they decline a little from the way, they are not immediately to be cast off, but to be corrected paternally in justice, until it becomes clear that they are obstinate in evil. The vices of kings are to be borne with, lest a greater evil should result from their destruction, for it is the will of God that we should bear the burden."† Yet a sterner principle was admitted by sovereigns themselves. Charles the Bald, in 856, declared by a formal act, that the grandees of his kingdom could resist the king by force of arms, if he required anything unjust. Henry I., king of England, recognized the same right in his subjects, in the strongest terms. The mighty king Andrew II. confirmed it to the states of Hungary, in 1222. John, king of Denmark, recognized the same right in the subjects of his three kingdoms. Alphonso III., king of Aragon, conferred it on the barons of his kingdom, in 1287; and in Poland the natural right of a legitimate resistance, was also formally announced. This is to be ascribed to those sentiments of individual liberty, that energetic development of the rights of individuals which the feudal system was so calculated to maintain and cherish: still this made resistance legal. A more consistent and efficacious defence consisted in provision for legislative redress, and also in the counsellors, who, under various denominations, were appointed to assist in the government of the people. In this respect, the monarchies of Christendom partook of the Homeric and Dorian character. The Homeric assembly, the βουλή γερόντων consisted of the older men of the chief families. At Sparta the γερονσία was the council to which none but men of sixty or more years of age had admission, "for the Dorians," says Müller, "laid the greatest importance upon age in the management of public affairs. These old counsellors were subject to no responsibility, since it was thought that the near prospect of death would give them more moderation than any fear of incurring censure. Plato calls this τὴν κατὰ γῆρας σώφρονα δύναμιν.‡ Dionysius after expressing his preference of the kingly mood of government chosen by the companions of Romulus, as being the best of all kinds of rule, observes that all the ancient kings of the world had their councils composed of men of the noblest families, and were not like those of later ages, independent and abandoned to their own opinions.§ The Christian sovereign was again the heroic, or Homeric, or Dorian king; not a despot, but having a council to assist him to rule: and of

* Lib. VII. cap. xvii. † In lib. V. cap. vi. ‡ Ag. III. § Antiquit. Roman. lib. II. c. xii.

this government St. Thomas Aquinas says, that as the rule of a tyrant is the worst, so that of a king is the best of all forms.* French writers observe, that the appearance of such a prince in the middle ages as Louis XI., is an extraordinary and almost inexplicable phenomenon, and that he stands alone in the old annals of their nation, like one who does not belong to the series of their kings. The history of the counsellors of kings in ages of faith, is rich in sublime examples of public virtue. Lord Bacon says of the philosophers who followed the rich, and fell at the feet of tyrants, and who were too prudent to contradict kings, "These and the like applications and stoopings to points of necessity and convenience, cannot be disallowed : for though they may have some outward baseness ; yet in a judgment truly made, there are to be accounted submissions to the occasion and not to the person."† Catholic counsellors, from being ignorant of this nice distinction, made by the great reformer of philosophy, were unanimous in disallowing such applications and stoopings which would have destined them, as they supposed, to join hereafter those ghosts which Dante saw in the second chasm, all immersed in ordure

Who gibber in low melancholy sounds
With wide- stretch'd nostrils snort, and on themselves
Smite with their palms.‡——

Far different from what these were when on earth, they would not have been afraid to name a Cyclops before Philip ; nor would they have acted the part of Cleon before the tyrant people of Athens. Christine de Pisan says, "that the task of correcting men of high authority in a state, belongs naturally to their private and intimate friends, who for the good of their soul, and for the sake of their renown, ought to admonish them secretly of their faults."§ What a contrast is here to the pagan spirit of the English Protestant chancellor ! Mercurieu, counsellor of the emperor Charles V., refused to sign a treaty of peace which he judged unjust and inhuman, and nevertheless retained his place.|| The chancellor of Philip II., duke of Burgundy, alone withstood the prince on one occasion, and declared that he would rather renounce his dignity, than consent to such measures ; and the duke was so pleased with his courage, that he loaded him with greater honor than before.¶ Even Don Pedro the Cruel found a counsellor in Fernandez of Toledo, who was bold enough to represent sincerely to him, the crimes of his government ; though he had the baseness to repay him, by sending him to the scaffold. Far different was the conduct of the Black Prince, when the Sire d'Alebert, in presence of the court at Bordeaux, declared to him the reports which circulated to his discredit. The prince replied, " Little would that knight love me, if he saw in me, or heard me say any thing contrary to my honor, and would not tell

* De Regimine Princip. III. † On the Advancement of Learning. ‡ Hell, XVIII.

§ Livre des Faits du bon Roi Charles V. liv. II. chap. xviii.

|| Guicciardini, Hist. lib. XVI.

¶ Drexelius Phaëtont. cap. IX.

me of it. Therefore let me hear what people say against me." This led to a disclosure, which ended in the deliverance of his prisoner Du Guesclin.* The tenderness with which these bold speakers were cherished by Christian kings, is often presented in an affecting light. When Ansel de Garlande, Senechal of France, was slain by the baron de Puiset, king Louis-le-gros testified a most extraordinary grief, and for a long time after could never speak of any thing without alluding to the fate of his dear senechal; insomuch that he would not even grant any favor excepting upon condition that one would pray to God for the soul of Ansel. In an ancient charter of the Abbey of Maurigni, near Estampes, this condition is expressed in a touching manner: he grants this favor to the monks in memory of his faithful senechal, who had loved them in his life, and on condition that they cease not to pray to God for his soul.

John of Salisbury, the priest of holy Church, explaining the duty of those who are to counsel kings, speaks very differently from Lord Bacon, the Protestant philosopher. "The rich and powerful kings of the earth," he says, "ought not to be flattered when they do evil: for free speech is not treason, and the Holy Spirit is the spirit of truth; and he will cry though he will not be heard, when any one hardens his ear to the cry of the poor." The same language had been addressed to the emperor Theodosius, by St. Ambrose, "It is neither imperial to deny liberty of speech, nor sacerdotal, not to say what one thinks, for there is nothing so popular and amiable in you emperors as to love liberty in those who are subject to you. And if this be the distinction between good and evil princes, that the good love liberty, and the evil slavery, nothing in the priesthood is so perilous before God, and so disgraceful with men, as not to deliver one's thoughts freely."† Mariana relates that the king Don John II., of Portugal, being applied to for a certain vacant office, replied to those who asked for it, that he had long intended to present it to a favorite of his, one who had such a zeal for his service, that he had never spoken to him with the mere desire of being agreeable, but only with the wish to serve him and the state. When Petrarch and the emperor were bidding each other farewell, a Tuscan knight in the emperor's train, said to him, "This is the man of whom I have so often spoken to you: he will sing your praise if you deserve it; but be assured he knows when to speak and when to be silent:" such freedom of speech did the emperor grant to those who were attached to his person; resembling, in this respect, our Henry V. in Shakespeare, who replies to the ambassadors of France, on their asking if they might venture to render freely what they had in charge:

We are no tyrant, but a Christian king;
Unto whose grace our passion is as subject
As are our wretches fetter'd in our prisons;
Therefore with frank and with uncurbed plainness
Tell us the dauphin's mind.

* Chronique de Du Guesclin Bibliothèque Choise, III.

† S. Ambrosii Epist. xxix.

The non-intervention of the commons in the affairs of the ancient governments, is a theme of bitter and interminable declamation with writers of our time : the fact certainly is, that whatever was begun by the commons was anciently termed petition ; for they had no jurisdiction or power to ordain ; but yet it should be remembered that the great charter which protected every individual of the nation in the free enjoyment of his life, his liberty, and his property, unless declared to be forfeited by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land, was secured at a time when the House of Commons was not in being.* It does not follow that the interests of the people in other countries were neglected, because there was not a nest of sophists, fed at their expense, forming a central power in the capital, under some vile politician, like Bolinbroke in Richard's time, "that king of smiles ;" while poets were addressing odes to commemorate the glory of their insurrections, like Falstaff lauding and praising them, because they offended none but the virtuous, and orators were explaining the abstract happiness and freedom of the general nation, in which domestic liberty had perished. Possibly it happened, as Strabo says of the Rhodians, that "though not under a democratic government, great care was taken of the people."† When the Catholic religion prevailed in England, the liberty of the subject was secured without the system of political fictions, and in France, when the government rejected the Catholic religion, nothing was done for the liberty of the subject with that system established ; for it left the minds and the persons of the lower classes without freedom by means of the monopoly of education, and the conscript laws. Even with respect to the ancient military service, it was the intention of the monarchs that no one should be obliged to pay exorbitantly for a substitute ; it was the sentence of Charlemagne, "ut liberi homines pauperes a nullo injuste opprimantur."‡ The great writers of the middle ages express sentiments with regard to the people that breathe the most ardent and judicious love of freedom : hear what Vincent of Beauvais says, "There must be mutual safety for king and people ; he errs who thinks that the king is safe when nothing is safe from the king : clemency, and not a fortress of towers, is the best security for him."§ "In the depression of the people," says John of Salisbury, "the strength of the prince is weakened ; for a people ground down is neither able nor willing to increase his power."|| "As for the people in a state," he says elsewhere, "their duties are so various, that no writer of offices has treated of each separately ; but generally all things are to be referred to the public good, and whatever is useful to the humbler classes, that is, to the multitude, should be pursued in all things ; for a minority should always yield to the greater number. To this end magistrates are appointed that they may ward off injuries from the subjects, and nothing can be more disgraceful to the magistrates of a state than when this class is trodden down ; but the whole republic will be safe as long as the

* Note to Sir M. Hale's Hist. of the Common Law, 181.

† Lib. XIV.

‡ Baluz. tom. I. col. 515.

§ Speculum doctrinale, lib. V. c. ii.

|| De Nugis Curialium, lib. V. cap. vi.

superior members attend to the inferior, and the inferior to the superior, that each may assist the other, and think that to be always useful to itself which it knows will prove most useful to the other.* Civil life should imitate nature, and may be formed best after the model of that of bees, described by Virgil, to whose republic the philosopher sends us to learn civil policy.† If kings offend God or trample upon the Church, the safety of the whole state is endangered; a result so alien from the office of a prince, that whenever that happens in a republic, he is thought either not to perceive it, or to sleep, or to be absent.‡ But yet Christ will hear the poor when they cry, and then it will be in vain to multiply vows, and to endeavor as if to bribe God with gifts; for the offerings of the impious are an abomination to the Lord, because they are made from wickedness; and he who offers sacrifice from the robbery of the poor, is as he who should immolate a son to his father. Nevertheless, I am still bound as a debtor, not only to the good, but also to the evil, in humility and respect to God, by whom all power is instituted. And therefore the Hebrews were commanded to pray for Babylon, because in the peace of princes is the rest of the people.§ But the whole virtue and prosperity of the state depends upon the maintenance of charity in all the parts of the body politic, and upon the flesh being subdued to the spirit; for where this continues, neither will the members be oppressed by the swelling of the head, nor the head weakened by the destitution and indolence of the members; for all this proceeds from the infirmity of sin: for the faults of inferiors derogate from the merit of princes, and the sins of princes are an occasion of sinning to subjects. A prince therefore is made mild by the innocence of the people, and popular movements are repressed by the innocence of rulers.”||

Many of the moderns are not prepared to find that such sentiments as these prevailed in the middle ages, and yet there might be no end of producing parallel passages. That indifference for the interests of the people, to which we are now continually referred, is not to be found in the institutions and language of the ages of faith. At the siege of Calais, when the inhabitants were reduced to the last extremity, and were told to surrender at discretion, in hopes of some of them being ransomed, the governor said in his reply, “ nous avons enduré maint mal et mésaise; mais nous sommes résolus a souffrir ce qu’ oneques gendarmes, ne souffrirent plutôt que de consentir que le plus petit garçon de la ville eût autre mal que le plus grand de nous.” All the formula and public acts of government were strongly expressive of the spirit which breathed in this noble reply. Thus at their coronation, the Norman princes swore “ to defend the people committed to their care, and to govern always with goodness, justice, and loyalty.” Religion defended even the material interest of the people. The bull in Cœna Domini, which used to be read at Rome every Maunday Thursday, excommunicated all kings and rulers who

* Id. lib. VI. cap. xx.

† Cap. xxi.

‡ Lib. VI. c. xxv.

§ Id. lib. VI. cap. xxvi.

|| Id. lib. VI. cap. 29.

should levy exorbitant taxes upon their subjects, or without consulting the Holy See. But the goodness of sovereigns was often of itself sufficient protection. The princes of Lorraine, when they wanted taxes had only to rise up in the church after mass, and wave their hat in the air, and the faithful people used to supply them immediately with what they wanted. Such was the wise economy of Suger, as regent of France, that while he was able to meet the king's repeated demands for money to assist him in the East, the people found not once occasion of complaint for any tax.* Nor were they retained in a state of humiliation.

"A prince," says Don Savedra, "should honor not only the nobility, and their ministers, but also all other subjects, who render themselves worthy by any particular merit, as is recommended by king Don Alonso, in one of his laws, where he shows how a king ought to honor virtue wherever it is found; and he adduces reasons for all kinds of persons, beginning from the highest, and descending to the very lowest in the scale of society."† I have already spoken of the ceremony of the coronation of kings. This was often composed so as to indicate in a striking manner, the importance and necessity of attending to the interests of the people. When a new duke of Carinthia succeeded to the government, he was escorted by a multitude of peasants to a field, over the ruins of an ancient town, of which all that remains is one great block of marble. The new duke was to wear a peasant's hat and shoes, and hold a shepherd's crook, so as to resemble a shepherd. Having come to the spot with banners borne before him, one peasant mounted on the great stone, was to cry out, "Who is he that comes with all these banners?" They answer, "It is the prince of the country:" he cries, "Is he a just judge, does he seek the good of the land? and is he of a free condition, worthy of honor, an observer and defender of the Christian religion?" They cry, "He is and will be." Then the peasant comes down, gives the prince possession of the spot, gives him a slight blow on the cheek, and the prince mounts on the stone, brandishes a naked sword, and speaks to the people; then he drinks water out of his hat, to denote simplicity of life. Then he is escorted to the church, where he assists at mass, and assumes the ducal state. This investiture by the peasants is said to be retained as a privilege arising from their priority in faith; because it was the peasants who first received the religion of Jesus Christ, the princes and nobles not having been converted till the time of Charlemagne. As religion, in these ages, supplied the principle of obedience to established rulers, so was it also esteemed the basis and origin of their power. King Don Fernando the Great, said to God with his last breath, "To thee, O Lord, belongs all power; command is thine. Thou art Lord above all kings, and all are subject to thy Divine Providence. Into thy hands, then, I commend the sceptre which thou hadst the goodness to entrust in mine." Savedra observes, that king Don Fernando the Saint used nearly the same words, in his last hours.

* Hist. de Suger, VI.

† Christian Prince, II. 104.

These men understood their office. The Council of Paris in the year 824, reminded kings that they must not suppose that they hold their kingdoms from their ancestors, but from God. The modern sophists always speak of the religious basis of government and legislation, as the characteristic of a barbarous age. Yet the most illustrious sages of the ancient world recognized no other. According to the principles of the Dorian sovereignty, to which I have already alluded, as the object of the predilection of Plato, the dignity of the king was founded on a religious notion, and his power limited by religion. Müller shows how intimate in early times was the connection between government and religion. "It is clear," he says, "that the Dorians considered the kingly office as proceeding from the Deity, and not as originating from the people; which would, I believe, have seemed to them in no wise more natural than that the liberty of the people should be dependent on the king."* Bonald well observes, in speaking of the Christian monarchies, that "Religion which placed God at the head of society, gave man a high idea of the human dignity, whereas philosophy, which is always searching for men who are above other men, to give them laws, creeps always at the feet of some idol: in Africa at the feet of Mahomet, in Europe at the feet of Voltaire or Luther; and rejecting God from the universe, makes gods of men, whose talents and opinions it admires. As legitimate power came from God, authority was justified and obedience ennobled; so that men equally feared commanding, and felt honor in obeying.† The new sophists," he says "having discarded the divine mission, had recourse to a human mission, and sought in an aggregation of men, the reason of the power, which they found not in one individual; but the people itself was only a collection of men, and so it was still men who sent men to give laws to men: and Jurieu, the apostle of the popular sovereignty, thought to escape from the difficulty, by saying boldly that the people is the only authority, which has no need of reason to validate its acts; a sentence which extorted from Bossuet a burst of fearful and indignant eloquence. All the ancient legislators founded their laws in the doctrine of the divinity." Virgil used the general expression in making Ilioneus ascribe to Jupiter the foundation of a new city, and the power of ruling the proud nations with justice.‡ "It required," says Bonald, "thousands of years, and a great progress in human philosophy, to be able to deny the Supreme Being a place in the constitutional code of a people, and to regard as a conquest the having been able to secularize its legislation." Nothing could be more simple than the views of the Christian nations in this respect. The civil legislation rested entirely upon the foundation of the natural and divine law, and the decalogue was in the first page of all the civil and criminal codes. The emperor Justinian had defined jurisprudence to be "the knowledge of things divine and human;" and his code began in the name of the Holy Trinity and of the Christian faith and by the most solemn and express declaration of the sovereignty of religion, and of the primacy of the Roman Church. These expressions did not arise from a mere vague sentiment of an abstract truth. The immediate support which government derived from the meekness and piety of the people was well understood. Suger had often on his tongue the words of St. Ambrose, "the sins of the people are the true cause of the revolutions of empires; and it is in vain that princes flatter themselves, that subjects will be faithful to them, if they are not faithful to God."* The golden bull, which was the fundamental law of the German empire, begins by an apostrophe to "Satan, to pride, to luxury, wrath, and envy." And, in fact, in the ancient Catholic state, as of old in the Dorian, education was upon the whole a subject of greater importance than government. Again the object of legislation was not different in its last terms, from that of religion. The universal reason, and the primal traditions of mankind had taught this lesson to the heathen legislators, that neither a state nor a man can be happy where luxurious and licentious manners prevail; but that of necessity such states would be a prey to a succession of revolutions, establishing either a tyranny, or an oligarchy, or a democracy; so that there would be no peace.†

* Hist. of the Dorians, book III. 6.

† Du Divorce.

‡ Æneid, lib. I. 532.

Dionysius in treating on the early history of Rome, continually remarks that the great object of all wise governments should be the cherishing temperance, simplicity, and justice among the people, and that no peace or safety can be hoped for in a state where these virtues do not exist.‡ "This is what I chiefly admire in the man," he says of Romulus, "that he sought to cherish and secure, and not leave to chance, the things which form the happiness of a state:—first, the favor of the gods, which causes all the affairs of men to prosper; then temperance and justice, by means of which men are less inclined to injure each other, are more peaceable, and disposed to estimate happiness, not by shameful pleasures, but by virtue and honor." Plato teaches that the great object of all national legislation should be, the promotion of virtue; § he says not a word about commerce, glory, or the preserving a rank in the scale of nations. Leibnitz, with noble energy, protests against the modern teachers of jurisprudence who dare to teach with Pufendorff, that "the end of the science of national law, is confined to the limits of this life;" this, he says is the policy of atheism: the pagan philosophy is in this point more wise, more severe, more sublime than that of Pufendorff. "I am astonished," he continues, "that Christians should permit such a degradation of philosophy, which has been so noble and so holy in the hands of some pagans." Man never existed, and never will exist, in a state of pure nature, that is unassisted by sanctifying grace, and not directed to a supernatural end. "The more a people is constituted, the more it makes its political laws religious laws; and its religious laws political laws; not in civilizing religion, but in consecrating civil policy. Those who wish constantly to separate the one from the other, have never comprehended

* De Fide, XII.

† Plato, Epist. vii.

‡ Antiquit. Roman. lib. II. cap. xviii

§ De Legibus, III.

man or society." This is what Bonald says.* In ages of faith no human legislation was permitted to interfere with any part of the Divine commands. "A law," says Tertullian, "which was before Cæsar, and which is above Cæsar." Cicero, in a magnificent passage, preserved by Lactantius, speaking of the great divine and primitive law given to mankind, declares that it can never be disannulled, "nec vero aut per senatum aut per populum solvi hæc lege possumus." Indeed Catholics were never inclined to ascribe to the political constitution of states, the same degree of importance which it holds with the vain multitude, who place their hope on an assembly of their choice, because they looked higher for the source of real good to their country, and to the human race. God, as a punishment for the sins of Israel, threatened them with a multitude of laws :† and it is only with laws that men propose to save.

The very object of all laws is now reversed. "Laws are only made," says St. Isidore, "in order to restrain human audacity by fear, that innocence may be safe amidst the wicked ; and that the wicked by fear of punishment may lose the courage and ability to injure."‡ What a change has taken place in the legislation of nations since these ages of faith. In France and the Isle that once was wise, and Belgium, abandoned to a king who understood but gold, laws are multiplied, not against human audacity, but against the humble ministers of religion ; against ecclesiastical colleges, against orders of holy men serving God ; though even Tacitus declares, non ex rumore statuendum,§ against the foundation of spiritual institutions, and, in short, they are made as if for the express purpose of leaving innocence at the mercy of men, who cry "heaven we fear thee not." Tacitus says, that a good politician is like God :|| but to what is a modern politician to be compared ? We may observe here, that Socrates professed and practised a veneration for the laws of his country,¶ which was excessive and unknown to the philosophy of Christians ; for they can recognize no covenant with society, which obliges them to await their own destruction from its unjust decrees. The text leaves no room for what Cicero calls the noble fierceness of Socrates before his judges :  for it expressly charges them to fly from the insane city, which should choose to persecute them. Under a despotism, the will of a tyrant : in a democracy, that of the people is sufficient to make a thing legal, but it does not follow that it is therefore to be allowed. Modern governments drawing from this double source of despotism, pronounce many things to be according to their legal order, which the "non possumus," of those who adhere to the wisdom of faithful ages will never suffer to pass into execution. "O Church of Jesus Christ," exclaims Bossuet, from thy birth thou didst already confound all the magistrates and powers of Jerusalem by the single firmness of this word—non possumus.

We cannot keep silence as to the things which our eyes have seen—non possumus.

* Législat. Primit. tom. II. 32. † Osee, viii. 11. ‡ Isidor. 2. Etymol. 1. Leg. c. de Leg.
§ Ann. III. ¶ Lib. III. ¶ Plato Crito.  Cicero, Tuscul. I. 29.

But holy disciples of Jesus Christ, what is this new impotence? Within these few days past, you were trembling, and the boldest of the troop cowardly denied his Master, and now you say—non possumus! and why can you not? Because things have been changed; a celestial fire has fallen upon us; a law has been written in our hearts; an all-powerful spirit impels us; charmed by its infinite attractions, we have imposed upon ourselves a blessed necessity of loving Jesus Christ more than our life. This is the reason why we can no longer obey the world; we can suffer, we can die, but we cannot keep silence, as to the things which we have seen and heard.”* The plea of legal order is, after all, very ancient: it was used by the Persian counsellors, to persuade the king of Babylon to cast Daniel to the lions. “Scito rex, quia lex est,—ut omne decretum quod constituerit rex, non liceat immutari.” They would not suffer the king to show mercy contrary to his own ordinance.†. “The philosophy of a people,” says Bonald, “is its legislation. When men, greedy of domination, impose their own opinions upon a people for laws, and endeavor to make their particular sentiments a general doctrine, absurd and impious legislations are the consequence.”

Let us endeavor to form a clear view of the spirit and object of legislation in ages of faith. “We call those princes happy,” said St. Augustin, “who employ their power in extending the worship of God, making it subservient to his majesty:” and again, “In this we see whether kings serve God; if in their capacity of kings, they ordain what is good and prohibit evil; not only in what pertains to human society, but also with respect to religion.”‡ “We do not,” says St. Thomas, “call those princes happy in proportion as they reigned long, left the government to their sons, punished public enemies, or vanquished the citizens who rose in rebellion against them; but we call these happy, who rule justly, who preferred governing their passions to ruling over nations, who did all things, not for the sake of vain glory, but through the love of everlasting happiness.”§ The type of the character of the Christian king may be collected from the office of his coronation, in which the Church prays that “this servant of God may be protected by the gift of ecclesiastical peace, and may deserve to attain to the joys of eternal peace by Jesus Christ; and the king having prostrated himself with the bishops and priests upon the cross, whilst the other clergy sing the Litany, the metropolitan interrogates him as follows: ‘Do you wish to hold the holy faith which is delivered to you by Catholic men, and to observe it with just works?—I wish it. Do you wish to be a defender and guardian of the holy churches, and of the minister of the churches?—I wish it. Do you wish to rule and to defend the kingdom conceded to you by God according to the justice of your fathers?—As far as I shall be able, by the divine assistance and the comfort of all the faithful, I promise so to act faithfully in all things.’ Then the metropolitan

* Serm. pour le Jour de la Pentecôte.

† Dan. vi.

‡ Cont. Crescon. gram. III. 51.

§ De Regimine Principum ad Regem Cypri.

places the crown reverently upon the king's head, saying, 'take the crown of the kingdom, which is placed upon your head by the hands of bishops, although unworthy, in order to impress you with the sense that this expressly denotes the glory and honor of sanctity, and therefore you should not be ignorant that by this you become a partaker of our ministry, that as we are understood to be pastors and rulers of souls in the interior, so you also may in external things be a true worshipper of God, and strenuous defender of the Church of Christ against all adversities.' " How well this type was followed in the minds and deeds of kings, history shows in numerous instances. Pope St. Leo writing to the emperor Theodosius says, "that he rejoices to find that the emperor evinces not only a royal, but also a sacerdotal mind, and that besides his imperial and public cares, he has a pious solicitude for the Christian religion." Savedra says, "that the kings of Spain esteemed more the honor and glory of God than their own aggrandisement, like Flavius Jovian, who when proclaimed emperor by the army, refused the dignity, saying that he was a Christian, and that he ought not to command men who were not Christians, and he did not consent until the soldiers cried out that they too would be Christians." In the third council of Toledo, when King Reclaredus had succeeded in bringing back the Arian Goths to the unity of the Church, it is recorded that he thus spoke: "If we are to labor with all our force to repress the evil of wicked men, and to promote peace on earth, much more are we bound to desire and imitate celestial things, to sigh for what is sublime, and to show truth to the people who are recovered from error."*

The power and grandeur of kingly government were thus to be devoted to extend the honor of the King of kings; but consistently with all the principles to human action then recognized, how could a different object of government have been admitted? Villani says, in the preface of his history, in the spirit of these ages, that he begins the book which is to celebrate the city of Florence, "to the glory of God, and of the blessed St. John." When every work of man was thus dedicated, as it were, to the Divine glory, would it not have been strange, indeed, if the noblest of all sciences had been otherwise directed? Men felt that it would. Philip Augustus, in departing for the crusade, published his testament, which was to determine the manner of conducting the government during his absence; and in this he required that his mother, the Queen Adèle, and his uncle William, Archbishop of Rheims, should redress the wrongs of his subjects four times in the year, and do justice "for the honor of God." The founders of the ancient governments in ages of faith understood the end of man and of society to consist in leading souls to God.† Hence politics were made to wait upon religion, instead of sacrificing religion to every political or commerical interest, to an election or the value of a manufactory. Θεωρητέον δὴ καὶ τῷ πολιτικῷ περὶ ψυχῆς

* Ribadeneira, Princeps Christ I. cap. xii.

† Menochii Hierœconomica, seu Œconomice ex Sacris Literis depromptæ 1628.

said Aristotle.* Political science in the middle ages rested upon a certain faith concerning the soul. This faith was embodied as it were in all the measures of government : the very coins expressed it : on the money of some of the Popes was inscribed, “væ vobis divitibus!” The administration of a Catholic state corresponded with the desire of the ancient sage, when he said, “Let the legislator take care to convince the people that the soul is a thing wholly different from the body, that it is in the soul that each man’s identity consists, that it is immortal, and that after its departure from the body, it will be called to give an account of all that it has done, an account τῷ μὲν ἀγαθῷ θαρράλειον, τῷ δὲ κακῷ μάλα φοβερόν.† This sentence from the tongue of Plato, expressing the universal reason of men, formed by original revelation and the constant traditions of the human race, conveys a summary of the principles which directed government in ages of faith. It was then thought that the true policy of states could not be better known than by the light of the Christian religion, and of its sacred books. So teach St. Thomas ;‡ Gilles de Rome ; § Savedra ; || Kircher ; ¶ Bossuet ;  Ribadeneira ; †† Spedalieri ; ‡‡ Scotti ; §§ and all Catholic writers on legislation.

Between the modern writers on the sciences which relate to society and the Catholic authors, the same distinction exists which Cicero remarked between the writings of the stoics and the peripatetics ; the former of whom, he observed, said so many things that he could never understand ; while the latter, treating on the same subjects, used no word that was not perfectly intelligible. || || The Catholic writers were so noble, so straightforward, generous, and simple, that even children could understand them at once ; there was no contrast between their principles and the ordinary precepts of religion ; whereas those of their opponents seem addressed to persons who know and care nothing about Christianity, and they are at total variance with its morality and design. Of their state policy we may say,—

Νοσῶν ἐν αὐτῷ φαρμάκων δεῖται σοφῶν.

The Archduke Leopold of Austria, son of the emperor Ferdinand II., hearing some one cite Machiavel to prove that an ambassador ought to be able to disguise things : “ How,” cried he, “ it is not allowed to tell the least falsehood to save the whole world, and how then can it be lawful to do so to obey a prince, or to ensure success to an embassy ? ” Don Savedra expressly says, “ the safest books for a prince to consult, are those which the Divine wisdom has dictated. Here the prince will find a perfect policy for all possible accidents, and instruction to direct him in the government of himself and of his states. The first thing that a master ought to teach a prince,” he continues, “ is to fear God, for that is the beginning of wisdom. He who is in God, is in the fountain of science. The science

* Ethic. Nic. lib. I. xiii. † De Legibus, XII. ‡ De Regim. Princip. § Miroir.
 || Christian Prince. ¶ Principis Christiani Archetypum Politicum.  Politique de l'Ecrit.
 †† Princeps Christianus. ‡‡ De Diritti dell' Uomo. §§ Teoremi di Politica Cristiana.
 ||| De Finibus, lib. IV. ii.

of men is, properly speaking, an ignorance; it is the daughter of malice which destroys states and princes.”*

Nicolas Vauquelin Sieur du Inveteaux, in his poem de l’Institution du Prince, addressed to his pupil the Prince de Vendôme, reminds the great, that it is from heaven that all their plans and motives of life ought to proceed:† and Antoine Godeau, the learned bishop of Vence, published in 1644 an admirable work entitled, “L’Institution du Prince Chrétien,” in which the same lessons are conveyed to kings.‡ No sooner were the maxims of Machiavelli proposed than they excited the utmost horror. Ribadeneira wrote his “Christian Prince” to confute them by the doctrine of the Christian legislators. Lord Bacon even remarked, “that these men, bred in learning, like certain of the Popes, were perhaps to seek in points of convenience, and accomodating for the present, which the Italians call ‘ragioni di stato,’ and he observes that Pius V. could not bear them spoken of with patience, terming them inventions against religion and the moral virtues:” he adds, “that on the other side, they are perfect in those same plain grounds of religion, justice, honor, and moral virtue.”§ Governments were to act with scrupulous honor, “Treaties with infidels and heretics,” says Don Savedra “must be strictly observed; for justice requires it, and as it is not permitted to a Catholic to kill or hate any one of a contrary religion, so neither is it lawful for him to deceive such a person, or fail in his word to him. Joshua kept his faith with the Gibeonites, and was rewarded by God,|| and David was punished for a contrary offence.”¶ “Honor,” continues this devout Spaniard, “is one of the principal instruments of the art of reigning. If it were not the child of glory, I should have thought it an invention of policy: it is the strength of states, and I do not know one that can maintain itself long without it.” He would have found some in later times that thought they had discovered the art, with whom to deceive, as Pliny says, “pro moribus temporum, prudentia est.” De Haller has remarked that the new political principles alter even the commonest notions of honor. What private man would not feel himself dishonored if his bonds were to be offered for a half or a third of their nominal value? But yet sovereigns are now to do this with indifference; for as they are debts of the state, no one believes himself interested in the honor of this imaginary being.†† What private gentleman would not scorn the invitation to refuse the shelter of his roof to an unhappy guest, whose enemies were jealous of his presence? In the middle ages it would have been deemed an equal insult if addressed to the ruler of a state. In the eleventh century, when Pandolfè de Teano was obliged to capitulate and deliver up Capua to his rival Pandolf of Capua who was assisted by the Normans, he passed with his family to Naples, which little republic was then governed by Sergio. Encouraged

* Christ. Prince, I. xlv.

† Gouget, Bibliothèque Franc. tom. XVI. 113.

‡ Id. tom. XVII. 290.

§ On the Advancement of Learning.

|| Josh. ix. 19

¶ 2 Sam. xxi. Christian Prince, II. 469.

 Christian Prince, II. 95.

†† Restauration de la Science Pol. III. 496

by this success, Pandolfe of Capua desired that Sergio would banish a rival whose near presence gave him such alarm. The positive refusal which he received to betray the rights of hospitality occasioned a rupture between the princes. Sergio being the weakest, was forced to fly from Naples, which then, for the first time, received the standard of the Lombards. Pandolfe de Teano escaped to Rome and died there, and he who had so generously sacrificed his interests for the sake of humanity, suffered misfortunes for three years, till he procured the assistance of the Norman knights who warmly espoused his cause, and soon reinstated him in possession of his domains. The history of these ages abounds with instances of the policy of honor. The king Don Henrique IV., was advised by some to arrest Don John Pachecue, Marquis of Vileña, the great author of the troubles which afflicted the kingdom, but he refused, saying, that he had promised him a safe conduct to come to Madrid, and that he could not fail his word. "What troubles and perils did not the kingdom of Arogon endure," cries Savedra, "in consequence of the king Don Pedro IV. regarding more utility than honor in peace and war?" Such was not the Catholic policy, as England might have borne witness. Cromwell retained a large sum of money which had been sent from Spain for the governments of the Netherlands, but which was thrown upon the coast of England by a storm.—Upon refusing to give it up, some persons advised the Archduke Leopold to retaliate: but he replied, "What shall we take from Cromwell or the Parliament who unjustly detain our property by following such a plan of vengeance? The goods of the English, which are in our ports, belongs to private men, not to Cromwell or the Parliament: the innocent then would suffer for the guilty! I appeal to you, would this be justice?"* In short, the character which Guizot says distinguished St. Louis from all the other kings that ever reigned, excepting Marcus Aurelius, was in truth a character which more or less belonged to whole generations of men in the ages of faith,—the habit of always considering in every action whether it was good or evil in itself, of regarding the moral good or evil of a measure, without any regard to its utility or consequences, and when once its good or evil was determined, of adopting the one and rejecting the other with a straight-forward resolution, which no interests or consideration whatever could alter. Since then the science of government was then simple and Christian, it was natural that kings should be desirous of having the assistance of holy men, and ecclesiastics who were most qualified to teach it. Martial d'Auvergne gives them this advice.

Par quoy, princes, autour de vos personnes
 Ayez des cleres de condicions bonnes,
 Ne vous chaille des astrologieus;
 Mieux si vauldroit deux bons théologiens
 Pour enseigner de la saincte Escripture
 Que de parler du temps à l'aventure.†

* Les Vertus de Lèopold d'Autriche, par. N. Avancin.

† Les Vigiles de la Mort du Roi Charles VII.

Hence it was that in many councils, as in that of Toledo, not merely matters of religion were regulated, but also those relating to the government of the state. This desire of kings, though honorable to them, was nevertheless injurious in some instances to ecclesiastical discipline. Thus we hear of the Statute of Merton, in the reign of Henry III., which was so called from the parliament, or rather council, sitting at the Priory of Merton, in Surrey, which belonged to regular canons. King Don Fernando the Catholic, used often to employ monks in his council, and this suggests a remark to Savedra, characteristic rather of Christian experience, than just in its immediate object, "that it was only barbarous arrogance in Hannibal to despise the lessons of Phormio; for though speculation alone cannot give practice," yet continues Don Savedra, "however experienced, Hannibal might have learned from him to purge his mind from treachery, to lay aside his cruelty towards the vanquished, and his pride towards those who came to him for protection; he would have learned to make a better use of his victory of Cannæ, to fly the delights of Capua, and to be reconciled to Antiochus."* Savedra seems to reason on the supposition of Phormio being a monk or a priest of his acquaintance. Solemnly constituted defenders of the Church, and of the poor, who reaped the benefit of its riches, disposed by every worthy motive to pay honor to the ministers of religion who dispensed those riches, kings in these ages were generally found faithful in protecting ecclesiastical property. When king Don Fernando the saint besieged Seville, and there was a great want of money to carry on the siege, some persons advised him to make use of the treasures of the churches in so great a necessity; but he replied, that he promised himself more from the prayers of the priests than from their riches. God rewarded this confidence, for the very next day the city was in his power. Savedra remarks, however, that the Apostolic See was always very liberal to the kings of Spain in assisting them in their contests with the infidels. Gregory VII. granted to the king Don Sancho Ramira of Aragon, the tenth and revenues of all the churches that were lately built or recovered from the Moors. Pope Urban conferred the same grace upon king Don Pedro I. of Aragon, and upon his successors, excepting the churches of residence. Gregory granted to the king Don Alonzo the Wise, the third of ecclesiastical revenues which were destined to buildings; Urban V., a third of the benefices of Castille to the king Don Pedro; and Pope Sixtus IV. consented that the clergy should give in one payment 100,000 ducats for the war of Grenada: but these supplies were received and expended with scrupulous delicacy. The same assistance was generally rendered to the state in other countries when occasions of difficulty occurred; and in an earlier age, when Charles Martel had taken the tithes and benefices, "Pepin and Carloman, with the council of the servants of God and of the Christian people, passed a decree, justifying the retaining of their goods on condition of paying every year to the church or monastery, a solidus for each farm house, and that on the death of the possessor, it should return to the Church ; but even in the meantime, care was to be taken that the churches and monasteries whose goods had been thus lent 'in precario,' did not fall into indigence ; in that event the Church and the house of God were to be replaced in full possession of their goods."* It may be remarked here, that Mabillon has shown the falsehood of the modern fables respecting the supposed condemnation of the soul of Charles Martel, disclosed by the vision of Eucherius. Mabillon proves that it was unknown to Pepin, and that the fable was a popular invention of a much later age.†

* Christ. Prince, I. 313.

The moderns, in recurring to ancient times, condemn the influence of the clergy in matters of government, without having sufficiently attended to the character of that influence. It was priests who were always for teaching kings that their safety and their real grandeur consisted in having no quarrel but what was common with them and their people. The language of Fenelon was the same in spirit as had been addressed by the clergy to the civil power, from age to age, since the rise of the Christian monarchies. The authentic memorials of the saints in every period of history, prove that they did not fashion, wrest, or bow, their reading, or nicely charge their understanding soul to flatter tyrants. What then was the language of Fenelon ? "You say that God will protect France," he writes to the Duc de Chevreuse, "but where is the promise ? Will God be appeased in seeing you humbled without humility ? Will God be content with a devotion which consists in gilding a chapel, saying a chaplet, hearing a mass with music, being easily scandalized, and banishing some heretics ? The question is not only about finishing the war externally, but about giving bread to a famishing people, re-establishing agriculture and commerce, reforming luxury which gangrenes all the manners of the nation, recalling the true form of the kingdom, and tempering despotism, the cause of all our woes. If I loved France less, the king less, the royal house less, I would not speak thus."‡ This refers to a calamitous period of history, when the principles of the ages of faith were either forgotten or, as in France, formally set aside. Let us return to those ages, and inquire what were the fruits of this spirit of legislation. Here the moderns in general have much to learn. Speaking of the Norman knights who recovered Sicily from the Sarassins in the eleventh century, Gauttier d'Arc says, that when he proceeds to treat on the foundation of the kingdom of the two Sicilies by these Normans, on their institutions, laws, and progress in science and letters, it will appear that "the policy or wisdom of these conquerors were not inferior to their heroic valor."§ In fact, what was it that formed the government of Christian states, but the Christian religion ? and if Crotona, by being subject to the philosophy of Pythagoras, gave rise as Müller observes to one of the most remarkable phenomena in the political history of the

* Capitula Carolom, in 743. book I. 148.

† Prefat. in III. Sæcul. Benedict. § viii.

‡ Epist. cxxxii.

§ Hist. des Conquetes des Normans en Italie. Preface.

Greeks, what must not have followed from the Catholic religion, the philosophy so eminently of order, unison, of κόσμος, having obtained the management of public affairs, and held possession of it for so long a time? But you desire to be shown its effects? For the present it is sufficient to reply, behold the protection of the churches, the protection of the religious orders, the protection of the countless institutions of mercy which ministered to the necessities of the poor, the protection of the temporal part of that blessedness which is promised to the meek, the protection of the countless institutions which ministered to the sanctification of souls, and to the completion of the number of the elect. In ages of faith men would have inquired no farther. But let us hear how the legislation of this period is spoken of by writers not disposed to pass over any defects in the men or deeds of Christian antiquity. Chateaubriand says, "that in the language of the institutions or laws of Alphonso the Wise, there is a tone of candor and of virtue which renders this king of Castille a worthy contemporary of St. Louis."* King Richard I. instituted a body of naval laws on his return from the Holy Land, which are yet extant. The Commentator on Sir Matthew Hale's History of the Common Law of England says, "These laws were made at the Isle of Oleron, off the coast of France, where his fleet rendezvoused in its passage to the Holy Land. They were designed for the keeping of order, and for the determination of controversies abroad; and they were framed with such wisdom, that they have been adopted by other nations as well as by England. They are very prudent, humane, and just."† Sir Matthew Hale, after styling Edward I. our English Justinian, concludes thus, "I think I may safely say, all the ages since his time have not done so much in reference to the orderly settling and establishing of the distributive justice of his kingdom as he did, within the short compass of the thirty-five years of his reign.

The short and pithy pleadings and judgments, in the judicial records of this reign, do far better render the sense of the business than those long, intricate, perplexed, and formal pleadings which since the time of Henry VIII., came into use, and on which later times have still farther improved." And he says elsewhere, that "the times of Henry VI., as also of Edward V., and Henry VII., were times that abounded with learning, and men excellent for legislative wisdom."‡ If the maxim of law, "cuiuslibet in sua arte credendum est," be admitted, here is enough to put to shame many who have written upon the history of the middle ages.

If now from the manners we pass to the men concerned with the government of states in ages of faith, we shall find the same characteristics in the practice which belonged to the theory of rule. There were, indeed, many princes who but little accorded with the noble and lofty sentiments which presided at the foundation of the Christian republics, but no historian has ever spoken of them, except-

* Discours Historiques, Pref.

† P. 175.

‡ Hist. of the Common law.

ing as forming exceptions to the spirit and principles of their time ; whereas in the lives of heroic and saintly kings, the writers most acquainted with antiquity have recognized the materials for the best and most faithful history of the middle ages. What student in the least conversant with these annals would ever think of questioning the justice of the remark made by Chateaubriand, where he says, " that St. Louis as a legislator, a hero, and a saint, is the representative of the middle ages ?" It seems self-evident, and yet what a noble testimony does it furnish to their virtue and to their grandeur ! It is to the kings of the middle age that the most exact and philosophic writers are obliged to recur in order to find an example of a great and wise government. Fenelon says, that no prince can be found more amiable or proper to serve as a model in all ages, than Charlemagne—that even his imperfections amidst so many virtues, are not without their interest. " I do not believe," he says, " that any king can be found more deserving of being studied in every thing, or of higher authority to give lessons to other rulers."* Certainly the number of truly Christian kings is an astonishing fact in the history of mankind. Lewis of Grenada observes that out of the great number of the Jewish kings, there were only three who observed religion and justice ; for besides David, Ezekiah, and Joshua, all abandoned the law of the Most High, and despised the fear of God. " In which fact," he says, " we can recognize not only the common disease of human nature, but also and much more, the danger of power and principality."† But who could enumerate the series of wise, and saintly kings who have appeared upon the thrones of Christendom ? It is in ages which have been denominated barbarous, that we behold men answering to the ideal perfection of Plutarch's heroes, who were to unite the possession of political power with the study and the love of wisdom.‡ The ancient history of empires furnished no grounds for supposing that such an union was possible. " Truly," says Glaucus to Socrates, " no one has ever seen a man possessing a character thus symmetrically composed as to virtue in this perfect accordance with himself in word and deed, and at the same time having sovereign authority in a state of which the character accorded with his own."§ What would he have said if he had beheld the Catholic kings of Catholic states in ages of faith, wearing their crowns adorned with the bright stars of virtue, which will shine to all eternity ? What would he have said of our sainted and heroic Ethelreds, Edmunds, Oswalds, Alfreds, Edwards, and Henrys ? What of the valor, and piety, and prudence, and magnanimity of the ancient kings of Spain—the political wisdom of Don Fernando—the liberality of Don Alonzo the pierced-handed—the justice of Don Alonzo XI.—the devotion of Don Fernando the saint ? Their very titles would have seemed to him as full of inspiration, and capable of exciting men to heroic virtue ; and who, in fact, does not feel, as it were, some interior assistance in the

* Epist. xii. au Duc de Beauvilliers.

† De Educat. XX.

‡ In Nativitate, B. Marie Concio. I.

§ Plato, de Repub. VI.

mysterious contest of life, when he hears of Don Fernando the saint, or Don Fernando the Catholic, of Don Alphonso the chaste, of Don Sancho the brave, of Don Alonzo the magnanimous, of Don Iañme the conqueror, that is to say, the deliverer of his country, for the victories of the kings of Spain were like the fifty battles of our Alfred, not to subdue nations, but to defend their native land? In Italy too, how many learned and holy princes, who, like Robert, king of Naples, and James of Carrara, deserved, as Petrarch said, to be styled the fathers rather than the lords of their people!

Consider again that ancient monarchy of France, of which so many of the crowns passed with saints to heaven! Even Guizot condemns Sismondi and other modern historians for maintaining that the first Capetians, Robert, Henry, and Philip, were insignificant kings, as being the kings of priests rather than warriors; for he shows that though supported by the clergy, and governed by their influence, they played a most important part in all the affairs, civil and military of their times.* We hear of nothing at present but the vices and absurdities of a monarchical government; but it is not in the history of the ages of faith that we shall learn to despise it. How happy was Spain under pious kings, Ferdinand the great, Alphonso the great, Alphonso the chaste, Ferdinand the saint, and others? How great was Ferrara through its princes, Hercules of Este, Hippolitus of Este, and others? Modern writers pass in silence over the heroic virtues of the ancient kings of Christendom. They are exact and judicious in describing the castle of Plessis, but where is their penetration to leave us in ignorance of the walls which received to the earnest of eternal peace, the innocent and yet penitent Wamba? We have now popular histories, in convenient form, of all our ancient kings, but when we enter the Abbey of Westminster, and behold there sepulchres, do we believe that these statements, which we hold in our hands exhibit their true image? The names of many of these kings, like Don Alonzo VI. as described by Mariana, so modest and humble in prosperity, so constant and unmoved in adverse fortune, if they had belonged to men in a private station would have passed to immortality: all Spain was restored by the piety and valor of Don Pelayo, as was England by the virtue of Alfred.

And here a curious reflection suggests itself. In these latter ages, when men boast to have made such advance in public virtue, and in the science of political society, when we behold kings and noblemen who are really themselves kings, surrounded with every enjoyment that their rank and unlimited riches can bestow, and the only problem submitted to the lovers of order, seems to be, how to reconcile the minds of subjects to their own condition, and how to make them admit that such an unequal distribution of the goods of this world is consistent with the plans of infinite justice, what would be thought of a writer, who, for the purpose of vindicating the ways of Providence, should engage in a long inquiry, in order to discover how and when God had provided a reward for kings and men in authority, and who should conclude that there must be a more eminent recompence reserved for them in heaven? Would not our astonishment be increased, if this were a writer of profound genius and a deeply reflecting mind, distinguished by his love of genuine freedom, and by the boldness with which he was always ready to declare truth to princes? Such a writer, then, was found in the ages of faith, who, by this extraordinary meditation, has left a most glorious testimony, both to the doctrine then held, respecting power, and to the virtue of a great number of men, who then exercised it. From reflecting on the burden and perils of their service, that profound and acute philosopher, the angel of the school, sets himself to investigate what compensation the providence of God ordained for kings. He takes for granted their self-devotion, and says, "since it is the office of a king to seek the good of the multitude, this would seem too laborious a task, unless there were some good to result also to himself personally." He then inquires what is that personal good, and after proving that it is not honor and glory, as some have thought and still less riches, all which motives, besides being unworthy, would lead him to commit great evil; he concludes, that it consists in an eminent reward in heaven; est autem conveniens ut rex premium expectet a Deo.* Accordingly, Garcias Loaysa, in his councils of Spain, gives the discourse of bishops to a king, which takes this conclusion for granted: for they exclaim in the commencement, "O quam beata est vita regum justorum! quæ et his temporalibus rebus fulta nitescit, et in æternum cum angelis immortaliter requiescit!" Thus words that might, in other ages, be taken for an intolerable baseness, or for a satire, were received in ages of faith as a holy, and sincere, and just tribute to the merit of Catholic kings! Their relics were often venerated as those of martyrs. Witness the hands of Oswald, king of the Northumbrians, which remained uncorrupted at Bamborough, in the time when the Saxon chronicle was written; a king, as it declares, whose holiness and miracles were displayed on manifold occasions throughout the island. Witness again what is said of king Edward, who was slain at Corfe-gate, "deed more dreary than this was never done by the English, since they first sought the land of Britain. Men murdered him, but God has magnified him: he was, in life, an earthly king; he is now after death, a heavenly saint: him would not his earthly relatives avenge; but his heavenly Father has avenged him amply.

* Cours d'Hist. Mod. tom. IV. 386.

"The earthly homicides would wipe out his memory from the earth, but the Avenger above has spread his memory abroad in heaven and on earth. Those who would not before bow to his living body, now bow on their knees to his dead bones. Now we may conclude that the wisdom of men and their meditations are as nought against the appointment of God."† And in truth, how different then were the ideal and exercise of power! See how far these rulers were removed from governing by the principles of the modern and political science. The holy emperor Ferdinand II. says, amidst his perilous fortune, that he is resolved to lose the empire, and to go out begging alms with his family, rather than commit one unjust action to maintain his greatness: and Reginard, in his life of St. Ammon of Cologne, testifies that the emperor Henry II. would never assume the royal ornaments, “insignia regia,” until he had purified and healed his soul by sacramental confession and penance. The king Don Fernando, surnamed the great, increased his kingdom by the force of his virtues; his piety was so great, that on the translation of the body of St. Isidore, he and his children bore the coffin, and with bare feet carried it from the Douro to the church of St. John, in the city of Leon. The noble qualities of the king Don Alonso V. of Aragon were so displayed during his imprisonment, that the duke of Milan, charmed with his merit, desired to possess him for a friend, and gave him his liberty, sending him away loaded with presents. This king Alonso, by being defeated and taken prisoner in the battle against the Genoese, obtained more than if he had conquered, for the duke supplied him with fresh forces to obtain the kingdom of Naples.* Witness their generosity. Don Diego of Arias, treasurer to king Don Enrique IV., represented one day to his majesty the necessity of being less bountiful, and of dismissing some useless pensioners; but the king refused to listen to his remonstrance.

* De Regimine Princip. cap. vii.

† The Saxon Chronicle, 164.

“We give to these,” he replied, “because they are men of goodness: we give to the others, in order that they may not become wicked. As for my officers, I retain some, because I have need of them, and others because they have need of me.”† Witness their diligence. Don Alonso the Wise, in one of his laws, prescribes rules to limit the recreation of princes. The king Don Fernando the Catholic used to instruct himself, even at the time of his diversions, for in hawking he used to listen to the despatches which were read by a secretary, while he kept his eye upon the hawks. Don Emmanuel of Portugal used to give audience at the time of his recreation.‡ The abbot Suger, in his life of Louis-le-gros, says of Louis the prince, during the life of his father, “this young hero, gay, conciliating all hearts, and endowed with a goodness, that made him be regarded by certain people as a simpleton, was hardly arrived at the age of puberty, when he showed himself a courageous defender of his father’s kingdom; he provided for the wants of the Churches, and he watched over the safety of laborers, artisans, and the poor.§ Having become king, by the grace of God, he did not lose the habits which he had acquired in his youth; he protected the Churches, sustained the poor and unhappy, and attended to the defence and to the peace of the kingdom: he || made frequent expeditions into various parts to maintain the tranquillity of the Churches and of the poor.” The abbot concludes thus, “It is the duty of kings to repress with their strong hand, and by the right of their office, the audacity of tyrants, who tear asunder the state by endless wars, and take the pleasure in pillaging the poor, and destroying the Churches." When the young prince Louis was set out for Guienne, he went to take leave of his father, Louis-le-gros. None of the ancient patriarchs ever spoke to their children, before dying, with more religion than did this Catholic king in embracing his son. "I pray God, my dear son," said he, "that Almighty God, who gives authority to the kings of the earth, that he may extend his favorable hand over you, and those whom I give you for companions; for if any fatal accident should befall you on the road, I could not survive that calamity. I have supplied you with all things necessary. Suffer not your troops to commit any devastation as they pass: take nothing without paying for it; and when you arrive, live in such a manner that your new subjects from being your friends may not become your enemies." Then he wept and embraced him.

* Savedra, I. 371. † Savedra, I. 419. ‡ Savedra, II. 321. § Cap. ii. || Id. cap. xiv.

Pignotti says, that Hugo the Great, duke of Tuscany, should rather have been called the just and pious: he was accustomed privately to visit the cottages of his rustic subjects, interrogates them upon the government and character of their sovereign, and listens to their answers, which were not marked by fear or adulation. His memory is venerated by the ecclesiastics. The abbey of Florence is one of the seven monasteries founded and richly endowed by him, where his tomb and statue are to be seen, and where annually his praises are celebrated in a rhetorical declamation.* Historians, in recording the accession of kings in these ages, are continually obliged to mention the joy and affection of the common people. Thus when Godfrey de Bouillon was elected king of Jerusalem, the old chronicle adds, "Dont tout le menu peuple en fut moult joyeux, car moult l'aymoient:"† and describing the death of Baldwin, count of Toulouse, it says, "et sachez que le dit conte fut merueilleusement plainet des grans et des petis par tout le pays, car il avoit bien employé tout son temps à l'honneur de Dieu et de la foy chrestienne, et fut grant dommage de sa mort pour la terre sainte."‡ Mark the universal cry of sorrow, which resounded within the castle and town of Amboise on the death of Charles VIII., or that which was heard in Bruges on the death of Philip the Good. John le Maine thus breaks forth in praise of Philip I., king of Spain,

Le Roy des bons, du monde les délices,
Le cultivateur des haults divins services,
Le bien volu des povres et des riches.

And John Marot describing the departure of Louis XII. for Italy, says, that all men were equally afflicted at the thought of losing him, citizens, merchants, and mechanical people, and the poor rustic peasants; the latter of whom cry out, that they will arm and follow him.

C'est nostre Roy, nostre pere et appuy;
Mieux nous vault morir en la bataille,
Que de languir en douleur après luy.§

* History of Tuscany, c. v.

† Id. f. cxxvi.

‡ Le grant voyage de Hierusalem, f. cxxii.

§ Gouget, tom. XI. 14.

The monk of the abbey of St. Germain, who relates the birth of Philip Augustus, furnishes a remarkable evidence of the popular feeling respecting that prince; for he says, "the messenger who brought us the news arrived at the moment when we were finishing lauds with the canticle of the prophet, Benedictus Dominus Deus Israel, so that it almost seemed an oracle of the events which followed." The festival of the king's patron was every where a festival of public observance and rejoicing. "What happy reigns!" says Monteil, "when a whole people, transported with loyal gratitude, make the signs of their devotion for the saints the signs of their attachment to their king."* The pieces of money of St. Louis which have reached our time are all pierced. They used to be worn round the neck, like relics, through veneration for the sainted king. It should be observed, in general, that there was nothing of oriental seclusion in the manners of the Catholic kings. They lived rather like pastors and fathers of the people. The emperor Rodolph would not suffer that any one should be denied entrance to him in his palace. "I am not emperor in order to be shut up in a cage," he used to say, "Etiam fera animalia si clausa teneas virtutis obliviscuntur," says Tacitus.† James I, king of Aragon, when young, being confined too strictly by his preceptors, made his escape and fled from the court, and for this love of freedom is proposed as a model to princes, by Don Diego Savedra. The difficulty with which Ramiere III. used to grant an audience seemed so monstrous a defect in a king, that the kingdom of Leon rebelled against him, solely on that ground. The king Don Fernando the Saint never refused it to any one, and every person, of whatever rank or condition, might penetrate into his most retired cabinets. The kings Don Alonzo XII. and Don Eurique III., as also Don Ferdinand and Isabella, used to give public audience three times a week. When I was at Philnitz, the king of Saxony used to dine with all his family in a great hall, at the end of which the peasants might enter, and numbers of the younger sort, barefooted and in their laboring dress, used to enjoy the spectacle. This was in the style of Charlemagne.

Charles VII. and Francis I., from whose reigns may be dated the revolution which took place in the spirit and manners of society, were the first kings of France of the third race, who publicly transgressed the moral law. After those examples, there were secrets of palaces which it was important to conceal by a system of seclusion, and the free court of the Christian king was thenceforth to be sought only in chronicles of the past. The same causes operating among the people occasioned the disgracefulness of this concealment to be less noticed. When the first liberty of man, the liberty from sin, perished, the last that from force and necessity, which is called the liberty of nature, was not slow to follow: when the indulgence of Solon was admitted into morals, magistrates were soon obliged to introduce the rigor of Dracon into the police: but this was found a weak barrier against the opposing flood. Revolution therefore followed, and vain attempts to

* Hist. des Français, IV.

† Hist. IV.

reconstitute society : “for,” as Pindar says, “it is easy even for the weakest to shake a city suddenly, but again to replace it in its seat is truly difficult, unless God should be a guide to its princes.”

ῥᾷδιον μὲν γὰρ πόλιν σεί—σαι καὶ φαυλοτέροις· ἀλλ’ ἐπὶ χῶ-ρας αὐτῆς ἔσθαι, δυσπαλὲς δὴ γίνεται ἐξαπίνης εἰ μὴ θεὸς ἀγεμόνεύῃ κυβερνατὴρ γένηται.*

God was to be no longer a guide to its princes, and in vain therefore was all their labor. As St. Augustin had said, the blessed city was not to be entered without avoiding false religion ;† nor was freedom to be secured by a people more docile to political than to religious laws ; for in proportion as man loses his religious docility, he will forfeit his real political freedom, and less submissive to God, he will be more dependent upon man. It was an ancient progress of mankind which followed. Every one wished to command, and fearing the domination of one, the people fell under that of many : the name of liberty was sounded on all sides, but the reality was soon diminished ; every man possessed it in idea ; but each day fewer in fact. At no period of the middle ages did Christian nations ever suffer such exactions, such servitude, and such losses as they experienced under the shadow of liberty, and the boast of advancing civilization : they reduced themselves to a state which might be described in the words of Tacitus, “magis sine domino quam in libertate.” And surely, we may add, while pride and hatred were thus seen instigating people against kings, and kings against people, to the mutual injury and dishonor of them both, it was made still clearer to the very eye of man than it could have been merely from the old experience of the peaceful life without its opposite, that even with regard to the fleeting interests of the present existence, the only secure policy was taught from the mountain, and that meekness diffused through the whole spirit and manners of a people, including both its legislation and its rulers, was the only basis of a lasting power ; the only security for real freedom.

* Pŷth. Od.IV.

† De Civit. Dei, ii.

CHAPTER V.

When the pilgrim through an Alpine forest, losing the track of a path which fails abruptly, throws an anxious look on all sides through the dark labyrinth of mossy trunks, endeavoring to discover some woodman or returning guide, who might direct his steps; so now do I in vain desire to find some indication of a way that would conduct me to the end of this long argument, and to the opening of more happy scenes; for powers that rule must needs be conversant with evil, and “dark are earthly things compared to things divine.

So far we have viewed the obedience of men in ages of faith, to the spiritual and to the civil powers, the origin of these authorities, and the objects of their administration:—now I proceed to visit with you the ordinary walks of men in social life; to mark the general character of a Catholic state, and the effects of meek obedience to this twofold government upon the constitution of the race of men,—a visit which may even instruct some persons who have had the opportunity of forming a personal acquaintance with it; for wanderers in our age see the cities, but do not, like Ulysses, behold the mind of various nations.* And first respecting this view of its meek obedience, its freedom and public virtue, we have not to fear that great question which Plato had to answer in his republic, namely, to show whether such a state be possible, or in what manner it can be possible, ὡς δυνατὴ αὕτη ἡ πολιτεία γενέσθαι.† We are not driven to adopt his mode of escape, when he says, “Do you think that he would be a less good painter, who having made a portrait of the most perfectly beautiful person, and who had done all that art required, would yet be unable to prove that it was possible there might be such a man?” Though we may agree to his opinion when he asks, “Do you think it possible to do any thing exactly as one may say it, or is it consistent with nature ἢ φύσιν ἔχει that practice should have more correspondence with truth than language? he justly shows that in practice we can only arrive at an approximation to the perfect ideal. But in what has passed we have been concerned with no imaginary state of things, or mere theory of perfection. At each step we have rested upon historical facts; for let it be remembered, that sentiments and opinions taught as conveyed to us in ancient writings are themselves facts of history, and perhaps the only facts on which we can always depend. We have seen that the basis of all was in truth a religious idea, and that the immediate cause in operation was the virtue to which that idea gave birth ; so that in looking upon that religion and upon those manners, we may be obliged, as Plato says, to admit that whoever would embrace these, so as to become most like the men of ages of faith, would experience a fortune most similar to theirs ; and after this it would be easy to discover and show why the same harmony does not now exist in states, and on account of what cause they do not so much approximate to the ideal of happy society, and what circumstances, though very small, being changed (in speculation it would be a small change to substitute for protestations of independence, meekness, leading to a return of obedience to the holy see which would be sufficient), the state would be brought once more to favor, not as at present only the material and sensual, but the intellectual and spiritual interests of mankind.

* Odys. lib. I. 3.

† Lib. V.

Modern writers in their contempt for these ages, besides having confounded causes together which had no connection, have shown that they never rightly understood society as it had been formed by the Catholic religion. The greatest enemies of this religion of truth must admit a fact which De Saint Victor says is as clear as the light of the sun—that it has developed the intelligence in all ranks of the social hierarchy, and to a degree of which no society of pagan antiquity can offer an example. Hence it followed that the people, properly speaking, could among Christian nations become free and enter into civil society, because every Catholic Christian, however ignorant and rude, has in himself, by his faith and by the perpetuity of instruction, a rule of manners and a principle of order sufficient to maintain him in this society without disturbing it ; whereas the pagan multitude who had no such moral law, or who at least had very incomplete notions of it, was obliged to remain in a state of slavery, in order that it might not overthrow society. The moral history of the ages of faith proves the truth of this observation. In referring to it, reader, you are journeying to a Catholic land, “id est,” we may add in the language of Pliny, and with far greater justice than when he used it, “ad homines maxime homines, ad liberos maxime liberos, qui jura natura datum, virtute, meritis, amicitia, federe denique et religione, tenuerunt.” * You are going to behold a state that is earthly, and therefore imperfect, composed of men, and therefore liable to a thousand disorders and afflictions ; but it is a state constituted with an especial view to all the spiritual necessities and to all the noble capacities of the redeemed race that is destined to rise to a life immortal : it is a state in conformity with the principles of nature, in which the imagination, the purity and the happiness of the youngest member, are deemed of greater importance than the thoughts and interest of the highest in the walks of commerce and ambition, and one in which gloom and proud severity, and merciless industry, are never suffered to enter under the mask of virtue. The apostles of nations, and the saintly kings who placed their crowns at the foot of the altar, founded these old

* Epist. viii. 24.

Catholic monarchies, and as Pindar says of Hieron establishing the new city of Ætna upon the genuine Doric principles, they founded them "with heaven-built freedom."*

"Your solicitude for the public good," says St. Hilary of Poitiers to a government that was disposed to abuse its power, "your imperial vigils, in a word, the whole labor of your sovereignty should have for object to secure for all those over whom it extends the sweetest of all treasures, liberty. There is no mode of appeasing troubles, and of reuniting what is divided, unless every one, emancipated from all the fetters of servitude, be able to live according to his choice."† "Impius et crudelis judicandus est qui libertati non favet," was the old Catholic maxim of English law. "Nihil autem gloriosius libertate, præter virtutem," says John of Salisbury, adding "si tamen libertas recte à virtute sejungitur, for to all wise persons it is clear," he continues, "that true liberty can proceed from nothing else: so that a man is virtuous as far as he is free, and free as far as he is virtuous. Vices alone bring men into slavery, to persons, and to things. What, therefore, is more amiable than liberty? What more favorable to one who has any reverence for virtue? We read that all good princes have promoted it, and that none have ever trampled upon liberty, but the manifest enemies of virtue."‡ To think that the new religious systems which dissolved the ancient union of society have been favorable to political liberty, would in nations under their influence be every man's thought: no doubt, as Prince Henry says to Poins, he is "a blessed fellow who thinks as every man thinks;" and we may add, never a man's thought in the world kept the roadway better than that of Blackstone, who in eulogizing Edward VI., and in reviling Mary, records the most oppressive and tyrannical laws enacted by the former, and the most just and mild laws enacted by the latter. Their principle has on the contrary been favorable to anarchy and despotism, though it may have met with contrary causes to neutralize its effects; for as the learned father Ventura observes "there are some people of Europe who although they have ceased for three centuries to believe, and to think catholically, yet in many respects have continued hitherto to live catholically; and there are others who after monarchy has been destroyed, yet continue to be governed monarchally; so that if they retain any thing true in matter of religion, or right in politics, it is not to be ascribed to their inventions or rebellions, whose institutions are of no weight, but to the ancient traditions of the Catholic religion, and of monarchy, which have not as yet been totally effaced; but when these traditions and manners shall have vanished, then it will be manifest how pernicious was their departure from the true religion and from their just institutions."§ With regard to the religious element that entered into the constitution of a Catholic state, we may observe that Leibnitz recognized its necessity, and admired the exterior society of

* Pyth. I. 61. † Epist. ad Constant. August. ‡ De Nugis Curialium, lib. VII. xxv.

§ De Methodo Philosophandi. Roma, cap. II. art. 6.

God and man, which he calls "the state the most perfect under the most perfect of monarchs;" under which it is impossible for men to live as Isocrates described the Persians, "all their lives either insulting over others, or else servilely enslaved to others, which must of all things corrupt the nature of men."* This really secured that spiritual excellence of government which Tacitus ascribed in a material sense to Nerva, saying, "res olim insociabiles miscuisset, imperium et libertatem." It was this element which inspired the desire and enhanced the real value of political freedom: witness what Don Savedra testifies of the Belgians in his time, that "they love religion and liberty, neither deceiving others nor enduring to be deceived."† The liberty, however, which was loved in these ages was not an abstraction, but a real personal exemption and immunity from the inconvenience and indignity of servitude. This is expressed even on the tomb of the Norman hero, Jourdan, son of Roger, on which was inscribed "quantus fuit auctor domesticæ libertatis ipse devicta à Barbaris Sicilia demonstrat;" and that under the influence of Christianity even the remains of pagan servitude were unattended with individual misery may be inferred from the fact, that when Louis X. published his ordinance, very few of the serfs desired to redeem themselves, so that the king by letters declared afterwards "that many have not known the greatness of the benefit which was offered to them." It must be remembered that until the fifth century there were in Gaul two distinct societies, the civil and religious, which differed not only in their object but also because they were governed by different principles. The civil society seemed to be Christian like the religious, but at the bottom it was in fact pagan; it derived from paganism its institutions, its laws, and its manners.

The Christian civil society, as Guizot remarks, was not developed till later, after the invasion of the barbarians;‡ and we must carefully distinguish its action and institutions from the influence of the ancient legislation; for the founders of Christian states had not the advantage which Plato ascribes to his ideal legislators: when a necessity fell upon the Christian clergy to apply the things which they contemplated in the regions of universal truth and order to the manners of men in public as well as in private, and not merely to form themselves, they were not, indeed, found bad artists to form temperance and justice, and all that belongs to the virtue of a people; for in employing their pencil, and in tracing that picture from a divine model, they constituted states which were highly favorable to the sanctification and eternal beatitude of men, but they were not permitted in the first instance, as Socrates required, to take as a piece of plain canvas the city and the manners of men, and make it clean, which he acknowledges would be no easy matter: they enjoyed no such distinction over all legislators, that they never were required to touch either an individual or a state, or to make laws before they either received or made it pure and clean.§ They found the world polluted with all the

* Panegy. 72. † Christ. Prince, II. 384. ‡ Cours d'Hist. Mod. IV. § De Repub. lib. VI.

vices of the old pagan civilization, and the new elements entrusted to them were wild and barbarous ; yet their deep and sweet colors succeeded at last in overpowering the almost inveterate and loathsome forms over which they had to work : their labor cannot be better described than in the very words of Plato. “While painting the form of the state, they continually turned their eyes from one to the other, that is, from what is essentially just and beautiful and wise, and all such things, to what actually takes place among men, blending and fashioning, from these models the ideal of humanity τὸ ἀνδρείκελον, taking as their point of departure or as their model that which Homer called as being among men θεοειδές τε καὶ θεοείκελον: and parts they effaced and parts they refreshed and repainted, until they rendered the manners of men as far as is possible worthy of being the object of divine love.” This was their noble painting of a government, not “the unhistoric rational state on the revolutionary destructive principle, which Frederick Schlegel well denounces as clearly irreconcilable with Christianity and in opposition to it,”* but the Christian Catholic and holy state, according to whose law man was contained in the family, the family in the nation, the nation in the religion, the religion in the universe, the universe in the immensity of God,—the holy, just, and happy state, which really enjoyed what the ancient sages and poets ascribe without reason to some of their people ; for, in that of truth reigned, as Pindar says, Eunomia, or good legislation, and her sisters Justice and Peace, of congenial manners, the foundation of happy governments and the dispensers of wealth to men.† Or as the same profound poet says of the Locrian Epizephyrians,‡ ἀτρεκέια governed their city, which word comprises all that is true in a government, integrity in manners, wisdom in legislation, and justice in the tribunals. Here was that harmony with that social order which Maximus of Tyre says is what saves a state.§ Here was really found that unity, of the importance of which Plato had so profound a sense, that to secure it he had recourse in his speculations to those wild and extravagant conceits which are the disgrace of his noble work on the republic ; to have unity he sacrifices every thing, and even the moral law of nature. His plan is ridiculous to the last degree, detestable, monstrous, but so much the more does it prove the depth of his conviction, that unity in a state was essential to its happiness. Let it not be thought that I exaggerate in ascribing to the Catholic states of ages of faith, the advantage which seemed so admirable and so unattainable to Plato. Guizot is struck with observing the moral unity which prevailed in France during a period of such multitudinous divisions of territory as took place under the feudal system. He endeavors to account for it in this way. “It is because in the life of a people, the exterior and visible unity, the unity of name and of government, however important, is not the first ; the most real is that which truly constitutes a nation. There is a unity more profound, more powerful, that which results, not from an identity of government and destiny, but from the sim-

* Philosophie der Geschichte, II. 114.

†Olymp. XIII.

‡Olymp. X.

§ XXII. 3.

ilitude of social elements, from similitude of institutions, manners, ideas, sentiments, and languages, the unity which resides in the men themselves who are reunited, in society, and not in the form of their approximation ; in short, moral unity, far superior to political unity, and which can alone form its solid foundation.”* Perhaps the fact admitted might be accounted for in fewer words, but its decided recognition by such a writer is sufficiently remarkable.

In a Catholic state one might have looked upon every person in every rank as one of a great but closely united family, possessing the same affections, entrusted with the same secrets, and acting from the same motives for the same end : this poor laborer, this young apprentice, this student, this soldier, this artisan, this king, had all the same sources of instruction and consolation as yourself. In the tribunal of penance, they had all been taught the same lessons and traditions, and had been all directed to the same end. In every other state, whether heathen or modern, each man has his own motives, his own rule of right and wrong, his own end in view ; perhaps he thinks virtues what you regard as sins, and sins against his type of perfection what you regard as the highest virtue ; in the Catholic states there was only one standard even amidst desertions, only one morality understood even by those who departed from it, as there was but one faith : what an increase of public and social happiness resulted from such unity ! It is true meek obedience was a prominent feature in this painting, but that this was not opposed to real freedom, or a source of servitude, has, perhaps, already been sufficiently shown. Müller says, “with the Dorians, that comparatively free and noble people of antiquity, so great was the desire of unity in the state, that greater importance was attached to obedience than to the assertion of individual freedom.”† In fact, the Spartans considered an immunity from labor as constituting entire liberty. True, in Christian states there was degree and subordination of ranks, necessarily attended with an unequal distribution of the goods of this world,—

But government, though high, and low, and lower,
Put into parts, did keep in one concert,
Congruing in a full and natural close
Like music———

“Old men participate by the very law of nature in paternity,” says Bonald, “and young men owe them deference : persons weak in mind or body, from sex or condition, participate in the claims of childhood, and require protection. Society is all paternity and dependence, rather than fraternity and equity.”‡ The Gallic rioters of the ill-guided city talk of the fraternal action of nations just as the great depopulators of the earth always effect to attach great importance to population. The Church reminded men of a real fraternity, “Hæc est vera fraternitas, quæ numquam potuit violari certamine : qui effuso sanguine secuti sunt Domi-

* Cours d'Hist. Mod. tom. IV. 1. † Hist. of the Dorians, book IV. ‡ Législat. Prim. II. 75.

num." The patrimonial bond considered in its primitive purity is the sweetest form of human existence;

Fallitur egregio quisquis sub principe credit
Servitium: nunquam libertas gratior extat
Quam sub rege pio !

never more grateful, and when allied to Christian manners, never more secure, for the political inventions of men are of less avail than the provisions of nature. "This patrimonial bond," says de Haller, "is the lightest and gentlest that can be conceived ; it makes not the least encroachment upon the liberty of man. That which is generally styled domination and dependence consists only in voluntary and reciprocal engagements, in a mutual assistance and an exchange of benefits. Certainly, nature in forming this bond, and in uniting men only by a law of love, has shown herself more affectionate towards us ; her tender solicitude has provided better for our freedom, our happiness, and even our desire of a higher fortune, than all the philosophers with their pretended rational states, their arbitrary or constitutional associations, and their odious establishments of coercion." * It was characteristic of these ages, that while in all the relations and circumstances of social intercourse men were simple, natural, open to all the sweet and loving harmonies of life, unfettered by the trammels of false refinement, and the hateful barriers which pride would introduce between the different ranks of the great Christian family, they were, if I may so say, supernatural or alive to the sublime elevation of things divine above the visible world in all the relations and circumstances of religion ; exactly as the converse is true with the moderns, who are miserably enslaved in their social intercourse while they affect to be natural in their religion, from opinions and manners which either destroy it altogether or render it so far from being natural, a system at total variance with what is really in harmony with the deepest sentiments of nature.

We have an incidental and undersigned evidence of the union and happiness of the old societies of Europe in the description which the pilgrims have given of the states through which they passed. Thus brother Nicole, author of the famous voyage to Jerusalem, says of Venice : " Chose superflue seroit a homme vouloir descrire la grant paix et concorde de que ont entre eulx les citoyens, seigneurs, et urbanité, magnificence, amour, benivolence par quoy leur chose publique par avant petite est devenue grande. Chascun le voit et apperçoit. Au surplus qui dira la grande religion ou foy qu'ils ont a Dieu, a sainte Eglise, et a toute la discipline ecclesiastique?" † Anquetil says, "that the subordination established among the clergy of Rheims in the time of Charles VII. became a model which the laity were anxious to imitate, and that the spirit of peace, union, and concord, the result of religion exercised in its purity, made all the inhabitants of the city like one and the same family.”* The moderns would think that he must not be an indifferent orator, who should undertake to prove, that in the ages of faith the people exercised an acknowledged and often effectual power in the state, but though we were persons always as hard to be convinced as Cebes,† nothing is less questionable than that they did.‡ We have seen that in the theory and practice of ecclesiastical rule, from which the civil was in a great measure modelled, the advice and interests of the community governed were always to be consulted. Accordingly we find in an article of a capitulary of Charlemagne, which commences with these words, “Ut populus interrogetur de capitulis que in lege noviter adita sunt,” that the emperor, not content with ordering his officers to read “in mallo publico,” to the citizens of each territory, the laws newly made, desires besides that their opinion should be asked, and that each person should testify either by his signature or by his seal his acquiescence in the new ordinance.§ However the modern politicians may deem such a reference unnecessary, we can only understand the reason and spirit of this ancient government by looking back to the origin and elements of the Christian society. In the first place, then, the people had priority of claims to its advantages inasmuch as religion commenced with them. The modern systems, unlike Christianity, began with the great and noble. In the first assembly of Huguenots in the year 1557, which was discovered in the street of St. James, at Paris, and dispersed by the populace, there were found among them many persons of the highest rank, and several ladies of the court, some of whom were in waiting upon the queen. From the first they had many gentlemen in their ranks who were ever ready to draw their swords and rush out upon the people as in the affair of the church of St. Marceau, where their fury was excited by hearing the bells tolling for vespers.|| In England and Germany, Protestantism introduced itself by the head of the state, by princes, and nobles, and magistrates, and men of letters, and descended slowly into the lower ranks. Christianity followed an opposite course; it commenced in the plebeian classes, with the poor and ignorant, the faith ascended by degrees into the higher ranks, and reached at length the imperial throne. It is a remark of Chateaubriand, too just to be rejected, “that the two impressions of these two origins have remained distinct in the two communions.”¶ The same difference continues in the propagation of the two religions. By the preaching and miracles of St. Francis Xavier, the whole kingdom of Travancor embraced the Catholic religion with the exception of the king and the chief men of his court. In the missions of the Protestants, it is invariably the higher classes which furnish them with a favorable soil. So little alive are they to the natural inference from this startling fact, that in magnifying their national religions, they always speak of their happy effects in giving some certain tone to high society or to literature or in contributing to some worldly

* Restaurat. de la Science, Pol. tom. III. chap. liii.

† Le grant Voyage de Hierusalem. Paris, 1517, f. viii.

* Hist. de Rheims, lib. IV. p. 8.

† Plato, Phædo. 77.

‡ Mem. de l'Acad. des Inscriptions, tom. xxxvii. 541.

§ Baluze Capit. An. 819.

|| St. Victor Tableau de Paris, tom. III. p. 27. ¶ Discours Hist. Pref.  Boubours, I. 129.

advantage, which virtually belongs alone to the ranks above the poor. There is in truth always a secret tendency in the higher classes to disdain the company of the shepherds at Bethlehem, and to follow where the fishermen had led. The poor shepherds believed the angel, and the rich will not believe apostles, prophets, angels, or the Triune Eternal God who sends them.

The name of Paganus was affected for a long time by certain great families, though it attested the original paganism of some member.* It is only perhaps at Rome in our age, where nobles generally are seen to contend with the poor in speed to seek Christ. To the observation of Chateaubriand we may add, that in the political doctrine of states and legislations, the two impressions of the two religions are still discernible. While the moderns have alternately rejected or exaggerated the doctrine of the popular power, the great writers of the middle age maintain it within its just proportion. St. Thomas, for instance, said, "that since law was given for the general good, it was not the reason of any individual that could make law, but that of the multitude or of the prince who stood in place of it."† Cardinal Bellarmin placed no mediate power between the people and God, but he supposes the people to be between the king and God. Suarez‡ confirms this doctrine by the authority of St. Ambrose, St. Gregory the great, and St. Augustine. Liguori speaks to the same effect. "It is certain," he says, "that power is given to men of making laws, but this power as it respects civil laws belongs by nature to no one, but only to the community, and from this it is transferred to one or to more by whom the community is governed."§ Fenelon also says, "the temporal power comes from the community which is called the nation,"|| and Bossuet says, "no one denies that the power of kings is not in such a manner from God, but that it is also by the consent of the people."¶ The Abbé la Mennais shows that this doctrine of St. Thomas and other theologians is not to be confounded with that of Jurieu and Rousseau, which they defended under the name of sovereignty of the people, which supposes that the people have no other law but their own will, which creates justice, whereas Catholic theologians lay down as a principle, that the people as well as an individual is subject to the divine law of justice, essentially independent of its will. Aware of all the abuses to which the exercise of that right is liable, which cannot however destroy that right, they have with St. Thomas endeavored to guard against them, saying, "a tyrannical government is unjust, being ordained not for the common good, but for the private good of the ruler. Therefore, the disturbance of this rule is not sedition, unless when the overthrow of tyranny is so inordinately pursued, that the multitude suffers more from the disturbance than from the existence of the government." In fact, during ages of faith, though the popular power was generally exercised in a legal resistance, which sufficiently preserved society from the dan-

* Lebeuf, Hist. du Diocèse de Paris, XI. 104.

† Defens. Fidei. Cathol. lib. III. cap. ii.

|| Tom. XXII.

¶ Defens. V. cap. xxi.

† 1. 4. 90, A.—Id. 97 ad 3.

§ De Legibus, I. Tract. II. P. 104.

 Sum. 22. 9. 42. Art. II. ad 3.

gers of a reckless revolution, yet the greatest monarchs had occasion to feel the necessity of guarding against its expression in a less orderly form ; but true to the origin of its emancipation, it was seldom formidable excepting in defence of its religion. Hence it was that Savedra warns kings and their ministers never to meddle with religion, or commence a contest with ecclesiastics, because, he adds, "this will kindle the fury of the people against them."*

Charles V. so feared the people, that he decreed public prayers and processions through all Spain, to obtain the deliverance of the pontiff, whom his own troops kept prisoner in Italy. With the heathen sentiments of a false and unattainable liberty, the moderns also adopted their expressions of contempt and hatred for the lower orders of the state ; expressions which, in a Christian society, are both unjust and opposed to the original laws and institutions of government. In ages of faith, the people were not that vulgar spoken of by Cicero, in whom "is no counsel, no reason, no discrimination, no diligence ; whose actions, while suffered by wise men, were seldom to be praised :"[†] the majority of whom were evil, as Pylades said to Orestes ;[‡] whom no poet was ever to address, as Theognis, the Megarian, said of the peasants of his native land, ranking them with the wicked ; they were not that Athenian people described by Demosthenes "the most treacherous of all things, changeable as the wind upon the inconstant sea ;"[§] not that democracy whose gifts, as the moderns would infer are always a Cyclopiian grace, to destroy others first and their friends last.

The Divine Saviour taught men not to be so proudly ready to rail at the multitude, and had left them his example in those gracious words benign, "misereor super turbam."|| Moreover, the constitution of a Christian state recognized them as entitled to every protection, and secured the perpetuity of institutions founded by charity for their advantage. The Church claimed them as the objects of her especial love, and formed them by her discipline to become what they still continue, in every Catholic country, when not perverted by the policy and driven to exasperation by the injustice of rulers, a most innocent, joyous, and engaging race, whose name might no longer be taken for that of a nation, but seems to be rather that of Christian intelligence. The Church prayed oftener for the people, than for the kings. She wished, that their approval might accompany her elections, and she indicated its necessity for kings in the ceremony of their coronation. The first grand objects which meet the eye in the capital of her government derive their title from the people ; as if to remind men of that ancient discipline, which lasted in practice till the xiiith century, and which continues always in spirit to distinguish ecclesiastical rule : it is through the gate of the people that you enter Rome, and the first church, of St. Mary, which presents itself to the pilgrim, is also entitled of the people : many of her solemn and holy orders have their especial missions to console and assist the people ; and it is among the lower classes, who, as

* Christian Prince, I. 566.

† Orat pro C. Plancio, IV.

‡ Eurip. Iph. in Taur. 670.

§ Æneid, V. 733.

|| S. Matt. viii. 2.

Bonald says, are always in the first age of society ; it is among the devout multitude, who come from far over the mountains in peaceful pilgrimage to Alvernia, or to the blessed house which crowns the eastern shore of Italy, or to the rock of the archangel which beheld his bright vision beside the Adriatic, that the piety, and simplicity, and innocence of ages of faith may still be found,—not amidst the disdainful assembly of those who meet in the chapels of some proud metropolis, to display their charms, or their grandeur, in the appropriated tribunes that are formed to separate them from the poor. Let the haughty rich men, who legislate in favor of their philosophy, bear these facts in mind, and let them at least respect the right of prior possession. The Catholic religion, with all its seeds of future fruit to be developed at the Church's pleasure, embraced by the poor, was here established before them : they found it here ; it is no upstart : they did not vote it into existence ; a majority of their voices was not required for its establishment, as in that scene among the American savages, who lately decided for Christianity by rising from their seats. They were not once consulted about it. But let us consider other objections which are usually advanced against the political state, in ages of faith : let us come to the question of Æschylus—who next is ranged here against the city ? It is objected then, that there were not those political debates, to discuss measures of government, which are now thought so essential to the happiness of every virtuous and free people. Much might be advanced in reply. The action of the Catholic religion in ages of faith necessarily secured domestic liberty from falling a victim to the immoderate license of assemblies.* Unskillful men, rude and ignorant of political relations, had other pleasures, other means of exercising their intellectual activity, besides sitting down as in a theatre to listen to the discourse of sophists, to hear “these fellows of infinite tongue,” these ten thousand loquacious youths who make incessant speeches, birdwitted chirrupers, whose only muse is that of swallows, to hear money-changers speaking on institutions of piety, and lawyers on education. Besides, the people knew too well their own interest to desire the rule of the multitude, and to wait for the mutual revelations of a Cleon and the sausage-seller,† though to hear such wrangling may be joy to vulgar minds. It is a remark of Savedra, and repeated by De Haller, that every numerous assembly, although composed of chosen men, and more or less cultivated, nevertheless, in many respects, resembles the populace : modern history proves that they are subject to the same passions, and impelled by that sanguine eloquence, that exaggerated expression, which is so uncongenial with philosophy, equally insensible to the dictates of justice. “The great crowd of men has a blind heart,” says Pindar

———τυφλὸν δ' ἔχει
ἦτορ ὁμιλοῦ ἄνδρῶν ὁ πλεῖστος.‡

The government by assemblies feeds the love of contention and the love of hon-

* Cicero pro L. Flacco.

† Aristoph. Equites

‡ Nem. Od. VII.

ors, which Plato reckons among the greatest evils of an ill-constituted state :* and when there is a foundation of error in principle, it subjects states to frequent variations. No one knows how to fix the bounds of liberty and the confines of servitude : on the contrary, there is seen a mixture of servitude and license. “ Liberty becomes only a word with the people who wish to have power to do every thing, and with the nobles who wish to subdue every thing.” This is said by the great historian of Florence.† A government of this kind secretly nourishes the love of riches, because it in fact participates in the character of an oligarchy, and as Socrates says, virtue has the same relation to wealth that exists between any two objects in a balance, of which each has always a force acting contrary to the other, so that riches and rich men being honored, virtue and good men will be dishonored of necessity.‡ Moreover, such a government would have been contrary to those habits of thoughtful retirement, and of a holy life, which were deemed of far greater value than any worldly interests whatever. Pindar ascribes the love of bold harangues to those who are fond of drunken banquets.

βαρβαλέα δε παρα
κρατῆρα φωνά γίνεται.§

The Romans under their kings received the abstinence of the Pythagoreans, and under their consuls the luxury of Epicurus. It was a maxim of the Christian philosophy to beware of the tumult of men, and as far as possible to avoid being drawn into the controversies of the world, “cito enim inquinamur vanitate et captivamur.” The churches were the places of assembly for Christians, and their lips were opened to sing the praises of God. Ah! seek me there, they would have replied to those who desired them to repair to political debates, approach the Divine altars, before which you will find me prostrate,

———Non me impia namque
Tartara habent tristesque umbræ; sed amœna piorum
Concilia, Elysiumque colo.||

We find that the great moralists of antiquity had sentiments not different from Christians in ages of faith respecting the public or rhetorical life. The maxim of the Pythagoreans was celebrated ; Plutarch, in his treatise on education, advises parents to keep their children as far as is possible from the vanity of wishing to appear before an assembly of the commons ; and he cites some lines of Euripides, which Amyot thus translates :

Langue je n'ay diserte et affilée
Pour haranguer devant une assemblée,
Car qui scait mieulx au gre d'un peuple dire
Est bien souvent entre sages le pire.

* De Repub. VIII. † Lib. VI. ‡ De Repub. lib. VIII. § Nem. IX. || Æneid, V. 733.

———οἱ δ' ἐν σοφοῖς
φαῦλοι, παρ' ὅχλῳ μουσικώτεροι λέγειν.

“Those,” he continues, “who acquire a habit of extempore speaking, besides contracting other faults, tombent en une merveilleux superfluité de langage,” as Amyot translates it, and thus become accustomed to utter “an infinity of impertinent and vain things :” and what an additional evil would have followed when these impertinent and vain things were to pass into laws. “The liberals of every country,” says Potter, who is himself a liberal, “commit the unpardonable fault of wishing to reform ideas, (great reform they would effect no doubt) by laws. They know not that to torment, vex, and outrage men is a bad way to convince them, and that to destroy is not to change.”* Pindar says, “it is impossible that a deceitful citizen should deliver an effective speech among good men ;”† but among those who form the majority of hearers in an assembly, the humble simplicity of real political truth would be laughed out of countenance, to make place for the theories of men, who, as Florent Galli says, “by nature noble endeavor to recover in politics the dignity which they have lost in morals.” This was the result of the inquiry which Socrates instituted among men famed for political science : he found that those men who enjoyed the greatest reputation for wisdom, when examined, as if before God, were found most wanting, where as others that seemed simpler were men really more near to wisdom.‡ The man who would correspond in his own life to the best constituted state, says Plato, must love the muse, and love to hear, but he must not be a rhetorician, φιλόμουσον καὶ φιλήκοον, ῥητορικὸν δ' οὐδαμῶς.§ “If any one,” says Cicero, “omitting the right and honest studies of reason and duty, should consume all his work in the exercise of speaking, there will be nourished a citizen useless to himself and pernicious to his country ;”|| one whose least offence and injury, as the history of a later age proves, will be when his tongue, like a fan of sedition, excites the assembly of the poor.

Have you never heard of the Loup-garon ? asks Socrates ; I believe, he continues, that this is, in fact, some democratic leader, polluted in tongue and hands, and now of necessity become a wolf, after having been a man during life.¶ But it is not to be inferred from these remarks, that the spirit of this society was opposed to the great judicial and legislative councils of a nation : on the contrary, the ecclesiastical assemblies, so free and wisely constituted, were a model imitated in the civil order ; and the very principle of opposition was derived from their forms, in which men, who had reasonable objections to advance, were exhorted boldly to produce them for the love of God. They were not, indeed, to quarrel about who should save the state, like Ulysses and Diomedes, and still less to seek only their own glory, desiring to be the sole authors of the action, and conspiring

* Union des Catholiques et des Libéraux dans les Pays-bas.

† Pyth. II.

‡ Plato. Apolog. XXII.

§ De Repub. VIII.

¶ De Inventione, lib. I. 1.

¶ De Repub. lib. VIII.

 In the Rite of Ordination for Deacons.

against all others who should endeavor to assist their country, as Ulysses, when he determined to kill Diomedes, when he carried off the Palladium ; but the people were, without doubt, represented in the general assemblies. In France the kings of the first race, as in the constitution of Childebert I., express their will as the result of an universal consent. "We all assembled, of every condition, together with our nobles, have resolved, nos omnes congregati de quibuscumque conditionibus una cum optimatibus."* And we find in the annals of St. Bertin that the people were convened to the assembly at Nimegue, in the year 831,—Percunctatus est populus—a cuncto qui aderat populo iudicatum est.† We may conclude, therefore, from such passages, as also from what we have before shown, that the people exercised real power in the state ; but this is carefully to be distinguished from that voice of sophists, which is sometimes called public opinion, the object of execration to Plato, and to all truly wise men in every age in which it existed ; but in the middle ages it did not exist in the ordinary sense of the term. The language of Socrates on this point is peculiarly interesting ; and it will furnish the best answer to those who despise the state of society in the middle ages, on account of not being able to discover in them the action of that public opinion which he condemns. Mark, for instance, what a reply he furnishes to those sophists who maintain, that holy wise men living in religious retreat are the corrupters and deceivers of the young, and that the public opinion, and the world in general, by all which they mean only the voice of their own party, would form them better. "Truly, this would be a great happiness for the young, if one or a few only corrupted them, and the rest of men were for setting them right."‡ In the Gorgias he evinces the same judgment respecting this public opinion. "Ask any one of these if it be not so?" is the appeal of Polus the sophist, to which Socrates replies : "O Polus, I am not one of the politicians ; and last year when my tribe had the privilege, and it was necessary for me to compute the suffrages, and to refer them to the council, I caused a great laughter, not knowing how to set about it. Therefore do not desire me now to appeal to the judgment of the company ; I know how to produce one witness, the person with whom I discourse ; but as for the public, I salute it and let it pass. I know how to collect the vote of one person ; but to the multitude I do not even speak."§ In ages of faith it was not the supposed voice of this multitude which, as Plato says, really perfected the education of the young, making them and all others whatever it wished them to be, both young and old, men and women ; they were not formed by that noisy and intemperate public opinion which he describes as one might write of it in our own times, as a sound re-echoed in all the public assemblies, in the tribunals, in the theatres, in the camps. It is true the common judgment of Christian ages was not different from the private instructions of education ; but if it had been otherwise form-

* Baluse, tom. I. capit. an. 595.

† D. Bouquet, VI. 173.

‡ Plato Apolog. XXV.§ Plato Gorgias.

ed and developed, there would have been an end of harmony in the state ; for no private education could have resisted this influence, and the young would have been carried away by the public expression of blame and praise, in whatever direction they impelled them. So that without taking into account what Socrates adds respecting the deeds which sophists united with their instructions, in punishing with dishonor and with penalties those whom they could not convince by reason, deeds now witnessed within the loathsome towers of Ham in Gallie land, we may conclude with his words, that certainly there was no private instructor who could have overcome this contrary impulse, had it existed, that the mere attempt to produce one would have been madness ; and since that power, whatever it may be called, is wielded not in reality by the people, but by the sophists who come forward in its name, the absence of so tremendous a danger in ages of faith should be only an additional reason to feel convinced that their state was eminently happy.

And here an observation is suggested, which respects latter ages, rather than the past ; for who does not perceive that the two camps now opposed to each other, those who adhere to the wisdom of Christian antiquity, and those who support a system contrary to it, are, as far as respects nature, differently affected by the action of this great intellectual and moral power ? The former being children of the Catholic Church, accustomed to union, and sweet conformity with all around them, when placed in a different society, the influence of its opinion and manners has an unnatural force, derived from their laudable disinclination to be singular ; whereas, on the contrary, those who protest against the principles of the Catholic religion are never so secure and so fierce as when in a Catholic country, where they enjoy in the greatest perfection their favorite privilege of singularity. The concluding sentence of Socrates, in the fifth book of the Republic, is very remarkable. “For neither is there, nor was there, nor can there ever be any system of education favorable to virtue capable of resisting this general opinion of society, that is, human system, O comrade, for I except from our discourse what is divine, and you ought to know well, that in such a condition of the state, when the multitude are thus disposed, if any one should be saved, and should become what he ought to be, you will not err in saying that he has been saved by a special providence of God. Besides this, you should remark that these private instructors, who give lessons for money, and whom the multitude call sophists, regarding them as their rivals and opposition pedagogues, teach nothing else but the opinions of this very multitude, whose passions they study to please, as if it were a great animal, which they desired to understand thoroughly.

Whoever lives with the multitude, presenting it either with a poem or some other work of art, or public service, making the multitude his master more than his right—must do all the things that will please it, of Diomedian necessity. Have you ever heard such a man giving a reason to show why and in what manner, in reality, things are good, and honorable, and fair, which was not altogether laughable and ridiculous? Certainly not; for they study only what seems good, and honorable, and fair, to the brutish multitude." So far Socrates. "It is impossible to express," says Montaigne, "how much our mind loses and degenerates by the constant commerce and acquaintance with low and diseased souls. There is no contagion which spreads like that." It is not too much to affirm, that to the absence of a power capable of extending this contagion beyond even the ability of natural causes, must be ascribed in a great measure, not only the spiritual happiness of society, during the ages of faith, but also the phenomenon which they present in the prodigious fruitfulness of nature in giving birth to men of extraordinary virtue and greatness of soul: and "how many excellent spirits," as Savendra says, "how many generous characters did then spring up and die unknown, which would have been the admiration of the whole world, if they had been once employed!" Does it seem against the evidence of history to affirm this? But even several modern writers themselves acknowledge its truth. "Another advantage," says Guizot, "from studying the history of the middle ages is political. Our time may be characterized by a certain weakness, a certain softness in minds and manners. Individual wills and convictions want energy and confidence: men take up a common opinion, obey a general impulse, and yield to an exterior necessity. Whether it be for resistance or for action, no one has a great idea of his force, or any confidence in his own thought. Individuality, in a word, the intimate and personal energy of man, is weak and timid. Amidst the progress of general liberty many men seem to have lost the noble and powerful sentiment of their own liberty. Such was not the middle age: the social condition then was deplorable," (these writers like painters, employ shades to make their sentences picturesque) "but in many men individuality was strong, and will energetic: the moral nature of man appeared here and there, in all its grandeur and with all its power."*

Bonald saw the difference and indicated the cause. "We have become so accustomed to think only in a crowd, to speak only in public, to think on laws only in a committee, to discuss them only in the courts, to establish them only by a majority of voices, that the most learned and able men feel afraid as soon as they are alone, and do not dare to move a step without that noise, often imaginary, which they call the public opinion."† Let us meet another objection, and reply to those who accuse society in these ages of being wanting in industry and activity, the grand criterion of modern civilization. It was an ancient argument, that the Christian religion tended to the downfall of the empire, and modern sophists have resumed it, affirming that it is too spiritual, too inductive to carelessness for the things of earth, and therefore hurtful to the interests of society. Machiavel, speaking of the effects of Catholic instruction in withdrawing the mind from earthly interests, proposes that children should no longer be made familiar with the names of saints,

* Cours d'Hist. IV. I.

† Législat. Primit. I.

who inspire contempt for temporal grandeur, but with the names of gentile captains which may inspire them with military courage.* On such subjects, it is well to present our apology in the words of the ancient sages, because the moderns will not accuse them of being under the influence of "that execrable superstition" which Pliny spoke of, and to which these ages clung with such unwearied ardor. The Athenian then, in Plato, extols the laws of Crete as securing to the state all good: "but the good of a state," he says, "is two-fold, being both human and divine; and both of these depend upon the divinity; and if any city should receive the greater good, it will possess also the latter; but if not, it will be deprived of both: and the lesser good consists in health, and beauty, and strength, and agility, and riches, not such as are blind, but those which with clear sight follow virtue; but the first and greater good consists in temperance, and chastity, and justice, and a manly spirit: and a legislator must always attend to this order in whatever he ordains, making what is human wait upon the divine."† "Neither a state nor a man can be happy, unless by means of a life of wisdom and justice, being under the dominion of holy men as rulers, and being brought up in virtuous manners."‡ Socrates says that he used to address each of his countrymen with these words; "O best of men being an Athenian, native of the greatest city, and most illustrious for wisdom and power, are you not ashamed to be occupied about money, about making as much of it as possible, and gaining reputation and honors, while you neglect the study of truth, and take no thought for your soul, ὅπως ὦς βελτίστη ἔσται?"§ There was no industry or activity in ages of faith, say the moderns; but there was industry, and activity, and subtle intelligence, in those matters which even the heathen sage thought alone deserving of human care, as having relation to intellectual wants, and to the future existence. Hæc magna, hæc divina, hæc sempiterna sunt. Was it for the illuminated race, upon whom the glory of the Lord had shone, when the nations walked in his light, and kings in the brightness of his rising,—was it for them, we may ask, to devote their lives to the pursuit of objects, which had been rejected by sages, as unworthy of man's nature, while darkness covered the earth, and a mist the people? Was it for them to prepare the way of the modern societies, by neglecting the spiritual interests of their posterity, while for themselves, "engrossing and piling up the cankered heaps of strange-achieved gold?" They pursued no ends of utility, we are told; but it was from a perfect conviction of the comparative inutility of all concerns to which death must put an end, that they gave that ecclesiastical and spiritual direction to society, which now is considered so injurious; indicating, no doubt, a mind resembling that to which Cicero alludes, weaned from the love of vanities, and placing its strength for living virtuously in the contempt of all human things.|| But nothing can be simpler than the whole of this problem: our

* Discorsi sulle decadi de Tito Livio. I. 12 & 41.

† De Legibus, lib. 1.

‡ Plato Epist. viii.

§ Plato Apolog. XXX.

|| Tuscul. I. 40.

desires are always according to our habits ; the old fisherman in Plautus only delights in finding gold, at the idea of being able to build a great ship.* In ages of faith, Christians had no other object in desiring money than that they might be able to build a church, or a monastery, for they were not accustomed to luxuries which would have given them a different view of the importance of money. Do we suppose, that if it had been deemed useful or noble to construct club-houses, exchanges, and theatres, the cities of the middle ages would not have possessed many monuments, like those in the streets of Vivien and St. James ? It was then considered more useful to make foundations of a spiritual order, and therefore we behold instead, the abbeys of St. Germain and Westminster.

Machiavel and the other politicians of that school speak disdainfully of the Catholic religion, precisely from the same cause which led the Jews and Gentiles to despise Christ. His voluntary humiliation and subjection reproved their pride ; and the moderns ascribe to ignorance, and weakness, and idolence, what was the legitimate result of the profound mysteries of the Christian religion. They pretend to read the ancient poets and sages with admiration, and yet their testimony is strong in favor of these characteristics of society in the middle age, which are now condemned. "The minds of mortal men," says Pindar, "are quicker to praise deceitful gain than justice ; but it is necessary for you and for me to accommodate our manners to justice, to prepare for ourselves future happiness."† Thus, indeed, spoke the universal reason, and the primal traditions ; but if he had consulted only the opinions of the philosophers, he could never have approached so near to the sentiments of the ages we defend, for in speaking of the errors of men, he says, that it is impossible to discover what is now and in future the best thing for man to obtain,

τοῦτο δ' ἀμάχανον ἔσθρην, ὅτι νῦν καὶ ἐν τελευτᾷ φέρτατον ἀνδρὶ τυχεῖν.‡

And St. Augustin relates from the testimony of the learned Varro, that there were no less than two hundred and eighty opinions among the philosophers respecting the chief good of man : they were at such a loss to know in what it consisted.§ If then they rightly extol Pindar for forming such a judgment amidst so many difficulties, with what injustice do they condemn the consistent policy of the ages of faith, which had so exact a knowledge of the supreme good, and which pursued it with such singleness of eye, following it even through the beautiful regions of imagination and poetry ! "But for that politic blessedness ought not to be the last mark of a Christian man," says the old translator of Tasso, "but he ought to look more high, that is, to everlasting felicity ; for this cause Godfrey doth not desire to win the earthly Jerusalem to have therein only temporal dominion, but because herein may be celebrated the worship of God, and that the holy sepulchre

* Rudens, IV. 2.

† Pyth. IV.

‡ Olymp. VII.

§ De Civit. Dei, XIX.

may be the more visited of godly strangers and devout pilgrims:" and the poem is closed with the prayers of Godfrey, to show that the understanding being travailed and wearied in civil actions, ought in the end to rest in devotion, and in the contemplation of the eternal blessedness of the other most happy and immortal life. It passed even into a proverb with the Spaniards that devout people who like Godfrey,—

—— Full of zeal, and faith, esteemed light
All worldly honor, empire, treasure, might :

"that all is nothing in this world if it tend not to the next," and that he who has much on the earth has but little in heaven. Men in those ages did not labor with such indefatigable anxiety in making the earth yield its utmost, for their hearts were not so much set upon it, and seeking pearls and finding the one of great price, all their ambition was to procure it; they no longer sought after these visible things, lest they might lose the things invisible, and become like Ely the priest, who had his eyesight so weak that he could not see the lamp of God which hung continually lighted in the temple. "The soul which loves God," says a writer of those times, "has not leisure to think of any thing else but him, or to be occupied about other things besides him: it disdains, it despises all the rest." "Nil grande, nil pretiosum et admirabile, nil reputatione appareat dignum, nil altum, nihil vere laudabile et desiderabile, nisi quod aeternum est:" this judgment gave rise to the real spirit which influenced men; they who had drank from the river of Paradise felt no more, as St. Augustin says, "the thirst of this world." How can we wonder that it produced its natural effects? The ascetical writer of the middle age, who is the author of the Manual ascribed to St. Augustin, devotes one chapter to showing that men ought to avoid and detest every thing which turns aside the soul from the contemplation of God.* Surely such wisdom was incompatible with the industry of the children of this world, or of men in whom there seems to be neither an actual, nor virtual, nor habitual, nor interpretative intention of being Christians, men who through their ardent passion for every thing sensual must needs labor constantly for riches in order that they may be able to gratify their senses. The man, therefore, who is ἐπιθυμητικὸν, as Plato† says, will consistently embrace the modern philosophy, but he cannot with justice argue against the intelligence of others who pursued a different end by different measures. Cicero even remarked that they who refused to render themselves servants to lust and to ambition had no occasion for the daily expenses which involved others in the necessity of making money. "Why," he asks, "should they greatly desire to have money, or rather why should they care for it at all?"‡ With greater justice might they exclaim, in answer to the magnifiers of such industry: O brother,

* Cap. xxx.

† De Repub. IX.

‡ Tuscul V. 32.

———Call to mind from whence ye sprang;
Ye were not formed to live the life of brutes,
But virtue to pursue and knowledge high.*

Ah ! the hearts of men in ages of faith responded to that voice from some undiscovered cell in holy cloisters, which sung the hymn of "Jesu dulcedo cordium," which in one sense is falsely ascribed to St. Bernard, though in another it justly belongs to him, and to all who had sat beneath his feet :

*Quando cor nostrum visitas,
Tunc lucet ei veritas,
Mundi vilescit vanitas,
Et intus fervet caritas.*

which, perhaps, in the English version has still greater simplicity.

Thy lovely presence shines so clear
Through ev'ry sense and way,
That souls which once have seen thee near,
See all things else decay.

Reasoners who take into account only the apparent material interests of the present life can never form a just judgment of the Christian political state, or of the men who formed it : but in the ascetical writings of the middle ages, in the festivals and in the prayers of the Church, they may discover the secret, without ascending to the source, which explains the cause of all that excites their pity and disdain. Ambition, as an universally pervading principle, and the incentives to activity in merely earthly interests, received necessarily a mortal wound in that society, which recognized and made ample provisions for the wisdom of desiring to die to this world, and of wishing to be despised for Christ, and of remaining unknown in the present life. The calm of the ancient Catholic state proceeded not from indolence, for what society ever gave greater proof of intellectual activity ? but from the suppression of passions. As the sea is beheld tranquil, when no breath of air moves upon the surface, so the mind of man was at rest, and human life passed in a sweet calm, when the perturbations were removed which have power to disturb it. Upon reading the motto of an illustrious and royal race of the middle ages "non laborant neque nent," a favorable occasion is furnished for sophists to give the reins to long discourse respecting the inaction and indolence of Christian antiquity, but they should remember that these are the words of the Son of God proposing an example of life to his disciples, and that they were borne as a device without implying a satire upon manners in ages when men were quite as sharp-sighted to detect moral deformity as in our own. But the result alone of the two disciplines might determine their respective merits. And how astonishing is the delusion practised here ? Those who were invited to the marriage feast in the

* Dante.

Gospel, says Father Diego de Stella, "thought it better for them to travail about their business with pain than to be partakers in peace of the solemn feast of the eternal King. If the King of heaven had invited them to travail, and the world unto pleasures and ease, they might well have been excused, but when it is all contrary, then is the error too manifest if thou shouldst despise the sweet service of Christ for the displeasing servitude of the devil."* The nations of the north who have refused the invitation to the solemn feast affect now to despise devout poetic Spain, and spiritual Italy, who have in successive ages accepted it; but we see how they suffer from their own tyrannic wills:—formerly blessed with sweet peace, and nourished with the bread of angels, they are now condemned to eat that of care and sadness, to behold violence and bloody strife within their streets, which day and night resound with moans: and what after all is the spirit of industry as expressed in the character of the proud?

Where is this great moral dignity spoken of, in the men who are unwilling to accept the invitation of the almighty King, "who was in earth for their sakes crucified," and who prefer going away in sullen disdain to their farms or to their affairs when the Church invites them to rejoice and rest? Even omitting all reference to heaven, on what ground are we to reserve our admiration for these men, who, as Lucian says, "spend many sleepless nights, and painfully laborious and sometimes bloody days, not for the sake of Helen or of Priam, but through hope of gaining five oboli?" What claims does this spirit possess to the praise of virtue? Tacitus paints it well in describing Vinus, "Audax, callidus, promptus, et prout animum intendisset, pravus aut industrius, eadem vi."† If we examine the true cause of the perpetual agitation in which men pass their lives, where the supernatural motives of faith do not exist, we shall understand why in a Catholic state in ages of faith there was less occasion and provision for it. To all men who are of the number that look back, it is an insupportable pain to think of themselves, so that all their care is to forget themselves, and to live without reflection in being occupied with things which leave no time for thought. "This," says Paschal, "is the origin of all the tumultuous occupations of men. The great object is not to feel one's self, and to avoid the bitterness and interior disgust which the thought of one's self would necessarily occasion. The soul finds nothing in itself which contents it, nothing but affliction, therefore it is obliged to fly abroad and to lose the remembrance of its real state in application to external things which may wear the semblance of honesty or duty. Its joy consists in this forgetfulness, and to see itself, and to be with itself, is enough to render it miserable. Hence men are loaded with infinite cares, and labors which occupy them from the break of day. You might think that the course of their lives was purposely contrived to render them unhappy, but it is necessary for their peace: so that even what little time remains to them after their affairs must be spent in some diversions, in order that they may never be for a moment with themselves. This it is which makes them court such interminable labors of body and mind, which makes them men of business engaged from morning till night, men of dissipation devoted to a thousand diversions which must occupy their whole souls, for it is impossible that those who act only by the movements which they find in themselves and in their nature should ever subsist in repose and leisure without being instantly attacked by melancholy and sadness." But in a Catholic state in ages of faith the case was otherwise, for as Paschal says, "it is one of the wonders of the Christian religion to reconcile man to himself in reconciling him to God, to render the view of himself supportable, and to make solitude and repose more agreeable to many than agitation and the commerce of men."

* On the Contempt of the World, p. 11

† Hist. lib. I. 48.

Hence we can understand why the moderns are happy in London or Paris, and find themselves oppressed with melancholy in Rome or Valladolid; why they prefer a Brentford hustings to the Dome of the Vatican, and a manufactory to a convent. That a just and reasonable industry, corresponding with that divine judgment which did not condemn Martha, as St. Augustin says, but only distinguished the gift, and consistent with the noble intelligence of Christians, was not wanting in the ancient states may well be understood from many evidences. Deguignes has written a treatise upon the Commerce of the Middle Ages, containing amidst many false and exaggerated statements, curious details.* Not to speak of the celebrated commerce of Venice, Pisa, and Genoa, it appears that in the reign of Chilperic the Franks had many vessels on the Mediterranean, that the trade of Marseilles continued to flourish as under the Romans, and that even in the interior of France the Oriental languages were cultivated in consequence of the commercial relations maintained with the countries of the East. In the time of Clovis, there were merchants at Paris who made frequent voyages to Syria. Under the Carlovingian princes the commerce of the Mediterranean was a source of riches to France. In the ninth century, the Lyonnese and the Marseillaise imported spices and perfumes from India and Arabia, which were transported by the Rhone and the Saone to the Moselle, whence they were distributed by the Rhein, the Mein, and the Nekar, to the extremities of Germany. The interests of commerce were not unconnected with the pilgrimages to Palestine and the crusades which followed. Deguignes exposes the immense projects of policy and commerce, associated with views of religion, which were developed by writers in the time of Philippe-le-Bel.

The tin of Cornwall used to be transported by means of the Loire to the gates of Digcon, to form pinnacles for the monasteries of Burgundy;† the merchants of Dieppe and Rouen, in the fourteenth century, carried on an extensive trade with Africa, where they founded great establishments: yet in general the knowledge of these facts has been transmitted only by incidental testimonies. It appears also, that the population of France and England in the middle ages, equalled that of our times. The Pope, at the Council of Clermont, spoke of France as being hardly able to contain the multitude of its inhabitants. The country was rich and well cultivated, as is proved by the immensity and variety of the royal and seigniorial rights. One of the first observations made by the pilgrim brother Nicole, during his first day's journey in the Holy Land from Jaffa, was that the land was good but ill cultivated by the laborers.* This implies that he was accustomed to see good farming. The mere fruits of the earth maintained Spain so rich in former times, that Louis IX., King of France, being at the court of Toledo in the time of Don Alonso, was lost in astonishment at its splendor, and said that he had never seen any thing comparable neither in Europe nor in Asia. Yet a vast part of Spain is incapable of much cultivation. With respect to England, there is reason to believe that tracts which had been reclaimed and cultivated by the monks have in later ages been suffered to return to their original barrenness. We shall have occasion in another place to speak of the multitude of monuments with which faith covered the soil of Europe; for the present one may be allowed to suggest, that the richly cultivated garden of the plains of Lombardy, or the lovely shores of Chiavera, do not indicate a less degree of the industry of man, because beautiful churches and graceful oratories are seen to rise at every step amidst the vines and corn; that a seaport city, like Genoa, does not impress a stranger with a less opinion of its commercial activity, because he hears during the still hour that precedes the dawn the faint music of innumerable bells summoning to matins choirs of saintly men and women, whose monasteries are thickly scattered over the surrounding mountains clothed with the pale olive. "Sed plena errorum sunt omnia:" the moderns cannot it seems, recognize an industry which does not exclude all considerations of a spiritual order, and all sweet remembrances of a future country. Villani is to be extolled above all the ecclesiastical and noble historians of the middle age, because he chiefly studies what belongs to the material interests of the people, the operations of trade, the price of corn, the quality of food and drink, which can only be learned by induction from the latter, as Deguignes complains; and a tyrant who destroys the liberty of education, and who pursues a systematic plan to undermine all intellectual good, is to be praised as a wise, magnanimous prince, because he encourages the breed of cattle and makes the markets thrive. How else would men legislate, if they were providing a city for brute swine? So asks one in Plato, after hearing a similar plan for forming a city, Εἰ δὲ ὁὖν πόλιν κατεσκευάζεις, τί ἂν αὐτοῦς ἄλλο ἢ ταῦτα ἐχόρταζες.† At the same time one may admit, that there is a wisdom of self-preservation shown by these societies which rest entirely upon material interests, materializing all interests and deriving their security from this forced rennion of all individual wills, when they look with a jealous eye upon Catholicism, and endeavor to exclude those who profess it ; for in consequence of the spirituality of this religion, it must be in perpetual contradiction with their principles and maxims, and it would become in some sort an instrument of disorder for the mechanics who govern that state and give motion to its springs. But let us mend our speed, for we draw near the opening of sweeter ways. I shall endeavor to compress in as small a space as possible the remaining subjects of reflection suggested by a review of the ancient political state in ages of faith.

* Mem. de l'Acad. des Inscriptions, tom. XXXVII.

† Bibliothec. Cluniacens.

* Le grant Voyage de Hierusal. f. xiii.

† De Repub. II

In the first place, I observe, there was a consistency between all things, material and intellectual, and the manners of men were in harmony with their institutions. The contrast which Coleridge draws between the genuine and artificial poets, might be found to exist between different forms of the society. Of the modern customs and institutions, "lay aside the titles and the ornaments, translate them into another tongue, and it will be a matter of wonder to you that such trivialisms, not to say such nonsense occasionally, could ever be received and perpetuated." Apply the same process to those of the ages of faith. Lay the body of an institution, or of a custom, bare ; decompose it to the utmost of your power : the beauty and grace, and poetry, may, indeed, be destroyed, yet good sense will, in every instance, remain conspicuous, as the substance or body of the whole. The first lines of the prologue of the Salic law are an instance in point :—

"The nation of the Franks having God for founder, strong in arms, firm in keeping treaties, profound in council, noble in person, beautiful in complexion, valiant in combat, but lately converted to the Catholic faith, free from heresy ;—and even, while under a barbarous belief, seeking, by the inspiration of God, the key of knowledge, desiring justice, and guarding piety." It is said, this might be the text of an heroic song ; but compare it, in respect to the strict truth of its testimony, with the received formulas of the modern society, where such strange inconsistencies have been introduced by retaining the language, and rejecting the philosophy, of Christian antiquity, and every one must be struck with the justice of this distinction. But the perfect Christian consistency of the ancient state is one cause why the modern historians are almost invariably mistaken in their representations of it. It is with their style, as with that of Ephorus and Hermippus in which, as Müller says, no one could recognize the ancient simplicity and loveliness which characterized all the genuine remains of the age of Lycurgus ; for our modern historians, too, endeavor to assimilate as much as possible the notions of antiquity to those of their own time, and to attempt, in some way or other to represent every deed as proceeding from such motives as would have actuated their own contemporaries. Machiavel was the first of a similar school. In his history of Florence his views are not Christian respecting the events of society. His very language is pagan ; and in order to imitate the dark and fearful sentences of Tacitus, he seems to forget that he is relating the history of a state which was no longer under the impressions of paganism. Nor can I omit mention of that other characteristic of the institutions and customs of the middle ages, which consisted in their indicating habits of meditation on the life of Christ, and on all the circumstances and mysteries of the Gospel history with which they were in harmony, or, at least, reconcileable; in the same manner as it is characteristic of the modern legislation, and form of life, to exhibit a forgetfulness of the doctrine of Christ, and of all the circumstances of the history of his Church, to such a degree as to be often absolutely irreconcilable with the practice of that religion.

Another characteristic, I observe, is the settled composure of the Catholic state, like that of the ancient Dorian, which seems entitled to respect when contrasted with the versatile talents of the moderns, who set no limits to their love of change, and with whom society is only a bond of convention, which the will of the people can dissolve, like a tent which the shepherd pitches for one night and which he takes down at break of day. In opposition to the modern opinion, we may believe what is written in the ethic page, that it is not men remarkable for virtue who make revolutions, for they would be few against the many.* “The great object of a wise and truly civilized state,” as Frederick Schlegel says, “is to preserve men from becoming wild, and from degenerating into a savage state. Every revolution is a passing epoch of a savage state, when man, notwithstanding single examples of heroic virtue, and wonderful self-devotion, is, in fact, reduced to the character of a savage. There is always a propensity in his nature to become wild and savage, and it is the great object of all wise governments to guard against this by all means possible.”† Again, one must admire (though French and English politicians regard it as sufficient evidence of a tyranny) its principles of self-defence, when contrasted with the revolutionary passion for attack, and conquest, and overthrow of existing constitutions. Like the Dorian, too, its power was not purchased, but native; its policy was slow and deliberate conviction against determined rashness: its essence a unity of feeling and principles, so as to make the whole body become as it were one moral agent; its object in administration to obtain good order, or κόσμος, the regular combination of different elements. Another remarkable characteristic of the middle ages was the importance attached to ancient customs, and their maintenance by a judgment and a power superior to all legislative enactments, and in defiance of all the novelties that private reasoners might advocate. Montaigne well understood the excellence of this society. “Qui mettroit mes rêveries en compte, au préjudice de la plus chétive loi de son village, ou opinion, ou coutume, il se feroit grand tort, et encoire autant à moi.” These are his words. The barbarians had respected the rights of the nations which they conquered, so that the ancient customs still prevailed in each province; and not only had these the force of law, but it was even permitted to each man to choose under what customs he would be governed, whether as a Roman or a Frank, a Burgundian or a German. “Populus interrogetur, quali vult lege vivere, et sub ea vivat.”‡

* Aristotle Polit. lib. V. c. iv.

† Philosophie der Geschichte, 1. 47.

‡ Baluz. II. an. 824.

If we pay attention to the particular tendency of each of these customs, we shall find it still indicating the superior wisdom of a Catholic state to all the enactments as well as theories of modern sophists, of which every characteristic, however liberal in denomination, is, at the bottom, something that Plato, to say nothing of Christianity, would term ἀνελεύθερον, and very often φιλοχρήματον. The Catholic state was the most natural of all others, that is, it was founded with the highest art; for to be natural is the most difficult triumph of all works of mind, since in laws as in arts, in morals as in manners, what is false, bad, and unnatural, presents itself to our mind of itself. And Bonald quotes Quintilian, saying, “id est maxime naturale quod natura fieri optime patitur.” Again, the public mind of a Catholic community had a love for past times, and a great attachment to the memory of its ancestors. Like the Doric race, though on additional grounds, and without its extravagance, the attention of that society was turned to the past, rather than to the future; and here was still further indication of a happy state: for, speaking of the living faith of a whole people as constituting its natural strength, De Haller says, “it is remarkable, that wherever a people is distinguished by a love for their ancient chronicles, wherever they desire to know the history of their country, wherever the glorious events which have founded, aggrandized, and consolidated the social bond, are generally recalled and celebrated by music or chants, one will find that there the greatest freedom prevails, and the abuses of power are least known.”* I have alluded to the unity of the Catholic state, by which it obtained the object of all legislation, according to the ancient sages. The great object with Plato would be to guard against the natural tendency of men to pursue private ends; “for without laws,” he says, “men would neither know nor be able to follow what is best; they would not know, in political science, that the general interest is to be pursued before private, for the former consolidates, but the latter dissolves states: they would not know, that it is for the advantage both of the whole society, and of each member, that the general interests should be preferred to the individual; and if they did know it, but were to find themselves independent, and not responsible, they would not be able to persevere in the opinion and practice; for the mortal nature inclines always ἐπὶ πλεονεξίαν καὶ ἰδιοπραγίαν, flying from pain and pursuing pleasure, and regarding both before justice, and involving itself in darkness, so as in the end to fill itself, and the whole state, with all manner of evil.”† What an assistance was here furnished by the Catholic principles, and how surely did they operate! The social order was compact and firm, and needed no propping with arbitrary laws: the authority of chiefs was strong, the consent of orders was inviolate, judgments were maintained; the minds of good men were ready at the nod of the Christian pastors, and always was there found a citizen who would expose himself to envy for the safety of his country. As the Athenian proposed in Plato, it was held that the state, like one man, should live virtuously;* and temperance and meekness were deemed as necessary in the state as in a man.† This was the mark at which all aimed in life, both with the regard to public and private affairs, that the state as well as each individual might cultivate justice and temperance with a view to happiness; not allowing all things to cupidity, the desire of satisfying which is an interminable evil, and reduces men and states to lead the life of robbers; for with the desire to gratify every passion, they can be friends neither to man nor to God.‡ The nation, as one suppliant, sent up prayers to heaven, that virtue might be granted to obedient youth, rest to placid age, and to the whole, collectively, wealth, and offspring, and every honor. “That as the temporal generation contributed to the ornament of the world, so by an admirable effect of the grace and providence of God, the spiritual generation might serve to the augmentation of his Church.”§ The whole character and desire of the state might have been expressed in the words which we read upon the great obelisk of the Vatican, “Christus vincit, Christus regnat, Christus imperat, Christus ab omni malo plebem suam defendat.”

* Restaurat. tom. III. 30.

† De Legibus. lib. IX.

“Of all religions,” says De Haller, “the Catholic is without question the most proper to maintain an union of hearts and minds, and to preserve the internal tranquillity of states; not only because the form of the Church is monarchical, and therefore analogous to that of kingdoms; for we shall prove hereafter that it agrees equally well with republics; but because it is founded on obedience to legitimate authority, and not on independence of all authority; on respect, and not on contempt for fathers and mothers; on the denial, and not on the idolizing, of self; on the reciprocal sacrifice of one for another, which is the bond of all society, and not on egotism, which is its solvent and destruction; on the bond of an immense community, united by the same faith and the same law, and not on a principle of hatred, of isolation, and of dispersion; in fine, because in its dogmas, in its worship, it teaches, nourishes, and vivifies without ceasing, respect for the maxims and traditions of fathers and superiors; veneration for all that is ancient, universal, perpetual; and repugnance against all separations, and all fundamental innovations.”||

But all rested on the maintenance of piety, in order that, according to the converse of Cicero’s celebrated sentence, piety prevailing, faith and the society of the human race, and justice, the most excellent of all things, might be established. Hence, then, arose the necessity for preserving the public mind from being corrupted by the perverse and immoral wills of a few. Though the moderns have chosen to discard these precautions, the wisdom of the ancient measures remains justified. The private error makes first the public error, and then, in its turn, the public errors makes the private error. This is what Montaigne said. The Athenian disputant in Plato would subject the stage to a severe censorship, and no

* De Legibus, lib. VIII.

† Id. lib. IV.

‡ Plato Gorgias.

§ Missal. Rom.

|| Tom. III. chap. 1.

peace should be performed until the censors had determined that it contained nothing contrary to the spirit of the legislature.* In what manner Socrates would have determined the question now so much discussed, relative to the justice or prudence of restraints upon literature and the arts, may be concluded with certainty from the famous passage in the Republic relative to poets, and, indeed, from the general tenor of the Platonic writings.

Plato expressly says that a legislator should inflict a great fine upon any poet or other member of the state who should sing of men living happily, being wicked.† He would not suffer any thing to be published derogatory to the noble images of piety and heroism which should exalt the imagination of youth.‡ Chateaubriand has done well in adding to the pompous inscription over the library of Thebes, in Egypt, “ψυχῆς ἰατρειὸν, deposit of the remedies and of the poisons of the soul.” In Catholic states alone we still behold this great primal object of all wise and just government faithfully maintained, that of preserving the eyes and ears of men from blasphemies against the good power in heaven, and of shielding defenceless youth from the accursed darts of reason, swayed by lust, or cunning avarice, such as in every other city are levelled at them, which way so ever they move, or turn, or bend their sight.

At Rome, where more than in any other city of the world each man feels himself personally free, any violation of public morals, by temptation, is guarded against like murder; and, indeed, owing to circumstances which we cannot delay to unfold, and which require the physician rather than the divine, more effectually prevented than manslaughter. We find St. Bernard complaining in energetic terms, as an extraordinary circumstance, of the circulation of dangerous works. In allusion to those of Abailard he says, “violent leaves are scattered on highways; books fly; in cities and in castles darkness is received for light; and poison is administered instead of honey. They pass from nation to nation, and from kingdoms to another people.”§ So great an evil was this considered, that bishops even refrained from publishing in their dioceses pontifical constitutions which condemned errors that were there unknown, fearing lest it might introduce the knowledge of them; therefore the fathers of a council in 1528 decreed that in public assemblies the doctrines of the heretics should be only reproved in general terms in all places where they were unknown. Under Philip I. the license of the French songsters proceeded to such a length, that Yves, Bishop of Chartres, thought himself obliged to procure the interposition of the Holy See.||

Philip Augustus, on coming to the crown, made severe regulations against licentious poets, banishing from court all those who employed their abilities to corrupt men. For this end, no doubt, it was necessary that power and an efficient force should belong to the government of the state. But let it be remembered while the administration was strong to repress the obstacles to the sanctification of souls, it did not sully the source of all intellectual and moral good, by attempting under the name of liberty to destroy the freedom of the Church, which is its immediate fountain. Plato proposed a hard question, "How can a state or city make use of philosophy so as not to corrupt and destroy it?" And instead of giving a satisfactory reply, he only suggests, that all great things are subject to ruin, and that every excellence involves a difficulty.* But if it were asked how did the state, in ages of faith, avail itself of the celestial wisdom without injuring it, the reply might be instantly made, by leaving the Church, which imparted it, free, only ensuring its protection or co-operating with its laws.

* De Legibus, VIII. † De Legibus, lib. II. ‡ Id. lib. III. § Epist. 189. || Epist. 68.

This would be the place to speak of the creative spirit which belonged to the ancient Catholic society; but as nearly the whole of the present and following books will be a development of this truth, I shall only observe here, what a singular contrast the history of later ages presents in this respect. Destruction follows the sophists in all their plans of constitution. Without authority and meekness corresponding, men are unable to found any thing: thus in France when every institution was falling to the ground, thrones, altars, monasteries, hospitals, and laws, they always professed the desire to reconstruct, to save, and to direct, as De Haller witnesses in the very words, Constituent, Committee of Public Safety, and Directory. The later history of the northern nations bear the same testimony, during periods of long tranquillity, and of an immense accumulation of wealth in noble families, which would have favored the spirit of institution, if it had existed. Such, then, are a few of the general reflections that may be suggested by a review of the government and society of a Catholic state, in ages of faith: others, indeed, sufficiently obvious, relative to the disorders which the passions of men introduced into it, have already, no doubt, presented themselves, to our minds; and perhaps readers of the modern school are ready to cry out with open mouths, as if they had overshot Robin Hood, that these were times of violence and desolation, and not such as are here represented; but granting that such disorders were found to exist; granting, I say, what they will have granted, the truth of what we have now seen continues no less certain; it is incontrovertible; and though such an exercise must be most painful to persons of their intellectual habits, so little prepared for encountering any trouble or difficulty in the way of a ready conclusion, the grand criterion of having profited under their masters, the task which devolves upon them, is to reconcile this view of history, which is so new to them, with the disorders and horrors which have been so long familiar to them; but with which they by no means had the exclusive privilege of being acquainted, as perhaps, in a future place it will be necessary to demonstrate. As for those real lovers of truth, and real scholars, willing, but unable, to rise from the study of history with such agreeable impressions, from their familiarity with a multitude of facts which seem to contradict them, there is a reflection which I would humbly suggest, from which one would infer that they ought rather to fear the consequence of their own timidity, which may be quite as injurious to truth as a groundless confidence. It is for the sake of truth that they should dismiss their fears, and unhesitatingly follow those who find in the history of ages of faith an idea full of grandeur and peaceful delight. For, in fact, how stand they with regard to truth? They read the learned antiquarian works of the great Benedictine and ecclesiastical writers of the last century, devoted to particular investigations, which rendered it necessary to comprise within a few pages the crimes and follies of many generations of men. Thus they become insensible to the general tone of sanctity which belonged to society in these ages. No doubt the researches of a Mabillon, a Chardon, a Fleury, and others in that track, have their importance; but they do not supersede the use of simpler and less valuable works, which only give a general and comprehensive review of the periods which these acute and profound men have analyzed, with a view to some particular object of curiosity: without this, the result, in the reader's mind, is a distorted and unjust conclusion, a right estimate, perhaps, of particular questions, but unquestionably an erroneous judgment of the general character of society. At the present, I proceed to notice the opinion of those who, in Gallic phrase, set forth the progress which has been made in civilization; and the observations I have to make will conduct us to our wonted stage of rest.

* De Repub. lib. VI.

"The ancients did not resemble us in this respect," says a sophist to Socrates, "because they were unable and not sufficiently wise, for the art of wisdom with us has made a great progress since their time." "So that," says Socrates, pretending to finish the sentence, "if Bias were alive again, he would be subject to your ridicule, in the same manner as Dædalus would now be laughed at, as the makers of statues affirm, if he were to fabricate any of those objects which bear his name?" "It is so," replies the sophist. "Indeed I am persuaded that you speak truly," continues Socrates, "for I have this evidence; I know that Gorgias and Prodicus have grown immensely rich in consequence of their application to public affairs; but as for these ancients, no one ever thought them worthy of receiving money as a recompense for their skill. They were so simple and foolish, that they seem not to have known the value of money, whereas each of these modern 'talented' men (our ancient language had no term adequate to express such proficient) make more by his wisdom than any mechanic by his trade." "And yet, O Socrates," cries the sophist, not perceiving the higher thoughts of genius, "you really know nothing of this glory of ours; for if you were to hear what sums of money I have made, you would be astonished. To omit other things, when I was in Sicily, though Protagoras was there in the height of reputation, yet in a very short time I made more than 150 minæ, and from one little place, Inichus, I had more than twenty minæ, and so I came home bearing such gifts with me, that the other citizens were lost in astonishment; and I think that I must have made more money than any other two of the sophists that you could name." "Καλόν γε καὶ μέγα τεκ- μήριον σοφίας τῶν νῦν ἀνθρώπων πρὸς τοὺς ἀρχαίους, ὅσον διαφέρουσι," replies Socrates. "Truly the ancients were strangely ignorant, for many of them experienced a fortune the very reverse of yours; and they despised, and neglected, and lost all these things, so foolish was their wisdom: λέγουσι δὲ καὶ περὶ ἄλλων τῶν παλαιῶν ἕτερα τοιαῦτα. You have given, by what you now advance, an abundant proof of the superiority of the moderns; for, as the saying is, the wise man must especially be wise for himself, and this is the criterion of all, whoever is able to make most money."* How can we, other little men, presume to refute arguments which Socrates thought unanswerable? One may only pity the ancient writers for not being aware of the moral perfectibility to which human society is always necessarily advancing. Thus Thucydides, describing the horrors and atrocities which attended the sedition of Corcyra, is so incorrect in language, as to add respecting the circumstances, "such things occurred, and always will occur, as long as the nature of men continues the same, ἕως ἂν ἡ αὐτὴ φύσις ἀνθρώπων ᾖ."† So far behind now appears to us his famed sagacity!

The theory of the perfectibility of human society, as understood by the political sophists who now maintain it, is admirably convenient for those who have an antipathy to the proofs of facts, and the lessons of experience, conveyed in history; it suits delightfully those who love to indulge in vague generalities and common places void of sense, who are fond of ambiguous emphatic phrases, and the language of exaggeration. It is only unfortunate that they are not the first to suppose that antiquity is forgot, custom unknown, and as it were that "the world is now but to begin." Such vaunts have risen before to Him, "whose eye nothing new surveys." The followers of Laërtes, in attacking the king of Denmark, have forestalled them here; and in fact, in every revolution of men, there were always some to cry, "the world is now but to begin!" The only novelty presented in the present circumstances of mankind is, that such a cry should have imposed on genius; and that the Christian poet of ill-guided France should have thought that he beheld the social state, and the human race fast advancing to perfection, in an age when men seem to speed only in the way of proud indifference to intellectual good, of systematic opposition to the beneficent will of Heaven, and to the immortal destinies of their nature. It is sad, no doubt, to have to contend with the adversaries of the cross; there is no literary glory to gain in such a contest: he who attacks them will pass away with them, and be forgotten with them; but men must not seek to ennoble their cause through disdain of seeming to contend with a base enemy, and so adopt the very tone and spirit of times to which they deem themselves superior. "Est non parva prudentia, silere in tempore malo, nec humano judicio disturbari." "The idea of the endless perfectibility of men," said Frederick Schlegel, "as long as it is merely admitted to argue a possible disposition, contains, no doubt, much truth ; but only while it is accompanied with a sense of quite as great a corruptibility of men."*

* Plato Hippias major.

† Lib. III. 82.

In the ages of faith it was well understood that religion herself, in one sense, sanctions the idea of a progress. "Posterity," says Vincent of Lerins, "will rejoice in understanding what antiquity formerly venerated without understanding ; but you must teach the same things which you have learned, so that while you teach in a new manner, you may not teach new things ; but perchance some one will say, will then the Church of Christ make no progress in Religion ? Clearly it will, and a great one : for who is there so envious to men, and so adverse to God, as to endeavor to prohibit that ? But only it will be a real progress, and not a change of faith. The intelligence, science, and wisdom of each, and of all men, as of the whole Church, and of whole ages, will increase, but in their own manner only ; it will be a progress in the same doctrine and in the same sense."† With respect to the supposed progress of civil society, if we consider merely the effects of human agency, it is, in fact, only a change and oscillation of good and evil : if it advances in one direction, it recedes in another : like the ocean, the tide of human passions and of man's wickedness may lose on one side of society, but it will be found to gain on the contrary ; the sea itself will remain as wide and as deep as ever. Sins and miseries will always be found in the earthly city, and abuses and imperfections must attend its government. In ages of faith there were not wanting subjects who knew that in whatever manner they were governed, by a few, or by many, or by one, it would be always a government liable to inconvenience. It was not for them, as said the meek Hildegard, who so holily admonished kings to throw off the discipline of the fear of God, and impelled by madness to ascend to the tops of the mountains, and to accuse rulers ; while their temerity was not to accuse their own wicked deeds. "In fact," concludes Savedra, "freedom consists not in the search of this or that form of government, but in the preservation of that which long custom has established, experience sanctioned, in which justice is observed and public order maintained."‡ The real evils which should make men hope for a progress in society, the spiritual tyranny of rulers, would be impossible to any practical and permanent extent, if subjects retained the fervor and the virtue of the ages of faith ; but fallen as they are in this respect, we may deplore the evils in the government of states, but it is not to them first, that any wise politician would think of administering a remedy. In the meanwhile, if the question of Glauco's § were to be addressed to us, "which of the states now existing do you regard as in accordance with the love of wisdom, and favorable to that love ?" we might sorrowfully reply, in the words of Socrates, "absolutely there is not one ;" nay, I will add this accusation, and affirm that independent of what has been preserved from the ages of faith, and what must be ascribed to them,

* Philosophie der Geschichte, I. 233.

† Christ, Prince, II. 355.

‡ Vincent Lirinensis, 27, 28.

§ Plato, De Repub. VI.

there is not one state now existing, if we except that whose emblem are the keys, and perhaps some few small principalities, like that which boasts of its red lily, or families united in federative bond, encircled with the snow-clad Alps, worthy of the philosophic nature.

Therefore philosophy, and that is now nothing else but the Catholic religion, is tormented, and being, as far as its earthly contingencies extend, perverted from its nature, as a foreign seed sown in an unsuitable soil, it degenerates and assumes a character partaking of the qualities of that new soil; and though, being divine and imperishable, there is no power sufficient entirely to extirpate it or totally to change its genuine qualities, still there is furnished occasion for its enemies to fancy themselves strong, who, armed with the force of the civil government, labor to paralyze the exertions of the Catholic Church, and then hope to convict it of inefficiency. Thus in one region they deprive youth of the means of a religious education, and will suffer no other schools to be maintained but such as would suit Turks or pagans; hence we are shown officers in military command and natural philosophers of fifteen, and atheists of twenty; in another, they violently or treacherously seize the property which was destined to support missions, and to erect sanctuaries, and throw all the weight of their influence on the side opposed to the true philosophy, while they employ immense riches in endeavoring to undermine it: they succeed at length in producing an indifference to all distinctions between truth and error, faith and infidelity; the laws of the religious society are lowered and assimilated to their own; hence men of supernatural motives are diminished; and the uniformity of the sophists, a very different thing from the union of Catholics, is established.

No one class of subjects is left as generally known to be essentially different in principle from another: you show men avaricious! So are all; you show them proud, luxurious, ambitious, degraded in philosophy, perverted in politics, vitiated in taste, materialized in understanding! So are all: as far, at least, as depends upon the effects of the general influence. In another, again, they take away the churches, they take away the monasteries, they endeavor to take away days of religious rest, for adoring God, instructing men, and filling society with joy, they deprive Catholics of the means of assembling to worship God in the beauty of holiness, leaving an immense population without the means of approaching the divine altars, or of being regularly and constantly instructed in their duty; they make laws to prevent the foundation of institutions which would support, direct, and sanctify them; they expose them defenceless and calumniated to the mercy of an armed and insane fanaticism, which their riches nourish and their honors flatter; hence follow successive generations of men, sensuous, and ignorant, unaccustomed to to order, insensible to all the harmonies of a social state; knowing the law only as an enemy, and government as a detested image subservient to the very principle of evil; reckless of life and of all that wait on honorable reputation, cruel, revengeful, desperate, sanguinary; all this is then exultingly produced by the adversaries of the holy wisdom as ground that justifies their rejecting it; they challenge inquiry, not into abstract truth, not into the testimony of the universal reason, of the great traditions of the Church, or of the race of men, but into the consequences of their own artful policy and injustice; and who can think of denying them the merit of success, or of attempting to depreciate its importance? They appeal to the consequences, not of those measures, and institutions which the Church would pursue in order to render men virtuous and happy, and without which she pronounces it impossible to form or preserve a state of society worthy of Christians, for they have declared by their legislation that she must abandon these, and they have forcibly taken them from her; but of the limited exertions which they, concluding against her judgment, have prescribed to her, and which she has long since judged from her profound estimate of human nature, and from her long experience of the conduct of men, to be wholly insufficient. What Catholic then can be anxious to demonstrate against the overwhelming facts which they adduce, that her fears were groundless, and that her estimate of human nature was mistaken? But if philosophy, if the Catholic religion should meet with the best constituted state, or rather if it should not be bent and paralyzed by a state professing contrary principles, then, indeed, being also itself the best of things, it will be seen by all men to be in reality, not only in the little world of separate souls, but in the great and general society of nations, divine; while every thing else, whether of nature or of custom, or of profession, is human, insecure, momentary, worthless, full of some moral deformity, opposed to innocence and mercy, to truth and justice, to the sweet enjoyment of private happiness, and to the beautiful reign of universal order. The worldly policy has prevailed over the divine, even among the kingdoms that acknowledge Christ. The institutions founded upon faith in the spirit of earlier times either have already been overthrown, or are paralyzed and rendered fruitless by the civil legislation; the new system may bring with it, as the historian of the Doric race says, by the mockery of fate, though it would be more correct to say, by the secret design of highest God who doth guide that fate, external fame and victory; but still will the humble and really philosophic mind recur with satisfaction to the intellectual union and spiritual harmony which existed in the ancient Catholic state, even while its external and material frame may have been shaken with the tempest of human passions, and its sweet peace, vexed by man's injustice, still will honor, and freedom, and moral dignity, and angelic meekness, claim it as the scene of their long and sweet abode, while they had a mission to descend and dwell with men.

CHAPTER VI.

WE have not completely escaped from the perils of the discourse on the social system of the middle ages, until we shall have more fully explained in what manner the institution and privileges of the noble classes in days of feudal law were consistent, or at least compatible, with the spirit of meekness. It seemed, indeed, a difficult thing to unite political power with humility; and to show that mild courtesy of manner might distinguish the simple unlettered people in the rank of lower subjects, appeared a task of no less difficulty, and now when we are required to reconcile the institutions of feudality and the lives of powerful nobles with the full and free development of that meekness which was to qualify men for beatitude, one may imagine, that we are about to be overwhelmed and to succumb. I might say in the Platonic style, that "having but just escaped from two mighty waves, you now by this question make to rush upon me the greatest and most difficult of the Trichymia,"* that is, you ask whether I can demonstrate that such an union was possible, and that it did exist. It will be found as we advance, that I am not ignorant of the particular evils which disturbed this ancient society, nor of the violence and oppression which not unfrequently distinguished the lives of some great men of the earth, whose old blood and forefathers' gallant deeds made them haughty in those very ages when the number of the meek was most considerable. I am not standing forth as the champion of any political system, nor does the renown of nobility, whether it be exalted or diminished, affect in my mind any of those bright and primal images which we would invite to accompany us as a protection, through all the mortal changes, sanctifying our joy, and following us from the banquet of youth to save our hearts from desolation when left to the thoughts of night and solitude. It is no pleasure to be detained within these palaces of the great, when we had hoped to hasten to the lawns and groves, and to converse with the meek and joyous people that live amidst them, dwelling with nature and with poverty; but the object of this argument requires that I should remove the objection founded on the assumed incompatibility of the feudal life with meekness: and even a sense of what all men owe to truth would induce one to show that the general sentence passed by modern writers upon the institutions and manners of nobility in the middle ages is essentially unjust and unsanctioned

* De Repub. V.

by the evidence of history. The Roman emperors employed generally natives, Gentiles, to guard the frontiers of their respective countries from barbarians, giving them a station or castle, which is the origin of fiefs, and perhaps of the word gentleman. The title of baron is a Celtic or Greek word which signifies grave, strong, or heavy, to denote the qualities required for a public man. The French juriconsults derive the feudal system, feodum, from fides, which seems preferable to the modern German derivation, which has recourse to an unknown word nowhere to be found, and the English term fee, an association of ideas hardly admissible. Feodality and fidelity were closely connected. Condorcet acknowledges that it was an institution which appeared among all nations, and that its principle was only the noble relations of authority and obedience, protection and attachment, and reciprocal fidelity. If the vassal swore fidelity, the seigneur was bound to justice, and this produced "a mutual confidence," which as the old capitulary says, "ensured the common safety."* Even Mably, so fond of isolation, and so ignorant of the origin of society, admits that the feudal system was favorable to the multiplication of families, and to the protection of a country. The conditions between vassal and sovereign were pretty near equal, for if the one lost his fief if he did not come to aid his seigneur, the other lost his sovereignty if he did not protect his vassal. The vassal, indeed, could not marry without leave from his sovereign; but this had only a political object. Thus St. Louis would not allow the Count of Champagne to marry the Princess of Bretagne, but on the other hand, when his niece Isabella was to be married to the king of Navarre, he first consulted his barons, and would not conclude it, however advantageous, till he had their consent. The ancient axiom of feudal right was this: "Le sire ne doit pas moins au vassal que le vassal au sire." Sieyes, in the year 1789, speaking of the system of feudal and ecclesiastical property, says, "I can never be made to believe that this manner of securing the two great public services of society was more burdensome to the people than the imposts with which it is now charged." The ban and the arrière-ban is assuredly a gentler sound than the conscription. De Haller remarks that what seems shocking in the ancient language of selling a barony with the soil and the people, Lente, results merely from a too great concision: for the term Lente in the German tongue signifies those who live with another in a relation of habitual dependence, and who owe him services, and here it implies the mutual bond which was thus transferred, securing the interests of the people as well as of the new possessor.† But men are indignant at the privileges which nobility enjoyed, and at the pride and selfishness of those nobles who monopolized all the advantages of society exclusively to themselves. Truly this is much if there be much truth in it: but are these reasoners aware that society in the middle ages comprised three classes, the noble, the free man or the ingenious, and the servant; that the intermediate condition comprised an immense class of subjects who had possessions, and privileges, and a power in the administration, and that it was the majority of their voices which decided the election of the magistrates of justice and of the police of each country? We must not judge of the ancient magnificence of a city solely from the ruins which the chance of war, or time, may have capriciously spared, for the monuments remaining may not have formerly stood isolated and alone. The nobility possessed privileges, but what class of subjects had not also theirs? The fact is, that power, being then under the general influence of the spirit of love and generosity, it became a characteristic of the times to multiply and extend on every occasion testimonies of affection and solicitude, the justice of which principle even as a temporal policy may admit of some defence on the ground of the permanence and solidity which this multiplication of privileges gave to the social order and consequently to freedom. We hear only of the privileges of the nobility and clergy, but we should remember that these were ages of privilege, when almost every man might possess for himself some one or other. First observe the privileges which towns enjoyed. At Bourges and at Tours, and other places, the office of the municipalities conferred nobility.

* Cap. Car. Calv. tit. 53. c. 4.

† Restaurat. tom. III. c. xlii.

There were cities and towns in which the citizen and townsman had the privilege of being addressed with Sire, they were others in which they had a right to carry swords, others in which they might wear gold spurs, others where, as in the great forest which belonged to the state of Sparta, every one had a right to hunt venison, others which had the power of conferring nobility.* The citizens of Loches had the privileges of knighthood, and in the Bourbonnais, the Duc de Bourbon used always to treat the Bourgeois as if they were knights. At Rochelle, the king had to take an oath on his knees before the corporation. Marseille, in favor of its merchants,† and in reward for its services, had the privilege from Baldwin II. of making enclosures in Jerusalem, and of having a quarter exclusively its own, and of being exempt from all toll within that kingdom. The students of the University of Paris had the same privileges as the clergy and nobility. Even to our time at Munich, a student of the university is an important person, who has his privileges: he is inviolable and cannot be arrested without authority from the rector: he can enter places of public amusements for a third part of the usual price. Boys on their journey had privileges confirmed by the ancient capitularies.—Where were there not privileges? Horses that had four white legs enjoyed the privilege of paying no toll.‡ It would fatigue Homer to enumerate all that existed. Artisans had the privilege that their instruments could not be seized.§ In certain trades members were exempt from serving in the watch.|| In others they paid no tax on the goods of fabrication, in others, as in that of glaziers, and silk weavers, and workers in the mint, they were free from all taxes like the nobles.* In France, all states without exception enjoyed some exemption and some privilege.† Monteil, who seems to have studied every character of the middle ages but that of the noble, is careful to remind his readers that nobles on passing a river were exempt from paying the toll, but the injury done to others by such an exemption was certainly not great, and who now thinks it absurd that members of the parliament should be exempt from the postage of letters?

* Monteil, Hist. des Français, tom. III. 186. † Deguignes Mem. de l'Acad. XXXVII.

‡ Mémoires Hist. sur Troyes par Grosley—Monumens anciens et du moyen age. Pancarte du Péage du Comte de Lesmont.

§ Lettres du Roi 1331 relatives aux privilèges de Salmeranges. || Lettres du Roi, 1407. 1461.

Again the merchants of some towns, such as Tarbes and St. Jean d'Angeli, had the privilege of exemption from all toll of entry or customhouse duty. Some towns were entitled to demand offerings from every merchant whose goods were carried through them: Libourne had this privilege; in other towns, the citizens had the privilege of being exempt from the burden of lodging soldiers. This was the case at Bordeaux. In France, painters were free and noble, and exempt from all tax and subsidy.‡ Again, the Francarchers, who were the finest men of the population of villages, were no less exempt from imposts than the nobility. Poor men had their names inscribed along with those of the nobles as being exempt from levies. Monteil quotes from a parchment in his possession, which enumerates among those who do not pay in that parish, nobles, Pierres le Vaillant Escuyer,—Poures, Jehan Hoguet, and others.§ The farmers of certain abbey lands were exempt from taxes, as in the case of the abbey of St. Mexent. The descendants of brave men, who had died of hunger rather than surrender their fortress to the enemy, were exempt from imposts, as was the case with the free citizens of the tower and castle of Evreux. The inhabitants of Montreuil-sur-le-Bois were exempted by King John from paying taxes or from giving supplies, on condition that they would maintain the fountains of their village at their own expense, a privilege confirmed to them by Charles V. and Charles VI.|| On the other hand, the privileges of the nobility were often merely honorary tributes or affectionate symbols, and never excluded a recognition of the real foundation of spiritual equality which the Christian religion had introduced among mankind; there was no absurd attempt to disguise it, but on the contrary there was almost an affectation of proclaiming it; so far were princes then from reserving to themselves, and to such nobles as they chose to honor, the right of burial in the Campo Santo, the holy field of the dead, which had been formed in the ages of faith, and blessed for all. The members of civil order used to eat with the king, and were called "conviva regis," because the hospitality of the table had been always a sacred symbol of communion, and this was a privilege far more sensible than that now in use of mounting in the king's carriage, or of entering the court by a private gate, an instance which may remind us of what was before remarked, relative to the consistency and sense of the forms and the customs in ages of faith, and in our

* Lettres du Roi en 1470. relatives aux monnoyeurs, aux verriers, aux ouvriers en soie.

† Monteil, Hist. des Français, III. 318.

‡ Monteil cites Lettres du Roi, 3d. Jan. 1430.

§ Hist. des Français, tom. IV.

|| Lebeuf, Hist. de Diocèse de Paris, tom. V. 69.

own. If we look to the privileges which the kings of Spain conferred on the nobility, they are chiefly of the same class. The king Don John II., to recompense the counts of Ribadeo, permitted them to eat at his table every year on the festival of the Epiphany, and the habit which the king wore that day was always to be given to them. The king Don Fernando the Catholic conferred the same honor upon the marquisses of Cadiz, granting them the habit worn by the king on the festival of our Lady of September, and he also decreed that the marquis of Moya should have the cup out of which the king drank on the festival of St. Lucy, and that the counts of La Rogne, of the house of Vera, and their descendants for ever, should have the privilege of granting exemptions every year to thirty persons from paying all tributes or impost.* That generally regard was paid to justice in granting privileges might be inferred from that action of Charles V., who having one day signed a privilege which was afterwards proved to him to be against justice, tore it in pieces with his own hands, saying, "he would rather tear his writing than his soul."† If there were privileges which cannot be justified, it should still be remembered that they had come down from ages of great antiquity, when they were regarded as a compensation for services rendered and losses incurred in the interests of the general society, and that in later times they may have been often possessed by men truly humble and disinterested, and not conscious of retaining any unjust distinction. With respect now to the principle itself of hereditary nobility, which gives such offence to many modern writers, it is only necessary to remark here, that this was no invention of the middle ages, and by no means incompatible with the spirit of meekness which belonged to them. Wholly unconcerned with the general defence of any political institution, candor would oblige us to admit that the French opinions on this subject indicate but little wisdom, and even an inattention to the most ordinary facts of human society.

The principle of nobility is coeval with the development of the social state, and it is even recognized by the authority of the unerring text. When God threatened to punish the idolatry of Solomon, he added "verumtamen in diebus tuis non faciam propter David patrem tuum."‡ The institution is also recognized, and in terms that lend so little sanction to the modern notions, that when God threatens a people with the greatest evil it is said in prophetic description, that "man shall rise against man, neighbor against neighbor, the child against the old man, the people against the noble."§ It is founded in the deepest sentiments of our nature. "The people honor persons of great birth," says Pascal, "the half-wise despise them, saying, that birth is not a personal advantage, but a thing of chance, the really wise honor them, not with the thoughts of the people but with higher thoughts. Certain zealots who have not much knowledge despise them, notwithstanding the considerations which make them honored by the wise, because they judge of them by a new light which piety gives them : but perfect Christians honor

* Savedra, II. 101.

† Ib. II. 202.

‡ Reg III. 11.

§ Isai. cap. iii. 5.

them by another superior light. Thus move opinions succeeding one another, for or against, according as light is given.”* The Catholic society of the middle ages was essentially disposed to respect nobility. In the first place, because it paid more attention to the past than to the present time, in which it was greatly opposed to the modern nations, who, like the Ionians of old, interest themselves more in the passing events of the day. This Catholic society listened to the songs of Charlemagne and Roland with such attention as to give rise to a new term in language, although the ancient rhapsodists were not to be surpassed, if we credit Maximus of Tyre: for many ages after Charlemagne his praises used to be sung in public places, and streets, and at all fairs, till at length the inventions of these bards passed into the reproachful term of Charletan; it loved to hear minstrels sing of Arthur and early nobles of its history; it regarded these recollections as its most precious treasure, and cherished them with a kind of poetic madness: Alanus de Insulis, a writer of the twelfth century, says, that if any one were heard in Bretagne to deny that Arthur was yet alive he would be stoned; it listened to these narrations with as much fondness as the Spartans used to attend to Hippias of Elis speaking of the families of heroes, and men, the foundations of the ancient cities, and in general of what related to the olden time.

In the second place, it respected nobility in consequence of the example and instruction of its religious guides. The clergy of the first ages were men of singular refinement, practised in manners which had come down in the higher ranks from the old civilization; and often personally distinguished by a great nobleness of nature, which under the influence of Christianity gave birth to every conceivable tone and degree of intellectual and moral delicacy and perfection. This is even one reason why parts of the ceremonial of the Church seem so strange to the vulgar eyes and ears of the half-bred sophists in our societies: but it is in its relation with human and natural subjects that this characteristic of the holy fathers falls under our observation at present. “With him is extinct an ancient and illustrious race!” cries St. Basil in his letter to the wife of Nectaire. The saints you perceive, reader, did not disdain these considerations which seem so contemptible to the men of our age. Even the austere St. Jerome dwells upon them. Thus in the beginning of his eulogium on the venerable Paula, he says, “she was illustrious by the nobility of her origin, but the holiness of her life rendered her more illustrious. Descendant of the Gracchi and the Scipios, sprung from that famous Paulus-Emilius whose name she bore, worthy heir of that Martia Papyria, who was the mother of Scipio Africanus, she had the generosity to prefer the modest retreat of Bethlehem to proud Rome, and to quit golden palaces for a humble and wretched cell.”† Even in proclaiming the utter vanity of all worldly honor, he shows how nobility may be converted into a source of merit. Paula was married to Toxotius, whose birth, he says, was no less illustrious, he being descended from Æneas, and from the Julian family, whence his daughter Eustochium received the name of Julia. "But if I speak here," continues Jerome, "of this worldly nobility, it is not because this was precious in the eyes of her who possessed it, but on the contrary, because the contempt with which she had the courage to treat it cannot be too much admired.

* Pensées, I. 8.† Epist. ad Eustoch.

"Men of the world are filled with veneration for those who have the useless advantage of being sprung from a celebrated and ancient family. As for us, we only praise those who know how to rise superior to it, when the chance of birth has conferred this vain honor. Those who enjoy it are but little in our eyes; but those who despise it become worthy of all our praise." St. Eucher writes in the same style to Valerien: "although the high birth of your father and father-in-law have raised you to the highest dignities, yet I desire for you an exaltation a thousand times more glorious than this of your family; for I desire for you not the glory and greatness of the world, which are vain and perishable, but the glory and greatness of heaven, which are immutable and eternal. Therefore it is not with the false wisdom of this world that I am about to entertain you; but on the contrary, with that profound wisdom, secret and unknown to the world, which God has resolved from all eternity, as the apostle says, to reveal to his elect, in order to conduct them to glory." St. Ambrose, again, writing to Demetriades, a holy virgin, says, that though she has many equals in purity, there are few to be compared to her in the magnificent honors of house, and the splendor of a most ancient family.* The recognition of a nobility of blood in France under the kings of the first race is proved by reference to the lives of the saints of the sixth and seventh centuries; for the holy men who composed them speak invariably of the noble extraction of such as were of the higher classes.† And after all, however liable to abuse may be the possession of nobility, it is beneath the dignity of no moralist to recognize the utility of its principle as an assistant that may be given to virtue. There must be some foundation of truth in a respect so universal as is paid to all who resemble Camertus,

Cui genus à proavis, ingens, clarumque paternæ
Nomen erat virtutis.‡

Though Euripides may be thought to go too far in saying, that every thing seems fair and beautiful in their actions; yet, his history justifies a moderate presumption in their favor. It is possible that they may feel an additional force for a life of virtue, like Diagorus, whom Pindar describes as "walking constantly in the way opposed to violence, from knowing well what the just minds of noble ancestors have inspired in him."§ St. Odo, Abbot of Cluni, in the eleventh century, states in the life which he has written of Count Gerald, that modesty and religion has been transmitted as an hereditary treasure in that noble family, which was a

* Epist. lib. X. 84.

‡ Æn. XIII. 225.

† Mem. de l'Acad. des Inscript. XXXVII. 547.

§ Olymp. VII. 87.

race of men in successive generations seeking God.* Even our days can furnish examples. It is the privilege of the family of the dukes of Altamira to proclaim the new king of Spain. On the renunciation of Charles IV., the duke proclaimed Ferdinand VII. the rightful heir, and not Joseph Buonaparte; for which he had to fly the kingdom, and his son, the count of Transtamara, to suffer a long imprisonment in the fortress of Fenestrelle. Honor and loyalty were hereditary in that family, in the same manner as the Spaniards said that the Guzmans were always good, and the Mendozas affable. No one need be told of the respect with which the ancients regarded nobility of birth. Dionysius says, that in his time there were remaining at Rome about fifty families descended from the most generous of the Trojan fugitives, who became the companions of Romulus, when he first built the city.† This at least shows that antiquity of family was prized. Tacitus reckons among the dreadful evils of the most calamitous times of Rome, that “nobility and honors were considered as a crime;”‡ and he furnishes a favorable testimony of nobility, in stating that when Regulus survived the cruelties of Nero, he owed his safety only to the circumstance that his nobility was not ancient, nor his wealth considerable.§ It was not till after the reign of Louis VII. that the famous institution or the twelve peers arose in France: six of whom were laymen, the dukes of Normandy, Guyenne, Burgundy, the counts of Champagne, Toulouse, and Flanders, and six ecclesiastics, furnished by the Churches of Laon, Langres, Noyon, Chalons, and Beauvais. At the coronation of the kings of France the peers assisted, wearing crowns, and holding their naked swords, as may be seen represented in sculpture on the tomb of St. Remi, at Rheims. Such are a few of the observations that may be suggested with respect to the privileges of the feudal nobility, and the principle upon which that rank depended. There are yet other circumstances to remark in proof that it furnished no insuperable obstacle to the exercise of meekness, and to the general happiness of Society. We have before seen how this question must be determined with regard to the condition of the poor. “Vera nobilitas numquam superbit,” says a monk of those days.|| Gernando, the king of Norway’s son, the proudest knight who joined the crusade,

——— who only vainly thought
That bliss in wealth and kingly power doth lie,
And in respect esteem’d all virtue nought,
Unless it were adorn’d with titles high, is particularly designated by Tasso as a barbarian, ignorant of the manners of Christian nobility.¶ It should be remembered, that the sort of selfish and disdainful men, who could now cover Europe, belonging to the middle and upper ranks of life, rich, or at least living like the rich, excepting that they may have no gate at

* Bibliotheca Cluniacens. 68.

† Antiquit. Rom. lib. 1. c. 85.

‡ Hist. lib. 1. 2.

§ Annul. XIV.

|| Petri. abb. Cellens. Epist. IX. 7.

¶ Book V.

which a Lazarus may place himself, full of contempt for the poor, and proud of their own superior knowledge, which consists in an acquaintance with a multitude of little minute despicable circumstances, connected in some way or other with luxury, are a race wholly unlike the feudal nobility : these men have not any interests in common with the poor, of which fact they seem thoroughly convinced in conscience ; whereas it was always the interests of the seigniors to promote the welfare of their vassals, and to prevent them from being oppressed and overcharged.* It must be inferred from a letter of Peter the venerable to St. Bernard,† that the peasants in Burgundy were then better fed, and consequently able to undergo greater fatigue, than the monks of Cluni, who were Benedictines, and under a most indulgent abbot, and many of whom had been great noblemen and princes. Sir John Fortescue, writing in the reign of Henry VI., bears testimony to the happy condition of the people of England at that time. “The men of this land are rich, having abundance of gold and silver, and other things necessary for the maintenance of man’s life ; they drink no water, unless it be so that some for devotion, and upon a zeal for penance, do abstain from other drink : they eat plentifully of all kinds of flesh and fish ; they wear fine woollen cloth in all their apparel ; they have great store of all husselments and implements of household ; they are plentifully furnished with all implements of husbandry ; and all other things that are requisite to the accomplishment of a quiet and wealthy life, according to their estates and degrees :” and though some would argue that this was owing to certain peculiar principles of civil freedom established in England, there is evidence to prove that in all countries of Christendom the same fruits were borne and brought forth in presence of the institution of nobility under the Catholic governments, which were every where else, also, “politic and regal conjoined,” and which, let it be remembered, excluded men of no rank from their counsels, since through the magistracy and the priesthood, persons of the lowest birth were frequently invested with great influence, and virtually with a share in the administration. John Marot, in his descriptive poem of the Voyage to Venice, represents the joy and peace which all classes of men in France, down to common laborers, enjoyed in the time of Louis XII. ; he says, “you saw the peasants in their houses, Sans crainte ou peur, plus fiers que gentilzhommes.”

It was the pride of nobility to be the protector of the poor. Baldwin, count of Flanders, son of count Robert, was celebrated for his strict execution of justice upon all men of arms who dared to molest or plunder the rustic people. He inspired such terror among them, that no one would dare even to pick up a treasure on the way. However, one day a poor woman accosted him before the church of St. Peter, at Ghent, as he was hastening to vespers, to tell him that her cow had been stolen. The count begged that she would allow him time to hear ves-

* Lebeuf, Hist. du Diocèse de Paris, tom. XII. 23.

† Bibliothec Cluniacensis, 681

pers ; but as she continued to speak, he threw off his mantle and gave it to her, saying, "by this sign you may know that I shall return to you after vespers ; which he did, and satisfied the poor woman."* Histories which relate such humble matter as this cannot be justly said to have overlooked altogether the interest of the poor. In the chant royal on the death of Duguesclin, it is not merely knights, and barons, and citizens, who were called upon to mourn, but it is said also.

Perdu ont ung vrai champion
Li pouvre pastourel des champs.

Is there no other assignable motive but pride for that resolution of nobility, never to make war upon the poor ?

In a memorable combat, when revolted peasants presented themselves with enormous sticks and scythes, brilliant squadrons of knights of Hainaut, cased in iron, suffered themselves to be beaten down, rather than draw their swords upon peasants who had no regular arms. Moreover, whatever may be said by the admirers of the Jacquerie, it does not follow of logical necessity, that in every revolt of the peasants the fault was on the side of the nobility. Though the modern historians of France, beginning with him who pretends to describe the conquest of the Normans, can dwell with pleasure upon only two heroes in English History, Jack Cade and Wat Tyler, the true champion of the principles of Wicklyf, there may have been some justice in the complaint of the strange knight, whom Gyron le Courtois overhears speaking to himself by night in a forest, condemning himself for having used ungrateful words against true love, the source of his honor and joy, and comparing himself to the serf, who is of such evil blood, that if his lord were to confer upon him a hundred thousand graces, a hundred thousand honors, and then afterwards were, for once in his life, to fail in fulfilling his pleasure, all the good which he had before done to him would be forgotten, and this one little fault which he remarked, would be for ever after on his tongue.† Pindar might have used in praise of many of the baronial castles of the middle ages the very words with which he celebrates the glory of the house of Xenophon of Corinth, a house which had thrice carried off the prize of honor ; and besides this,

Οἶκον ἄμερον ἄδοις,
Ξένοι δὲ θεράποντα.‡

But as he sings elsewhere, "neither can this delight the mind of the envious."§ John Regnier, seigneur of Garchy, and counsellor of Philip the Good, left a remarkable testimony to the affection which he entertained for the poor peasants, for being a poet, and composing his will in the form of a poem, when in the expectation of death, after specifying the place where he chose to be interred,

* Chronicon S. Bertini apud Marten. Thesaur. Anecd. tom. III. cap. 39.

† Gyron le Courtois, f. xxxv.

‡ Olymp. XIII.

§ Pyth. Od. II.

Aux Jacobins eslis la terre
 En laquelle veuil estre mis
 Pour ce qu' aux Jacobins d'Auxerre Gisent plusieurs de mes amys:

and even the most minute particulars of the funeral, as that chaplets should be strewed on his coffin, which was to be covered with a white pall. and that his mass of requiem should be chanted in high note, he continues,

Item, au moustier je veuil estre
 Porté par quatre laboureurs,
 Qui de vignes seront tins maistre;
 Car de telz gens suis amoureux.*

With this affection for the peasants, these nobles were far from being courtiers when in the presence of kings. The emperor Frederick I. passing through the town of Thougue, the baron of Krenkingen, lord of the place, did not rise from his seat, but only touched his cap, "in token of courtesy." Wherever paganism had been completely extirpated, the baron would not have been treated with servility by the lowest of his own vassals. "Poverty is not a baseness," said the Spaniards, "but an inconvenience," καὶ τὸ πένεσθαι οὐχ ὁμολογεῖν τινὶ αἰσχρόν, they might have added, in the words of Pericles in praise of their own countrymen.† Meschinot accounts for the title of his book, Les Lunettes des Princes, in which he instructs men of all conditions, by observing that it is appropriate, although he offers them to persons who are not princes or great temporal lords but far removed from such an estate, pour ce que tout homme peut estre dict prince en tant qu' il a reçu de Dieu gouvernement d' ame.‡ Thus one discovers in every point the trace of the same moral dignity which the Catholic religion had diffused throughout society with an equal hand; and there are monuments still remaining in sufficient abundance to prove that by the action of the general feeling of the people, there was a strict and immediate fulfilment of the divine prophetic sentence, that "they who despise God shall be ignoble."§ It is a remarkable fact, that the sentiments respecting nobility, which were diffused through all classes of the state, during the meek ages of faith, though they did not give rise to hatred and division between different ranks, were yet far less favorable to the pride of birth or riches than those which now pervade our disdainful literature, and even our proud population. Witness the instructions of St. Odo, the second Abbot of Cluny in the eleventh century; and bear in mind who it is that speaks, that it is not a passionate orator and an obscure moralist, but a lover of peace and order, an abbot of a great monastery, and a companion of princes. "Worldly nobility," says this holy man, "is not the work of nature, but of ambition; for Eve was formed from Adam in commendation of unity; and he, though the greater, was formed without paradise, and she the inferior was made within

* Gouget, tom. IX. 336.

† Thucyd. II. 40.

‡ Gouget, tom. IX.

§ 1 Reg. II. 36.

it. And certainly," as St. Jerome saith, "we are all made equal by grace, whom the second nativity hath regenerated, by which the noble and the ignoble are made sons of God, and earthly nobility is obscured by the splendor of celestial glory. Say, are the poor generated with more uncleanness, when even David lamented that he was conceived in sin? Are the nobles regenerated with greater lustre, when God hath chosen the poor rich in faith?"

Job reflected on equality when he did not disdain to undergo judgment with his servant, though he was a king; and lord Martin thought upon it when he waited upon his own servant and cleaned his shoes. Examine all the books of the ancients, and you will find that the most powerful were always the worst men; they were fattened by means of the labor of the poor; they had precious vestments and exotic meats prepared by the hands of the poor; but they only embraced the winds and trusted in vanity. There have been in times past men powerful, and proud, and voluptuous; but what have their immoderate joys, riches, and pleasures profited them? Where are those things, or where are they themselves? Go to their sepulchres, and what do you behold there but the fetid leavings of worms? They have passed as a vision of the night. And I wish that all the pomp of mortals were only to end in ashes and worms! but we must remember the horrible tribunal of the Judge, the burning river, the worm that dieth not, the fire of hell, the weeping and gnashing of teeth, and, what I believe is still greater than all these, the exclusion from the everlasting joys which are prepared for the saints. Let the nobles then be advised to consider carefully what is man, and before what Judge he will stand; let them behold their own power, and estimate their infirmity and the evils of their especial burden; that they may be prepared for appearing before that Judge, and that they may not be confounded at the last day in sight of the whole human race, and of all the host of angels and archangels.*

Perhaps after all, it might be a question whether the noble writers and orators of later times, who refer with such confidence to the spirit and sentiments of the middle ages, in order to condemn others for forgetting the natural equality of the human nature, might not return from consulting them under the impression that they were rather called upon to answer a little for themselves. Nothing is more difficult than to form a true idea of the character of the feudal nobility, if one consult only the writers of our own time, whose views and motives are so different from those of antiquity! With one, for instance, the mainspring which governs his pen is the love of aristocratic privileges, joined with that indifference for religion which the policy of states and the spirit of society, since the sixteenth century, have been creating in the higher orders; with another it is a hatred of aristocratic privileges, joined with an ignorance and a hatred of religion; with another it is an extravagant respect for aristocratic privileges, joined with a religious but uninstructed zeal: it is only in writers who understand and respect religion that one finds aristocratic institutions spoken of with respect, but also with freedom and discernment: and yet assuredly it is not of little consequence whether a just or an unjust estimate be formed of an institution so deeply rooted in European manners, and so capable of producing great effects. The injury which must be done to society by a systematic design to cover it with contempt was not unknown to the ancients, who represented Æschylus objecting to Euripides, that by choosing to ridicule the lofty grandeur of the ancient tragic muse, and by representing kings in tatters as miserable men, not distinguished above the commonest in language or habit, presently there was found no great man in the state willing to fit out a trireme at his own expense, but wrapping himself round in a ragged cloak, every one wept and said that he was poor, though he might have under it a tunic of soft wool.* If men are really impressed with a sense of the enormity of pride, and feel a desire to contribute to its defeat, it argues ignorance in the extreme to be continually singling out examples of its operation, and denying that blessed meekness was ever beheld in the manners of the ancient nobility. As Peter the venerable Abbot of Cluni, said to Milo, "It is not a sufficient persuasion to avoid pride when examples are produced of pride, since it is rather by contrary examples of humility and of other virtues, that the disease of pride and of other evils is expelled from human breasts."† In fact, if men were only to consider the present interest of society, it would be necessary to form a just estimate of the real value of these modern objections advanced against the institutions and manners of ancient times; and the only means of arriving at a reasonable conclusion would be by the study of all classes of the contemporary writers, who would as it were, place them in the presence of greatness, and enable them to converse with the men themselves. In this manner I propose that we should now approach the noble society of antique days; not indeed with any other intention but that of removing the objections which might be founded upon it against our views of the meekness of the ages of faith. To this retrospect then, reader, advance without alarm for the result. And as we cannot hope to find men wholly blessed, perhaps with peculiar justice I may invite thee to accompany me in the words of Sordello to Dante, when they were about to visit that second region in which the human spirit is purged from sinful blot, and for ascent to heaven prepares,

* S. Odonis Collationum, lib. III. Bibliotheca Cluniacens.

——— to the valley now,
 (For it is time) let us descend: and hold
 Converse with those great shadows; haply much
 Their sight may please ye.———

And here, passing by for the present men whom we shall hereafter meet with in the schools, in the cloisters, in the hospitals of the sick, in the hostels of the poor, in the peaceful walks of poetic and devout contemplation; walks that are with

* Aristoph. Ranæ, 1064.

† Epist. lib. IV. 8. Bibliothec. Cluniacens.

nobles of time past thronged as the ways of the rugged Apennine on an autumnal evening, when the crowd of holy pilgrims hastens to Alvernia;* there will still be found many who will justify our conclusion, that in the middle ages, notwithstanding all the instances of disorder and abuse, there was nothing incompatible with meekness in the possession and privileges of nobility. Mark first that long line of princes, and even warriors, who are acknowledged by their contemporaries to have appeared as sincere disciples of our Lord; men who, as St. Odilo says of the holy Maiolus, studied to become meek with the blessed meek, that with them they might possess the land of the living. They are the counts of Anjou.† He who stands there is the representative of many: Odo is his name: one invested with much power, and yet a man of innocence; for so he is described, “At ille quoque ut erat vir innocens, licet potentissimus.”‡ Who is this that comes forward next in such pompous state attended with every appendage of feudal splendor? Can you pretend to claim him? It is Herlembald, a nobleman of Milan, who in the eleventh age from Christ enjoyed the golden light of day. Erat nobilis coram sæculo quasi Dux in vestibis pretiosis, et in equitibus et armis, sed in abscondito Deo sicut eremita, agrestibus indutus erat laneis.§ Who are these great promoters of commerce, these makers of roads and canals to benefit their country, to whom Troyes is still indebted? They are successive generations of the counts of Brie and Champagne.|| Who is this with such an authoritative air of majesty? It is John VI. duke of Bretagne. Perhaps to the proud too fierce; but as Meschenot says,

———Aux bons doux en couraige,
Prudent en faits, et benin en langage
Autant valloit qu'en scellé sa promesse:
Oneques ne fist ung deshonneste ouvrage.

“The true father of nobility,” concludes the poet, “may God grant him the inheritance of heaven.”¶ He who follows next in that train is Regnaud du Guesclin, father of the constable: he was of Brittany, in the reign of Philip de Valois, and lord of la Mote de Bron, a strong castle, well placed at six leagues from Regnes. “Le chevalier,” says the old chronicler, “fut preudons, loyal et droieturier envers dieu et le monde, renommé de grant prouesse et de hardement. Sur toutes riens aimoit l’église pour la reverence de nostre Seigneur, de qui tous biens viennent; confortoit les povres et leur faisoit aulmosnes: sa femme moult de sainte vie estoit et bien renommée en son país.” Who is this with such a benignant look in death? Ah! you are already disarmed by their meek grandeur! It is Charles duc de Bourgogne; whose last words to his sons admonished them to love and serve God, from whom all good proceeds, and that they should take care never to

* The festival of the stigmati is in September.

† See the Gesta Consulum Andegavensium in Dacher. Spicileg. tom. X.

‡ In tom. X. cap. 6. § Voight’s Hildebrand, 123.

|| Lebeuf, Hist. du Diocèse de Paris, tom. XV. 69.

¶ Gouget, tom. IX. 408.  Chronique de du-Guesclin Bibliothèque choisie, III. 8.

grieve their subjects, but retain their love.* And he who stands next so humbly? Lewis, duke of Anjou, brother of Charles V. “Douls, paisible et très familier à ses amis et à privé : entre ses serviteurs, si très humble et tout humain que plaisir estoit de luy servir.”†

Who is this, bearing mortal wounds, who has both palms joined, and raised them in prayer? It is Dregon de Hauteville, who was assassinated before dawn, on the festival of St. Laurence, as he entered the church of that martyr in Montaglio. You may learn his character from the chronicle of Romuald of Salerno, “Fuit vir egregius, pius, strenuus atque famosus, qui propter animi mansuetudinem et justitiæ servatam equitatem omnibus dilectus erat.” He who kneels at his side is Count Thibault of Champagne, who though sick when the Marechal Villehardouin arrived at Troyes, yet would needs mount his horse and join the crusade, but his sickness becoming more violent, he died a few days afterwards, and was buried in the sepulchre of his ancestors in the Church of St. Stephen at Troyes. No one was ever more lamented by the poor. The monks said of him :

Terrenam quærens cœlestem reperit urbem.

Who are these that cling to the cross and cast away their coronets as things worthless? They are some of many who with the English Howards were in the first ranks of those who preferred the devout unanimity of the multitude to the proud obstinacy of a few ; and well did it become the blanche Lion to be foremost in the warfare that was at once generous and holy : those who bear the red hand and the red cross are from Ireland, O'Donnell and O'Neil are they ; chieftains loyal to heaven, who exiled in the persecutions of Elizabeth fled to Rome, and there left their bones, side by side, before the great altar of St. Peter's Church, served by the Franciscans of Montorio. But we need look no longer, for enough is seen, and it is time to shake off the abstracted mood in which such visions would retain us. As one who, left alone in a hall of antique arms at the hour of advancing night, gazes with interest upon the shields, and helmets, and lances, glittering with pale splendor under the faint rising moon, and almost fancies that he sees the knightly forms that wore that steel panoply, thinks he beholds them pace across that vast hall or fall into lines to receive some high prince, or beautiful dame, so lost to the apprehension of present things must every thoughtful person who loves the meek and holy muse read these descriptions of the Catholic nobles of times gone by. Will you hearken now to the lessons which used to be addressed to these men in ages of faith? When you have heard father John de Avila you will have heard them all. “Remember,” he says, in writing to a Spanish nobleman, “that in great lords who have authority over others, there are always two persons; many of these are good men in what relates to their consciences, but they fail in respect of being good seigneurs. And it is not sufficient for such men to be just as far as regards their private conduct ; they must be just in their public capacity, they have need of double goodness because they have a double character to support. Beware, my lord, of not giving a good example. So great is the force of example, that I believe men of your rank will be found the chief cause of the ruin of souls. This should suffice to make lords live like saints. The more you will regard and imitate our Saviour Jesus Christ, the better seigneur will you prove yourself to those over whom you have authority? ”* But let us hasten on, for now I tire not as before. Can it be possible, that the mere grandeur of their feudal castles should be found a grave offence? Well then, let us turn aside, and perhaps a visit to one of these ancient houses will teach us to be more humble. The castle of these ages, as every one knows, was Homeric at least in situation, being like the house of the rustic Eumæus περισκεπτῶ ἐνὶ χῶρῳ.† If one who studies the history of the earth were to trust his own associations, he might suppose that like the men of primitive times as described by Plato, these nobles lived on the summits of rocks and hills, as if still afraid to trust themselves in the low lands which seemed more exposed to the great catastrophies of nature ;‡ but without such speculations, it is clear that such a situation was agreeable and healthful, and moreover it interfered with no tastes or habits of life then prevalent, for Homer might have said of feudal nobles :

* Christine de Pisan, Livre des fais et bonnes mœurs du sage Roy Charles V. liv. II. cap. 13.

† Id. c. II.

τοῖσιν δ' οὐτ' ἀγοραὶ βουληφόροι, οὔτε θέμιστες, ἀλλ' οἳ γ' ὑψηλῶν ὀρέων ναίωνσι κάρηνα ἐν σπέσσι γλαφυροῖσι, θεμιστεύει δὲ ἕκαστος παίδων ἢ δ' ἀλόχων, οὐδ' ἀλλήλων ἀλέγουσιν.

It is not necessary to ascribe the choice of this situation to Cyclopean or predatory habits. In Tuscany and in other parts of Italy, all the ancient towns, like Fiesole and Subiaco, are placed upon the tops of high hills. In the times of material disorder consequent upon the fall of the Roman empire, the population of countries were often obliged to seek refuge on the tops of mountains and in places of difficult approach. Thus we read in the life of St. Nicet, bishop of Trèves, written by Fortunatus, bishop of Poitiers, “In traversing these plains, Nicet, this apostolic man, this good pastor, constructed there a tutelary fold for his flock : he surrounded the hill with thirty towers, which enclosed it on all sides, and thus he raised an edifice where before there had been only a forest.”§ Those who are acquainted with the moral elevation of the noble chivalry of these ages may, perhaps, imagine that in that circumstance they have found a clue to explain the prevailing taste in respect of this choice of habitation, and, perhaps, in some instances, the building itself, if it could acquire a voice, as Æschylus says, would say this most clearly. Petrarch certainly observes that Scipio Africanus was so adverse to a life of pleasure, that he would never even look upon Baia, and for the same reason he says, “Marius, and Pompey, and Cesar, and others, who were of lofty manners, are known to have build their houses upon mountains.”* The descendants indeed of those who led a castle life have very different tastes in respect of locality. It is not likely that they should relish the site of the Gothic castle.

* Epist. xlvii. † Od. XIV. 9. ‡ Plato de Legibus, lib. III. § Fortun. Carm. l. 3. 12.

—————Enervés de mollesse

Ils se traînent à peine en leur vieille jeunesse,

Courbés avant le temps, consumés de langueur,

Enfants efféminés de pères sans vigueur.

They may shudder from their gilded barges, impelled by the force of vapor, as they pass along the coast of Northumbria, when they gaze upon those embattled mansions which the poet says were seen by the abbess of St. Hilda, as she sailed from high Whitby's cloistered pile to the holy island of St. Cuthbert.

Thy tower, proud Bamborough, mark'd they there,

King Ida's castle huge and square,

From the tall rock, look'd grimly down,

And on the swelling ocean frown.

But if their fathers were again to visit earth, they might hasten from these modern Baias to inhabit their ancient picturesque abodes, without its being necessary to conclude that they were impelled by sentiments contrary to meekness, or that theirs was the crime of Pazzo and Rinieri, whom Dante beheld tormented in the seething flood for having filled the ways with violence and war.† Even the two houses of Pliny on the Larium lake indicate a nobleness of nature, of which the modern rustic villas present no indication: he built one upon the level shore, but the other was placed upon a rock looking down upon the water. This latter he called tragedy, sustained as if by buskins.‡ The former was comedy, like all the houses erected in our times, in which there is nothing solemn, to favor sweet melancholy, and no part lofty or painful of ascent, requiring force of soul; whereas the very rooms of the ancient mansions inspired thought and feelings of devotion, and were a defence to preserve the mind in purity. There were indeed many characteristics in the architecture of the middle ages which seemed to have a relation to their manners; and first its beauty and durability merit admiration. Men consulted almost a poetic taste, and worked for posterity: the ancient laws prescribed a certain thickness to the walls and beams of houses.§ The magnificent old baronial castle of Glamis, the hereditary seat of the earls of Strathmore, is described by Sir Walter Scott as bearing signs of great antiquity in the immense thickness of the walls, and the wild and straggling arrangement of the rooms, “I was conducted to my apartment,” he says, “in a distant corner of the building. I must own, that as I heard door after door shut, after my conductor had retired, I began to consider myself too far from the living, and somewhat too near the dead;” and he also gives a description of the castle of Dunvegan, whose turrets standing upon a frowning rock, rise immediately above the waves of a lake. Except, perhaps, for some tapestry hangings, and the extreme thickness of the walls, nothing could have been more agreeable than the interior of the chamber; but if you looked from the windows, the view was such as to correspond with the highest tone.

* Epist. lib. V. 4. † Hell, XII. ‡ Epist. ix. 7. § Monteil, Hist. des Français, tom. III. 253.

An autumnal blast, sometimes clear, sometimes driving mist before it, swept along the troubled billows of the lake. The waves rushed in wild disorder on the shore, and covered with foam the steep piles of rock, which rising from the sea in forms somewhat resembling the human figure have obtained the name of Macleod's maidens, and in such a night seemed no bad representative of the Norwegian "choosers of the slain, or riders of the storm." But whether such was the situation of castles, or whether as at other times they rose from the dome of forests which resounded to the cry of solemn birds, or whether as at others they crowned the hill or rock that served as a citadel to towns from whose streets below a distant murmur ascended to the protecting battlements, their interior was always grave and spacious, and furnished many places favorable to retirement and meditation. These vast chimney recesses, which in the fifteenth century were adorned with that noble architecture which may still be seen in the castles of Fontainebleau, Vincennes, St. Germain, and others, might be said to have a literature belonging to them, and a school of taste, in which, judging from genuine principles, we shall find nothing to disdain. We shall have occasion to recur to this when we consider the learning of these ages. The decoration of these houses was thoroughly Christian, and this is a characteristic which deserves to be remarked. To this day the feudal science of heraldry rejects absolutely all immoralities, to a degree that would indicate the purest manners and the utmost spirituality of conception. Wherever to our eyes the principle of modesty might seem transgressed it arose from the simple reverence with which men read creation's holy book describing the innocence of the life of Paradise, and before the mysterious light of primal sanctity our ancestors thought that every polluted fire would be extinguished. In respect of its disposition to take a different view of this subject, our own age has no grounds for self-congratulation. Plato even says, that at no very distant time from that in which he wrote, it was deemed disgraceful by the Greeks as it still continued to be by the greatest part of the barbarians, (that is, nations who had no sophists), to see the images of naked men, and that the Cretans first and then the Lacedæmonians adopted the gymnastic discipline so contrary to this sentiment.* Cicero quotes a verse of Ennius :

Flagitii principium est nudare inter cives corpora.†

Naked statues were not seen in Rome till after the reign of Augustus. One may conceive that the Christian society would be rather favorable to the ancient taste; and accordingly the old mosaicks of our blessed Lady with the Child are always recognized by the circumstances of the infant Jesus being clothed. The crucifixes

* De Repub. lib. V.

† Tuscul. IV. 33.

used in the time of Charlemagne represented our divine Saviour on the cross, not naked but clothed, and with a royal crown on his head, and nailed with four nails in the two feet separately, and in the two hands. The celebrated crucifix at Lucca and that in the cathedral of Amiens are in this form, as was that in the church of St. Cilinia, the nurse of St. Remi, at Rheims. The body, however, is not clothed in the crucifixes that were found in the catacombs, nor in those printed by Giotto and earlier masters, such as may be seen at Pisa and in other places. The chief decorations of the castle, representing the history of saints, differed not in this respect from the general tone of Christian modesty: those that were peculiar to its adornment were either carved representations of ancestral fame, as the silver tables in the palace of Dido:

Fortia facta patrum, series longissima rerum
Per tot ducta viros antiquæ ab origine gentis.*

or else heraldic blazons which sometimes recalled ancient virtue,

——— Veterum decora alta parentum, and at others were the symbolic expressions of the piety of the founder or possessor. In the superb castle of Ecouen, built by the grand Condé, in the forest of Montmorency, the floors of several of the rooms are paved with painted tiles representing in each compartment the monogram of our blessed lady, and the ceilings represent the sword of Condé, interlaced between the initial letters of the angel's salutation and the beloved name. The walls of these castles contained beautiful recesses arched with rich tracery to hold the water that was blessed, and solemn tapestry flowed to the ground,

In whose glittering tissues bore emblazon'd
Holy memorials, acts of zeal and love
Recorded eminent ———

There is little wisdom, and not more of taste, in the man who would despise the ancient symbolic decoration, even when considered exclusively in its historic and ancestral character. It is a sensible appeal in our great poet, "Will you mock at an ancient tradition, begun upon an honorable respect, and worn as a memorable trophy of pre-deceased valor?"† Who could enumerate all the worthy deeds to which this imaginative science may have given rise, as in the instance of Perez de Vargas at the siege of Seville? Besides these decorations, the walls of a Gothic castle in these ages were covered with paintings, historical, theological, mythological, geographical, and so generally instructive, as to form almost an encyclopædia, in which every science and art was, at least, indicated. The ancient apartments and galleries of the Vatican were not singular instances of this mode of imparting knowledge. The castle of king Robert, at Naples, contained numerous apartments to receive men celebrated for their learning and genius, and there was a correspondence between the decoration of each and the studies of the men whom it was to receive. The apartments of preachers and theologians were adorned with paintings of Paradise, those of poets with mythological devices, and so of the rest. In the halls of the castle of Meudon were painted the sessions of the Council of Trent. In the reign of Charles VI. the castle of Vincestre, near Paris, was adorned with portraits of Pope Clement, VII. and all the cardinals of his College, with those also of the kings and princes of France, and the emperors of the East and West.* The deacon Paul collected the fashion of the dresses of the Lombard warriors from the paintings made by order of Teodolinda in the castle built by her at Monzo.† The return of Cosmo de Medicis to Florence was painted in the hall of the castle of Poggio Caiano; and Tasso only describes a common practice, when he says, speaking of Clorinda,

* Æn. I 641.

† Hen. V. s. 1.

Her prison was a chamber, painted round
With goodly portraits and with stories old.‡

In general the taste of men was directed towards grand and striking matters, instead of being confined as at present to promote the invention of ten thousand little minute objects of fashionable manipulation, exquisite trifles which have neither beauty nor meaning, nor use, excepting as some contrivance to facilitate the gratification of personal vanity. In our times men fear almost to traverse these moonlight halls of knightly state, so little in accordance with the desires of luxury and the habitations of the effeminate; their very decoration impels men too strongly to meditate; they may admire indeed with Wilfrid, that huge old hall in the castle of Rokeby, when

The moon through transom shafts of stone
Which cross'd the latticed oriels shone :

but they cannot disguise their impatience to pass on; for they feel as if

—— By dim lights these portraits of the dead
Have something ghastly, desolate and dread.

“The pale smile of beauties in the grave, the charms of other days, glimmering on high in starlight gleams,” all that would have excited such deep and tender emotions in the ancient possessors, are to these men only sources of gloom and regret, objects only that they think every eye would shun. But in all the parts of these ancient castles there was some aspersions of religion. Its high towers were generally under the protection of the holy martyr, St. Pancrace. Thus at Fontenay-le-Vicomte was the tower Pancrace.§ The very name was often that of a saint. Thus the magnificent castle of Kenilworth was anciently Kenelmworth, so called from the Saxon saint whose name occurs so frequently among the students

* Lebeuf, Hist. du Diocese de Paris, X. 16.

† Paul, Diae. lib. IV. c. xx.

‡ XII. 23.

§ Lebeuf, Hist. du Diocese de Paris, XI. 104.

of the Anglo-Saxon monasteries. Often where we least expect it in visiting the interior of these castles we are compelled to fall upon our knees. Thus in the eleventh century, the castle of Harzburg, in the midst of the Harz, fortified by Henry, who placed in it the insignia and treasures of the kingdom, would hardly seem to have been a place to visit through devotion. It stood upon a high hill, and could only be approached by one way, and that was most difficult. The other sides of the mountain were covered with a vast forest which extended in one continued tract of solitude as far as the borders of Thuringia; yet in this castle were many holy relics.

The lords of castles were sometimes even troublesome to the churches of neighboring villages, from desiring to transfer their relics to the chapels within their own walls.* It must be remembered, however, that at others they came to the possession of such treasures in a way more honorable, as in the case of several noble families of Rome, such as the Mariscotti, Falconieri, Corsini, and others, having saints among their line whose bodies are preserved in their private chapels. The chapel was a constant appendage to the castle. At the time when Hugues Capet was only Count of Paris, Count Haymon, not content with having built the church of St. Spire close to his castle, on the translation of the body of St. Geunaul built also the church of St. Geunaul within the very walls of this castle which stood close to the junction of the rivers Juine and the Seine, and there he founded four priests to celebrate the divine service.† The seigneur de Montmorenci having procured the relics of St. Felix for the chapel of his castle, which was dedicated in 1174, such a multitude of devout people were attracted there annually on the day of his festival, that a fair was established for the time.‡ Thibaud the fair-haired, forester of king Robert, built the castle of Montlhery in which were two churches, that of our Lady, and the collegiate church of St. Peter, of regular canons having an abbot at their head. At the same time his son Guy founded without its walls the monastery of Longpont.§

Louis Guibert, counsellor of state and Seigneur de Bussy in 1628, founded a chapel of St. Louis in the knightly castle of Bussy, assigning revenues for the chaplain, who was to celebrate mass every day in the week but one, and to teach the children of the village, and above all six of the poorest; and he was to lead them every evening to the church of the castle for night prayers.||

The parish church of Andresel, in the diocese of Paris, under the invocation of St. John the Baptist, is within the walls of the baronial castle, which was a rare example in country places; but the Abbé Lebeuf observes, that the name of the seigneur of Andresel at the time determined them in the choice of the patron, as was usual; and after all, the seigneurs were the founders of most of the parish churches.¶ In short, no seigneur in these ages ever thought of building a castle

* Desguerrois Hist. du Diocese de Troyes. † Lebeuf, Hist. du Diocese de Paris, XI. 179.

‡ Id. tom. III. 379.

§ Id. tom. X. 157.

|| Id. tom. XV. 35.

¶ Lebeuf, Hist. du Diocese de Paris, tom. XV. 343.

without a chapel, and in some there were even two. In the vast castle of Marcoucies, built by John de Montaignu, on a steep rock which stood in a deep valley, there were two chapels in the dungeon court ; one dedicated to the Holy Trinity, was built expressly for the Celestin monks, that they might serve it and be lodged in the adjoining tower, when war should oblige them to seek an asylum within the walls.* At the same time the episcopal permission to found chapels within private walls was always indispensable, and never granted without assigning specific reasons, such generally as the great distance from a church, the danger of crossing rivers, or the event of sickness. Thus in 1552, Anne Noblet, widow of Guerin de la Coustardiere, obtained leave to have a chapel at Cachant, on account of her advanced age :† and in 1617, John Tronson, seigneur of Condray, obtained permission to have a private chapel, from the bishop of Paris, on account of the distance of his castle from any church. By the canons of the council of Orleans, in the year 541, the possessors of chapels were forbidden to receive strange clerks without the consent of the bishop of the place. They excommunicate the possessors who should prevent the priests who serve their chapels from acquitting themselves of what they owe to the divine service. Indeed the Council of Chalons in the year 650 complained that some great men who had chapels, withdrew their clerks from the jurisdiction of the ordinary. In the year 506, that of Agde found it necessary to make provisions against the danger and abuse, lest the priest might insensibly lose the spirit of his order, and the lord usurp ecclesiastical power. From this outline of a feudal castle in the middle ages, one may conceive that no great alteration was necessary in the structure, whenever the possessor through devotion thought proper, as was not unfrequently the case, to convert it into a house for persons of a religious order. Thus Anne de Bretagne, wife of King Charles VIII., converted the ancient country-house of the dukes of Chaillot into a convent of poor Clares :‡ and Charlotte, queen of Portugal, in our age, has left in her will her superb castle of Guadras to the Dominican sisters, on condition that they are to maintain a house of refuge.

In the year 962, St. Guibert, a nobleman of Lorraine, abandoned his arms to serve God alone in his castle of Gemby, in Brabant, which he offered to God, converting it into a monastery of Benedictines ;§ and the Comte de Rougemont, the fierce and terrible champion of Savoy, being converted by St. Vincent de Paul, condemned himself to a life of austere penance, selling his estates to employ the price in charity, and changing the place of his residence, the castle of Chaulnes, into a hospital for widows and orphans. From all this too we can understand why even holy writers did not disdain to borrow similitudes from the structure and parts of the feudal castle, as when St. Theresa compared the soul to a superb castle of which prayer is the gate, and which has many courts, in the principal of which

* Id. tom. IX. 271. † Id. tom. X. 31. ‡ Lebeuf, Hist. du Diocese de Paris, tom. III. 54.
§ Hist. des Evesques de Senlis, p. 360.

God dwells ; of which castle the souls that enter not into themselves are as it were the sentinels, who only go the round of the walls without entering it ; and of which in the first lower cloister, answering to the first in the awakening of the soul, all is dark and tortuous, and full of danger and difficulty, and infested with phantoms and demons to scare one. F. Benedict also, an English capuchin, composed a book entitled "Le Chevalier Chrestien," containing a dialogue between a Christian and a pagan, in which he teaches all the doctrines of the Christian religion, and inculcates all the lessons of a spiritual life by means of emblems furnished by his castle and tower, as well as his arms and equipage : indeed the castles of these ages being constructed on nearly the same plan in every part of Christendom, might serve in this way as a universal language. In Italy, however, it would meet with a new order of ideas, but even the palace of the Vatican, amidst the master-pieces of Greek and Roman art, contains the vast arched galleries, the solemn flights of stairs, the sombre Sistine chapel, the guards, clothed in the striking and picturesque uniform of the middle ages, which are all in such harmony with the recollections of Charlemagne, who so long inhabited it after being crowned emperor by Pope S. Leo III. In the fifteenth century, owing to the destructive policy of the government, many castles in wild parts of France were left uninhabited, excepting by some old porter who had care of it. Before the revolution these castles were thickly scattered over France, and often within sight of each other.* Eury-les-châteaux was so called from the number of castles which surrounded it.†

The huge old halls of knightly state,
Dismantled seem'd and desolate :

but such was not the case with the castles or mansions in the middle ages, when the very word which expressed them implied the constant residence of the possessor.‡ The Catholic religion kept families at home and prevented them from degenerating into a kind of nomadic tribe, ever wandering about with wives and children, like the Tartars, whether their journeys would be made in coaches or in carts. Here we may remark some particulars relative to the castle life which deserve attention. The feudal castle was Homeric, inasmuch as it deserved the title of "the well-inhabited house." Walstein in his castle of Prague entertained sixty pages, all children of ancient families, who were trained under the first masters kept expressly for the purpose. Froissart and other writers describe at length the immense households entertained by private noblemen of that age. Guizot affirms that a characteristic feature of the feudal system was a strange development of individual characters such as might be expected, he adds, "from men who lived isolated ; free to follow the originality of their nature and the caprice of their imaginations : " but immediately after he speaks as follows ; "every one knows that the domestic

* Monteil, Hist. des François. III. 126.

† Lebeuf, XIII. 206.

‡ Lord Coke says, "Manerium dicitur à manendo."

life, the spirit of family connection, and the high importance of women, were characteristic of the same state of society. The husband lived in the castle with his wife and children around him :” he observes also, that each castle became peopled with a crowd of pages and squires, who were sent there as to a school of chivalry. Thus the interior became animated ; all these young sons of vassals became members of the house, and performed service of different kinds, and thus social movement and the communication of equals entered into these isolated habitations.*

There seems then to be no ground for supposing, as he says, that this was “a solitary, sombre, or hard situation.” In truth it is in our days, notwithstanding the multiplication of clubs and chambers of political debate, that men are doomed to the misery of an isolated existence. In no state of society were they possessed of more bonds of union, than in the ages of faith : no one was then condemned to a life of solitude, if he sought to be protected from the assembly of the malignant, and from the multitude of the workers of iniquity. The principle of association, so eminently Catholic operated both in the highest as well as in the lower ranks of the state. I shall have occasion hereafter to speak of the morality of this society : for the present, I would only entreat a suspension of judgment. Facts present themselves in every direction to warn us from lending too entire an assent to the view taken by modern writers on this subject. Leopold, archduke of Austria, used to examine his own pages respecting their manners, and he regarded more their innocence and piety, than the nobility of their birth.† St. Odo, the second abbot of Cluni, when a youth in the service of count William of Aquitaine, residing in his castle, and an attendant on his hunting, used to retire, as he says himself, on the vigil of our Lord’s nativity, to watch during the night, and pray before the public office in the chapel.‡ The castle of these ages was not always as felonious as that of Nabon le Noir, in the history of Gyron, in which the good knight without fear was imprisoned in an iron-grated chamber, till after killing a giant who had been sent to despatch him, he at length went mad. Sometimes it was an asylum for the poor. The count de Tendilla during one period lived in the impregnable fortress of Alcala la Real, perched high among the mountains about six leagues from Grenada : this was a place of refuge for the Christian captives who used to escape by night from the Moorish dungeons of Grenada. Often, however, they missed their way in the defiles of the mountains, and wandering about bewildered, either repaired by mistake to some Moorish town, or were discovered and retaken at daylight by the enemy. To prevent these accidents, the count built a tower on one of the heights near Alcala, which commanded a view of the Vega, and of the whole country ; and here he kept a light blazing through the night, as a beacon for all Christian fugitives to guide them to a place of safety.

* Cours d’Hist IV. 5, 6.

† Avancin, Vie de Léopold d’Autriche.

‡ Bibliotheca Cluniacensis, p. 17.

An amusing instance occurs in the old Fabliaux, which is sufficient to show how generously the poor were admitted to hospitality by the lords of these castles. On a certain day, the story relates, count Henry invited all the world to an entertainment; rich and poor, nobles, knights, and peasants were all equally accustomed to receive his invitations; but he had a discourteous and niggardly seneschal, who took pains to insult the guests. A poor ploughman, named Raoul, became the object of his insolence, though the seneschal, fearing that the count might observe him, had at length provided a seat for the poor man. When the minstrels and jongleurs, who sat at the end of the banquet table, had exerted themselves to the utmost to amuse the count and the guests, Raoul advanced and kicked down the seneschal before the whole company. Then being called upon for an explanation, he related humbly to the noble count how his seneschal had treated him in a similar manner, on his first entry, though he came to the castle on the count's general invitation. The count was highly delighted, as were all the company, and to Raoul was adjudged the prize of a robe which was to be given to the jongleur that caused most merriment in the hall.* Here is at once a great contrast to the gloomy pride of modern manners in the houses of the great. Sir Walter Scott takes notice, that "the union betwixt the nobles of La Vendee and the peasants was of the most intimate character; many of their employments, and even their amusements, were in common. Upon the evenings of Sundays and holidays, the young people of each village and farm-house repaired to the court-yard of the château, as the natural and proper scene for their amusement, and the family of the baron often took part in the pastime." It is not beneath our notice to remark that the same customs and delights prevailed with the great and with the poor. Both reserved their gayest habits for the same days of common religious rejoicing; there was not that anxiety in the noble to avoid the simple practices of the people, and to abandon successively whatever exercise or dress they adopted: on ordinary occasions, all were equally attired for the business of life. Montaigne says that he loves to imitate that cheerful carelessness of youth with respect to their dress, having their cloak only on one shoulder, their stockings torn, and many things about their person indicating a fierce disdain of art. A great deal of this may be ascribed to the circumstance, that there was no false or artificial state of social elevation in those days: of the arrogance and vanity of a timid grandeur we find some trace in Virgil, when he speaks of Drances:

-genus huic materna superbum
Nobilitas dabat.†

There can be no doubt but that the higher classes in these ages sympathized far more with the people than that numerous race of men, who have of late been multiplied by the progress of luxury, who live by a thousand ignoble arts which

* Bibliothèque Choisie, Recueil de Fabliaux.

† Æn. XI. 340.

tend to debase the mind and consign it to sensuality, while they yield a sufficient supply of maintenance to enable their possessors to appear in a rank above the poor. The feudal nobles encouraged agriculture, which in the fifteenth century had attained to the dignity of a science, and was studied as such.* The duke of Milan had magnificent stabling and sheds for 1800 cows and 14000 goats and sheep, as appears from the account of the voyage of Charles VIII. to Naples, by Pierre Desrey of Troyes. In the forest of Landea, the viscounts de Rohan supported a breed of wild horses. But to return to the hospitality of the castle. The zeal with which this virtue was exercised is sometimes amusing. Gyron le Courtois was thus invited by the knight of the tower. "Sire, il est bien heure de vespres, et seays bien que vous avez huy trouve par cy devant si mauvaise voye que vous estes travaille, et apres le travail se doit chascun homme par raison reposer; et pour ce je vous prie pour la foy que vous devez a tous les chevaliers errans du monde que me faiez or endroit une courtoisie que assez petit vous coustera. Et saichez, sire, que je la triendray a moult grant bonte." "What would you have me to do?" said Gyron. "En nom Dieu," said the knight, "je vous prie que vous herbergiez ceste nuyt avecques moy dedans ceste tour, il mest avis certainement ce saichez vous que ce me sera moult grant honneur, si si preudhomme comme vous estes herberge a mon hostel, et pour ce, sire, je vous prie que vous y demourez cesluy soir, car certes ce sera une chose que bien me donnera moult grant confort." † Boniface, the pious marquis of Tuscany, might be chosen as an example of the magnificent spirit of these times; though every feudal castle, like that of the count de Foix, exhibited something similar. On his marriage with Beatrice, daughter of Frederick, duke of Lorraine, he kept a public table for three months, at which not only the noble foreigners who accompanied his bride into Lombardy were entertained, but also people of all descriptions. Gold and silver adorned the tables, to which the meats were carried on beasts of burden; there were wells of wine, where every one could quench his thirst out of pails of silver. In the same spirit of magnificence, Albert, viscount of Mantua, made a present of 300 horses and as many goshawks, to the emperor Henry III. when he came in Italy. Nor were holy observances neglected amidst the splendid triumph of the feast; as the minstrel of Branksome Hall bears witness, saying how —o'er the heron and the crane,

And princely peacock's gilded train,
And o'er the boar-head garnish'd brave
And cygnet from St. Mary's wave,
O'er ptarmigan and venison
The priest had spoke his benison.

The gayety that reigned in these Gothic halls was simple, and from the heart. The chronicle of Alberic, speaking of the marriage in 1237, of Robert, brother of

* Monteil, Hist. des Fran. III. 33.

† P. ccxxxix.

St. Louis, with Mathilda, daughter of the duke of Brabant, describes some of the amusing pageantry. At the four corners of the hall were minstrels mounted on oxen covered with scarlet, who blew trumpets at each service. Sometimes were introduced dancing dogs, apes on horseback, and goats playing upon the harp. And yet with intervals of this occasional merriment, there was generally an ancient Christian discipline observed which is now only found in colleges or episcopal palaces. To the moderns alone was the sanctity of the Christian banquet a surprise. The custom of reading during repasts came from the ancients. Pliny never neglected it, and Juvenal inviting a friend to supper, promised that Homer and Virgil should be read. The Christians continued to observe it, only substituting holy lessons for profane.

Charlemagne preferred hearing read at his repast the books of St. Augustin de Civitate Dei. Christine de Pisan, describing the table of the queen of Charles V., says, “durant son mangier, par ancienne coustume des roys, bien ordonnée pour obvyer à vaines et vagues parolles et pensées avoit un preudomme on estant au bout de la table qui sans cesser disoit gestes de meurs vertueux d’anciens bons trespassez.” This was the discipline to secure τὸν εἰνοματώτατον ἔρανον, a feast among men of ardent spirits, where at least there was no shoulder of Pelops to eat, where all was peaceable and well. With the ancients, indeed, there was often extravagance in their affectation of mixing pleasures with severity. The father of history relates, that at the feasts of the rich, after the repast a bier used to be borne round the hall, on which was placed a wooden figure resembling a dead body; it was shown in turn to each of the guests, with these words, “Turn your eyes towards this man, whom you will resemble after your death. Now drink and divert yourself.”* The heroic chants, as with our own ancestors, were the ordinary accompaniment of the ancient repast, and certainly far more useful than would have been any reading from their more formal authors, or conversations philosophical, such as that of the guests in Athenæus. A young sophist on being asked by his father, at supper, to take up the lyre and sing a song of Simonides, is represented as replying “that it was old-fashioned to use the lyre in order to sing a song while drinking, like a woman grinding barley;”† these pedants were all for sophistical discourses. But though there was no pedantry, it cannot be denied that there was much solemnity in the customs of the baronial feasts, which bore no resemblance to that of Agathoeles, the merry tyrant. The very hall was sometimes in a mystic form, as that of Tau in the archiepiscopal Palace, at Rheims: the light from long flambeaux, held by varlets who stood round the table, harmonized with nothing trivial; when discourse was held, it was often learned and philosophic. St. Thomas Aquinas sitting silent in a musing posture at the table of the king of France, at last broke forth with these words: “Conclusum est contra Manichæos;” their very dances were solemn as when the king used to dance between two flambeaux which were held by two knights.* And here I cannot help remarking, that in point of taste there were many features of the ancient castle to delight and exalt the devout poetic fancy, without having recourse to the fictions of any absurd pagan superstition. Was it nothing that corresponded with such an imagination, when the strange guest was told, as he was conducted to his chamber on some wild tempestuous night, that the faint glimmering which he observed in a distant turret proceeded from the lancet casement of a holy monk, who lived a recluse under the baron's roof? Did his recollected step across the Gothic galleries awaken no solemn thought? And when his spirit had passed from the earth, did the memory of him afterwards cast no halo of sanctity over the chamber which he used to occupy? Madame de Chantal, walking one day in the fields near her castle, had a vision in which she saw St. Francis de Sales;† and we have all heard how the old crucifix in the little chapel of the castle of Xavier, in Navarre, at the foot of the Pyrenees, had still a mysterious connection with the great saint of that house when he was in the distant regions of India. When St. Theresa came to Madrid, she descended at the house of the Lady de Mascarengas, adjoining the convent of the nuns of St. Francis, which that lady had founded. There was in her house at that time a hermit, who was greatly venerated, to whom she had given a chamber in a retired part of the palace. The lady was enjoyed at this occasion of making two saints known to each other. The hermit's history was remarkable. Ambrose Marian, born at Bironta, in the kingdom of Naples, pursued his early studies with such success that he became doctor in the three faculties of letters, law, and theology; he was a great mathematician, and at the same time a master of Roman eloquence: being deputed to attend the council of Trent, he was employed in negotiating several important matters relative to the Church in Flanders and Germany. The queen of Poland, who observed his merit, desired that he might be of her council, and he became intendant of her palace. Nevertheless the world had but few charms for him; he accordingly took the vows of a knight of Malta, but being falsely accused by two perjured witnesses of being accessory to a murder, he was thrown into prison, and there he took the final resolution that, in the event of his innocence being manifested, he would leave the world for ever.

* Herod. lib. II.

† Aristoph. Nubes. 1358.

The examination disclosed the crime of his enemies, for whom he entreated mercy; and on being set at liberty, after accomplishing certain orders of the king of Spain, he retired to the house of the Jesuits of Cordova to follow the spiritual exercises. One day as he was looking from his window he saw a venerable hermit enter the church: he sent down to entreat him to come to his chamber. The holy man obeyed. He was the superior of the hermits of Tardon, and renowned for his sanctity. Ambrose questioned him respecting their manner of life, and resolved to visit their desert; here he was so moved by the example of these devout men, that he finally took the habit in 1562, and being obliged by their rule to support themselves, he learned to spin, as affording the most humble occupation, and as at the greatest variance with his former glory. He was now at Madrid on the affairs of his order, being deputed to seek permission from the court for a new establishment. In some places, as at Ormoye, in the diocese of Paris, the curate used to be lodged in the castle of the seigneurs.* In the houses in England of the old Catholic gentry, the chambers, and even the concealed retreat of the priest, during the times of persecution, are always found. One of the latter having been lately discovered in an old mansion, after remaining unknown for many years, there was found in it a table, on which lay a copy of the Imitation of Christ, curiously bound with old clasps of iron. But in the castles of the nobility, in ages of faith, saints and persons of holy order were generally most eagerly received. Thus when it was known that St. Theresa was to come to Salamanca, the count and countess of Montereï obtained permission from the superiors that she might be lodged in their palace. An old chronicle, speaking of St. Victor, a holy recluse, who lived in a solitary wood near St. Saturnin, in Champagne, records another beautiful instance. "It was a wonderful gift of God to this holy recluse and austere anchorite, that he should be so greatly loved, respected, feared, and revered, by the great men of his time, who were all happy whenever they could enjoy his presence. There was one gentleman, allied to the crown of France, whom he had held on the holy baptismal font, who resided at Cupigny, and who desired him earnestly to come to his castle to bless his family. After many pressing invitations the holy man at last consented, and set out on his journey thither. All the castle was overjoyed, and the nobles of the neighborhood hastened there to meet him, thinking that they would be in paradise to be visited by such a saint. On his approach, lords and ladies, sons and daughters, servants old and young, hastened out to meet him, receiving him into their halls as an angel of God. There was nothing but rejoicing in the castle, and they wanted to feast him well, but the saint would eat nothing till late, employing all his time in instructing them in what tended to their salvation. After taking a slight repast, as usual, he retired to rest for a time, but at midnight he rose up, and sung his matins, and then meditated till break of day. This was a Sunday, so that a vast number of persons hearing of his being there came up to the castle to receive some heavenly instructions in the Catholic faith, to have the fear of God imprinted in their hearts: he made a long discourse to them, insisting, above all things, upon the love which we ought to cherish, for our Lord the Son of God. After mass, to oblige and gratify them all, he ate and drank in their company, and then remained the whole day instructing them in holy things, and speaking of God. The next day, very early in the morning, he departed from the castle, leaving them much more sound in their souls than they were before his visit."† The castle life was a life in the world, and many a dark and sanguinary deed has stained the feudal towers. I know it; but still, methinks, we have already wherewithal to support the opinion, that it was not necessarily ὀλέθριον βίωσιν, a life causing death,† but that it was compatible with the character of men who sought to recommend themselves by meekness to the Divine mercy, knowing that it is only the humble of heart who shall be saved. Faith might have had her residence even within the embattled courts of nobles, and holy lessons may have found within them soft, obedient hearts; but if sad intervals did follow, when all was lost and all forgotten, if the knight who but yesterday at evening had listened to the benign recluse, who taught him “the way for man to win eternity,” and had given proof how he did prize the lesson, by moistening the pavement of that recluse’s chapel with his tears, if he, as soon as the warden’s trumpet announced the beacon blaze of war, lost in an instant all remembrance of that dear paternal image, when

*Mémoires de La Marche, liv. I. chap. vii. an. 1442.

† Marsollier, Vie de M. de Chantal, tom. I.

* Lebeuf, XIII.

† Desguerrois Hist. du Diocese de Troyes, 123.

The blast alarm’d the festal hall,
And started forth the warriors all;
When downward, in the castle yard,
Full many a torch and cresset glared:
And helms and plumes, confusedly toss’d
Were in the blaze half seen, half lost, is it for the men whose days now glide luxuriously in undisturbed repose from without, to congratulate themselves on their superior consistency? These would do better to imitate that recluse, who had as profound a sense as they can possess of what it is to prevaricate with God. Far from breaking forth in disdainful reproaches, he only smote his breast, and silently mounted again to his lonely turret, to weep before his altar, and to pray.

But let us proceed to speak of the manners of the castle life. The pompous equestrian exercises which belonged to it, and the passions to which they led, may seem to furnish ground for the accusation of the moderns. We are told how

Thirty steeds, both fleet and wight,
Stood saddled in stable day and night;

that many, like the ancient Spaniards, prized a good horse more than their own blood; that, in the case of Earl Morton, who claimed the horse of his bold vassal Gilbert,

The valley of Eske, from the mouth to the source,
Was lost and won for that bonny white horse.

There is a worse tale than this, which we shall hear on a future occasion; but after all that can be advanced and conceded on this head, there is no necessity for concluding that pride was inherent and essential in the habits which belonged to men, whose fondness for horses was their characteristic. They may have loved their horses, and thought them all worthy of being shod by St. Eloi ; but he who is conversant with the noble muse has heard before of men lovers of horses, and possessing souls better than treasures.

† Medea, 991.

————— καὶ κτεάτων
 ψυχὰς έχοντες ἀρέσθονας ἄνδρες.*

The horse was not always saddled to bear his seigneur to the battle, or the tournament ; it was often his companion to the monastery, to the cottage of the poor, or to the deep wood, whither he might repair, like Count Thibaut, of Champagne, to cultivate a sweet poetie fancy.

J'aloie l'autre jour, errant
 Sans compaignon
 Sur mon palefroi pensant.

The church availed herself of this love of horses, and contrived to make it minister to goodness ; for under her direction men sacrificed it during many intervals of the year, when in proof of penitence and humility they refused to mount on horseback ; and for some capital offences the prescribed penance consisted in never mounting on a horse during the rest of their lives. This was the ecclesiastical penalty for some deeds of violence, and it was virtually a forfeiture of nobility, and of all its interests.† The immoderate passion for hunting is advanced as an objection against the feudal life, and no doubt it was one of its peculiar temptations. St. Odo says, that when a young servant in the castle of Count William of Aquitaine, after continued days devoted to laborious hunting, he used to be frightened at night with dreams that indicated remorse.‡ If we are to credit the Saxon chronicle, King William “loved the tall deer as if he were their father.” John of Salisbury is delighted with the text that saith that “hunters ben not holy men.”—“Venatores omnes,” saith he, “adhuc institutionem redolent Centaurorum. Raro invenitur quisquam eorum modestus, aut gravis, raro continens, et ut credo sobrius nunquam. From their centauric banquets no one returns without spiritual wounds.”§ Justice, however, would oblige us to make some allowance here, in consideration of the title of the work in which this sentence occurs, which is on the follies of the great. There were sober hunters, and many modest and humble men hunted, and so far from being only second Chirons, the master of Achilles, whom Homer calls the most just of the centaurs,|| some of them were saints, and rode through the forests with a thoughtful heart, and attended by smiling angels, winnowing the air with their eternal plumes. Romuald, a young nobleman of the family of the dukes of Ravenna, when he went a-hunting, if he found an agreeable solitary place in the woods, used to stop in it to pray, and

* Pindar, Nem. IX.

† The synodical statutes, published at Verdun, in 1534.

‡ Bibliotheca Cluniacensis, 16.

§ De Nugis Curialium, lib. I. cap. 4.

|| II. XI.

used to cry out, "How happy were the ancient hermits who had such habitations ! with what tranquillity could they serve God, free from the tumult of the world !" Religion never sanctions an extravagant censure that is without reason or moderation. It is to be remembered that hunting in these ages was not always an illiberal, sybaritic, cruel amusement. It was not like the sport of him, alluded to by Dante, "who throws away his days in idle chase of the diminutive birds." The Athenian, in Plato, prays that the love of destroying winged animals, οὐ σφόδρα ἐλευθέριος, may never possess any of their youth ;* but as in many countries of Europe at this day, hunting was then a noble service rendered to the country, and one which was attended with danger. Tancred de Hauteville owed his first advancement as a youth to an act of courage and address in hunting the wild boar, whereby he saved the life of the Duke of Normandy. The noble,

Who had mere joy to raunge the forest wyde,
And chase the salvage beaste with busie payne,
Then serve his ladies love, and waste in pleasures vayne,†

the youth who chose to remain at home and fight the wolves and bears, as Bayard's father said to his son George who preferred this mode of life, may have been real benefactors to men, like the heroes of the ancient world : and though John Le Blond, in his poem on the chase, may go too far in ascribing to the temple of hunters all the parts of a church, yet for such hunters wisdom herself might deign to order the consolations of those Herulean baths, mentioned by Pindar, which the nymphs made to issue out of the earth, by order of Minerva, to refresh Hercules when he returned from his expedition into Spain against Gerion. The knights of Calatrava, in Spain, originally of the Cistercian order, living chiefly amidst great woods and mountains, were allowed to hunt and eat of the game.‡ "Omnia innoxie remissionis genera breviter amplectar," says Pliny, "homo sum."§ And though we may smile at Xenophon when he says, that "hunting was the invention of the gods,"|| yet one must admit that it was a very happy combination when even amusements were a service rendered to society : they may, indeed, have been too eagerly pursued, as when the boy Ascanius used to wish that the foaming boar, or the yellow lion, might descend from the mountains,¶ but as a general exercise of the younger men, I do not think that even Momus himself would have inclination to condemn it. There was a literature belonging to hunters, as every one knows. Oppian, in his poem on hunting, speaks of the excellence of the British dogs. Ælian, in the second century, speaks of falconry which had been long practised in Upper Asia, though at that time unknown in Europe. It need only be observed here, in conclusion, that certainly, notwithstanding the inventions to diffuse a taste for literature, the lovers of hunting at present would be greatly at a loss if called upon to justify their contempt for

* De Legibus, lib. VII.

† Spenser, I. 6.

‡ Chronicon S. Bertini, cap. XLl.

§ Lib. V. Epist. 3.

|| Cynegetici, p. I.

¶ Æneid IV. 159.

their ancestors by composing a book upon their favorite science, which would have equal merit, as a literary composition, with a number of treatises written during the middle ages by various members of the feudal nobility. "Life was not gross and barbarous in these castles and Gothic towers, as we might suppose," says a modern French critic. "Many books of the time breathe a kind of delicate urbanity and generosity worthy of the most civilized age. It seems that almost in every period of the middle ages, whether by a tradition preserved from the old Roman society, or by the effect of a happy nature," (for religion is not taken into account by these philosophers) "some minds did attain to a high degree of moral cultivation." Of this we shall hereafter see abundant evidence. It would be foreign from the design of this enquiry to speak at length of the general manners of the castle life, but a few instances may be produced illustrative of their tendency to assume a mild and humble because a holy tone. The owners of their castles, however barbarous we may think them, at least did not always virtually admonish their guests conversely in the words of St. Bernard, that they should leave their souls without the house, and enter only with their bodies. Over the door of the great tower of the castle of Sévre there were inscribed in marble these words belonging to the arms of Longueil, "Animas colentium te Deus rem et domum tuetur."* In the histories of the saints we are often presented with very interesting views of the interior life of great families in the middle ages.

Thus we read that St. Theresa being an invalid in her father's house he resolved to take her to the country house of his daughter who was lately married. On the road they stopped at the castle of Don Sancho de Pépède, brother of Don Alphonso, and uncle of our saint. Don Sancho kept them in his house, and would not hear of their leaving him. This gentleman was a widower; he had retired to one of his estates, where the love of solitude and the desire of his salvation enabled him to derive the greatest consolations. Holy readings, the delights of prayer, the innocent occupations of rural life, divided his time. It was the reading of some books on the spiritual life, which this old knight put into the hands of his niece, that first inspired her with the thoughts which afterwards enabled her to rise to such a high degree of sublime contemplation. The very announcement of the domestic offices of these houses breathes a tone of devotion. Thus we read, that it was the duty of the porter of the castle to sound the bell of benediction for dinner and supper, to keep clean the niches of the saints of the gate, and to keep their lamp carefully lighted. In his examination of conscience it was a distinct article whether he had ever closed the door against the poor, or against monks, or clerks, or brothers of hospitals who sought alms, or whether he had opened it to lewd singers and dancers, or to receive improper letters, or to persons of evil intention.† But there is no occasion for our delaying any longer amidst these scenes of feudal life, compatible indeed, as we hope to have proved, with the character of the meek, but certainly not the most congenial with the loves of those whose eyes have been opened on the difference between things temporal and eternal. Perhaps we have already halted there too long: there was no Diomedian necessity that we should undertake to dwell upon the praise of nobility; we were not driven to it with hands bound, and the edge of a sword laid upon our shoulders, as was Ulysses when he was driven back to the Greeks without having gained the Palladium from Troy; but it was right to produce some features of its institution and manners in ages of faith, in order to show that men might have been meek Christians, and have had the centurion's faith, though they had vassals under them who came and went at their command, and that there was no insurmountable obstacles in the circumstances of each inhabitant of the embattled towers, to prevent his being able to say with truth in the presence of God, "Non est exaltatum cor meum;" it was right to meet an objection upon which men at present lay such great stress, for they produce their arguments founded on the pride of nobility, like a tower which they keep constantly in view, λίαν, πυργοῖς χάριν, as the Greek poet says;* and after all, it is much to have seen that poverty was not then a crime in the eyes of the rich. We are incessantly told that some feudal towers were in the hands of nobles who pillaged travellers, and it is satisfactory to be able to answer that the roads and villages were secure and open for the wandering poor, whom no haughty baron ever thought of consigning to a prison for the general interest of society. The feudal noble, on the contrary, exercised that Homeric hospitality shown by Nestor who received the two strangers with such kindness, although he thought in his mind that they might be robbers who passed over the watery ways bearing evil to men of other nations.† He was revered and even sacred whoever came wandering :

* Lebeuf, VIII.

† Monteil, Hist. des Français, III. 130.

ἀνδροῶν ὅστις ἱκηται ἀλώμενος.‡

It least of all becomes the men of our age to declaim upon the pride of feudal nobility. But, indeed, as for those who stand near the sweet mountain to inhale the celestial air which descends thence in the refreshing of ambrosial shower, the present retrospect may have been wearisome and tasteless: for how little seems to them all that belongs to the plain which they have left below? To those whose eyes are turned upon the eternal throne of Him who has dissolved the crowns of many cities, and who will dissolve more, for His is the surpassing strength,§ what is nobility of race, what is feudal splendor? why dwell, they may ask us, upon that piety which would have passed unnoticed with the poor? Why describe these brief distinctions which pass like a shadow on the mountain's side, or like a messenger who runs on his way? "Transierunt omnia illa tanquam umbra et tanquam nuncians percurrans."|| Nothing was more dreaded by the early Greeks than the extinction of a family and the destruction of a house, by which the dead lost their

* Medea, 526

† Od. III.

‡ Od. V.

§ Hom. II.

|| Sap. V.

religious honor, the household gods their sacrifices, the hearth its flame, and the ancestors their name among the living ; but is it for Christians to return to these shadows of past things when all things are made new ? Is it for them to search for glories which even this earth has ceased to recognize ? It is a voice in paradise which cried :

—————Mark Luni! Urbisaglia mark!

How they are gone; and after them how go

Chiusi and Sinigaglia; and 'twill seem

No longer new or strange to thee, to hear

That families fail when cities have their end.

All things that appertain to ye, like yourselves

Are mortal; but mortality in some

Ye mark not; they endure so long, and you

Pass by so suddenly.*

What remains of the families sung by Homer, Æschylus, Sophocles, Euripides, and Pindar ? What of the race of Charlemagne, of Alfred, of so many families that shed such a lustre upon our heroic age, which gave imperishable themes to minstrelsy and knighthood to illustrious kings ? Our age has beheld the extinction not alone of families, but of monarchies ; it has beheld the principles themselves that give permanence to civilized society, and a value to the promise of offspring, erased from the constitution of a great people ; it has beheld, and if only for one day there would have been matter for the tears of angels, indifference to religion, that universal solvent of all social harmonies, that fearful representative of atheism, that last heresy which is to precede the tremendous advent, not alone in the shop of the mechanic, not alone on the tongue of creeping sophists, but reigning in principle on the throne of Saint Louis.

We began by dreading to approach this subject of nobility : we only expected deliverance from the sea of this discourse, as Plato says, either by means of some dolphin coming up to us or by some other unexpected deliverer. Reader ! thou wert aware how perilous was the passage ; how only by yielding much we could avoid the shock of its proud billows. But say has the great difficulty been overcome ? Have we shown that it was possible to reconcile these institutions and manners with meekness ? We only sought a chance for these men, and is this now granted ? I am of opinion that we have escaped, and, indeed, it was a formidable danger. So now then I think we may glide on cheerfully, and hope "o'er better waves to speed."

* Dante, XVI.

CHAPTER

Students

Library

THE last development of the principle of meekness which the present view of history will propose to our consideration is seen in the rise of associations among the lower ranks of the Catholic state, and this will lead us at the same time to observe what were the characteristic features and employments of that class of men during the ages of faith, when the people showed forth the wisdom of the saints, while the Church declared their praise. The modern writers acknowledge that the Catholic religion has been the origin of associations.* “Ecclesia in commune orat,” says St. Ambrose, “et in commune operatur.”† The spirit of the Church is eminently social, and opposed essentially to that isolation which appears now equally as the source and fruits of misanthropy in men and nations. Wherever the modern philosophy triumphs, all associations dissolve before it, and the state becomes only a nation of individuals, of wretched men, who have recourse to a system of desolating fatalism, in order to account for their position in regard to life, and to justify their hatred of mankind. Lo ! where stands solitary a sublime unhappy spirit that has lately passed upon the earth ; he will instruct us if we hearken. “I found myself alone,” it cries, “on entering the world, alone in my house, and I shall die alone. I am a being essentially solitary, not from choice, but from necessity.” In the ages of faith, it would not have been so with him. We have seen that the spirit of association entered virtually into the courts of nobles, and we shall hereafter observe it in fuller action in the great religious institutions which then covered Europe. It is pride which has dissolved the Catholic associations of the middle ages ; it is pride which renders men isolated in the modern states ; for each man disclaims to be regarded as a member of any body which does not immediately of itself minister to pride by conveying a title to some material advantage, such as the reputation of science, learning, rank, or riches. To associate together to honor God would be a thing in their eyes ridiculous to the last degree, and yet to associate together with any object which does not include this, is only preparing a fresh link to that long chain of disappointed hopes which men drag after them to their graves. There is no alternative between the society of the saints, and the solitude of sin ; an age of pride must be also an age of isolation. The middle ages understood that man is born for society ; they knew, as Bonald says, “that such is the general law, that men receive from one another physical existence by generation, moral existence by language, and religious knowledge by communication, according to the apostolic words, Fides ex auditu.”* Human intelligence was therefore employed in directing the creative and associating spirit of charity to form those numerous colleges, universities, orders, congregations, and brotherhoods, which opened an asylum for every want, and a prospect of fulfilment for every desire of the human soul. It is with the latter we shall be now occupied. Tertullian is an evidence that these different fraternities were as old as the first days of Christianity with which they arose. They were instituted to facilitate the salvation of souls, and to edify the Church, in order that under the fraternal crown of the martyrs the meek might rejoice, and obtain for their faith increase of virtues, and might be consoled by multiplied suffrages. Such was that institute at Paris in the year 1168, called the Confrérie de Notre Dame, composed of thirty-six priests and thirty-six laymen, in memory of the seventy-two disciples of Jesus Christ. In the year 1224 women were admitted into it. Such were also the fraternities of the blessed sacrament, of the holy name of Jesus, of the blessed Virgin, and others. There were others whose specific object was to assist the poor, to tend the sick, to bury the dead. Others had their origin in pilgrimages; those who had made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, to Compostella, or to mount St. Michael, entered into their respective fraternity in Paris. Others were established by merchants to draw down the blessing of Heaven upon their commerce; such was the Confrérie des Marchands de l'eau at Paris, in the year 1170, of those who conducted the trade on the Seine.

* De Laborde sur l’Esprit d’Association.

† De Off. lib. I. 29.

There were also fraternities instituted by officers of justice, notaries and artisans, all of whom had their respective patrons, churches, statues, and banners.† Great seigneurs in Flanders used to consider it an honor to be received into a corporation, or fraternity of merchants or artisans. At Paris the community of brethren shoemakers was formed in the year 1645, by the charity of the Baron de Rentè. He had already procured instruction for the poor inmates of the hospital of St. Gervais, and he wished to extend this benefit to the artisans, who were in danger of profaning the Sundays and festivals through ignorance and the corrupt habits of life which were then commencing. With this view he associated himself with a shoemaker, whose virtue was so well known that he was generally called le bon Henri. This poor man being thus encouraged, assembled some people of his condition; and a doctor of the Sarbonne gave them rules, and they commenced their exercises. They worked and ate in common, recited certain prayers and psalms, and gave the surplus of their profits to the poor.‡ Similar associations existed in every country of Christendom, and in none were they more numerous than in our own. Machiavel describes the citizens of Florence as divided into numerous bodies of trades, each having rules and banners peculiar to it. A number of Lombards,

* Législat. Prim. III. 34.

† De St. Victor, Tableau de Paris, tom I. 564.

‡ Idem, tom. III. II. 616.

particularly Milanese, being banished into Germany by Henry I., in the year 1014, in order to console themselves, joined in a devout society, which, as a sign of Christian humiliation, they called the humbled, uniliati. Professing to live by the work of their own hands, they applied to various trades, and particularly to the wool trade, and to the making of cloth. Returning to their country in 1019 they preserved their manner of living; they assembled on particular days in houses purchased at the common expense, afterwards united together in convents, where they worked conjointly. Down to the year 1140 they were all laymen; but at that time an order of religious priests was formed who did not work, but directed the labor of the laymen. The lamb was their emblem. Their rule was approved of by Innocent III., and by other pontiffs. They acquired riches, while their diligence and honesty caused them to be sought for by the government for various offices. In Como charge was given them of the weights and measures; in Florence they had various public duties. They furnished preachers and authors, of whom a long list may be seen in Tiraboschi.*

Unhappily they did not escape the degeneracy which accompanied the rise of the Lutheran heresy, and as they resisted the reform which the cardinal Borromeo endeavored to effect, they were suppressed by Pius V. in 1571. In the eighth century these mutual societies and anniversaries in commendation of the living and the dead had been greatly multiplied. A remarkable instance is furnished by Bede, who as a reward for the life which he has written of St. Cuthbert, asks in the prologue addressed to Eadfrid the monk and bishop of Lindisfarne, that he would inscribe his name among those of that society for whose souls after death the holy sacrifice was offered, that in testimony of this future aid he would give orders that his name might appear from that time in the album of their holy congregation. Many other examples occur in the epistles of St. Boniface. Briefs used to be sent from one place to another, containing the names of the persons who desired to be united in the suffrages, and the laity of all ranks, as well as the clergy, were in habits of desiring of this grace. Persons thus inscribed were entitled Fratres Conscripti, as appears from Goldasta on the monastery of St. Gall. The fraternity of the Holy Trinity was founded in the year 1373, in the reign of Edward III. The members were bound to maintain thirteen wax lights burning about the sepulchre in the church of St. Botolph Aldersgate, in the Easter time, and they were to make their offerings and hear mass on Trinity day. They had a common hall; their chaplain was to say mass every day in the year, winter and summer, by five o'clock. A dirge was to be sung on the Sunday night after All Souls' day, and on the morrow a requiem for the dead brothers and sisters. One statute of the order says, "gif eny of the bretherhode be a losed of eny theft, or he be an comm' contellaur, or com'n hasardour, or of eny oth' wycked fame, it is ordeyned that theii ben vputte out of the breth'hode." Taillepiet says, "the people of Rouen are so devout towards God and his saints, that to encourage and excite each other to live virtuously, and to recommend themselves to the prayers of the saints of paradise, they have instituted such a number of fraternities that there is not a trade or condition which has not one belonging to it.* Some are common to all persons, as that of the blessed sacrament, and that of St. Romain; The singers have their fraternity of St. Cecilia, the notaries theirs of St. Mark, the lawyers theirs of St. Yves, the boys and children of the town have theirs in the church of mount St. Catherine, the jewellers theirs in that of St. Eloy, the poets and orators, the merchants, the butchers, the brewers, the cooks, and the tailors, have all their fraternities. The carters celebrate their fraternity on the day of the three kings. The mariners, masons, painters fruiterers, shoemakers, dyers, bakers, porters, fullers, arquebuss-makers, surgeons and barbers, soap-makers, mercers, and carders, have all their particular fraternity dedicated under the invocation of some saint, on whose festival they have a high mass, celebrated with a sermon and procession, and a banquet afterwards; besides every week they have one mass celebrated for them; and when any brother dies the rest assist at his funeral with lighted tapers, and the fraternity bears the expense; and besides this there is one fraternity for all the dead. The members of all these fraternities are commanded to do works of charity, to visit hospitals, to assist widows and orphans, to visit the sick and the prisoners, to bury the dead, to found sermons for the instruction of the ignorant. There is extant," continues Taillepied, "a letter of St. Paulin, bishop of Nola, in praise of St. Victrice, archbishop of Rouen, in the time of St. Martin of Tours, in which he says that St. Victrice had announced the name of Jesus Christ with such success that the city of Rouen was celebrated throughout the world, and that in the West it was as much venerated for its holiness as was Jerusalem in the East; for as many came to Jerusalem to contemplate the holy places, so do multitudes repair to Rouen to contemplate the holiness of St. Victrice, and to see its magnificent monasteries and churches." These fraternities were even encouragers of literature. In the time of William the Conqueror, that of the Conception, in the church of the Carmelites at Rouen, used to give every year a prize to those who would make the best hymn, ode, sonnet, royal song, rondeau, ballad, or other laudatory poem, in praise of the blessed Virgin. A similar custom was observed by the fraternity of St. Cecilia in the church of our Lady, and the citizens of Dieppe followed this example. Taillepied gives specimens of the successful pieces in the year in which he wrote his Antiquities.

* Humiliat. hist.

Charity and piety were, however, the chief objects of these institutions. The silversmiths sent a large sum every year to the Hôtel-Dieu at Paris, to assist the poor workmen of their body, and in 1399 they built a separate hospital, with a chapel, to receive such as were aged or infirm, and also widows.† In every trade by the statutes of the fraternity, masters were bound to assist their workmen when they were in distress. If sick they were to be taken care of, if dead to be buried, if they left widows and orphans these were to be supported and educated, and portioned and enabled to marry.* In the year 1830 it was stated in London that the Ironmongers' fraternity were then in possession of 104,000*l.*, and of 3,000*l.* per annum, accumulated in their hands from ancient donations, which had been destined for the redemption of Christian slaves on the Barbary coast. It was stated that they could not find objects for their bounty. The laws of these fraternities of artisans were also directed to watch over the morality of the members; they were forbidden to live in sin. Luxury was prohibited, the necessity for which restraint is sufficiently remarkable, and the expense of their banquet on the reception of a master was not to exceed ten sous; but the members of these fraternities were to invite each other to their family banquets on occasion of a marriage or christening.† Any act of dishonesty caused a forfeiture of all the privileges of the fraternity. Apprentices in every trade were only such as were born of legal marriage. The bastard of Arminhac holding his baton of marshal of France, the bastard of Burgundy seated on his high daice, the bastard of Orleans proclaimed the deliverer of France, unless the statutes of every fraternity were changed, could not be received in any one of them. This is the observation of Monteil. There were guardians to watch that the workmen took their rest, and did not labor on days of festival, or during the hours of repast, or too early, or too late. If any master or apprentice was suspected of having any immoral connection he was to be expelled by the fraternity, losing all the rights and privileges and claims attached to it.‡ If Catholic artisans lived among Pagans, or among the Moors, no consideration of profit or esteem of neighbors was admitted as a justification for their exposing goods to sale upon a festival, an example which may startle some of London who now drive their traffic, though within Geneva's walls, where the quick flight of wanderers would furnish more excuse, it can be witnessed still. No master, or apprentice, or servant, was to receive or work under any one that was excommunicated. If any one were known to play at dice, or even at an honest game on the vigil of Christmas, or of the Epiphany, he was to forfeit his privileges for a year. In some places these fraternities chose a patron peculiar to themselves only within that neighborhood. This was the case in the town of St. Denis, where the masons adopted St. Betesus as their patron, and assembled to celebrate his festival solemnly in the church of St. Marcel, which contained his relics, for this saint has been a common mason of the town.§ In all solemn processions artisans walked under the respective banners of their trades, representing the patron of the fraternity. Thus in France the silversmiths and founders, blacksmiths and cutlers, carried the banner of St. Eloy, masons and stone-cutters that of St. Blaise, potters and tile-makers that of St. Fiacre, carpenters that

* Recueil des antiquitez et singularitez de Rouen, 58. † St. Victor, I. 627. Tableau de Paris.

* Monteil, Hist. des Français, tom. III. 315.

† Monteil, III. 293.

‡ Monteil, Lettres des rois relative à l'homologation des statuts des differens corps de métier.

§ Lebeuf, Hist. du Diocese de Paris, tom. III. 219.

of St. Joseph, glaziers that of St. Mark, harbers that of St. Cosma, brewers that of St. Amand, bakers that of St. Honoré, wax chandlers that of St. Nicholas, farriers that of St. John the Baptist, shoe-makers that of St. Crispin, drapers that of the Annunciation, weavers that of St. Arregonde, clothiers that of our Lady, silk-mercers that of our Lady-the-rich, dyers that of St. Maurice, tailors that of St. Lucy, makers of amesses, which were long hoods covering the head worn by women, and clerks and solemn laymen* that of St. Severus, embroiderers that of St. Clair, weavers of tapestry to cover the walls of churches and castles that of St. Francis, rope-makers that of St. Paul, paper-makers and book-binders that of St. John-port-Latin. The fraternity of each trade, wherever there was an abbey of their patron in their neighborhood, used to dine there on their festival. Thus at Rouen the master brewers used to dine in the refectory of the abbey of St. Amand on their festival.

Each fraternity had devotional exercises, and a church assigned to it, where the obsequies of every member were solemnized with great lights at the expense of all the members. These details may be deemed trifling, and an evidence of nothing substantial, but yet what a beautiful picture do they furnish of the harmony prevailing between the different orders of the state during ages of faith, of the consolations provided for the laborious poor and of the restraints imposed upon the avarice of masters! From this picture of society we can understand how in a Catholic city the most utter stranger never felt himself isolated: there were so many beautiful harmonies, so many affecting relations in which he found a bond of union with all the persons around him, who all seemed to walk in love as most dear children of Jesus Christ, and followers of God. With the young and old he might instantly have been united in some pious association, in the exercises of which he recognized their tender love for all that was dear and venerable to him from his days of sinless youth. How could he feel himself a stranger among such men? he could serve at mass in their common temples, he could walk with their children in their solemn processions, he could repair every evening to their pious assemblies round the divine altars, where like one family they adored their Saviour, and heard the exhortation of some meek man of God, who seemed like a common father to them all, who every day offered up the oblation of their lowliness, praying that it might be pleasing to Almighty God in honor of his saints, and that it might purify them in body and mind through Christ their Lord.

Another very striking characteristic of the Catholic society was the religious and even poetic character which the most ordinary and vulgar employments of the lower ranks acquired by their association with some sublime affecting mystery, the memory of which would bring every high thought into captivity, and dissolve the soul in a transport of amaze and love seraphic. These poor mechanical and rustic trades, which the ancients held in such contempt, assumed quite a new

* Ducange, Gloss. v, Almacia.

character; for besides that the Catholic religion, from being eminently averse to all singularity, while it respected the privileges of the great, left the affections on the side of the people, whose employments became therefore estimable even to the imagination, it furnished also particular motives for viewing them with especial regard. The trades of the people had been exercised by Christ and by his apostles: in the poor carpenter men would behold St. Joseph; and perhaps from some person of tender susceptibility the sight of his apprentice would cause a tear to fall, a sweet tear of gratitude and devout amaze. A soft hallowed light was shed round every pathway of life, however humble. In simple shepherds were seen those who hastened to the stable on the blessed night, to give faith to Mary;* in fishermen were beheld companions of those who were obedient to the call of Christ. Ah! let the modern sophists blush for their own report, if no pity move them for us. They may now compose as many treatises, as they have ruins made, on the utility of associations and friendly societies among the laboring classes; they will never confer a benefit on men as great as that which their predecessors took from them. These poor meek banners of St. Joseph of the Annunciation and of St. Paul, these airy unsubstantial things, as they appear to some, were worth more than thousands of their pompous books and libraries that are styled of useful knowledge! With respect to the employments themselves, there are some observations still to offer. The primitive Christians, in following different trades, chose such as were the most innocent and most favorable to retreat and humility; and these were always subordinate to religion, which was the principal and, as it were, only business of their lives. Their profession was simply to be Christians: they avoided as far as possible all professions which engross and dissipate the mind too much. Fleury's description† might stand for that of the middle ages. Can we doubt of it when we read the modern books so full of disdain for what they term the depressing power of superstition, which acted upon them? It was deemed imprudent in public penitents to return to the mercantile profession, for, says Pope St. Leo to Rusticus of Narbonne, "It is more advantageous to the penitent to suffer some temporal loss, than to expose himself to the perils of commerce, for it is difficult to prevent sin from gliding into this reciprocal office of buying and selling." Deguignes speaks of religion being made a pretense for the pursuit of commerce; but it would be more correct to say that commerce was made an instrument for furthering the interests of religion. It was the merchants at Paris who facilitated the correspondence between St. Genevieve and St. Symeon-Stylites at Antioch;‡ it was they who furnished St. Eloy with the precious materials which he was to employ in shrines: it was the traders of the Levant, who, under the direction of Popes, founded schools for the oriental languages which were to be employed in the conversion of the infidels. St. Gregory of Tours speaks of merchants of Syria who brought their relics of saints into France; of others who supplied hermits

* St. Ambrose.

† Mœurs des Chrétiens, 47—50.

‡ Ball, Vie de St. Genevieve, c. vi.

during Lent with roots of Egypt ; and others were unceasingly employed in redeeming captives. We shall continue to meet with proofs that the vices of the middle and commercial ranks, during the middle ages, were at least not connected with the detestable love of sordid gain. The noble reply of Hegio to the captives in the old Roman play, spoke the sentiments which belonged not exclusively to heroic youths but to merchants and mechanics in Christian ages.

Non ego omnino lucrum omne esse utile homini existimo.
 Scio ego, multos jam lucrum luculentos homines reddidit.
 Est etiam, ubi profecto damnum præste facere quam lucrum.
 Odi ego aurum : multa multis sæpe suasit perperam.*

The old poet Charles Fontaine ascribes to his father these sentiments, joined with the love for literature.

Loyal marchand ; tel estoit son renom,
 Dès son jeune âge avoit science acquise,
 Qu'il estimoit plus que sa marchandise.
 Toujours hautoit les lettres et lettrez,
 Non les grand gens richement accoutrez.†

But with this noble spirit, discoveries in the arts, the ἀρχαία σοφίσματα, of which Pindar speaks ‡ as being taught by time, and to which Æschylus also applies the same word, were cultivated with a diligence and a success of which, as I remarked in the introduction to the first book, no other period of the world can furnish an example. Still, these discoveries had also a connection with some liberal noble and even religious end ; they were all Promethean, not for the injury but for the immediate benefit of men. Far different was their spirit from that of these modern mechanics so cunning with their hands like Sisyphus, πικρότατον παλάμαις;§ “fools,” cries an English writer, “who account themselves honored with the shameful title of being the inventors of evil things, endeavoring to out-infinite God’s kindness with their cruelty.” The list of trades as set forth in a charter of Philip Augustus shows a great predominance of the liberal arts. Thus at that time the principal trades which formed privileged corporations and had kings of arms, were silver-smiths, workers of sacred ornaments in gold, coral, shell, jet, and amber, cutters of chrystal and precious stones, silk-weavers, founders and carvers of brass, makers of lamps and chandeliers, weavers of tapestry, makers of crucifixes and images of the saints, makers of chaplets of flowers and feathers of peacocks, and along with these there appear only bakers, tavern keepers, makers of halberds and locks, carpenters, stone-masons, dyers of cloth, makers of bows and arrows, and those who ornament the guards of swords,

* Plautus Capteivi, II. 2.

† Olymp. XIII.

‡ Gouget Bibliothéque Française, tom. XI. 115.

§ Pindar, Olymp. XIII.

fishermen and saddlers, the last of whom, at least, Homer would have commemorated as worthy of the same praise which he bestows upon Menestheus.

τῷ δ' οὐ πῶ τις ὁμοῖος ἐπιχθόνιος χεῖρετ' ἀνῆρ, κοσμήσθαι ἵππους τε καὶ ἀνέρας ἀσπίδιώτατος.*

In the common estimation of men, the members of these different trades were persons entitled to respect, and many of them were even exercised by the companions of nobles. In the fifteenth century it was deemed no derogation to a scholar, bachelor, master of arts, or one entitled "honorable" to be a printer and book-seller.† Every thing relative to men was raised in dignity by the principles of the Catholic religion; for meekness in manners was not an hypocrisy, but the manly expression of a sincere conviction. To these various professions I shall only add, as forming a curious and truly Homeric personage of the middle ages, the office of a messenger, to which Monteil has done full justice. There was the messenger of the university, the flying messenger, who could speak Latin, and who used to sing his hours as he rode along, "par monts et par vaux." Even gentlemen used to charge themselves with messages and letters, travelling night and day to serve great lords and others. There was the feudal messenger, the messenger of men of arms who had to ride from castle to castle; there were foot messengers, town messengers, and church messengers.

In 1464 posts were established in France, which proved fatal to this profession. Before that time the conveyance of letters and paquets belonged almost everywhere to the universities. That of Paris had at least 100 messengers under its orders. But on the whole it is to be remembered, that the religious and poetical character of these ages was unfavorable to many branches of industry which now may appear to flourish, even under the circumstances of a state of continued concealed or open war between the masters and their laborers. The race of men who seem to have no conception of moral and social perfection beyond what is implied in the smoke of a steam engine, did not then exist. Men exercised themselves in honest and useful employments, but not with an insatiable thirst for gold and a heart hardened against the harmonies of life, against the associations of poetry, against the movement of humanity, and the inspirations of religion. Neither in their intellectual nor bodily discipline did they resemble the heretical race who, as they inquire for the sake of inquiry, so do they seem to labor for the sake of labor. "We are called to liberty," they might have said, "and we desire not to sacrifice the whole of our time about interests of money, in which there is no companionship; we require intervals of leisure for our religious exercises, for the festivals of the Church, for the recreation of our minds, for the improvement of our various intellectual powers. In this we give no just cause of offence for any one to condemn our faith, if he also respects it; but if he will only hearken to arguments drawn from natural reason he must admit that this is a question of which, as far as respects ourselves, we are the best judges, and we will therefore give him his dismissal in the words of Plato: οὐδέν γε δεινὸν ποιούμεν, κρίνοντες τὸν Ἀπόλλω καὶ τὰ τοῦ Ἀπόλλωνος ὄργανα πρὸ Μαρσύου τε καὶ τῶν ἐκείνου ὀργάνων.”*

* II. II. 552

† L'imprimerie par La Caille XV. Siecle.

The various civil dignitaries of the social order during the ages of faith have now passed before us in all their relations; we have beheld the ancient magistrates, counsellors, nobles, and kings; it would be unjust to pass on without taking notice of the humble members of a Catholic state, upon whose character the history of Christian associations has already thrown such light, and in whose manners there will be found so much to interest the historian and the philosophic observer of mankind; but as it would be difficult to make a selection from such a multitude of examples as present themselves incidentally in history to the mind of accurate and reflecting readers, it will, perhaps, be sufficient to choose one of whose life we have the most curious details given by a very ancient writer, himself a saint, and in whose manners we can behold not only the singular merit which has entitled him to the veneration of the Church, but also the general tone and habits which belonged during these ages, in some degree or other, to a multitude of persons who trod the same paths with him. Eligius or Eloy, says his contemporary St. Ouen, born of devout parents, at Limoges, was placed as an apprentice to “an honorable man, by name Abbo, who was a silversmith and kept a public shop! He was a pious youth and very skillful in whatever he undertook; he used diligently to assist at the divine offices in the churches, and whatever he heard there used to be the subject of his meditation when he returned home. He became known to king Clotaire, who gave him abundance of employment; and on the death of this king, his son and successor, king Dagobert, treated Eligius with no less kindness. His integrity and diligence, his piety and meekness, his charity and mortification, were beyond all description. While at work, he had always some holy page open before him, that his mind as well as his hands might be well employed. His fame was so spread that whenever strangers from Italy or Gothland came to the royal palace, they would first pay a visit to Eligius; and also holy men and poor people and monks used to come to him in crowds. His great desire was to redeem captives” (we have seen what zeal was evinced in this respect by the fraternity in London of Ironmongers), “and sometimes he used to deliver at once as many as thirty, and fifty, and even one hundred, for ships used often to arrive with that number on board of Romans, or Gauls, or Britons, or even of Moors, but especially of Saxons, who at that time used to be carried off from their country in whole droves like cattle;” (for paganism had still great power, and the inhabitants of the sea coasts were for the most part pagans) “and if his money failed he would give his clothes, or his food, his belt, or his shoes to redeem them. He used to give these redeemed captives the choice of three things. If they wished to return to their own country, he would supply them with means to regain it. If they wished to remain where they were, he undertook to provide for them, so that they should live, not as slaves, but as his own brethren. If he could persuade them to engage in the monastic life, he treated them as his lords, and supplied them with what was necessary. He had many holy laymen living with him in his house.

*De Repub. III.

When any stranger asked for his house, 'go into such a street,' he would be told, 'and where you will see a number of poor people there you will find his door.' He used to send out his servant to seek for poor strangers to invite them to hospitality, and he used to serve them with his own hands. The king and rich men used often to send him bread and other necessities, which he used to distribute to the poor. He used to pray and sing Psalms during the night, keeping vigils, and if the king would send for him suddenly, he would never go until he had fulfilled his service to Christ. * Being sent on a journey into Britain, he gave large alms on his way, for his thoughts always rested on the sentence of the apostle, 'Habentes victum et vestitum, his contenti simus; nam qui volunt divites fieri, incidunt in tentationem et laqueum diaboli.' Having obtained a villa from the king, he built a monastery on it, and whatever property was given to him he destined to support it. Here were many religious who were skilled in arts. It was a fertile and agreeable spot, so beautiful that when any one tarried there, finding himself among gardens and groves of apple, he might exclaim, 'quam bonæ domus tuæ, Jacob,' et 'quam pulchra tabernacula tua Israel!' like the shadowy woods, like the cedar near the waters, like a Paradise on the river's bank. 'Habitacula justorum benedicentur.' It is surrounded with a ditch and a hedge, and comprises a space of ten stadia, by the side of a river, with a mountain crowning it, covered with wood and breaking out into steep rocks, while the whole space is full of fruit trees. Thus the mind is refreshed, and may congratulate itself in enjoying in some measure the sweets of Paradise. Moreover, he built a Xenodochium in the city of Paris for poor maidens: he built also and restored several churches, and covered them with lead. Thus was he bountiful in alms, sedulous in watching, devout in prayer, perfect in charity, profound in humility, excellent in doctrine, ready in speech, most holy in conversation, bound by no chains to the world, active in ministering to the servants of God, solicitous to redeem captives, brave in suffering hardships, cheerful in good works, generous in hospitality. Nothing could be more clement than his mind, nothing sweeter than his severity, 'Nihil risu gravius, nihil prorsus tristia suavius.'

Under a laic habit he had a mellifluous doctrine from God filled with the Holy Spirit, with the desire of Christ, and of eternal happiness, and being forgetful of secular dignities, he had all his conversation with the poor, and with monks, 'omne consortium cum egenis haberet et monachis.' Though monks used to flock to him, yet he was never satiated with their conversation, so that he would often repair to divers solemn monasteries. Who could describe with what devotion, with what humility he would enter the monastery and walk among the brethren! It was his custom on a journey, if he knew that the same night he could visit a monastery or a church, or any religious man, he would never take food till he arrived there, and the last three or four miles he would go on foot, and then would he eat their eulogia fasting. This blessed man among other good works made a great number of rich shrines composed of gold, and silver, and precious stones; as those of Germanus, Severinus, Quintinus, Genoveva, Columban, Maximian, and above all of the blessed Martin of Tours: king Dagobert was at the expense of the materials. Also he made the mausoleum of St. Denis, at Paris, and adorned the altars and the doors with silver metal. This was the time when heresy afflicted the empire, and many heretics came into Gaul. Eligius reclaimed several of them, 'erat enim ipse in studio Scripturarum subtilissimus,' and being himself sufficiently instructed he went about among the people with evangelical exhortations, teaching them to persevere irrevocably in the faith of Christ, and to beware of the contagion of the heretics: he was subject to the king, and devout to Christ; he prayed frequently, according to the apostle, for kings and for those who are in high station, that men might lead a quiet and tranquil life in all piety and charity. So that under the laic habit he possessed the priestly grace, an indication of his future destiny. Oh what a perfect layman, whom priests themselves might desire to imitate! O mind worthy of being celebrated by all to whom to live was only Christ, only to fear him with love, and to love him with fear! O happy foe to this world, to whom the world was crucified, as was he to the world!"* Here concludes that part of the life of this saintly man which was spent in the exercise of his humble trade: henceforth he goes on to greater blessedness, but as occasion is not given us now to view the graces of his ecclesiastical life, we shall take leave of him for the present with submissive reverence, although with the earnest hope that we shall meet again in the cloisters of Noyon.

Such then are a few of the leading facts presented in this history, of the associations and employments of the middle and lowest ranks of society during the ages of faith. Perhaps the prospect held out to the reader in the commencement of this path was not inviting, but it seems indeed to have supplied much that may give us pause if pondered fittingly. It was impossible to impart dignity to such a subject, and to speak of the most ordinary trades in a manner that would prove agreeable seemed difficult; but although Callimachus might turn away in contempt, our offering is, as it were, a Cyclic rhapsody which can omit mention of nothing however little or common, and it appears as if in this instance it has made us acquainted with circumstances and with personages, such as no one meekly wise can reasonably disdain. The truth is, that the Catholic religion enjoys that privilege which belongs in a lower degree, to genius, of ennobling what to us without it appears common, and beautiful is every path on which its light has shone. But henceforth, reader, be assured my theme will rise, for this humble pathway has conducted us to the confines of that happy earth, the pledge and earnest of eternal peace which the meek do now inherit. We from this stage of our course proceed like those who journey over a plain, gazing intent through the evening sky upon some noble mountains crowned with holy towers, the object of their vow, which stretch in purple splendor against the bright vespertine ray. But here must we pause awhile and gather strength as wearied men halt when they first gain sight of home. A short space separates us from the realm of joy ; if no interruption should occur to our remaining enterprise, I shall in the next book endeavor to trace its shadowed form, and set it forth to view.

* Vita Sancti Eligii Episcop. S. Audœni auct. apud Dachet. Spicilegium, tom. V.

END OF THE SECOND BOOK.

MORES CATHOLICI;

OR,

AGES OF FAITH.

BOOK III.

MORES CATHOLICI;

OR

AGES OF FAITH.

THE THIRD BOOK.

CHAPTER I.

HAT the meek were blessed has already been seen incidentally in surveying the development of the mild and humble spirit in the reciprocal relations of political order, but in what manner they truly inherited the earth remains to be shown; and the attempt to explain this in reference to the history of the ages of faith, will constitute the subject of the present book.

“Beati mites,” has been hitherto our theme, but now we must attend to the conclusion of that sentence, “quoniam ipsi possidebunt terram,” and mark well the saintly commentators’ distinction, who add with St. Jerome, “not the land of Juda,” nor the land of this world “whose base affection many a spirit soils;” not the cursed deceitful land which beareth thorns and briars, which the cruellest warrior rather may possess, but the land which the Psalmist desired, saying, “Credo videre bona domini in terra viventium :” “for no one can possess the former land by meekness, but by pride.”* “Beati mites : quoniam ipsi hereditate possidebunt terram,” “that earth I believe,” continues St. Augustin, of which it is said in the Psalm, “Spes mea es tu, portio mea in terra viventium :” for it signifies a certain solidity and stability of perpetual inheritance where the soul by a good affection rests in its place as the body rests upon the earth; this is the rest and life of the saints; of the meek who yield to improbity and resist not evil, but overcome evil by good.† “What then are the riches that the earth will offer to them? They shall be delighted in the multitude of peace. The proud are delighted in the multitude of gold, in the multitude of slaves, in the multitude of luxurious banquets; but what will be the riches and the delights of the meek?”

* St. Hieronym, Comment in Matth. v. † St. August. Lib. I. de Serm. Dom. in Monte.

The multitude of peace. Their gold will be peace, their possessions peace, their life peace; they will love and desire it in their houses, in their business, in their wives, in their children, in their servants, in their friends, in their enemies: whatever they possess or desire will be peace to them; for God will be their peace for ever." * Nevertheless, though it was promised that the meek should inherit the earth, yet the redeemed children of the holy discipline were not like the Jews to be always looking for a temporal reward and blessing which would often be interrupted by that necessary sword which Christ came to send, or by that more ancient trial imposed in the command "Egredere de terra tua et de cognatione tua." They were not to possess the earth according to the conception of those who were immersed in matter and inextricably entangled in the net of the senses. The Israelites themselves were not to possess it like the Philistians, of whom we are told, that they had fat beeves and abundance of store, and of all that could gratify mere animal life.

The first that sought to live on this earth like an inhabitant thereof, being indeed but a stranger and pilgrim, was Cain, and that the reprobate race may in a certain sense gain possession of the earth, is an evident fact, which must not be denied through that reckless love of antithesis in which some writers indulge according to the license of those associated with Nicole, who says, "It is the condition of man to have God or nothing:" on the contrary, we read that the devil would have given our blessed Lord all the kingdoms that he showed him from the pinnacle of the temple, if he would have worshipped him: and until God will arise to judgment that he may save all the meek upon the earth, that adversary has beyond all doubt permission to bestow gifts on such men as consent to serve him, of which power, without recurring to fable, the world has in different ages beheld wondrous and fearful examples. Yet, on the other hand, the lofty and inspiring doctrines of the bright school must not be forgotten, which affirm that the real possession of the earth, and of its genuine good, can never be obtained by any excepting by those to whom that possession is promised; for not to insist upon the explanation of St. Cyril of Jerusalem, who supposes that Satan lied when he said he would give all that to our Saviour, as if it had been at his disposal, † is it not clear to the dullest apprehension, that, in order to enjoy the fruits of a real possession, something more is required than the bare material and external gift, or the mere nominal right? for that these do not always of necessity confer the real personal good, may be witnessed in a thousand families and unquestionable instances; so that strictly speaking, not only according to the deepest conceptions of philosophical truth, but from the observation of the undeniable facts in human life, it may be said, that the proud or wicked can possess nothing, since every thing is evil to them, which is itself nothing. Sin and evil cannot have a substantial existence. "There is no substance of evil," says St. Basil, "for malice is not any thing subsisting." And St. Gregory Nazianzen says, "there is no essence of evil, nor does it subsist by itself, nor was it created by God;" and St. Epiphanius says, "there is no evil by itself subsisting." St. Augustine also says, "iniquity of itself is no substance, for iniquity is not the nature which God formed, but it is the perversity which man made; all natures are made by God: iniquity has not been made by itself; because iniquity has not been made."*

* Id. Tractat. in Ps. xxxvi. et in Ps. cxlvii.

† Cateches. VIII.

The meek Hildegard expresses this with scholastic brevity, in writing to Eberhard, Bishop of Bamberg, "All things are made by God, and without him is nothing made, and this nothing is pride,"† which the wicked alone possess. So that in fine to convey an idea of the possessions of the proud, one might borrow a similitude from those popular fables which represent the splendor and beauty of the elfin elysium, in which to the eye of a seer, the illusion vanishes at the first glance, the young knights and beautiful damsels showing themselves as wrinkled carles and odious hags, their wealth turning into slate stones, their splendid plate into pieces of clay, phantastically twisted, and their stately halls changing into miserable damp caverns; an emblem, if rightly understood, teaching the real and inevitable condition which awaits the ambition of the proud; for as Cardan says, "Human things are rather shadows in the imagination, than essences of real subsistence."‡ On the other hand, it would be easy to show that the meek preservers of the interior life, can impart reality to earthly things by connecting them with what essentially exists in God; and not only that, but by faithfully continuing in obedience to the will of their Creator, beholding him in all creatures, and praising him in all their actions; besides really enjoying the positive material advantages which flow to them from all creatures, they are enabled to draw even higher and spiritual treasures of consolation, and rapture, from possessing somewhat of the very essence by which these creatures subsist. The world which the little flock was not to love, is not the beautiful creation of God, which with such multifarious excellence declares his wisdom, his beneficence, and his glory; it was by conquering himself, as the holy Columban said, that man was to trample upon the world "in se enim solo mundum aut diligit aut odit."§ The world which he was to detest, had no more a material existence than the vice and evil which are a shadow in the embraces of the wicked: but as for the innocent, the admirable, and lovely creatures of God, they were to be hallowed and received with thanksgiving. The moderns, indeed, entertain such erroneous notions of spirituality in their theoretical contempt for matter, that not only would these sentiments be inadmissible to them, if they were with themselves consistent, but, according to their principles, it would be impossible to account for the creation of the material universe: but in Catholic philosophy there is no contradiction of the wisdom of nature, and the consequences of the Manichean opinion are, therefore, excluded. In a Catholic country every thing, to the eye of faith, seems to acquire a new and supernatural value, being sanctified to the holy end of supplying the spiritual necessities of redeemed men, and of glorifying God, both as Creator and Restorer. Harmony and innocence seem to reign there amidst creatures, as if they were no longer subject to vanity, and as if men were again placed like Adam in some other paradise of pleasure. The marble and gold of the mountain, the cedar and oak of the forest, and the flowers of the enamelled meadow, seem all to have a reverence to the divine temples, and to the mystic beauty of holiness, and to have acquired in some sense an eternal duration. They who have minds capable of feeling the charm of beauty in material form, on descending into Italy perceive at once that it is the religion of the meek which has created in it such a multitude of lovely objects, and given men the means of really possessing the earth, changing its stones into magnificent churches, its metals into gorgeous altars, its minerals into exquisite paintings, crowning its hills with noble convents, and sprinkling its verdant plains with chapels and oratories; and, accordingly, we find that while the moderns ascribe their external prosperity, which by the way is always attended with the deformity that accompanies moral disorder, to their industry, to their superior skill and higher spirit, to the influence of their chosen system of philosophy, or to something arising from themselves, the faithful multitude in Catholic countries, ascribe all their possessions to God and believe devoutly, that whatever smiles upon them, in the beauties or in the sweet enjoyments of the present existence, is always "because of truth, and meekness, and justice." In short, if we consider how much of what is thought possession from its consisting of matter, has no real existence, but arises from the merest delusion and vanity, and how much of reality though esteemed imagination, because it is a spirit, is often sacrificed to the regret of losing what is only imaginary, it appears evident that the innocent playful carelessness of youth, which, in a certain sense, the meek carried with them into all the occupations of life, enabling them to endure with the utmost cheerfulness, the vexations and losses which overwhelm the proud worldly race, must have imparted a large portion of that earthly enjoyment which is described as their peculiar inheritance.

* Serm. I. in Ps. lviii. † Epist. ad Eberhard. ‡ Prudentia Civilis, cap. 91. § Instruct. 111.

To behold how Christians inherit the earth, we have only to visit any Catholic country, like the Tyrol or the small Cantons of Switzerland, or any of the great kingdoms, where the institutions and spirit of the ages of faith have not been destroyed: there men seem to live in a terrestrial paradise; while property is respected, every thing seems in common as far as relates to its enjoyment; the arts do not minister to the pleasures of the rich alone; they have no exclusive consolations; the poorest possess similar corresponding with their desires, whether arising from the same ravishing spectacle of beauteous nature, or from the same benignant exchange of kind and courteous greeting, or from entering the same sublime temples hallowed by common and most sacred rights, or from hearing alike the sweet and solemn tones of morning and evening bells which seem to blend earth with heaven, and to spiritualize the very material elements which they possess through every sense. To their meek and innocent hearts the earth is a garden of pleasure ; and no storm of foul and bitter passions ever disturbs the serene composure with which they receive and enjoy the wonderful gifts of God. “Donum et pax est electis Dei.” A Catholic state is wholly a supernatural condition in respect of happiness and abundance ; it verifies the divine sentence. “Mansueti hereditabunt terram ; et delectabuntur in multitudine pacis.”*

The blessedness of the meek in faithful ages may be considered in relation both to the material, external, and to the spiritual and interior possession of the earth which is their inheritance. With regard to the former, we shall survey the monuments erected by faith, and the various institutions which were directed to the development of temporal advantages ; and in relation to the latter I shall attempt to show in what manner the earth and all things proceeding from it were made to minister to intellectual good, and to assist the cultivation of the spiritual nature ; so that as in the last our principal object was to prove how widely the spirit of meekness pervaded the society of Catholic states, in the present we shall be chiefly occupied with demonstrating how that spirit received even literally its recompense in the fulfilment of the divine sentence.

In attempting to develop this view of the beatitude of the meek, our course to some may seem retrograde ; but even for those fledged souls who desire to soar upon the eagle wings of heavenly meditation, it is well, from time to time, Antæus like, to rest upon the earth. I may perhaps be drawn into a variety of details, which will appear to some minds irrelevant and frivolous ; for there are many who conceive that every idea relating to theological truth should be involved in a certain tone of severe and reserved language, and others profess to feel alarmed at whatever wears, in modern literature, the semblance of novelty ; but after making every due allowance for the influence of the circumstances in which such persons are placed—for their opinions seem to be only the result of circumstance—there would remain sufficient encouragement for pursuing this argument, if one possessed but the ability to do it justice, in the single sentence of St. Augustine, where he says, “Utile est libros plurimos a pluribus fieri diverso stylo, etiam de questionibus eisdem ; ut ad plurimos res ipsa perveniat ad alios sic, ad alios sic.”†

The monuments with which faith covered the soil of Europe, belong to the history, not only of ecclesiastical, but also of civil architecture. Churches, monasteries, hospitals, oratories, crosses, and isolated towers, proclaim more obviously indeed the creative spirit of the religion of the meek ages ; but these are not the only examples of its power.

*Adde tot egregias urbes, operumque laborem,
Tot congesta manu præruptis oppida saxis.*

The Catholic Church fulfilled the poet's prediction—

* Ps. xxxvi.

† St. August. de Trinitate, L. I. c. 3. n. 5.

—————Populosque feroces
Contundet, moresque viris et mœnia ponet.

As in missionary countries at the present day where the Catholic religion is preached, so in the first ages of the Church, the inhabitants of towns became Christians before the country peasants; and hence, for a long while, the term Pagani was used as synonymous with heathens.

In proportion as the faith spread, the multiplication of towns proceeded; for the Christian religion is essentially social, and converts were excited, both by faith and charity, to congregate, as much as possible for the worship of God in common, and for the exercise of beneficence, just as other men are induced to separate and disperse through infidelity and selfishness. Oratories and cells of retirement for devout persons, became therefore the kernel, as it were of future communities, and many of the towns, and even cities, of Europe have no other origin.

Shortly after the death of saints it was usual to build an oratory or chapel, under their invocation, to which some devout men had brought their relics, or the garments which had touched their tombs. In time, houses were built round the chapel; and thus, gradually, a village was formed, bearing the name of that saint. The chapel then became a church, and a town was the final result. Thus arose in France the towns of St. Martin, St. Hilaire, St. Germain d'Auxerre, St. Remi, St. Medard, St. Sulpice, St. Brie; and similar instances in England must be familiar to every one.* When the monks of Lindisfarne first brought St. Cuthbert's body to Durham, it was a barbarous and rude place, with nothing but thorns and thick woods, where they first built a little church of wands and branches, wherein they did lay his body; whence the said church was afterwards called Bough Church.† In the thirteenth century, before the angelic visit, Lorreto was a mountain covered with thick wood, and uninhabited. Saint-Merry is a village in the diocese of Paris, so called from a chapel which was built on the spot where St. Merry was detained for one day, either by sickness or fatigue, as he travelled from Autun to Paris, about the year 695; so that the village is a memorial of the event.‡ In the third century, Æonius, an evangelical missionary, having been martyred and buried on the mountain called St. Ion, in the diocese of Paris, the faithful erected an oratory on the spot, where, in the course of time, such a number of devout people resorted, that a village was formed; and as this belonged to a certain rich knight, he fortified it on the top of the mountain, that the people might be secure from the attacks of the barbarians. Lebeuf thus explains the situation of St. Ion, on the mountain of that name.§ Mabillon shows, that in this manner the Benedictine monks in Germany were the founders of cities, as well as the cultivators of the soil. Not only did the great monastery and town of Fulda rise up in the midst of forests that had been before pathless, but also Saxony beheld Corby and Brema.

* Lebeuf, Hist; du Diocese de Paris, Tom. IV. 253.

† The Ancient Rites, and Monuments of Durham, p. 111.

‡ Lebeuf, Tom. XV. 362.

§ Hist. du Diocese de Paris, Tom. X. 252.

Thus too commenced Hersfeld and Fritslaria in Thuringia, Salzburg, Frisinga and Eisted in Bavaria, St. Gall and Campidona in Helvetia, and numerous other towns throughout all Germany, as well as in other kingdoms where the Benedictine family extended.*

In the tenth and eleventh centuries, the propagation of Christianity in Prussia and Livonia was immediately followed by the erection of walled towns and cities, in places which had before been horrible deserts, or where the only habitations had been some wretched huts on the banks of rivers, composed of boughs and sods of earth.† Holm, Riga, Thorn, Elbing, Kulm, Christburg, Marienwerd, and Marienburg, were founded and built with stone by holy missionaries, and by the Teutonic order.‡ The last was built so late as in the year 1274. In the thirteenth century, Bishop Henry of Ermland, besides other works for the good of Prussia, founded Frauenburg, and gave it privileges. Bishop Siegfried of Samland, and Bishop Eberhard of Ermland, converted barren wastes into fruitful fields. In one year the left bank of the Weichsel saw the rise of three new cities.§ Lithuania, which had been a vast wilderness of wood and marsh, over which wandered a wild and ferocious population, became now covered with towns and villages. Prussia itself possessed no city before the arrival of the Teutonic knights. The manners of a city life were wholly unknown to the ancient inhabitants: as in Germany of old, these savage sons of nature had neither walls nor towers. It was the desire of living under the just and free government of the Teutonic order, which was wholly ecclesiastical, that induced multitudes of Germans, in the thirteenth century, during a season of scarcity, to pass into Prussia to inhabit the new cities, which had been founded there in the desert.

The bishops of Prussia testified to the college of cardinals, that the Teutonic brothers administered the public affairs with such justice, discipline, and peace, that innumerable people, from diverse nations, passed into their colonies, desiring to live under their rule.|| Parish churches were generally to villages, what monasteries and cathedrals were to great cities—the centre and bond of their rise and progress. The ancient capitals, indeed, were generally allowed to convey the right of pre-eminence to their churches; and in the great council of Nice, which regulated the rights and jurisdiction of the chief bishopricks of Christendom, these ancient and primitive customs were strictly maintained.¶ But after the overthrow of the Roman empire, and in the multiplied divisions of territory which ensued, it was the state which looked to the church for the site of capitals; and the residence of a bishop or the existence of a great monastery, were often the preservation of the rights of the ancient cities, to which they owed their being chosen as the seats of the new government. The social elements which existed in every converted nation were highly favorable to the increase, not only of towns, but even of

* Præfat. in II. Sæcul. Benedict. § 5.

† Procop. Riga Histor. Goth. 339.

‡ Voigt. Geschichte Preussens.

§ Voigt. IV. 138.

|| Voigt. IV. 270.

¶ Chardon, Hist. des Sacremens, Tom. V. c. 5.

capitals; for, independent of the political circumstances of the world, it was natural that cities which acquired such extreme importance from the devotion of the people, should be invested with a corresponding dignity in relation to the civil power. However, perhaps it would be more correct to say, that the capitals were not allowed then to assume that exclusive importance which they at present possess. The influence of religion was too universal for any one city to become like Rome, in heathen, or like Paris or London, in our times. The church was the attraction and point of union; and therefore Canterbury, and York, and Winchester, and Salisbury, and many other cities of England, were as much desired as places of residence as the metropolis itself, although the presence of the court drew there the attendance of a certain number of persons, whose duties connected them with it. Had Rome been Christian at the fall of Veii, she would not have deemed the subsistence of that city, even if it were inhabited by Romans, and possessing elective magistrates of its own, as endangering the unity of the republic. In point of construction too, as well as in their customs and governments, the provincial towns of Christendom did not resemble those of modern times, nor the old Roman colonies, miniature likenesses of the capital.* Each had often a style of architecture, as well as municipal laws, peculiar to it; and thus the charm of variety was added to the advantages of a material administration.

It has been remarked by Baron Cuvier, in his Lectures on the History of Natural Philosophy, as a circumstance of the middle ages, which was favorable to learning and to the cultivation of minds, that centers of government were then multiplied; for in the vast number of small states which then existed, each capital became a source of real civilization, the influence of which was concentrated within moderate limits. In vast empires, letters and sciences are necessarily drawn to one seat of government, and the distant provinces are left in comparative destitution. The modern systems of empire, are, in fact, in this respect, heathen, in the same manner as those of the middle ages indicate the influence of the philosophy and of the manners of Christians. I am aware, indeed, that an exclusive acquaintance with the religion of the modern sects may render the whole of this statement an extraordinary and untenable proposition to the ears of many; these opinions, it is true, tend to separate men, instead of to unite them, or at the most, they leave them free to follow the caprice of their disposition, or the condition of their birth. A life in community or in towns is not required where religious worship, to which no obligation is attached, consists in attendance only on the Sunday, and at an advanced hour of the day; but the Catholic religion, by the celebration of its consoling mysteries, both attractive and obligatory, draws men together in multitudes, who, merely for the sake of fulfilling the duties or desires of their supernatural life, are induced to establish themselves in places that furnish the means; and hence, no argument can be drawn against this view of the rise and progress of Christian cities, from observing the wants and manners of the present age. Indeed, that this was the process in the rise or augmentation of the Christian towns, is a fact which is attested by history. Paris, in the beginning of the third dynasty, being confined to the island in the Seine, and there being four abbeys on both sides, at equal distances from it, those of St. Laurence, St. Geneviève, St. Germain-des-Près, and St. Germain l'Auxerrois, each surrounded with the houses of persons who sought the neighborhood of the abbey, the junction of these four villages formed the future enclosure of the capital.* The suburbs of most cities were formed by the devotion of people who chose to fix their habitations near the convents and hospitals, which stood originally without the gates. The great abbey of St. Claude in Franche-Comte, gave rise to a considerable town built about it. In the fifth century, St. Bridget, having chiefly resided in her monastery at Kildare, the reputation of her sanctity and miracles made that place so renowned and so much frequented, that the many buildings erected about the convent, during her life, formed a town, which in process of time grew to be so considerable, as to have the episcopal see placed there.

* Aul. Gellius, XVI. 13.

Religion had always first possession. Freyburg in Switzerland was built in the twelfth century, by Bertholde, Duke of Zehringen; but before his time there was there a solitary castle with a chapel on the rock over the Sarine, in the midst of a vast forest. A multitude of towns and villages retained the name of what had originally given them birth. Such as Lachapelle, Abbeville, Monasteriolum, Little Monastery, which became Montreuil, of which there are so many in France, and one in Ireland, Monastereven; and even when the origin was different, the piety of these ages desired that the very name of cities should be a homage to religion. When it was proposed that the new city, which was built on the ruins of the Christian camp before the walls of Grenada, should be called by the name of Isabella, so dear to the army and to the nation, that devout princess, calling to mind the holy cause in which it was erected, gave it the name of Santa Fe, or the city of the holy faith; and it remains to this day a monument of the piety and glory of the Catholic sovereigns. The custom began in the East with the religious orders of knighthood, and it was extended to the north by the Teutonic order, of giving holy names to cities newly erected;† thus as the clergy and people celebrated a devout festival, and deposited a shrine of relics in a chapel, was the town newly recovered from the Lithuanians solemnly named Christmemel, in honor of the holy Saviour.‡ From these, then, and many other similar facts, which the reading and observation of each person will easily suggest, it will be seen with what justice we may apply to the Catholic religion those celebrated words of the Roman orator, which were only true on his tongue so long as they referred merely to the great original traditions and revealed principles, of which the full development was reserved for Christian ages. “O vitæ dux! o virtutis indagatrix, expultrixque vitiorum! tu urbes peperisti; tu dissipatos homines in societatem vitæ convocasti; tu magistra morum et disciplinæ fuisti: ad te confugimus; à te opem petimus; tibi nos, ut antea magna ex parte, sic nunc penitus, totosque tradimus. Est autem unus dies bene et ex præceptis tuis actus, peccanti immortalitati anteposendus. Cujus igitur potius opibus utamur quam tuis? quæ et vitæ tranquillitatem largita nobis es, et terrorem mortis sustulisti.”*

* De St. Victor. Tableau de Paris, Tom. I. 83.

† Voigt. Geschichte Preussens II. 583.

‡ Ib. IV. 300.

The Catholic religion not only founded and preserved cities and towns, but also gave a new importance to those which she found existing, and to many imparted a renown which from henceforth cannot be separated from her own eternal destiny: for although wherever the Catholic religion has been withdrawn, the material glory, unless preserved by very extraordinary local circumstances, has passed away, and often been followed by utter ruin and desolation, still to many the fame, grandeur, and interest cannot be said to have perished; since even in those streets which are now deserted, as those we read about in ancient times, of Gabii and Fidenæ, their intellectual greatness stands like a monument for everlasting ages and books, and the solemn offices of the universal church will make it in some sense even to the eye of men as durable as the world. But this refers only to those whom learning makes conversant with the past. To the generality of men, nothing is more certain than that these cities are not what they once were: if any one should retain that superstitious scruple which restrained the ancients from ever affirming that any thing had perished, he may adopt, with regard to them, Virgil’s expression and say,

————— fuit Ilium et ingens
Gloria Teucrorum!

To seek proof of this, we have not to look to a distance. Witness any of our great ecclesiastical cities; for example, Canterbury, and compare its former with its present condition. In the ages of faith, men of learning, artists, saints, and kings used to repair thither with a multitude of devout pilgrims from all parts of the world: and without an inducement from recollection or from observation of the past, who would now travel from a distance to visit it, unless some farmer, who desired to sell the produce of his hop ground? If any others there should be, anxious to repair thither, methinks they are so few that we might say of them with Dante, “a little stuff would furnish out their cloaks.” Formerly, the men of learning and sanctity, and of intellectual greatness, all over Europe, felt an interest in what passed at Canterbury. Under St. Theodore, and for many ages afterwards, it gave penitential laws to almost all the churches of the West. The site of its various monuments was known, studied, and explained by scholars in Italy, Spain, and France. Chardon, a Benedictine in France, speaks of the situation of a little humble church of St. Martin in the suburbs, as if he were describing the most familiar monument in his native town. What could be said of Canterbury at present, excepting that it resembles every other provincial city in England? and assuredly that is not a description which is calculated to sanction the idea that it is intimately connected with the fine arts, with learning, with sanctity, and with every kind of intellectual interest which should endear it to the most distant members of the Christian family. Had England continued in communion with the Catholic church, it is possible that Birmingham and Manchester might not have attained to their present character, for merciless inhuman industry would not have been tolerated; but York, and Winchester, and Canterbury, and Exeter, and Salisbury, and other cities of the same type, would have possessed some degree of the interest attached to Milan, Verona, Bologna, and even Florence. In another way also religion gave celebrity to places, for the meekness which left men of the greatest genius and learning without any other distinction but that of the place of their birth or residence, the name of which was attached to that which they had received in baptism, was an occasion of rendering almost every little town celebrated. Thus Malmesbury triumphed in her William; Tours in her Gregory; Blois in her Louis; St. Denis in her nameless Monk; Verona in her Zeno; Pisa in her Peter; Exeter in her Joseph; Ramsey in her Monk; Huntingdon in her Henry; Salisbury in her John.

* Tuscul. V. 2.

Anquetil says in the introduction to his History of Rheims, that "the history of some cities may be as curious as that of great states." Ponceius Cato, one of the most learned of the Romans, collected accurately the origin of the Italian cities, as did Terentius Varro, and Antiochus, the Syracusan, and many others. Their motives in collecting such materials were different indeed from those which made Christian writers feel so deep an interest in the antiquity of their cities, but yet there were some grounds in common between them. Dionysius Halicarnassus says of the reasons which induced him to write upon the antiquities of Rome, "It seemed right that so illustrious a history should not be left to silence; for the importance of such a work would be great; since by these means brave men, who have fulfilled their fate, will gain an immortal glory, and the men of this age and of all future times will be led to imitate the example of these god-like men in adopting, not the sweetest and most easy, but the most generous and honorable life, resolving to think highly of themselves on account of such a noble origin, and never to commit any action unworthy of their ancestors."* The old French histories of the different cities of France, form a department of literature highly curious, and in every respect remarkable; and, indeed if on general grounds, as the wise critic of heathen antiquities observes, the histories of illustrious cities ought not to be written hastily and rashly, but with the utmost diligence and caution,† they ought to be more peculiarly studied in our times, because cities and churches are now described in books elaborately executed, but composed by the most auda-

* Antiquit. Rom. Lib. I.

† Dionysii Halicar. Antiquit. Rom. Lib. I.

cious triflers, who write, as the present holy father of the faithful says, “ what they find, not what they understand,” and by the most inveterate enemies of the religion of truth. With respect to the old local historians, we find that they generally passed over the heathen antiquities of their cities, though, like Lyons they may have been successively Celtic, Greek, and Roman : they confine their researches to the commencement of the Christian annals, as it was to them they referred when they wished to exhibit their trophies of truly honorable renown.

The cities of Italy and France can boast of the names of apostolic men, who had preached the faith in the first century, and founded episcopal sees in which the regular succession of pontiffs had never been interrupted. Thus St. Apollinaire was revered at Ravenna ; St. Savinian, at Sens ; St. Sixtus, at Rheims ; St. Potentian, at Troyes ; St. Martial, at Limoges ; St. Trophime, at Arles ; St. Julien, at Mans ; St. Crescens, at Vienne ; St. Memme, at Châlons ; St. Ursin, at Bourges ; St. Austremoine, at Clermont in Auvergne ; St. Eutropius, at Xaintes ; St. Front, at Périgueux ; St. Irenæus, at Lyons. It was considered the highest glory of a city or of a province to have produced a number of saints. Thus the chronicle of St. Riquier says, “ while all the world rejoices in being redeemed by the descent and incarnation of the only Son of God, and the common deliverance gives rise to a common exultation, it is known to be the peculiar joy of some places that they possessed men who, from their sanctity and learning deserved the title of Fathers, and with this privilege our province is indeed richly endowed.”* Even little villages by the way-side acquired sometimes great celebrity and importance from having given birth to saints. Witness Nanterre, which produced St. Geneviève, and Nogent in Champagne, where St. Vinebauld was born.

The Prologue to the Life of St. Marcellin, Bishop of Embrun in the sixth century, contains the following passage : “ By the liberality of Christ, the combats of illustrious martyrs, and the praises of blessed confessors have filled the world to such a degree, that almost every city can boast of having for patrons martyrs born within its walls.”—“ I take a pleasure,” continues that ancient writer, “ in seeking every where the palms of these glorious champions ; and I often travel about with this design, inquiring of the inhabitants respecting them, and addressing myself to the oldest men, who are often unanimous in their accounts : with such materials I then transmit their memory to future ages.” St. Ceraune, Bishop of Paris in the seventh century, devoted his life to this employment : he wrote to all the clerks whom he supposed were instructed in the traditions of their country, praying them to collect for him this kind of information. Many similar examples may be found in Gaul, from the fourth to the tenth century. These were often the materials used in the great collection of the Bollandists. The spirit of all this traditionary lore is well expressed in the inscription which has been placed over the gate of the subterranean church in Cremona’s Cathedral, which is to this effect : “ Your holy fellow-citizens here have altars for tombs. Enter and revere the ashes of those whose examples you will imitate." But in speaking of the new interest which the ancient cities of the world acquired with their adoption of the Christian faith, who has not already been transported in imagination to Rome—to that city, justly called eternal, not because her heathen glories have been perpetuated, but on account of her saintly lustre and divine pre-eminence, which, by a mysterious law of heaven has been associated inseparably with the interests and the destiny of souls, which are themselves immortal. It is not to Rome, triumphant, to Rome, queen of the world, that our mind would now revert, but, as Torquato Tasso says, in his reply to Plutarch, it is to Rome, restored by the virtue of one and of many most holy Pontiffs, to Rome become humble from being proud, pacific from being warlike, and as it were celestial from being earthly, to Rome, boasting not so much of her former greatness as of the present things which inspire her with joy.* Let us go back to the age of this wondrous transition, and behold a scene nobly described by the author of the Martyrs. "Whence come these immense armies? who are these people, hastening from the four regions of the earth? the scourge of God conducts them: their horses are lighter than leopards: they gather troops of captives as mountains of sand. What mean these kings clothed in the skins of beasts, who slay their prisoners round the cities which they have besieged? All come from the desert of a fearful land: all march towards the new Babylon. Art thou fallen, queen of cities? Is thy capitol buried in the dust? How desert are thy plains! what a solitude around thee! But, O astonishing prodigy! the cross appears in the midst of this whirlwind of dust! it rises over Rome risen from ruins; it marks all its edifices; the children of the Apostles occupy the ruins of the palace of the Cæsars; the porticos where the death of the Christians was vowed, are changed into pious cloisters, and penitence now dwells where before reigned triumphant crime."† "I also love Rome," says St. Chrysostom, "and though I might praise it for its greatness, its antiquity, its beauty, its multitude of inhabitants, its empires, its riches, its warlike fame: yet omitting all these things, on this account alone I proclaim it blessed, because Paul, while alive, was so affectionate towards it, preached to it, and lastly ended his life within it, whose holy body it possesses; and therefore is this city illustrious more than all others. The sun shines not with such splendor in the heavens as this city of the Romans casting forth beams from these resplendant bodies of Peter and Paul. Consider it, and shudder at the spectacle which Rome will behold; namely, Paul suddenly from that shrine, with Peter, rising to meet the Lord in the air! What a rose will Rome then send to Christ; with what two crowns is this city adorned: truly I admire this city, not on account of the abundance of gold, not on account of columns, nor any other object of beauty, but on account of these columns of the Church."‡

* Chronicon Centulensis sive Richarii, Lib. IV. c. 1. apud Dacher, Spicileg. Tom. IV.

* Torquato Tasso Risposta di Roma a Plutarco.

† Les Martyrs, liv. XI.

‡ St. Chrysost. Serm. XXXII. in Moral Exhort.

In a lower degree some associations of a kindred nature belonged to almost every city, for there was hardly one which could not boast of having some martyr or holy confessor connected with its history. Vienna rejoiced in her St. Stephen, Brussels in her St. Gudule, Madrid in her St. Isidore, Paris in her St. Denis, St. Germain, and St. Geneviève, Lyons in her St. Irenæus, Poitiers in her St. Hilary, Limoges in her St. Martial, Sens in her St. Savinien, St. Columbus, St. Loup, Milan in her St. Ambrose, Tours in her St. Martin, Arles in her St. Cæsareus. The circumstance of any person of eminent sanctity residing within a city was enough to make it celebrated; his death was in one sense a public calamity, though in another, religion converted it into a higher consolation, as in the instance when St. John of God was dying in Granada, and he gave the city his dying benediction by order of the archbishop; or as when their bodies were preserved as treasures, and their prayers invoked as affectionate intercessors for their fellow-citizens. At other places, though men could refer to saints among their own citizens, yet they chose to invoke the prayers of blessed spirits who had earlier passed upon the earth. Such were Florence and Genoa, of the former of which Dante says,

“ In that city I dwelt,
Which for the Baptist her first patron chang'd.”

Such too was Parma, which chose St. Thomas for one of its protectors on account of having been delivered from its enemies on his festival. Lawful, useful, and laudable was known to be this invocation of holy patrons. Lot prayed to the angels, and obtained that the city of Segor should not be destroyed by fire from heaven.* Jacob asked and obtained a blessing from the angel.† Moses besought God to remember Abraham, Isaac, and Israel, his servants.‡ The three children in the furnace implored his mercy for the sake of Abraham and Isaac and Israel;§ and God declared He would protect that city, and would save it, for the sake of David his servant.||

With respect to the new character assumed by cities, it is worthy of remark that Petrarch, though speaking with the pride of an old Roman, yet in contrasting the ancient with the actual state of Cologne, is obliged to give the preference to the latter. “I have beheld the capitol,” he says, “an image of our own, excepting that instead of the senate assembling there to take counsel upon peace and war, there are inhabiting it beautiful youths and holy virgins, who sing nocturnal lauds to God with eternal concord. There one heard the noise of wheels and arms, and the groans of captives; here one finds rest and joy, and the voices of the cheerful; there, in short, moves a warlike, and here a pacific conqueror.”¶

To religion must be ascribed not only the rise and preservation of cities, but also many peculiarities of their structure, and by far the greatest portion of their

* Gen. xxxiii.

† Id. xlviii.

‡ Exod. xxxiii.

§ Dan. iii.

¶ Reg. xix.

¶ Epist. Fam. Lib. I. 4.

beauty. Dionysius of Halicarnassus says, that in three things he chiefly beheld the magnificence of Rome, in the aqueducts, the great roads, and the sewers; all monuments designed to promote material interest, none connected with mind and with spirit for the benefit of the soul. In Christian Rome, and in a Catholic city, the cloaca maxima are but little regarded: which circumstance ought not to be a surprise to the moderns, since even the heathen philosophers themselves acknowledged that, as Pliny says, "Oportet mortalibus utilitatibus æternas anteferre."* It was not merely public utility, as he says, that was to be preferred to private, but eternal to temporal, and therefore it ought not to be an offence to philosophers when they find that churches and monasteries had pre-eminence over docks and sewers.

The unhappy heathens, indeed, found within their cities more objects to proclaim national glory, or the power of a selfish superstition than resources even against their temporal calamities. In that celebrated forum they had three arches of triumph, temples to Fortune, and columns to princes, but they had never heard there of the via della consolazione. If with modern cities there should be any poetry connected, it is only as with the city of the Phœnicians, on entering which Ulysses wondered at the harbors, docks, and ships, the market places and public halls, the long walls and lofty bulwarks of defence wondrous to behold.† The modern philosophy has in this manner paganized the very structure of cities; though, indeed, Juvenal pays a compliment to the Romans at the period of their greatest corruption, which could not be extended to ourselves, for he tells them that they had erected no temples to money. But in the middle ages some image or emblem of religion was always the first and most striking object to excite the admiration of a stranger. In the fourteenth century men could not begin to build, even that lofty tower at the public palace of Sienna, without placing a marble chapel at its base; and even the material monuments of cities were spiritualized, and in some way or other connected with the intellectual and immortal nature. A striking instance of this may be witnessed in a certain town of the Tyrol, where one sees a fountain surmounted by an image of our Saviour; the stream of water issues from the wound in his adorable side, and at the foot is this inscription, "O all ye that thirst, come to the fountain of life," at once supplying the temporal wants of the people, and under this beautiful emblem affording a most instructive Christian lesson. So again the author of the "Calendrier des Bergeres," which was printed in 1499, in enumerating the praises of the city of Paris, begins with its schools of theology and arts:

O Paris, souveraine et digne
Source de science divine
Comme sainte théologie.

And he says that its material grandeur consists in its beautiful churches, its vast cemetery of the Holy Innocents, its great bridge, Notre Dame, and its Hostel Dieu.*

* Epist. Lib. VII. 18.

† Od. VII. 43.

In fact, in the cities of the middle ages, there were no monuments of decoration to be seen which corresponded with the heathen philosophy, no pantheons, columns, statues of kings, or triumphal arches ; or, as at Rome, such remains of pagan grandeur were sanctified and converted into Christian monuments, for purposes analogous to the truths of the holy wisdom. Thus at Rome, the monuments of Egyptian superstition are made to pay homage to the Christian church. The solar obelisk erected at Heliopolis by Psammiticus I., king of Egypt, which had been brought to Rome by Augustus, is now near the church of St. Lorenzo, in Lucina. The immense obelisk transported from the ruins of Thebes, in High Egypt, stands in the palace of St. John Lateran. That which was transported to Rome by Caligula, and described by Pliny, is in the front of St. Peter's and bears an inscription on the base, which fills with tears of admiration the eyes of the devout stranger.

Wonderfully is the power of religion developed there in converting the most loathsome monuments of crime and error into objects that are gazed upon with devout reverence. Such is that stair-case of the Hall of Pilate, which every Christian on visiting the Basilica of St. John Lateran ascends upon his knees ; such that colosseum that once used to flow with the blood of martyrs, which is now a place of prayer and holy contemplation ; such that pagan portico, which now leads to some church of the living God ; such are those columns erected to commemorate the triumph of worldly conquerors, which are now surmounted with images of apostles ; such those obelisks once dedicated to an impure superstition, which now sustain the cross of Christ ; such that Mamertine and Tertullian prison in the forum, built by Ancus Martius and Servius Tullius, which heard the expiring groans of Jugurtha, and which is now a sanctuary, crowded incessantly by faithful Christians, who go there to venerate the prison which confined St. Peter and St. Paul.

At Aosta again, the triumphal arch which was built by Augustus on subduing the inhabitants of that valley, is surmounted with a crucifix, which is said to have been there ever since the first conversion of the city to Christianity ; but in no instance did Christians in the ages of faith erect such monuments. When Pope Adrian VI., indeed, entered Rome, a triumphal arch was constructing at Porta Portuense for his reception, but he ordered the work to be interrupted saying, "These were the pomps of heathenism." The only trophies in Christian cities were suitable to the victory which overcometh the world, and, like that colossal image at Arona, in honor of the best sort of conquerors. The first triumphal arches in Paris to commemorate temporal conquests were erected in 1670, when the walls were demolished.†

* Gouget, Bibliothèque Française, Tom. X. p. 189.

† De St. Victor, Tableau de Paris, tom. III. 439.

The first statue erected to a king of France was that of Henry IV., on the Pont-neuf; and Portugal had erected no statue of any of her monarchs, until the sophist Pombal awarded this honor to King Joseph the First, when he placed a portrait of himself in bronze on the front of the pedestal. During the middle ages, if a statue of a king were made it was to be placed upon his tomb, or on the portal of some church, or over the gates of some hospital or college, which he had founded. Even the ancients never formed a statue for a public square, like that of Louis XIV. in the Place of Victory, which seems a personification of frivolity and egotism. The statue of himself which Constantine erected in Rome after his victory over Maxentius, was in fact a trophy of religion, for it represented him holding a cross in his right hand; and the inscription which was placed under it testified that by that salutary sign he had delivered the ancient city from the yoke of a tyrant, and had restored the senate and people of Rome to their former dignity and greatness. The columns of modern cities date from the Protestant scholars commemorating, in language worthy of a nobler cause, the fanaticism of heresy in England; those of France have been erected in days subsequent to the revolution.

Thus our very buildings and monuments bear witness to that tendency towards pagan opinions relative to the motives of human action, which has been constantly on the increase since the sixteenth century, till we have lived to see it arrive at a complete and open profession of idolatry, in the establishment of a pantheon in the frivolous and guilty city. It was indeed natural that the honor of Apotheosis should be first revived in that land where there would be always a supply of men vain enough to desire it. St. Jerome said long ago, in writing to a heretic of Gaul, "The world is full of Centaurs and Sirens, Ululas and Onocerataluses, Leviathans and Behemoths. There is the Erimanthian boar and the Nemean lion, the Cacus of Virgil, and the Gorgon of Spain. Gaul alone has no monsters, but abounds with eloquent and brave men."* But if Christian cities wanted these impure ornaments of worldly triumph, they were not without objects of a meek and admirable beauty peculiarly their own.

Theodoret, in his life of St. Simeon Stylites, testifies that every where in Rome before the entrance of shops stood an image of that saint whom they invoked as a guardian; and the fathers of the second Council of Nice recommended the erection of holy images and paintings on the public ways, according, as they said, to the ancient pious custom. In all cities, at the corners of streets, and in the markets amidst the busy crowd and piles of objects for sale, you beheld the gracious image of our blessed Lady, holding the divine child enfolded in her arms. The laborious people occupied amidst these tumultuous scenes, from time to time, would turn their eyes to this benignant form, and feel fresh strength to support their various trials. The sweetest flowers of the season are placed, from time to time, by pious hands at his feet, while garlands of every hue are suspended over it and across the public ways. The same image smiled upon the poor from the portals of palaces, and seemed to encourage the timid to pass beyond the proud threshold of the more powerful citizens. Thus, in the court of the old Hotel of Harcourt, in the street of La Harpe, at Paris, as also in that of the Hotel de Cluny, in the street of the Mathurins, you see over the small Gothic door which led to the principal apartments, a niche richly decorated to contain the image of our Lady. Monteil reckons among the multitude of little services daily rendered by the people of Paris to one another, "the indication of images in the streets or of the signs of houses, for almost every private house was then distinguished by a sign which generally represented the patron of the family."* At the present day a walk through Oxford or Gloucester, if the eyes be kept fixed upon the buildings of ancient times, is like reading an old book full of majesty and holiness. Under the images of our Lady, which are in nearly every corner of the solemn and almost cloisteral streets of Bologna, you observe sentences inscribed from the holy Scriptures, teaching the way of a blessed life and death. Upon a wall at Padua, which contains the monument of Rolando de Placiola, you read these divine lines :—

* Epist. XXXVIII.

ter amare Deum, cum cætera deleat ætas,
Hic sere, quod plena postmodo falce metas.

Entering Stia, a small town among the Appennines, with the ruins of an old castle above it, I saw a little chapel at the end of the bridge, on which was an inscription to this effect : "Here is the bridge to enter Stia, and here is the chapel of our blessed Lady. May it prove to us a bridge to heaven." At Lucern, there is a little chapel in which is a lamp ever burning over that pier of the bridge, which one might fear every moment was going to be swept away by the fury of the flood which swells and rages round it, in a remarkable manner. At St. Maurice, there is an oratory on the great arch over the Rhone; at Dresden, the bridge is lined with images of saints; and at Prague the Moldau still beholds its martyr as if looking down gratefully upon the waters which had given him the blessed palm. Walking one night in Florence, I saw a great light upon a bridge over the Arno: it was from a little oratory of our Lady where three priests and some children were singing nocturns before an illuminated altar. Then, in order that passengers in the night may be reminded of heavenly things, and our blessed Lady honored in the night, you behold the lamps before her image which are lighted as the sun goes down. In fact, the streets of cities derived their light from the number of these lamps which burned before the images of our Lady, or the paintings of saints.† Tiek beautifully avails himself of these in representing one who has overheard a horrible plot arranged in a street at midnight before an image of our

* Monteil. Hist. des Français, Tom. IV. 377.

† Monteil.

Lady ; when the wretches had moved away, this person comes forth from the dark niche, shuddering and lifts his looks to the image and says, " Before thine eyes, thou mild and blessed one, are these miscreants audaciously holding their market and trafficking in their infernal drugs. But as thou embracest thy child with thy love, so doth heavenly love encircle us all with its protecting arms ; we feel their touch ; and our poor hearts beat joyously and tremulously toward a greater heart that will never forsake us."

The whole of the fronts of houses exhibited beautiful carvings of some sacred subjects, of some symbolical device, or interesting local tradition, or else of grotesque figures, to inspire gayety. The windows were richly ornamented, and the patron of the family appeared every where. On the houses in Sarnen you see painted the history of the holy hermit Nicholas of the Rock, whose prayers once saved that town from the flames. At Paris, the celebrated Nicholas Flamel only followed the custom of that age in adorning the exterior walls of his house with images of devotion, and with pious inscriptions.* This custom is still observed in many Catholic countries, where you read continually, "Glory be to God alone. Blessed be God." The inmost thought of the possessor seems to be often expressed by an inscription. Over the door of one house, on which a crucifixion was painted, I read, "Jesus amor meus crucifixus est." Sometimes the inscription and device were mysterious, like that dove with an olive branch represented on the gate of Marengo at Pavia, under which a treble woe is denounced against its enemies.† At others, they were intended to impart to men some important council respecting the affairs of life. Catholic sentiment was most ingenious in this respect. In the year 1445, a citizen of Milan, Thomas de Capagono, placed an inscription at the foot of the staircase which leads to the tribunals of justice, to warn the passengers from law suits. "In controversiis causarum corporales inimicitie oriuntur, fit amissio expensarum, labor animi exercetur, corpus quotidie fatigatur, multa et inhonesta crimina inde consequuntur, bona et utilia opera postponuntur." Such was the inscription. On approaching Italy from every side, we find the exterior walls of the inns and other houses adorned with frescos representing generally the Annunciation or the Nativity, executed in the style of the miniatures in the old illuminated prayer books, from which one might suppose they had been copied, having caught all that delicate grace and simplicity which captivate us in the works of the middle ages.

Antiquity admired those paintings, with which the Athenians decorated the walls of their porticos. Pausanius relates that the exploits of that people were represented on the Pœcilia at Athens ; and the moderns speak of the moral advantage resulting from the erection of monuments to great men that have been ornaments to their country ; but how much lovelier, more cheering, and instructive to

* Hist. Critique de Nicolas Flamel et de Pernelle sa Femme. p. 11.

† Flavia Papia Sacra del P. Ghisoni Prolog.

the eye of humanity are those peaceful trophies on the walls of Christian cities in which the barbarous principle of national glory is excluded, and nothing commemorated but what should be dear to the affections and inestimable in the judgment of the universal race of men? It must be admitted that devotion and reverence of the olden time contributed to irregularity of structure. Streets were made to bend to the position of churches, and as churches were generally built in the direction of east and west, the continuity of streets was often broken by their erection; for no one ever thought then that temples should be made to bend to the convenience of a mechanic's warehouse. The sight and direction of churches were never determined by any obstacle from profane buildings.* In the year 846, while the Cathedral of Rheims was rebuilding, Charles-le-Chauve gave permission to Archbishop Hincmar to change, and to suppress the adjacent streets which might interfere with its convenience or decoration.† It may be observed that these crooked winding streets of our ancient cities are more favorable to picturesque effect than the regularity of the ancient Thurian or Ionian streets, mathematically arranged at right angles to each other like those of some modern cities. The bends and windings contributed even to the convenience of the passengers; for they broke the rays of the sun, and force of the wind, and served as a protection against both heat and cold. When the crookedness and narrowness of the streets of Rome had been remedied after the fire under Nero, it was found that the broad straight streets were injurious to health,‡ and Niebuhr remarks that the quarter of the city which was erected in the middle ages with the same disregard of regularity as at the rebuilding after the departure of the Gauls, is at the present day, much more healthy than those which have wide regular streets running through them; and he considers the contrary opinion of Aristotle respecting the cities of Greece to be a mere theoretical assumption.§ Viewed from a distance the appearance of the ancient Christian cities was full of indescribable majesty. How grand is the effect produced by those stupendous towers at Florence, raised by Giotto and Arnolphi di Lapo, the former encrusted with colored marbles to the summit, the masterpiece of that famous architect and painter, as he is styled on his epitaph which is within the church, composed by Angelus Politian, the latter Gothic, and from its height and proportion, a prodigy of art! The tall and slender towers which rise above the Gothic palaces of Sienna, and those of Asinelli Garisendi at Bologna, leaning in such strange disorder, which have furnished images to Dante,|| are the admiration of every beholder. Benjamin of Navarre reckoned ten thousand towers in Pisa. On one occasion one hundred and forty towers were demolished in Rome. Asti could boast of one hundred. Writers of the twelfth century speak with admiration of the towers of Pavia, which according to Breventano, amounted in all to five hundred and twenty-five. One of these, erected in honor of the learned Giasone del

* Lebeuf, Hist. du Diocese de Paris, Tom. I. chap. 4.

† Anquetil. Hist. de Rheims, Lib. I. p. 115.

§ Polit. VII. 2.

|| Infer. XXXI.

‡ Tacitus, Ann. XV. 43.

Maino, stood reversed upon the cone; and was destroyed through stupid timidity, in the last century, when it was too late discovered that it had been built with such skill that it might have stood for many ages.* The towers of Ravenna are round and remind one forcibly of those so celebrated in Ireland, with the exception of the huge Torre del Pubbico, which now stoops as if from age, and of which no one knows the origin and founder. According to Bettinelli it was in the eleventh century that the rage for building towers in cities prevailed; those over private houses were generally for ornament and pomp;† on those of churches and palaces of justice were placed those curious clocks, like that on the tower of the palace of Padua in the year 1344, which were the work of men who were philosophers and astronomers, like John and James Dondi, with whom Petrarch corresponded, of a family so renowned for these works, that it took the surname of “degli orologi.”

But to return to the towers, what a contrast now is here to the dull uniform and unbroken line over the cities of the moderns! In London one can distinguish the Catholic and the Protestant city by the number of beautiful towers in the former, and the almost total absence of them in the latter, or the substitution of shapeless deformed masses; as in Genoa, where you behold the hideous forts built by Napoleon in the age of revolutions rising out of the midst of the beautiful palaces raised by the noble Genoese in the ages of meekness and faith. The situation, too, was often more favorable to devotion, and to the natural enjoyment of life, than to the desires of vanity or the wants of the effeminate. Towns were often called castles, being, like those which we see upon the Rhine, dependants upon a castle, and inclosed within its walls. Thus we have still Château-Thierry, Château-Goutier, Château-Landon, Chateau-Roux, and others. One might sometimes suppose that these Christian cities were built among wild rocks and mountains, from some religious and mysterious motive, suggested by the situation of Jerusalem, for the holy city was raised in a savage spot that it might be insulated on the mountains, to be free from the contagion of the earthly nations; and such a supposition would not be altogether groundless, if we bear in mind that as at Saltzbourg, monks were frequently the founders, and that a monastery had originally determined the site. But, be this as it may, our ancestors are to be admired for their choice of situation in the foundation of towns. Those picturesque cities encircled with crags, with their Ἐπιπολάι, such as Freybourg, Sion, and others, or those Etrurian bourgs which strike the pilgrim's eye at every step as he travels on between Florence and Sienna, and which have exactly the appearance of great castles rising over the woods, and crowning the summits of hills, may be a terror to the speculator in the transport of effects, but to a natural taste they are beyond all comparison preferable to those modern cities, extending beyond their original

* La Torre del Pizzo in Giu. Pavia. 1832.

† Risorgimento d'Italia et Muratori, Tom. II. Antiquit. Ital.

pleasant site upon the bank of rivers to spread over uniform plains, to which, perhaps, the beam of the sun can never penetrate through the clouds in which their innumerable manufactories envelope them, as the people and city of the Cimmerians are described,

*ἡέρι καὶ νεφέλῃ κεκαλυμμένοι.

A city of this description is, to one accustomed to a city of the middle ages, what the gloomy forest was to Dante :

Which to remember only his dismay
Renews, in bitterness not far from death,†

He would describe leaving it in the words of the same poet, where he speaks of “emerging from a dead vapor which had saddened his eyes and heart.” Such were not the cities which the Catholic religion founded and inspired, which seemed almost to have been raised expressly for poets or for saints, for those who love meditation, and beauty, and peace. Such, to name but one, is Pisa, with its towers, of white marble, its silent Gothic streets, and its holy field of the dead. But where are there not examples, notwithstanding the rage of modern destroyers? When I had visited the churches of Genoa, many of which present an interior like a vision of paradise, as far as mind at the sight of material beauty can conceive primeval things, and then in the sweet hour of twilight, when the sun had set upon

Those tall piles and sea-girt palaces,
Whose porphyry pillars, and whose costly front,
Fraught with the orient spoils of many marbles,
Seem each a trophy of some mighty deed :

and I had ascended one of the towers of that noble city, and looked down upon it in quiet contemplation, (aspect indescribable, which filled my eyes with “pleasant tears,”) and then when I heard the sweet chiming of the Angelus break forth, and observed suddenly how innumerable lights began to cast their beams, burning before images of our blessed Lady,—there was in all this so planet-like a music, an order, and variety,—there was over the whole such a sky of poetry, such beauty to inhale in the very forms of man’s creation,—that I felt as if suddenly presented with a new view of the wonders of the human course ; and it occurred to me, that a great and important problem remained to be solved connected with the destinies of our nature : for how are we to explain this fact, of which I have here the evidence before me, that a religion which proposes only a future recompense, should yet put men in possession of so much that has affinity with supernal bliss? Yet the explanation is not difficult if we take into account the morality of the Catholic Church and its influence upon intelligences. When men are left to themselves and to their own miserable philosophy, all the energies of their noble natures are then directed to base ends, either to gratify their appetites, their love of sensual pleasure, their selfish pride, or love of personal and exclusive distinction. Abandoned to the pleasures of sense, they find in that dishonorable servitude a temporary source of satisfaction, sufficient, not indeed to give them peace, but to paralyze every generous and heroic effort. The active or creative spirit is either destroyed or misdirected to base and selfish ends; but when the principle of self-denial has once begun to operate, when the mind is restored and resuscitated by the vivifying spirit of Catholicism, all these energies, besides being strengthened, are employed in giving expression to their infinite desires, which have relation to beauty in its highest perfection. They seek no longer life to support

* Od. XI. 15.

† Hell. I.

By earth, nor its base metals, but by love,
Wisdom, and virtue,————— and therefore their works resemble those of the Divine Architect, and bear testimony to the sublime and amazing record, that man was created after his image and endowed with capacities analogous. Their temples are each like a world coming forth from his plastic hand, when the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy. Their cities are so rich in beauteous forms, that they seem like the wondrous works of the Eternal Master, and the ancients would have believed that, as was affirmed of Athens, the gods themselves contended for their possession; or at least, that they were worthy of those who sought but one employment,—to celebrate them with a perpetual song.* In Rome, the utmost expression of beauty is seen at every step. The exquisite taste which is displayed in the disposition of works of art is no where else to be found. Rome, independent of all associations, is doubtless the most splendid city in the world. Her churches, porticos, fountains, palaces, obelisks, and palmy villas, make her like some ideal city in the fancy of a poet. It is right, and unquestionably it is of necessary consequence, that the city of spirits, under the dominion of Intelligence and of the heavenly life, should be also that in which bodies and material forms approach the nearest to the essence of beauty, and are the farthest removed from all imperfection. Petrarch, in a letter to the Genoese, describes that state as it appeared in his youth. “Your country appeared a celestial paradise: such surely were the Elysian fields! What a beautiful object towards the sea! those towers which rose to heaven, those palaces where art excelled nature! those hills covered with cedars, vines, and olives! those houses of marble built under the rocks! those delicious retreats on the shore, where sand shines like gold, on which the foaming waves, dashing their crystal heads, attract the eyes of the pilot, and stop the motion of the rowers! Can we behold without admiration the more than mortal figures that inhabited your city? Those who entered it, though they were in the temple of felicity and joy." Milton borrows one of his most beautiful similitudes from the appearance of such a city at the rising of the sun:—

* Hor. Carm. I. 7.

————— As when a scout
Through dark and desert ways, with peril gone
All night, at last by break of cheerful dawn
Obtains the brow of some high-climbing hill,
Which to his eye discovers unaware
The goodly prospect of some foreign land
First seen, or some renown'd metropolis,
With glittering spires and pinnacles adorn'd
Which now the rising sun gilds with his beams.

A modern French writer (in a book of which I would conceal the title, as a man doth of some horrible thing), offers one admirable passage, in which he contrasts ancient Gothic Paris with the present capital, and shows the superior beauty of the former, appealing to all who have ever seen a Gothic city—entire, complete, homogeneous—such as Nuremberg in Bavaria, Vittoria in Spain, or even the little specimens of Vitré in Bretagne and of Nordhausen in Prussia. "After all," he says, "since the time of Louis XI. Paris has not increased much more than by a third part. It has certainly lost much more in beauty than it has gained in extent. Let one imagine himself looking down from the towers of Nôtre Dame upon Paris as it was formerly. The eye was at first confused with the mass of roofs, streets, bridges, spires, and belfreys.

"There was the lofty sharp gable, the turrets suspended at the angles of walls, the round-walled tower of the dungeon, the square and decorated tower of the church; the great, the little, the massive, the aërial. The eyes were lost for a long time in the depth of this labyrinth, where was nothing which had not its originality, its reason, its genius, its beauty; nothing which did not owe somewhat to art, from the least house, painted and carved as to its external wood-work, and with its arched door and sloped stories, to the royal Louvre, which had then a colonnade of towers." After describing the multitude of beautiful and sublime edifices, churches, convents, colleges, palaces, hotels, and halls, which were distinguishable out of this mass of buildings, he concludes with observing, "This is nevertheless the city of which Voltaire has said, that 'before Louis XIV. it possessed only four fine monuments;' a sentence which proves, that a man may have a great genius, and comprehend nothing of an art in which he has not been initiated. Thus Moliere thought to pay a high compliment to Raphael and Michael Angelo, in calling them those Mignards of their age. Gothic Paris became first disfigured by the architectural paganism which was contemporary with Luther; then followed a succession of other styles till the Revolution, when a taste arose, Greek and Roman, which produced monuments that bore as much resemblance to the Coliseum or to the Parthenon, as the constitution of the year four did to the laws of Minos. This he calls the style Messidor. Then followed the style

Napoleon, with its column of bronze made with cannon, and, he might have added, with the bells of churches. In the modern styles, there is a total want of that presiding judgment which knew how to adapt the architecture of an edifice to its particular destination, and to the climate of the country. Thus an exchange is shown which might be a royal palace, a chamber of parliament, a town house, a college, a riding-school, an academy, a museum, a barrack, a sepulchre, a temple, a theatre; and it has a flat Eastern roof, so that it must be swept and scraped in time of snow, as if it entered into the design of a roof, that it ought to be swept and scraped. Returning to the Gothic city of the fourteenth century, behold that surprising hedge of needles, of towers, and of belfreys, rising over the midst of the immense city, excepting where it is broken at the point of islands, and interrupted by the winding river.

Cover it with the shades of night, and mark the strange play of light and shadow in this sombre labyrinth of edifices; cast over it a beam of moonlight, which may vaguely sketch and bring out the vast crown of towers with the thousand sharp angles of spires and turrets,—and then compare. And if you wish to receive an impression from the old city which the modern cannot give you, ascend some elevated point which commands the entire city, at the hour of sun-rise, on the morning of some festival, and assist at the awakening of the bells. At the same moment these thousand churches vibrate. At first it is a scattered sound, passing from one church to another, as when musicians give signs of being about to commence. Then suddenly see—for sometimes it would seem that the ear has also its sight—see rising at the same moment, as it were, a column of noise, like a smoke of harmony. At first the vibrations of each bell rises straight, pure, and as if isolated from one another in the splendid sky of the morning; then by degrees increasing, they melt into one, and are mixed and amalgamated in a magnificent concert. It is now only one mass of sonorous vibrations, disengaged unceasingly from innumerable towers, which floats, undulates, rebounds, and thunders over the city, and prolongs, far beyond the horizon, the deafening circle of its oscillations. And yet this sea of harmony is not a chaos. Vast and profound as it is, still it has not lost its transparency; you see winding apart each group of notes which escapes from the belfrey; you can follow the dialogue alternately grave and piercing, from the chime to the great bell; you see the octaves jump from one tower to another; you see them dart forth, winged, light and hissing from the silver bell, and fall broken and heavy from that of baser materials; you see the rich gamut which descends and remounts unceasingly from the seven bells of one tower; you see dart through it the clear and rapid notes which make three or four luminous zigzag lines, and vanish like the lightening; below, it is the sharp and glassy chime of the abbey of St. Martin; on that side, it is the deep low murmur of the Louvre, and on the other it is the royal volley of the palace, while from time to time, at equal intervals, the heavy tone of the belfrey of Nôtre Dame makes them all sparkle like the anvil under the hammer.

Through the whole mass of sublime noise you see pass at intervals sounds of every form, from the low indistinct murmur to the sharp note of the Ave Maria, which explodes and sparkles like a shower of stars. Certes, this is an opera which deserves to be heard. The city seems to sing, as during the stillness of the night it had seemed to breathe. Lend an ear then to this chorus, which rises over the murmur of half a million of men, which mingles with the eternal lamentation of the stream, the infinite sighings of the wind wafted over the surrounding forests, which blend and soften what might have been too rough and piercing, and then say whether you know of any thing in the world more rich, more joyous, more golden, more resplendent than this tumult of chiming and tolling bells, than this furnace of music, than these ten thousand voices of brass, chanting altogether within flutes of stone of the length of three hundred feet, than this city, which is only one orchestra, than this symphony, which is as loud as a tempest."

Of the churches and monasteries, which were the noblest, and generally, as at Paris, the most ancient of the Christian monuments in cities,* I shall speak hereafter : but besides these, the learned stranger was sure to meet with objects in most cities connected with ancient heroic or saintly fame ; for religion stimulated men to preserve them with more than merely human care. Nothing is older in the history of men than the indications of a similar inclination to revere ancestral associations ; so that the monuments have existed even where the fame had perished,—like those walls at the villa of Mæcenas at Tivoli, of which antiquarians can only say, that they are an astonishment and an uncertain work, opus incertum. Dionysius says that down to his time the Romans preserved one of the original houses of the companions of Romulus, when he lived among the swine-herds and cow-herds on the mountains, where their huts used to be made of wood and rushes, without any joining : he says that this one, which was preserved sacred, used to be called the house of Romulus ; there were persons appointed to take care of it, and to see that nothing should be added to it for the sake of ornament, but if any part were destroyed by the injury of time or weather, it used to be carefully repaired and restored, as far as possible, to its original appearance.† Before the time of the Dorians, at Mycenæ were to be seen the Cyclopiæ Hall of Eurystheus, and the sumptuous palace of Agamemnon. Nevertheless Cicero was a witness that the most noble city of Greece, and once the most learned, knew not the monument of one of its most acute citizens, until it was shown to them by a man of Arpinum.‡ But the old monuments in Christian cities were chiefly venerable from a pious sentiment, which made men revere whatever was connected with the friends of God in former times, and there were more certain grounds than the ancients possessed for determining their authenticity, because the ecclesiastical records had been constantly preserved from the first ages in the capitals of each diocese and in the monasteries. When the Abbé Lebeuf was employed in composing his history of the diocese of Paris, he found that the country curates were able to supply him with much local antiquarian information that was highly interesting. It appears that in the very first ages the Christians adorned cities with memorials of the grace of heaven. Eusebius relates, that when he was at Cæsarea Philippi, he saw at the door of one house a bronze image of a woman on a stone column kneeling and with hands outstretched as a suppliant, and opposite to it stood, in the same metal, the image of a man, standing, holding out his hand to her. These represented Jesus Christ and the woman who touched his garment to be healed. On entering the city, adds the historian, we beheld these statues.* These images were afterwards destroyed by Julian, but the fragments were collected by the Christians, and placed in the church, as Sozomen relates.† Many streets of Christian cities became distinguished by some venerable name or memorial of faith. What stranger is not now moved with indescribable sensations of devout pleasure when, for example, in that pious and faithful city which the Rhone devastates and the Saone caresses, he finds himself unexpectedly in the street of St. Polycarp, or in the streets and churches of St. Irenæus, of St. Just, and of St. Pothin? or when at Rome, though I can now only hint at the sacred memorials of that amazing and holy city, he enters the way of St. Nicholas in Carcere, and the way of St. Peter's chains, and beholds the prison where the blessed apostles were confined, and that Pyramid by the Ostian road which saw the blessed Paul go to martyrdom. All Rome flocks to the chambers of a retired student in the Roman College, when the Church commemorates St. Aloysius Gonzaga.

* Lebeuf, Hist. du Diocèse de Paris, Tom. XVIII.

† Antiq. Rom. Lib. I. cap. 79.

‡ Tuscul. v. 23.

In the Gesu are preserved the small humble rooms which St. Ignatius occupied, his little study, and the small low chamber floored with tiles in which he died. Here is now an altar, at which St. Charles Borromeo said his first mass. The same chamber was inhabited also by St. Francis Borgia. Hear you see the old family painting of St. Ignatius, as a young knight, clad in complete steel, possessing a fair and engaging countenance. How solemn are the emotions on finding one'sself in these rooms, where such an intercourse passed between earth and heaven! Who can depart from them without kissing the ground! In the house of the novices, adjoining the Church of St. Andrew, on Monte Cavallo, is shown the chamber in which St. Stanislaus Kostka died. It is now a chapel, and on the spot where he expired a most lovely figure of the little saint is represented as on his bed, in black and white marble. The sculptor, from being a heretic, was converted by the work of his own hands. What a tender mystery of grace! These are the doors which open not for gold, but only to the symbolum or sacred sign of Catholics. In the convent of the oratory at Rome, you see the chamber of St. Philip Neri, with the furniture as it stood in his time. What stranger can be insensible to the influence of local associations as he passes through the streets of Florence, when in a lane near the Cathedral, which enters the Piazza at the spot where Dante used to sit, he is shown the house in which St. Antoninus, the sainted archbishop, was born and educated? or when at Milan his attention is arrested in a street near the Basilica of St. Ambrose by an inscription, stating that in that house was baptized St. Augustin by St. Ambrose? or when he sees there the halls of the Palatine schools, and the statue of St. Augustin, under which is written "Augustinus hic humana docens, Divina didicit?" With what reverence does one enter that cell at Padua, built by the very hands of the seraphic father, inhabited at various times by five saints, and where Jesus Christ himself appeared in a visible form to the dying Anthony. From this spot was that blessed soul conducted to heaven attended by a choir of exulting angels. Ah! well may the inscription over the entrance be "supplex ingredere."

* Hist. Eccles. Lib. VII. cap. 18.

† Hist. Eccles. Lib. V. cap. 20.

In Sienna, the city which boasts the two holy advocates, is that cell of St. Catharine, in the house where she was born, which was originally a little room at the far end of the shop of her father, who was a dyer. In this cell she slept, and wrote her celebrated Epistles, and studied the holy Scriptures and the writings of St. Thomas Aquinas. The hole in the wall is seen through which she daily gave alms to the poor. In this cell she performed her penitential exercises: in this cell she had the vision of angels: in this cell did she remain in an exstasy during three days after the festival of the conversion of St. Paul. At Paris, in the street de la Calendre, the fifth house on the right hand, on entering from the street de la Juiverie, was believed by tradition to have been that in which St. Mareel, Bishop of Paris, was born, whose image was over the door. The clergy of Nôtre Dame used to make a station before this house on the day of the Ascension.* At Rheims, on the eastern side, was a gate called of the Prison, because there was a tower there in which Archbishop Tilpin confined Oger le Danois, and where Archbishop Vulfar retained some Saxons whom Charlemagne had confided to him.†

The first bishops of Rheims were St. Sixtus and St. Siniceus, among whose converts fifty martyrs sealed their faith with their blood, at a spot called La Pompele, one league from the city, on the great Roman road, which was shown by constant tradition.‡ At Troyes there was a house which bore the sign of the tower of St. Mastie, to commemorate the tower of the house which had formerly stood there, in which that holy virgin lived with her parents in the fifth century, where her family received the first Christian missionaries, and were converted by them.§ In the wall of the house before which St. Loup stopped Attila, when he passed by Troyes, was a piece of sculpture, representing the holy Bishop with his mitre and crosier, and a great soldier followed by others of a lower stature, and under it was an inscription, stating that in that spot did St. Loup, Bishop of Troyes, stop Attila. It would be endless to enumerate similar instances.

The streets of the cities of Italy are immortalized, not merely by the fountains

* Lebeuf, Hist. du Diocese de Paris, Tom. II. chap. 2.

† Anquetil, Hist. de Rheims, Lib. XIX.

‡ Id. Liv. I. 28.

§ Desguerrois, Hist. du Diocese de Troyes, 18.

that have been sung by Dante,* but by the miraculous graces of heaven commemorated by solemn pillars, as that column near the Baptistery in the Piazza del Duomo at Florence, which attests the miracle connected with the body of St. Zenobio, and that stone cross in the square at Aosta, which commemorates the flight of Calvin from that city on his return from Italy. In these cities are bridges containing houses in which were born canonized saints, and palaces, from the balconies of which most holy pontiffs have given their benediction.† At Florence there is that bridge of graces with its little oratory of our Lady, and the house still stands, in which was born blessed Thomas de Belacci, of the order of St. Francis. Some of these ancient Christian cities wore a grave and melancholy aspect, which announced the city of recollections and of the past. Witness Arles, with its hotels and castles whose mysterious inhabitants have long since disappeared, and with its images that have an undefinable air of strangeness, which startles the beholder. Witness Pisa, with its palaces, that contain mysterious inscriptions over the gates, enigmatical, and full of ancient and forgotten lore. On the palace Lanfreducci are the words, "alla giornata," under which hangs a captive's chain; the origin of which is no less a mystery than the inscription, though one feels that there is some connection between them, and that they refer to the secret of some forgotten history. Into what meditation does the pilgrim fall when he reads over the gate of an ancient palace in Ravenna, the city which received the banished Dante, these words, which seem to refer to that event: "Deesse nobis terra in qua vivamus, in qua moriamur non potest;" or when, over the door of another house in the same city, he reads, "Amicis et ne paucis pateat etiam fectis?" These palaces, erected in the middle ages, have a solemn and tragic aspect, and they astonish us by their number as well as by their vastness. The verses of Horace do not seem to have cooled the ardor of our ancestors for building, although they did not require to be reminded of their tombs. The interior of these majestic hotels, as we observed of the castles of chivalry, announced any thing but an effeminate and trifling taste. It is impossible not to be struck with awe on ascending those majestic staircases in the palaces of Genoa, or on entering that terrible Hall of the Giants in the palace of Tau at Mantua, in which, when once entered, you see no means of exit; but you are surrounded with rocks, which fall upon giants wounded and flying, and defending themselves in vain on ground which is covered with ruins, while the distance is involved in clouds and thunder. Even the windows of shops in Catholic cities correspond with the spirituality of the inhabitants, and present more beautiful objects of piety for the use and decoration of churches and oratories than instruments of luxury and secular pomp. Jewels and gold are displayed there in subservience to religious reverence, and not to the vanity of the rich. The profession of the silversmiths of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries was connected with all the arts of

* That of Sienna.

† From the Palace Pitti Pius VII., in 1804, gave his benediction to the Florentines.

design, and formed an apprenticeship and a school of sculpture ; so that from their shops came forth such men as Brunellesco, Donatello, and Ghiberti.

As he who kneeling gazes on the relics of the saintly dead within the walls of Vallombrosa, feels his eyes drawn on every side, and knows not where to stay his looks, so does the pilgrim feel his sense confused on entering an ancient city of Christians, which on every side contains some wondrous monument of sanctity beneficence, and zeal. The streets of cities in the middle ages, as indeed those of Italy and Spain at present, were not a scene of constant commotion and bewildering activity, from the din and dust of wheels, like those of modern luxurious cities,

———where the noise
Of riot ascends above their loftiest towers,
And injury and outrage.

Men were taught, as in the time of St. Chrysostom, to walk through the streets of cities with the utmost modesty, having their eyes rather cast upon the ground than directing them from side to side, lest their enemy should take occasion to wound their soul. The inhabitants seemed employed but not dissipated. Every thing indicated that they had heard the holy warning, "potes citò fugare Jesum, et gratiam ejus perdere si vulneris ad exteriora declinare." The streets were not disturbed by that confusion of hideous discords which pervade the towns of France and England, where the haste of those who have deserted the place of virtue to become the restless slaves of sordid gain, gives rise to a multitude of sounds distracting and ignoble: they were not a stage of continued agony for poor animals, sinking under the blows of merciless tormentors, who seemed in every stroke to think of their political enemies.

The streets from the thirteenth century, as at Rome till lately, and as at Florence to this day, were flagged across like the pavement of a church, being less designed for wheeled carriages than for passengers on foot or on horseback. The latter were sufficiently numerous, for nobles used to pay their visits on horseback, judges to proceed to the courts, and even the clergy to go about on horseback ; monks used sometimes to preach from horseback ; kings went to be crowned on horseback ; and it is even recorded that the constable of St. Pol went on horseback from the Bastile to the Place de Grève to be beheaded.* It was not necessary to be rich and to have a vast palace in order to sleep in the city ;† the sweet refreshment of the first rest was not excluded there. Guillaume de Champagne, Archbishop of Rheims, gave to that city the ground called "culturam" in the suburbs, in order to build upon it houses for the cartwrights, carpenters, coopers, and all who exercised a noisy trade, that the streets of the city might be tranquil.‡ Their silence was only broken by the cheerful sound of human voices, or by the sweet

* Monteil, Hist. des Français, Tom. IV. 301.

† Juv. Sat. III.

‡ Anquetil, Hist. de Rheims, II. 341.

tinkling of innumerable bells, for such was the number of clocks that struck minute divisions of every hour, from churches, convents, palaces, and portals, that it was like a constant shower of hours and beautiful harmony, or else it was by the chant of the solemn Litany, begun within a church, and then continued in the adjoining street by the kneeling crowd. In the south of France, at the present day, as we read was the case in Avignon in the time of Petrarch, the stone benches at the doors of the houses are occupied every evening by persons of all classes, not excepting even the noblest, conversing familiarly together, as if members of one family, while children play in the centre of the streets, and poets recite their verses to the plaintive melody of a guitar. Such seats are found outside the house of Ariosto, in the street of Mariasole at Ferrara.

To account for the different character which architecture, customs, hours, and all things relative to life in cities assume with the moderns, and with those who followed the Christian philosophy, would not be difficult. The moderns are only pleased by distraction, and their cities are expressly required to supply them with this ingredient, so essential to their enjoyment. Each house seems to proclaim the character of its inhabitant; the whole man drawn out to things external, and resting on things without.

His hours fill'd up with riots, banquets, sports,
And never noted in him any study,
Any retirement, any sequestration
From open haunts and popularity.

Γαστήρ ὅλον τὸ ὄμμα, πανταχῇ βλέπων Ὁφθαλμοῖς.

And, as Messenio jests in the old play, every city under their influence might have been called Epidamnus, even by themselves; for they never left one without suffering loss;* whereas our Catholic ancestors were most cheerful when the interior life was not injured by things external, but rather assisted; and therefore even the form of their cities was calculated to favor meditation and peace, inasmuch that as St. Benedict prescribes to the abbots of his order, "All things seem to have been purposely tempered and disposed, so that souls might be saved." It was clear that a meek placid feeling was diffused through the state. Those narrow modest streets, in which the people seem to live as one family, and to walk as dear children before God, with their eyes continually presented with gracious images of the saints and of our blessed Lady, however disagreeable in the judgment of those who seek to live well by means of horses and chariots, who are accustomed to cities where both nature and Christianity are banished, in which the public ways seem so expressly designed for the purposes of dress and display, that men are afraid to speak or move there, excepting with an air which denotes that they are rich, seem expressly made to favor a form of life for men who rather shun than love distract-

* Plautus Menæchmi. II. 1.

tion. In Christian ages, the poet might traverse Rome from the Quirinal to Mount Aventine without meeting any obstacle to his meditation, and the chorus of writers was not obliged, as Horace says, to fly from cities and confine its affection to the groves.*

Wherever streets were necessarily disturbed, it was usual, until two centuries ago, to build houses with their gable ends turned towards it, so that the front was removed from the distraction, being towards some court or garden. In fact, in Catholic cities, the laity could always lead somewhat of a monastic life, while inhabiting their paternal or their hired house. They have other resources there, besides flying from place to place, like hawks or vultures, wherever the smell of meat rises to their nostrils, indicating the preparation for a feast. In a modern city, men in the evening leave their houses for a banquet: in a Catholic city they go out for the benediction. The offices of the Church, morning and evening, and even the night instruction were not wanting to those who were still living in the world; and, if the intervals were past in study, or other intellectual exercise, it was a life scholastic and almost monastical. The number of churches always open, the frequent processions, and the repeated instructions of the clergy, made the whole city like a holy place, and were, without doubt, the means of making multitudes to choose the strait entrance, and to walk in the narrow way. There are many who have no idea of the perfection in which great numbers, in every rank of society, pass their lives in Catholic cities, not excepting even that capital which has of late been made the nurse of so much ill. But wherever the modern philosophy has created, as it were, an atmosphere, that which is spiritual is so confined, closed and isolated, that its existence is hardly felt or known. The world appears to reign with undisputed possession, and that too as if it had authority to reign. And yet there are tender and passionate souls who have need of being unceasingly preserved in the path of virtue by the reign of religious exercises, who when deprived of the power of approaching at the hour their inclinations may suggest to the resources of grace, are exposed to great perils, and who, perhaps, sometimes incur in consequence eternal death.

Ay me, how many perils doe enfold,
The righteous man, to make him daily fall!

House of prayer why close thy gates? Is there an hour in all nature when the heart should be weary of prayer? when man, whom highest God doth deign to hear in thee as his temple, should have no incense to offer before thy altar, no tear to confide to thee?†

In Catholic cities there are always some young persons who lead a life like that of St. Basil and his friend, while students together, who knew the way to two places only of the great city in which they resided,—to the church and to the schools. And yet there even the most frequented ways are safe for innocence, breathing rather an air of poesy than of diabolic contagion. The poor beggars in the streets of Rome, instead of telling a tale of feigned distress, are heard chanting the prose for the dead or some hymn to blessed Mary. Homer is represented saying, that he prefers wandering over the world, though weak and poor, to leading an idle life in the sacred streets of Cyme ; but in a Catholic city there is no condition which may not possess sanctity and joy. No hostile banner is there hoisted to draw men from the ranks of virtue. The Florentines, indeed, may not at present dress in that simple style which seemed so admirable to Dante, but visit a sea-port like Genoa, and see what innocent and holy manners prevail. It is no longer the nautic crowd whose dissolute insolence is the theme of the Athenian poets. Here angels might pass, and not drop a tear. Mark the manners even of the multitude that loiters in the public ways of every frequented town. See how it meekly kneels to receive a benediction from the bishop who happens to pass by : and when the dusk comes on, and the lamp of the sanctuary begins to shine brighter, and to arrest the eye of the passenger through the opened doors of churches, hearken to the sweet sound of innumerable bells which rises from all sides, and see what a change of movement takes place among this joyous and innocent people ; the old men break off their conversation on the benches at the doors and take out their rosaries, the children snatch up their books and jackets from the green in token that play is over, the women rise from their labor of the distaff, and all together proceed into the church, when the solemn litany soon rises with its abrupt and crashing peal, till the bells all toll out their last and loudest tone, and the adorable victim is raised over the prostrate people, who then issue forth and retire to their respective homes in sweet peace, and with an expression of the utmost thankfulness and joy.

* Hor. Epist. II. 2.

† Lamartine.

The moderns in vain attempt to account for the difference of manners in these Catholic cities, and in their own, by referring to their present prosperity and accumulation of wealth ; these cities in point of magnificence incomparably surpassed theirs, and with respect to riches they were not inferior : for peace was in their strength, and abundance in their towers. An able writer has shown that the commercial prosperity of Christian nations was owing to that universal church which broke down the barriers between different nations, developed and assisted the spirit of proselytism by withdrawing religion from national and political forms, and by means of that spirit, opened new channels to maritime commerce and to the intercourse of men. St. Louis, in his establishments, laid down the principle of free exportation as the simple dictate of universal charity. It is true men had not for sole motive of activity the desire of making a fortune, tempered by the fear of the executioner ; but riches flowed into the Catholic states, as they had been promised in the Gospel, in the way of a surplus ; and temporal prosperity was added unto those who sought first the kingdom of heaven and its justice. In 1764, the Abbé Intieri, founded at Naples the first chair of political economy, and the author who remarks this fact establishes his proposition that Catholicism comprises in its practical consequences the most admirable system of social economy which has ever been given to the world. In fact, from the tenth century, a multitude of free cities had risen in Flanders and on the Baltic, the ancient territory of the Germans, which rivalled Venice and Genoa in riches. It is admitted that in the fifteenth century, Florence, Venice, and Genoa possessed as much wealth as is now found in London, and without the desolation of its poor. Two millions of florins in gold, in effective money, circulated at that time in the former city, while it was the centre of learning and the arts. Boniface VIII. said to Charles of Valois, who was going to Florence, "I send you to the fountain of gold." Nevertheless Pignotti remarks that the merchants there still lived even in the midst of riches, far removed from the parade of ostentation. They would not have ventured to put either gold or silver upon their garments, nor make use of silver plate at their tables; and it would have been accounted a shame for a citizen to have made use of it.* "For this disposition and greatness of mind" was inherent in a Catholic community, to which these words of Cicero are strictly applicable, "that while in their private affairs and domestic expenses, being content with the least, they lived on the most slender allowance, in the empire and in public dignity they referred all things to grandeur and magnificence." "Quæritur enim in re domestica continentiae laus, in publica dignitatis."† Pignotti says, that in the course of a few years many sumptuous edifices had been erected in Florence, and that generosity appeared to go hand in hand with religious charity in embellishing that city. In the year 1288, a Florentine citizen, Falco Portinari, better known on account of his daughter Beatrice, who is immortalized by Dante, than by the pious and useful work he began, founded the hospital of Santa Maria Nuova, one of the first in Tuscany. Five years afterwards, the genius of Calimala was employed in adorning the church of St. John with white and black marble. In the preceding year, on the day of the holy cross, the church of this name was begun with that magnificence which we now admire; and in September a beginning was made with all possible splendor to the superb cathedral of Santa Maria del Fiore. It was to these holy edifices that merchants voluntarily devoted a part of their gains. The same men built also two towns in the upper valley of the Arno, peopled them, and gave privileges to the inhabitants. These were the castles of St. John upon the left bank of the Arno, and that of Castel Franco on the right. It was the genius of the Catholic religion which inspired Cosmo de Medicis, when he applied his immense riches to embellishing the city and the country with sacred and profane buildings. The hill of Fiesole still boasts of his superb edifices; those of St. Jerome, the magnificent abbey, the splendid villa at the summit of Careggi, Cafaggiolo, and Trebbio, are all works of Cosmo. In Florence, the sumptuous palace in Via Larga, the churches of St. Laurence, St. Mark, and St. Verdiana, owe their origin to him. In Magello, too, he erected the church of the minor friars in the midst of a delightful grove, and he even erected hospitals in Jerusalem : in such works the operation of religion is seen as clearly as if they were enjoined by the very letter of its text. Since the ages of faith, and the revival of the epicurean philosophy, the only monuments erected in towns have been fortresses and prisons, theatres, exchanges, and triumphal arches.

* Hist. of Tuscany, III.

† Pro L. Flacco.

"Laudantur urbes similiter atque homines,"* says Quintilian. "The virtues and vices of each are the same." Amidst the general character of faith which belonged to Christian cities, there were moral features peculiar to particular places discernible in each. Thus an old writer says, that the city of Rouen assumed a lamb for its arms, to signify that this city was always mild and gentle, insomuch that the blood of no martyr was ever shed within its walls; first the messengers of God, who came there having been received with honor, and all strangers being sure, in all ages, to meet there with kind and hospitable treatment.† At Peronne such attention was paid to innocence of language, that fines used to be levied upon all who offended against it, and these fines were applied to the expense of the walls.‡ Some cities could boast of enjoying the especial favor of holy advocates; others like Ravenna, seemed to enjoy privileges from heaven. At Lyons, the church had a custom of always expecting a revelation from God before it elected an archbishop. In the sixth century, this custom prevailed there, as appears from the life of St. Eucher; for we read that on occasion of his predecessor's death a child had a vision of an angel, who indicated to him St. Eucher, who led a hermit's life in a cavern on the Durance. Upon hearing this, the people and clergy, after a fast of three days, sent the archdeacon with some others to the hermit, whom they brought back with them, and recognized him unanimously as their pastor.§ Cities exulted in their ancient exploits of saintly warfare, as a family in those of its ancestors. Thus, in the hall of the palace of the Republic, at Sienna, you are triumphantly shown a painting which represents the departure of the two thousand Siennese crusaders, who were sent to the Holy Land in the year 1098. Cicero says, "that for discipline and gravity Marseilles surpassed every other, and that it would be easier to praise all its institutions than to imitate them."|| Yet his writings are an evidence that the whole character of a city life has undergone a revolution since the rise of Christianity: for in the ages of faith it was assuredly free from the crimes which he seems to think inseparable from it.¶ In the Augustan age the persons who preferred cities to the country are described as having regard only to their plays, baths, taverns, and vaults of debauchery. In comparison with the character which then prevailed, there was no luxury and consequently no avarice in Catholic cities: it

* Hist. Orat. Lib. III. 7.

† Théod. Liquez, Recherches sur l'Hist. Religieuse et Littéraire de Rouen depuis les premiers temps jusqu'à Rollon, p. 11.

‡ Lettres du Roi, 28 Janv. 1368, relative to the town of Peronne.

§ Mabillon, Acta Benedict. Tom. I. 248.

|| Pro L. Flacco.

¶ Pro S. Roscio Amer.

 Hor. Epist. I. 14.

was for every man who wished to visit them, and not, as at ancient Cornith, for the rich alone. "The Romans," says Petrarch, "are not greedy of gain. I was astonished in so great a city, to find so few merchants and usurers." The streets of these cities were less familiar with the bulletins of an exchange, than with the verses of pilgrims, who, like St. Columban from Ireland, sung the shame and folly of avarice.

St. Gregory, of Tours, mentions the coming of Nuninus, a French nobleman, to the city of Auxerre, and expressly says, that he came to that city, "causa tantum religionis," to visit the tombs of saints, and to pray to God.* Fleury says, that during the solemn fasts of the church, all business ceased, and the streets of the most populous cities were as silent as the desert.† On entering a Catholic city during the octave of Corpus Christi, you find the air in every street embalmed with the fragrance of roses, and the pavement still strewed with the beautiful leaves which had been scattered before the blessed sacrament. Cities were privileged, mysterious holy places, which announced on all sides the good tidings of redemption, and from many of them, as still in our days from Rome, each man necessarily returned either better or worse than when he went. When the Normans in the eleventh century first came to Sicily, Messina had been since two hundred years in the hands of the Mussulmans, and yet on the summit of its ramparts shone a cross of gold on a purple flag, a revered symbol which the inhabitants had obtained permission to retain. When Ferdinand and Isabella had delivered the city of Grenada from the dominion of the Moors, the joy was all for the exaltation of the cross.

The first step taken by the grand master of Leon, on taking possession of the city, was to elevate a great cross on the highest tower of the Alhambra, while a numerous clergy intoned the joyful hymn of "Te Deum laudamus," and the devout hymn, "O Crux ave spes unica." Three times was the said cross raised on high, and at each elevation the people sung this pious hymn. Then the devout and victorious King of Spain, nobly armed, on horseback in the midst of his battalions, when he beheld the cross elevated, dismounted and knelt upon the ground, and adored the cross, returning thanks to God for the benefits he had bestowed upon them in the recovery of this great city of Grenada. As you enter Rome by the gate of St. Paul, or by that of St. Lorenzo, you see a little cross in the wall of the outer portal, and this every fervent Christian kisses with devout reverence. In Italy, the first thing that meets the eye over the gate of towered cities is a pious invitation to all the faithful from some particular Church, to assist in it at some approaching festival which it is about to celebrate. At the gate of every city there is an image of its patron, or some noble painting which tells the stranger that faith is within those walls, so that he enters full of devout joy and confidence, perhaps, applying to it those mysterious words of the divine text, "Blessed are they who enter into the city; without are the delusions of nature, and the poison-nous creatures which infest the desert of the world." Nor are these impressions effaced as he departs from it, for the Catholic traveller must needs feel that the place is holy in which dwells the meek religious man of blessed order to whom he has repaired in the sacramental tribunals, whom he found a man of God, for wisdom and for charity more than human, who has renovated his world-worn heart by revealing to him the secrets of the spiritual side of things and refreshed his parched and fainting soul with some drops of the dew of heaven. Many were the memorable events which followed from this conception of the holiness of cities, of which two instances are related by St. Gregory, of Tours; for he says, that the city of Bazadois being besieged, a certain holy priest used to go round the walls every night singing the Psalms and praying, while the enemy was laying waste all the surrounding towns, burning houses, and ravaging lands, and plundering in all directions; but that one night it seemed to Gauseric, the king of the barbarians, as if men in white robes, and carrying lighted tapers, were making the circuit of the city, and raising a chorus of psalmody; that after sending a herald to demand the reason of it, and receiving for answer, that no such procession had been seen by the citizens, and that they knew nothing of it, he concluded if they do not know it is manifest that God assists them, and thereupon that he drew off from the place.*

The second example occurred at the siege of Nantes, while that city was surrounded by a host of barbarians, in the time of King Chlodorec, for it happened on the sixtieth night of the siege about midnight, that there appeared to them men in white vestments, and holding burning tapers, who walked forth from the Basilica of the blessed martyrs, Rogatianus and Donatus, and another chorus proceeded from the neighboring church of the great confessor Similinus. The two processions joined and saluted each other, prostrated themselves in prayer, and then returned each to the place whence it first came forth. At this spectacle, the whole army of the enemy being seized with great horror, fled with such precipitation, that at break of day there was not a man to be seen.† Fanciful writers availed themselves of this opinion of the sanctity of cities in framing tales to amuse their readers. Torquemade relates an instance to show how unwilling were those under the dominion of demons to enter them, and it is told with such simplicity, that it cannot be heard without a certain pleasure. "When I was a student," then says Torquemade, "another young scholar was very intimate with me, who became afterwards so skilled in medicine, that he was made physician to the Emperor Charles V. This youth told me that being at the town of Guadalonpe, learning grammar in the monastery there, he on one occasion went out in the evening to take a walk in the fields, and that he saw a man coming up to him habited like a monk, and mounted on a horse so lean and weary, that it seemed hardly able to bear the weight. The stranger came up to him and said, 'Young man will you do me the favor to go for me into the town and buy something for my supper, because I cannot enter it myself at present, for certain reasons ; and you will do me a great pleasure if you will take this trouble for me.' The scholar said he would go gladly if he would give him the means : and so he gave him silver, and the scholar ran to the town, and brought him back what he desired. The man, spreading his mantle on the ground, sat down and made his supper in the field, and invited the scholar to eat with him. So as they talked together about many things, the scholar asked him where he was going, and he replied, to Grenada. The scholar said, 'I hope to go there myself before long to see my mother, for it is a long time since I have seen her or heard from her.' The man then said, 'If you wish to go there, come with me, and I will pay your expenses, and comfort you on the way ; only it must be on the condition that we set out immediately, for I cannot delay here.' The scholar, who was very poor, not having a farthing, accepted the offer and only begged him to wait till he could run to the town, to commend some of his acquaintances to God, and to tie up some books. The man consenting, he ran off, and came back speedily with his books in a string ; but as it was night-fall, he begged the man to wait till morning ; but he replied that they would better travel during the night, and rest by day, in order to avoid the heat, for it was in the month of June : so they set out, the man on horseback and the scholar on foot, talking together of many things, till after a time the man desired him to mount up behind him. The scholar began to laugh, and said 'How can your horse carry us both, when he is already so fatigued with your weight ?' 'Ah,' replied the stranger, 'you do not know him : only mount, boy, as I bid you.' The scholar obeyed, and immediately the horse began to trot in a wonderful style, and so smoothly, that the scholar at last fell asleep. Thus they travelled all night, and at day-break the scholar opened his eyes and saw a beautiful country of gardens and groves, and a great city before him, and he asked his companion what was its name, and he told him that they were on the plain of Grenada, and only begged in return for such a lift, that he would not mention to any one the particulars of the journey ; 'for,' he added, 'I must now turn off here, and so you may go your own way into the city.' The scholar, in great amaze, let himself down and took leave of him, and entered Grenada, not a little alarmed, and persuaded that he must have been riding upon a horse possessed."*

* S. Greg. Turon. Miracul. Lib. I. 13.

† Id. Lib. I. 60.

But to return from fable to history. The very seasons of amusement and of busy occupation in cities partook of a religious interest. Sacred plays were represented to honor the entry of kings : it was usual in the public streets to act the play of the good Samaritan, of Dives and Lazarus, of the Annunciation and Nativity. Coventry, Chester, York, and Newcastle-upon-Tyne, were famous for their religious plays. The incorporated trades used to perform, and the various sacred parts were assigned to particular trades, according to their respective patrons. A sacred mystery of the passion of Christ was performed at Padua in 1243 ; and at Friuli in 1298 ; and at Florence in 1304 there was a representation of hell upon the Arno, to the fame of which spectacle Dante, then in exile, is said to have been not insensible. In the same city, on occasion of the anniversary of the death of Cosmo de Medicis, there was a grand public festival given in representation of the three Magi coming from the East, guided by the star. It was so pompous, that the preparations cost the labor of three months.* These superb pageants, which used to be celebrated in cities and towns on great events, in which persons of all ranks took part, nourished a taste for art and decoration, and tended to ennoble and humanize the lower orders. Such were the magnificent spectacles given at Venice, when Lorenzo Celsi was doge, in the year 1364, on occasion of the recovery of the island of Candia, and at Milan by the Visconti, in 1355, and by Bergonzo Botta on the marriage of Giovanni Galeazzo Sforza with Isabella of Arragon; as also by Galeazzo Visconti in 1366, when he married his daughter to Lionel, son of the king of England, and that celebrated at Rimini in 1324, by Malatesta. These were sometimes annual, as that at Venice on the election of a new doge, and on the marrying of the sea, when used to be displayed the eight standards, which sovereign pontiffs had given to the republic ; and that on the feast of St. Catherine, instituted by the doge Gradenigo in 1307 ; and in other places an annual rejoicing took place, as at Ferrara, in persuanee of a statue in 1279 ; on the festival of St. George ; and at Vienza that denominated of the wheel, on Corpus Christi and on the Assumption ; at Pavia on the anniversary of the translation of San Siro ; and at Sienna on the feast of St. George, to commemorate its deliverance at Monte Aperto ; at Modena on the feast of St. Michael ; at Bologna, in the thirteenth century, on that of St. Bartholomew, to commemorate its deliverance from the tyranny of the Ghibellines ; and on that of St. Peter ; at Verona, on the first Sunday of Lent, at which latter Dante was present ; and on the last Friday of the carnival, in the piazza of St. Zeno.*

* Hexameron, Liv. III. 284.

Stripe mentions the spectacles which were exhibited in London, when Queen Eleanor rode through the city to her coronation, in 1236 ; and again in 1298, on occasion of the victory obtained by Edward I. over the Scots ; and again in 1357, when Edward the Black Prince brought King John of France prisoner through the city ; and in 1392, when Richard II. passed through London, after the citizens, by submission and the queen's intercession, had obtained the restoration of their charter ; and again in 1415, upon the entry of Henry V. after the battle of Agincourt ; and again in 1445, on the marriage of Henry VI. with Queen Marguerite, of which last we read, that there were costly pageants with verses by Lydgate, and resemblance of divers old histories, to the great comfort of the queen and her attendants. Sometimes the public amusements consisted in the exercises of the youth. Invitations to tournaments used to be sent to cities as well as to the no-

* Machiavel's Hist. of Florence, Lib. VII.

* Antichita Romantiche d'Italia, Epoca II.

bility. In the year 1331, the citizens of Rheims proceeded under their banners to assist at a celebrated tournament near Tournay, at which Hugues de Large, one of their number, defeated and disarmed John Vestin of Tournay, surnamed Le Roi de Cornouailles, one of the most doughty champions.* Rivers gave occasion to a variety of joyous spectacles, as that at Pavia every year performed in boats on the Ticino; and at Pisa that on the bridge over the Arno, to commemorate the valor of Cinzia Sismondi, whose heroism preserved the city from being surprised by the Saracens in 1105:† but the sentiment of pagan glory never entered into them; for the mimic triumph of Castruccio Castracani at Lucca, in 1326, was a rare, if not a solitary instance, of a revival of that barbarous spectacle. In Italy we may still witness the innocent and beautiful form of public rejoicing, as in that city on the Arno,‡ whose youth still delights in the exercises of the days of old chivalry, when its festivities could inspire Ariosto with imagery for his world of bright enchantment. The chivalry of humble life played an important part on these occasions.

The King of France, Louis XII. and his queen, made their entry into the city of Rouen, which was very triumphant, for, adds the old historian of Bayart, if the gentlemen did their duty there, the children of the town did theirs no less.§ In another respect they conduced to the advantage of society, by causing to meet together the nobles, poets, philosophers, and men of letters of various countries, who thus became acquainted with each other, and mutually imparted those discoveries which might contribute to the common glory. In fact, noble writers did not disdain to describe these spectacles: and sometimes the earliest efforts of their genius were employed upon them, as those of Giambullari when he described that celebrated at Florence on the marriage of Cosmo I. with Eleanore of Toledo. At Venice, Jaffier had the curiosity to witness the ceremony of the doge marrying the sea, because it was to be for the last time. St. Real says, this spectacle of public rejoicing, this tranquil and happy festival of a whole people, so wrought upon him that he lost all resolution to co-operate with the conspirators and destroy Venice: and it was at that moment that he conceived the expedient which he hoped might save both the city and his companions. Petrarch, describing the joyous festivity at Cologne on the evening of his arrival in that city, after mentioning how he was struck with the number of beautiful women who covered the banks of the Rhine, concludes thus: "In the midst of the vast crowd I was surprised to find neither tumult nor confusion; great joy appeared without licentiousness." The connection between the Catholic religion and this cheerful and happy aspect of cities, was never more clearly seen than where the modern philosophy is allowed to prevail against it, as in that noble capital which in former times was joyous

* Anquetil, Hist. de Rheims, Liv. III. 154.

† Tranci Annali Pisani. Marangoni Cronica di Pisa, 318.

‡ The famous sport of the Pisans, called the giuoco del ponte, recalls the games of chivalry.

§ La tres joyeuse Hystoire, &c., chap. xxviii.

and comparatively innocent, though now, through the multitude of her sophists, she is proud and loathsome. There for awhile at least they have accomplished their triumph: "attrita est civitas vanitatis; clausa est omnis domus nullo introeunte."*

To the intervals of busy occupation belonged also a kind of religious interest in the Christian towns, which might even supply matter for a curious episode in their history. When religion had given rise to an extraordinary concourse of people at any place, assembling in consequence of devotion to some saint on his festival, merchants availed themselves of the circumstance, and fairs were established during the interval, so that the faithful might exercise their devotion, and at the same time reap the advantage of a plentiful and cheap market for things of more rare or difficult attainment. The clergy favored commerce to a certain extent, and even granted indulgences to those who, having repaired to these fairs, should make offerings to the poor in the nearest church; for piety found nothing to condemn in this kind of commerce, which was simple and conformable to those primeval maxims of humanity which Hesiod of old developed in heroic verse. All servile labor was indeed prohibited on a festival, but dispensations and custom for the good of the community allowed this minor and local traffic, though contrary to the canon law, which on these occasions was considered abrogated.†

At Jerusalem during the seasons when the pilgrims from the West resorted thither, there was a fair held; at Loretto on the festival of our Lady in September, at Pavia on the festival of St. Augustin, whose relics are there enshrined, and similarly in other places, according to the epoch of their respective patrons, annual fairs were held. At Lyons the famous fair des Merveilles, owed its origin to a solemn festival, celebrated in memory of the 19,000 victims whose blood was shed for the faith in the primitive Church. This drew such a concourse of people, that the fair was established. The celebrated fair of Beaucaire was held at the feast of the Magdalen. In the time of King Charles V. Gilles Malet, Seigneur of Villepeele, obtained leave to have a fair in this place, to begin on St. George's Day, on account of the concourse of people to the chapel there, which was under the invocation of that saint.‡ Such was the crowd of devout people who resorted to the abbey of Gercy on the festival of its patron, when his relics were exposed, that the abbess obtained leave, in 1510, to establish a fair on that day. It was the exposition of the relics in the abbey of Hierre which occasioned the concourse of people there, and the consequent establishment of the fair on its festival. The dedication of the church of St. Remi at Rheims, is still commemorated by an annual fair on the first of October. In the year 1486 the monks of St. Germain-des-Près, at Paris, had the privilege of holding a fair near the abbey; so had also the abbey of St. Laurent. This was the scene of Parisian festivity.

* Isai. c. xxiv.

† Ligorio Theologia, Lib. III. Tract. III. cap. 1.

‡ Lebeuf, Hist. du Diocèse de Paris, Tom. XIII. 195.

Every day during the fair, mass used to be said in a chapel at the end of one of the halls or booths. There was also a fair in the open place opposite the west front of Nôtre Dame; another within the walls of the temple on the festival of St. Simon and St. Jude; another on the festival of St. Clair, before the abbey of St. Victor; and generally there used to be a fair before each church on the festival of its patron-saint.*

In England the history of fairs proves the practice to have been the same as in other countries. When the first mass was sung in Salisbury Cathedral after its erection on the new site, King Henry III. gave a charter to the church, granting among other privileges, the liberty of an annual fair of eight days, from the vigil to the octave of the Assumption inclusive, for the benefit of the church. The priory of St. Bartholomew in London had the privilege, from the kings of England, of holding an annual fair on its festival.

To mark how much interest might be attached to the history of these fairs, let us delay an instant and hear the account which is given of that of St. Denis, which was for the first time established near that abbey in the time of the pious King Dagobert. It began on the 9th of October, the festival of St. Denis, and lasted during a month, to allow time for merchants to come from Lombardy, Provence, and Spain. In the year 1472, it was finally abridged to eight days. The second fair of St. Denis began on the festival of St. Matthias, because that was the day of the dedication of the church, which had been finished under Charlemagne. Indulgences were published then for all who visited the church. The third fair of St. Denis was called the Landit, from the word "indicatus," or "campus indicatus," it being held in the fields between La Chapelle and St. Denis, where the Bishop of Paris used to assemble the devout multitude to show the holy relics of the cathedral, there being no church in Paris large enough for the purpose. The clergy went in procession, "usque ad indictum:" and this was the origin of the Landit. A poet of the year 1290, who had made a list of the streets of Paris in verse, gave a description of this fair as "la plus roial foire du monde."

"Premierement la procession
De Nostre Dame de Paris
Y vient, que Dieu gart de perir,
Tous les bons marcheurs qui y sont
Qui les grans richesses y ont,
Que Diex les puit tous avancier:
L'Evesque ou le Penancier,
Leur fait de Dieu beneison."

"There," he says, "are the sellers of beer and the barbers, the tavern-keepers and the sellers of tapestry, and the mercers,

"A la coste du grand chemin Est la foire du parchemin."

* De St. Victor, Tableau de Paris, Tom. IV. 351.

And after that are the tailors, the furriers, the linen-draper, the leather-sellers, the shoe-sellers, and cutlers, and rope-sellers, the corn-merchants, the jewellers, and silversmiths. These merchants come to the fair from Paris and Provins, Rouen, Ghent, Ypres, Douay, Bruxelles, Caen, Breteuil, Chartres, Beauvais, Evreux, Troyes, Sens, Auxmalle, Montereul sur la Mer, St. Quentin, St. Omer, Abbeville, Chalons, Louvain, Tournay, Corbie, Lille, Flui Arras. Merey !" cries the poet, oppressed with the numbers that occur to him,

"Je les mis tous en mon escrit."

"Nor must I forget," he continues, "the dealers in cattle, in sheep, and swine, and horses."

*"Rousins, palefrois et destrier,
Les meilleurs, que l'on puet trover,
Jumens, poulains et palefrois,
Tels comme por Contes et pour Roys."*

Upon the acquisition which the abbey of St. Denis made of this land in 1294, the Landit came more under its jurisdiction. When the day arrived of the Landit, the abbey sent its officers to receive the bishop and clergy of Paris with the relics. In the thirteenth century, the university of Paris being established in form, began to take part in the Landit, on account of the parchment sold there which was then a great article in all fairs. The rector went to choose the parchment for the university.

In 1291, all dealers in parchment were forbidden to procure it at the Landit, on the first day of the fair, before merchants of the king and of the bishop of Paris, and the masters and scholars of the university, had made their provisions. This going of the rector to the Landit was a joyful time for the scholars to whom it gave a vacation of some days ; for all must needs go with him, as if it were not enough that he should be attended by his officers. The journey was made with all the pomp and rejoicing of an ancient triumph. All the Regents and scholars mounted on horseback in the Place of St. Genèvieve, and from thence marched in order ; though circumstances sometimes occurred which, as Lebeuf says, gave infinite embarrassment to the masters. It was not enough to go to the Landit, the scholars must go as far as St. Denis. As the Landit was in a hot season of the year, numbers of scholars used to fall sick in consequence of the fatigue, especially the little ones. At length, in 1550, Jerome Garnier, the rector, procured an ordinance from the parliament, limiting the number that might accompany the rector, and only twelve of each nation were in future permitted to attend him ; but notwithstanding, there continued to be private bands of scholars, called Les petits Landits, who persisted in going. The year 1556 completed the calamity of the scholars, for the Landit was removed to the walls of St. Denis. However, the scholars wishing to preserve their old customs, resolved to continue their annual expeditions to the old spot in the plain, though there was to be no longer a fair there. At length, when the art of printing had superseded the use of parchment, the Landit became obsolete, with regard to the university, and nothing remained of it but the leave which used to be granted every year on the Monday after St. Barnabas, which continued to be called the congé du Landit.*

In Italy, on the feast of St. Mark, the indulgences granted by the holy see drawing vast multitudes to Venice, a fair was instituted in 1180 on the shores of the Adriatic, in which various spectacles used to be offered, and where it was the custom for artists to exhibit specimens of their work. It was at this fair that Canova first distinguished himself, and it was the applause there bestowed on his group of Dedalus and Icarus which is supposed to have encouraged him to persevere in that track of glory.†

The minstrels who used to sing the song of Roland at these fairs became so numerous, that in 1288 there were statutes published at Bologna against them.‡ These particulars respecting the fair of St. Mark and of St. Denis, will convey an idea of the features which, in some degree, belonged to all similar assemblies of merchants in the middle ages; for everywhere these annual fairs were invested with somewhat of a smiling, and even poetic character, being closely connected with a thousand innocent recollections of friendship with immemorial customs, which attached men to their domes and to their country, with associations of domestic interest, and with the encouragement of humble and popular artists, who were induced to employ their talents in a multitude of inventions, and to conduce to the recreation, and even to the religious instruction of youth. Tasso, in an unpublished letter, borrows a noble image of the accidents of human life from the confusion of a solemn and populous fair; and, in fact, philosophers as well as poets might have deigned to visit them. In cities on these occasions hermits were sometimes seen, who came either for the purpose of assisting at the festival which gave rise to the fair, or else of addressing some words of holy counsel to the people assembled. Thus the hermit, Nicolas von der Flue, who had his cell and little chapel in the forest near Sarnen, used never to be seen from home excepting once every year on the eve of the Assumption, when he used to be seen in the crowd at the solemn procession in Lucerne.§ It was on the Saturday after St. Thomas's Day, in the year 1481, that this holy man came barefoot from his cell in the forest, over the mountains, deep in snow, to Stanz, where he appeared in the assembly, and succeeded in reconciling differences, and prevailed upon his countrymen to admit Freyburg and Soleure into their confederacy. Before all the great festivals holy solitary men used to flock into cities, and were sure to appear as the great bells announced the first vespers of the feast. Monteil says, that Olier, the solitary religious man, generally known by the name of the hermit of the Aube, because he lived in a little hermitage near the source of that river, used always to come into Troyes on the eve of great festivals, to assist at the solemnities in the cathedral. On these occasions he used to take up his lodging at the top of one of the towers of the Hôtel de Ville ; he was neither priest nor deacon, nor subdeacon nor clerk, his cowl was nothing but what was worn by the peasants ; he had made no vows, like the hermit brothers, nor did he belong to any order, but was simply a lay hermit.* The appearance of such men was not an unimportant feature in the solemnities of towns. Those who have resided in Catholic cities may be often reminded of what F. Bouhours says of St. Francis Xavier, that when he used to leave his solitude, and come into the villages to instruct the poor, no one doubted, after seeing him, but that it was a saint came from the desert to teach men the way to heaven. St. Jerome used to say, " Let every one judge for themselves, but to me a town is a prison, and solitude a paradise."† This was said at a time before Christianity had imparted a new character to cities ; but yet even in those early ages, we find that holy anchorites in the desert still felt an interest in the cities of men ; for one of the three questions respecting the earth, which St. Paul the hermit addressed to St. Anthony was, do men raise new edifices in the ancient cities ?‡

* Lebeuf, Hist. du Diocese de Paris, Tom. III. p. 257.

† Paolo Morosini, Storia di Venezia, Marrin Storia del Commercio di Venezia.

‡ Ghirardacci Annali. § Leben und Geschichte des Nikol von Fluë, by Weissenbach, cap. 6.

We find that these holy lovers of solitude did not disdain sometimes to take up their residence in the neighborhood of cities. It is in a rocky ravine in the forest which comes near to the walls of Sarnen, that the little wooden hut and chapel may be seen where once lived that man of God whose prayers had cured the sick, stopped the flames, appeased feuds, and saved his country. Hermits were frequently to be found living close to the gates of populous towns ; and as when a wandering lad, who goes forth to swim on a summer's morning, discovers with joy the beauteous lily, or some wild fragrant blossom, which floats free and odoriferous upon the cool blue waves, though close to the walls of a parched and unwholesome city ; so was it sweet to find these men of pure and peaceful souls, devoted to holy contemplation, dwelling within a short distance of the towns which resounded day and night to the busy hum of the multitude, that followed the broad and unsequestered way.

In the third century St. Parre withdrew from the city of Troyes, and retired into a country place in the neighborhood, where he lived a most holy and austere life. This spot is pointed out by tradition in the field, which is not more than 300 paces from the city walls, where, till the revolution, stood the pious monastery of Foïci, the origin of which name is thus related : " While St. Parre lived here in holy retreat, St. Savinien, a Greek from Samos, who after becoming a Christian had passed into Gaul, arrived at Troyes, and coming to the banks of the Seine, where he found this holy man, was received by him into his hermitage, and per-

* Hist. des Français, Tom. IV. 317.

† Epist. XCV.

‡ Lives of the Fathers of the Desert, Tom. I. 10.

ceiving that St. Parre and his servants were assiduous in prayer, and that the Christian faith was in their souls, he returned thanks to God that faith was here, and hence the place ever afterwards bore the name of Foy-icy, fidiacum a fide.* Even within the very heart of towns hermits were found to dwell. Recluses had their cells either in grottoes under the streets, or in towers surrounded by palaces, where they were devoted to constant prayer and meditation. Such is the history belonging to the cave at Royston, and, if we credit some authors, to the tower of Rolland in Paris. On the hill of St. Geneviève at Paris, lived the holy solitary priest, Dulciolenus, the friend of St. Eloi, whom that saintly silversmith used to visit frequently. It appears from titles of the abbey of St. Geneviève, that in this neighborhood, in the thirteenth century, there was a street or road called from him, Vicus servi Dei.† In Florence, upon the bridge Allegrazie, lived certain holy women, recluses. At the present day, in each of the little lonely chapels or oratories in the neighborhood, or even in the sequestered parts of Rome, you find a hermit who takes care of the holy place. There is generally one residing among the ruined arches of the Colosseum. We find indications too in our old literature, of solitary wise and benevolent men living secluded in cities, who used to be sought out as private arbiters and advisers in all cases of difficulty, by the people.

Thus in the Fabliau, the young man who is falsely accused of having stolen oil from the barrels left in his cellar, goes for advice to “a famous philosopher in the town, a good man, who lived according to God, and who employed his talents in succoring the unhappy.” The annals of the city of Troyes make mention of a hermit, whose history is so wound up with its old towers, that it is impossible to disengage it from them. In the year 1419 died the good hermit, the blessed friar John of Gand, and was buried in the church of the Dominicans at Troyes, in a chest of wood, secured with bars of iron, in the south wall of the nave. His history was remarkable. During the calamities of France, consequent upon the wars with the English, and at the time when Charles VII. was struggling to defend his kingdom, a hermit of St. Claude was raised up to give warning to men. This brother John of Gand was so called either from a certain noble family, which bears the surname of Gand, and which is of the neighborhood of Troyes, which still boasts that this holy anchoret was of its blood, or else from the city of Ghent, in Flanders, of which he must have been a native. Be that as it may, he lived as a brother among the hermits on the mountain St. Claude, where many holy men led an angelic life: till moved by the calamities of France, he left his hermitage for a while, and travelled on till he arrived at the place where Charles VII. was to be seen, and entering his presence, he asked him saying, “Sire, do you desire to have peace? it comes from God.” And the king answering, “My good father, that is what I desire from my heart, if it please God to give it to me.” Then the good hermit said, “Sire, since you desire peace, you shall have it, and God will grant you victory." Having thus spoken to the king of France, he went to the king of England, and proposed the same question to him, "Sire, do you desire to have peace?" The king answered haughtily, "No, and that he was resolved to conquer all the kingdom, and that the king of Bourges (for so he called Charles VII.) had nothing to gain from him." Then the hermit replied, "Sire, men propose and God disposes, for he is the sovereign master. It will not be as you say; but you should think of your end, which will soon overtake you." The king, naturally passionate, would have given stripes to the hermit, without respecting his habit; however he refrained, and let him depart. Now it is well known that Henry died shortly after, in 1421.

* Hist. du Diocese de Troyes, 35.

—† Lebeuf, Hist. Tom. I. II. c. 1.

But to return to our hermit: he continued to lead an austere life, with fasts and vigils, and practising both external and internal mortifications, so that it was wonderful how he surmounted all passions, and became so humble and patient; for even on beholding his effigy in white stone, which is on the spot where his bones repose, it is easy to judge that he had sanctity in his soul, and great grace from God. People used to style him the holy hermit of St. Claude, for every thing that he did and said was holy. Whenever he came into the city of Troyes, he used to lodge in the hostel of the Moors; or rather the good woman that kept this house, knowing his holy life, respected him, and used to give him lodging for the love of God, giving him a little room in a retired part, that he might be without noise or any disturbance. From there he used to visit the convent of the Dominicans to hear mass, and because these friars were very holy men, and strict observers of their rules, he haunted them willingly, and wished to be buried with them, that he might not be separated in death from those whom he had loved when living. All this may be read in old Latin manuscripts in the treasury of these friars, though it is in a character very difficult to read from the continual abbreviations used. This holy man used thus to move about wherever the inspiration of God suggested an occasion of doing good to the souls of men. So on this occasion he was at Troyes, and in his usual lodging in the hostel of the Moors, and here he fell sick, and he knew immediately that God was about to draw him from this world to the other; he took no thought about what he should eat or drink, or about a physician or medicine, for he was a holy man, whose constant practice was to eat and drink but sparingly, speak but little, be always internally collected, and aspiring to God; so that now he only thought of God more ardently than ever, and expressed his wish to confess, and to receive the blessed sacrament for his viaticum. Now it happened at this time that there was in the same hostel a good old man, a venerable priest, named Messier Gautier Garnot, curate of Torvilliers, a village in the suburbs of Troyes, who on account of the wars, and the danger from insolent soldiers, had been obliged in his old age to take refuge within the walls of Troyes, whence he used to visit his flock as often as he could, and his retreat in the city was in this same hostel of the Moors, where he had his little room, for the woman that kept the house was his cousin-german. Thus his good hostess gave lodging to one for the love of God, because he was a holy man, and to another for the sake of humanity, because he was old and her relation. The priest then, hearing that brother John of Gand was lodged in the same hostel visited him, and they two used to speak together about holy things, and to encourage each other to serve God. When the hermit fell sick, he told him that he wished to confess for the last time, and to receive the precious body of his Saviour. This venerable priest, Garnot, went to find the curate of St. John, to whom he related the wish of the blessed hermit, who gave him power forthwith to assist him to his end ; for Garnot did not like to fail, on this last occasion, brother John of Gand, whom he so loved and respected ; so he heard his confession, and administered to him the sacred body of our Lord Jesus Christ, and also extreme unction, and served him in all that he could ; but Garnot was more consoled by the blessed brother John than he consoled him. So there, in that poor little room, after begging of Garnot that he might be buried with the friars and preachers, this good man rendered up his soul to God, in evangelical poverty, great patience, human misery, sweet silence, and elevation of mind to God, as a poor stranger, who perchance was only stretched upon some straw in that little chamber. Thus he died on the 29th of September ; but it was said, that immediately after his death, a supernatural light gleamed over that hostel, to show to all the world that the death of the saints is precious before God.*

This connection between hermits and the appearance of Christian cities, might naturally lead us to take notice of the scenery which generally surrounded them, for this was not without its characteristic features; and in the middle ages, when moral authority superseded, in a great measure, the necessity of the civil, no stranger was subject to be arrested and led away a prisoner if he attempted to walk beyond the gates of cities, without being able to produce a written pass; but every one was at liberty to enter and depart without molestation. "I am a lover of learning," said Socrates to one who proposed a philosophic dialogue in the fields, "trees and the country teach me nothing; but I look to men who live in the city. You then have discovered the secret to draw me out of the walls by offering to read to me, and presenting me with that written speech which I will follow wherever you go, like one of the cattle to whom you would offer provender, though you should lead me the circuit of Attica, or wherever else you wish."†

Now, although Christians were, as we have already seen, naturally led to congregate in cities, in order to enjoy the resources of piety, and to exercise the duties of public adoration, which furnished far higher inducements for loving them than Socrates possessed, yet the Church, with her ingenious and creative discipline, discovered a way as it were to lead devout and affectionate disciples without the walls, as Phædrus prevailed on the Athenian sage, by presenting them with some new sustenance to strengthen a meditative and revering spirit, to follow which they would accompany her along the embowered bank of rivers, and to the summit of overhanging cliffs, which afforded delicious views of lakes and groves and undulating lawns, where she used to erect her oratories and crosses, and make her enclosures for holy retirement and prayer. Thus at Soleure, on the evening of Maunday Thursday, the inhabitants go out to the little hermitage of St. Verone, which stands in a delightful wood within a deep chasm of lofty mountains; it was made by an Egyptian in the seventeenth century. In the rock there is a sepulchre, and lamps are then lighted round it. Certainly no spot can be conceived more sad and fair. I remember to what a golden world of bright and peaceful images I used to be transported, when straying of a summer's morning without the walls of Soleure, immediately after the first mass in the churches of the town. There one might walk through delightful meadows interspersed with groves like a continued garden, watered with a number of clear rivulets, sparkling amidst violet beds, studded with beautiful convents, chapels, and crosses, with villas and pavilions adjoining. There one heard ascend through the clear air the sweet liquid symphony of the bells of the different monasteries, which are tolled at every elevation of the sacred mysteries, and these too seem to answer one another from hill to hill. There one saw the happy and courteous groups that passed along; the children, angel mild, intent upon some office of domestic duty, the cheerful scholar, so anxious to salute the stranger, and the venerable old men, whose smile is like a benediction; and if one entered to say a short prayer in the church of the convent, there would be seen at his devotions some noble proprietor of an adjacent castle, who always desired to be at the mass of that community. The humble little cloister too is open. See the poor devout prints which cover the walls, and the sweet flowers which grow within the little court; and through one of the small windows above you catch a glimpse of some holy friar, who is meditating in his cell. What a peaceful and holy calm reigns all around! the groves and meadows, the gardens and the surrounding hills, seem to have imbibed the celestial tranquillity of the blessed enclosure.

* Desguerrois, Hist. du Diocese de Troyes, 387.

† Plato, Phædrus

Even the walks around Florence are a delightful recollection; though along narrow roads, confined within scorching walls, which you excuse from the memory of that deed of grace rising out of them, which gave origin to Vallombrosa, for as I walked an evening among the hills which encompass it, near the delicious villa of Careggi, where Lorenzo de Medicis held the Platonic academy, I used to hear at the cottage doors the Kyrie eleison from the tongue of children. But since we are already without the walls, let us pass on and depart, though it must be with painful impressions. Heresy, and the influence of its moral and philosophical doctrines, rather than wars and time, have nearly effaced the vestiges of early Christian history which existed in the cities of Europe. In England it has rendered our cities as bare of ancient memorials as our churches; and in France, what was preserved in Lyons, Troyes, Tours, and in other places from the rage of the Calvinists in former times, has been swept away in these latter days during the great revolution, when men were inspired with deadly hatred against even the inanimate monuments which recalled the events and personages of their former history. In the sacking of Rome, where so much still remains, the atrocities committed by the Lutheran soldiers of Charles V. surpassed all that had been committed by the Goths and barbarians, or by the Turks in other places. The venerable cities of Lombardy have remained nearly in the condition to which they were reduced by the philosophy of the unhappy Joseph, and the brutality of the Gallic invaders, who completed what he had begun. The tombs of the eastern scholars who promoted the study of Greek learning in the West, are covered over with military stores in the desecrated cloisters at Milan; and the tumults of barbarous legions seem to leave no other interest to Mantua but its imperishable name.

The celebrated apartment of Troy, covered with the paintings of Mantegna and Julio Romano, representing scenes from the Iliad, is now a granary. The Mantua of the middle ages could boast of her Julio Romano and of those illustrious Gonzagues, who declared that it was the painter who was her sovereign; now her cloisters are converted into barracks, and her sole ornament is a military parade. The Luitprands and Othos of the middle ages had erected at Pavia and aggrandized the mausoleum of Boecius, in the church of St. Augustin, for which Gerbert had composed the inscription; but the sophists of the last century suppressed the church, which is now filled with military provisions; and when I desired to be shown his sepulchre, I could only have the consolation of learning at which side of the nave it stood, for it was buried deep under an impervious store of hay. The refectory of the Dominicans, in which is the divinest painting of Leonardo, the convent which possessed one of the oldest churches of Milan, St. Eustorgius, which contains the tomb of Emanuel Chrysolorus, and the shrine of St. Peter Martyr, are abandoned to the service of a barrack. In one church there is the office of the Lottery, in another a theatre, in another a custom-house. So lost are men at present to those feelings and sentiments of nature recognized by Seneca, when he says, that one has regard for demolished temples, of which persons of religion adore and venerate even the ruins.

Without referring to those shattered fallen cities on which the hand of time seems the heaviest laid, such as Ravenna, with its towers, round, square, leaning, broader at summit than at base, with its palaces of races that are extinct, and its monuments of an empire that has long perished, there are few at least in the northern countries, which do not impress irresistibly every beholder with the idea that they are the cities of other days and of another race of men, and which do not remind him of the poet's sentence "Debemur morti nos nostraque." Even where the ancient spirit continues to animate the people, the intellectual glories of the ages of faith are found to be too mighty not to obscure all claims to present greatness. To one conversant with history, even the gay and brilliant and devout Florence seems but like a sepulchre and city of the dead; for on what can the stranger's thoughts remain fixed, excepting on the city of the Medicis? There he sees their wondrous gallery of incalculable treasures, the accumulation of years, and wealth, and pains unceasing; there he finds their rich stores of collected learning, their libraries and their cabinets. There he visits their once gay and palmy villas on Careggi's height, whose walls heard the Platonic mixed with Christian lore, and it was there Lorenzo died; there he may descend into the vaults of that gorgeous chapel, where every vein of marble which the earth produces pays a tribute; and there lie the bodies of that great majestic line whose memory makes Florence a city of the muses. There, too, is the house of Michael Angelo, in which every thing remains as if he had walked out but yesterday; and there you may gaze upon the seat of the awful Dante hard by the dome which he so dearly loved; but lo! in that cloister of the Holy Cross you see the tombs of all these wondrous men whose works surround you or the trophy that tells you they are dead. Pisa, too, with its vast deserted streets, speaks to you only of other days, when the Campo Santo was not a museum for the connoisseur, or a royal and exclusive cemetery, but a holy field for the faithful dead, and when men went not to criticise, or to admire, but to tremble and to pray. Bologna and Padua only remind you of the genius and the learning of ancient days. Ferrara, with her majestic castle, noble palaces, and solemn cloisters recalls the image of her princes and of the poets who gave them renown. Genoa of its Dorias. Urbino of its incomparable court, described by Castiglione. Rome alone seems invested with an interest which is present and eternal; and yet, amidst the astonishing concentration of present intellectual greatness there, who, standing upon that awful ground, can avoid thinking of the past, and yielding to its immortal recollections? The approach to Rome is precisely what it ought to be. Nothing can be imagined more sublime, more proper to inspire meditation, and to fill the soul with the profoundest emotions of wonder for the past and of pious astonishment and reverence for the everlasting Ruler, than a view of the vast and solemn plains of the Campagna, in which the history of the world seems written in ruins, where no object appears but here and there some isolated fragment of an arched aqueduct or of a sepulchre, some aged cork tree or some spreading pine, near which shepherds are seen sitting together round a fire by night, keeping watch over their flocks.

The thronged and noisy suburbs of a modern capital would belong to an order of ideas to which you would there deny admittance, for they would indicate too much of worldly solicitude to be in accordance with what naturally fills the breast of the Christian pilgrim as he approaches Rome. It is as much as he can sustain to look upon the delicious retreats of Albano, when he remembers that it was through that villa of pleasure that the chosen vessel was led bound to Rome. Whether it was the result of care, exclusively employed on the adornment of cities, within which every interest induced men to dwell, or from motives of convenience and of security, which prompted the inhabitants to desire the immediate neighborhood of forests and deserts, it is certain that the scenery which surrounded many cities of the middle ages, corresponded with the wildest and the highest tone. How solemn is that approach to Pisa, over the ground which was the scene of Ariosto's ghastly chase! where following a lonely track through a vast sandy plain, on which rise a few tall pines, you find them growing in a closer contact, till at length you are within an immense forest, through which you see at intervals wild cattle and buffaloes grazing over vast desert tracts which extend to the Mediterranean; and then on proceeding you behold rising over the forest the vast domes of the cathedral and baptistry, with the mysterious tower, which stands as others fall. Who has not heard of that sombre forest of pines which conceals Ravenna from the sea, like a funeral veil thrown by nature over the ruins of the fallen city; a forest celebrated in the annals of history; wonderful among the scenes of nature; dear to poets, since it was sung by Dante, and by Dryden! I first beheld it on a summer's evening, when I walked out by the Porta Nuova, and had reached the bridge about half a mile from the city, over the united streams of the Ronco and Montone, on whose banks fell the slaughtered French, when, under Gaston de Foix, they encountered the lance of Spain. The road being raised very high, commands an extensive view of the plain, the vast solitary Basilica of St. Apollinare in Classe, the sole vestige of a Roman city, which was destroyed by Luitprand the Lombard king in the eighth century, forming the only object till the eye reaches the distant forest. I shall never forget the feeling with which I beheld it, and gazed upon its vast and solemn line, which was only broken at intervals by the broad top of some more elevated stem, which rose above the horizon. A pale moon had just risen over it in a blue heaven, but towards the west a deep range of clouds gave index of a storm. At the same moment a vast flight of cranes traversed the sky, coming from the Adriatic, and reminded me of a sublime passage, in which Dante describes their clamorous course which I repeated with an additional degree of interest, as I returned to the ancient city.

In England, too, we have cities, the approach to which is in the highest degree calculated to inspire meditation, such as Ely and Lincoln, rising majestic over the watery wastes which surrounded them, and Salisbury, encompassed with that vast plain, to which Stonehenge gives so mysterious an interest. But having now taken a general view of the Christian cities, it will be necessary to go into more detail, and to examine the particular history of the most remarkable edifices with which faith adorned them; and the construction of churches will furnish abundant matter for our next inquiries, relative to the evidence of the fulfilment of that divine sentence, which affirmed that the meek will possess the earth.

CHAPTER II.

THE number of beautiful monuments, with which faith covered the soil of Europe, has been the delight and astonishment of men of genius in the latter ages, when the probability or consequence of their overthrow was contemplated. How richly adorned England was in this respect, is recorded by Strype, Leland, Dugdale, Tanner, and other historians, who speak of the destruction which attended the first establishment of heresy. In Ireland it has only left ruins, which appear thickly scattered over the country, so as to make it resemble the Campagna of Rome. In Spain there are more than seventy thousand great churches; there were no less than a thousand raised in the reign of King Don Jaïme I. of Arragon alone. A late French writer makes some interesting remarks, to show how France was formerly covered with beautiful monuments of an architecture which showed a free and boundless imagination. It is calculated that there were thirty thousand churches, fifteen hundred abbeys, eighteen thousand five hundred chapels, two thousand eight hundred priories, one million seven hundred thousand steeples, and as to every twelve steeples may be supposed one castle, there would be seven thousand fortified towns, giving a total of one million eight hundred and seventy-two thousand nine hundred and twenty-six monuments, without reckoning the basilicas, monasteries, royal and episcopal palaces, and town halls, contained within cities. Certainly, adds Chateaubriand, this was a soil very differently ornamented from what it is at present. Remark, too, that the religious, civil and military architecture of these ages, rose aloft and struck the eyes, unlike the modern, which is flat and levelled, like the ranks of our social state. Will our ages, he asks, leave such a testimony of its passage? We have no longer the faith which moved so many stones. We raise exchanges, bazaars, coffee-houses, club-houses. How will philosophy be able to compare accounts with religion? The moderns, who look to practical advantages, cannot conceive on what ground the multiplication of churches and chapels could have been required. Stamford and Gloucester, and the ancient city of London, are instances which seem perfectly inexplicable to them; but the reason is obvious to all who have knowledge of the ancient religion; for within cities there was a necessity arising out of its very principles for erecting churches at short distances from each other, in which the divine mysteries might be celebrated in order that the merchant, the tradesman, the laborer, and the servant, might be able to assist at them every morning without loss of time or interruption to their other duties; and also to give the same facility to infirm persons who could not have gone far from their houses : and it required that these monuments should be multiplied in the country to afford a similar assistance to persons engaged in agriculture, whose interests were not forgotten in the original laying out of the ecclesiastical divisions, as appears from consulting those of the dioceses of France, which had remained the same from the reigns of Honorius and Clovis till the revolution.

The attention of religious men to the spiritual interests of poor shepherds, gave rise to chapels and oratories in the wildest and most romantic spots of uncultivated nature. On the high Alp of the Surinam Pass, I found a little chapel with a bell in which mass is occasionally said for the poor herdsmen who resort to those high regions in the summer months. In the ninth century, we read of oratories being constructed on the mountains for the monks of St. Benedict, who used to depute a certain number of their society to watch the flocks on the high pastures during the fine season ;* and, in the most retired valleys of Savoy, under impending glaciers, you find some humble sanctuary, which like that at Argentiére, proclaims its object, by an inscription, to be the safety of the poor. But there was still another reason why the Church loved to multiply her chapels, oratories, crosses, and places of pilgrimage, and place them amidst the woods and mountains. It was to make men love the Author, while they admired the works of nature. She knew too well the propensity of wretched mortals to be occupied incessantly with creatures, and to depart from him who made them, and she sought by the erection of material monuments, symbols and memorials of religious truth, to make the whole life of man a continued hymn or act of praise to God. The recollections of every traveller who has visited a Catholic country will bear testimony to the wisdom of this discipline, and even history itself has been obliged in many instances to record its effects. During the dreadful storm which so dismayed the English army under King Edward, after leaving Rheims, it is said, that the troops and the King himself looked upon it as a mark of God's wrath, and that at the same moment the king, turning towards the church of Chartres, whose lofty tower rose in the distance, made a vow to consent to peace.

The Archduke Leopold of Austria, on his journeys, used always to salute the patrons of the different churches that he passed, and in this manner the whole face of a country was like a book which recalled a thousand holy images to inspire devout meditation, and to confirm salutary thoughts. St. Gregory of Tours says, that on the banks of the river Garonne, and contiguous to the castle Blaviensis, there is the tomb of a holy Roman priest, and it is said, that when the sailors have been in danger of perishing, they have been saved by imploring his prayers, and they think no one can perish who contemplates his church from the midst of the waters. On one occasion, he adds, during our passage across, we believe that we experienced the benefit of his suffrage.† With respect to the origin of these edifices, it is certain that the first Christians had their churches, for the Apostle St. Paul distinguishes them from other houses ; and St. Ignatius the martyr in the first century exhorts the Magnesians to assemble in a place which is named "the temple of God," and in his Epistle to the Philadelphians he says, "There is one flesh of our Lord Jesus Christ, and one cup in union of his blood, one altar, and one bishop, with the priest, and deacons, my fellow-servants," and Tertullian at the end of the second century, speaks of the Church to which Christians resort, and the house of God.* Peter the venerable abbot of Cluni, says, that when he was at Rome he saw in the ancient crypts, the oratories and altars which had been raised by the Christians in the time of the Apostles.† At the present day, these are the places visited with most awe and astonishment by the devout strangers. In the catacombs, we behold the first churches of the eternal city. In the year 1812, a chapel of the primitive Christians was discovered in the palace of Nero, when excavations were made among the ruins of the baths of Titus. The persecution of Diocletian commenced with the demolition of the churches which the Christians had erected for the first time in public places under the Emperors Alexander and Gordien ; and the final triumph of the cross when the empire became Christian under Constantine, was marked by the restoration and erection of churches.

* Mabillon, Acta S. Ordinis Benedict. Sæc. IV. Pars I. Vita S. Bened.

† De Gloria Confessorum, cap. 46.

In that of the Lateran Palace, which had been an imperial residence, Rome for the first time beheld the image of the Saviour. The lowest of the two churches, at present subterraneous under the church of St. Martin, was built by Pope St. Sylvester, in the time of Constantine. It is supported by vast square columns of brick, and it resembles exactly the Roman work in the Basilica of Constantine in the forum. The image of our Lady is represented in mosaïque, without that of the Divine Infant, and the Pope is on his knees in the act of imploring her intercession. Chateaubriand made the remark at Rome, Constantinople, and Jerusalem, where are seen churches of the age of Constantine, that these ancient churches had a character of gravity and grandeur which the pagan monuments of the same age did not possess.‡ In that age the Christians erected magnificent temples in their cities and in Nicomedia, but others had been preserved from earlier times. In Spain, the Church of our Lady, at Zaragosa, is said to have been erected in her life-time. The holy bishops delighted in consecrating to God that beauty and splendor which had been so long devoted to the service of demons. St. Gregory Nyssen is astonished at the superb temple of the martyr Theodore, which with golden arches and cerulean tablets impels the mind to the contemplation of eternal beauty.§ St. Cyril praises the splendor of the temple which the emperors had built at Jerusalem ; nor does St. Chrysostom overlook the arched temple of prodigious height, incrustated with marble, in which they used to assemble.|| At the close of the third century, the blessed Patiens, Bishop of Lyons, built in that city

* Benedict. XIV. de Sacrificio Missæ, sect. 1. 6. † Contra Petrobrusianos Hæret. Epist.

‡ Les Martyrs, Liv. V. § Op. Tom. III. p. 578 ; Tom. II. p. 41. || Tom. V. Serm. 16.

a most splendid church of marble and gold, which Sodonius Apollinaris commends in verse to all posterity : there were precious stones and variegated marbles to adorn it.* In the third and fourth centuries, the splendor of the Spanish churches was very considerable. It appears that the church of St. Eulalia, at Merida, was ornamented with magnificent columns, beautiful marbles, and lofty towers. The irruption, however, of the barbarians destroyed entirely that splendor. They inundated Spain in 409 ; but in other countries many churches survived their fury. After the overthrow of the empire, and the conversion of the barbarians, it was not at first possible to erect churches of similar magnificence. In the tenth century, the architects were unable to rebuild the church of the Theban legion which had been destroyed by fire, so as to equal its former beauty.† The church of St. Stephen the greater at Milan, having been burnt in the eleventh century and rebuilt, an inscription was placed on it which began by extolling the superior grandeur of the former church, and then proceeded,—

———*Collapsum surgit ab imo
Sed primi cultum nequit æquiparare secundum:
Plebs spectando time: peccatum causa ruinæ,
Te prius ædifices, tunc materiale reformes,
Sit templum Domini, placet illi fabrica templi.*

The church of St. Martin at Tours, before the tenth century, was incrustated with red, green, and white marbles, and even the exterior was adorned with gold and beautiful stones. Old men in the time of St. Odo, who had seen it before its destruction by fire, used to say, that when the building was seen against the sun it resembled a mountain of gold.‡ The first churches erected by the barbarian invaders were greatly inferior to those of the ancient empire. Among a rude people it would be in vain to expect beauty of architecture. It was related of St. Patrick, that he built a church of clay alone in a plain in Connactia, which resisted all inclemency of wind, and snow, and rain. It is an error, however, to suppose, that the Anglo-Saxons had only churches of wood. In the year 626, King Edwin had ordered a church to be built of timber, which was hallowed in the name of St. Peter, but “there he afterwards ordered a larger church to be built of stone.”§ In the year 1020, King Knute ordered to be built at Assingdon, a minster of stone and lime, and the church of Peterborough was built of stone in 656. In the year 710, Naiton, King of the Picts, sent ambassadors to Ceolfrid, Abbot of Jarrow monastery, requesting him to send architects into Scotland to build a church of stone there, after the manner of the Romans, which he wished to dedicate to the prince of the Apostles. Ceolfrid sent him in return a long letter of advice, and also architects for the above purpose, and a quantity of glass to glaze the windows ; for his predecessor holy Benedict had established glass works on the Tyne which continue to the present day. But the Christian Church could not long ex-

* Sidon. Apol. Leg. II. Epist. 10.

† Id. 146.

‡ De Combust. Basil. Bibliothec. Cluniacensis, 158.

§ The Saxon Chronicle by Ingram, p. 33.

ert her influence without producing that civilization which developed itself in the arts as well as in learning and manners ; and accordingly the rise of a new and most beautiful architecture followed soon after the re-establishment of society under the northern tribes. Even in Italy, in the eleventh century, the small but beautiful church of the holy Apostles at Florence, which was the model followed by Brunelleschi in raising the churches of St. Laurence, and of the Holy Ghost, proves that the good rules of architecture were not unknown in Tuscany in the tenth century. St. Bernard relates that when St. Malachy began to rebuild the abbey of Bangor, in Ireland, "he was of opinion that such a stone oratory ought to be built there, as he had seen in other countries ; and when he began to work, the natives admiring it, because such structures had not till then been seen in that country, said, O good man, why have you thought fit to bring this new fashion into our country. We are Scots not Frenchmen. What lightness is this? What need is there of such superfluous work and so magnificent? How will your poverty afford the expense of finishing, and who will live to see it finished?" The choir built was so beautiful, that the abbey was called in consequence Banchor, or the beautiful choir, for before it had been called the Vale of Angels. Among the most remarkable Gothic churches built between the tenth and the sixteenth centuries, which remain, for many of the abbey churches destroyed both in England and France, were equal, if not superior, to our present cathedrals,* are the cathedrals of Winchester, Canterbury, and York, the churches of Westminster and Bristol, in England ; that of Sante Croix, at Orleans ; the cathedrals of Chartres, Paris, Rheims, and Amiens, in France ; in Germany the church of Halberstadt, the Elisabethskirche at Marburg, the church of Ulm, and the cathedrals of Vienna and Cologne ; and in Italy, the cathedrals of Pisa, Sienna, Milan, the Carthusian church at Pavia, and the church of St. Petronia at Bologna.

When, in the prophetic language of the sacred scripture, God threatens to punish a people, he declares that he will take away those that are wise in building and the prudent in mystic sentences.† This judgment had not overtaken the nations in the middle ages, when these stupendous and mystic piles were erected to the glory of the eternal God, of which almost every stone is a symbol full of saintly wisdom. What acute and skilful men were those who raised at Paris the church of St. Paul ; at Arras, the church of St. Wast ; at Albi, the cathedral of St. Cecilia ; at Rouen, the church of St. Ouen and the palace of Justice ; at Rheims the church of the abbey of St. Nicaise, which was so celebrated for its trembling pillar, which used visibly to oscillate whenever a bell in that tower was tolled ;‡ at Milan, that cathedral ; at Amboise, that castle of Charles VIII. with its vast round towers, containing staircases by which men on horseback could mount and descend ; at Westminster, that hall of state whose roof is still the astonishment of mechani-

* Tanner, Notitia Monastica (Preface.)

† Isai. cap. iii.

‡ Anquetil, Hist. de Rheims, Liv. III. 67.

cians! what boldness, and imagination, and skill, were here testified. Assuredly there was enough to fire with emulation Ictinus himself; and with justice was Ferracino the Venetian compared to Archimedes in the inscription on his tomb at Solagna. The history of their scaffolding attests an astonishing perfection of mechanical science. At the building of the cathedral of Pisa, by means of the machines invented by Buschetto, weights which a thousand oxen could hardly have moved, were raised by ten young maidens, as a tablet in the church still testifies. Could these be ages of intellectual stagnation and ignorance as they are styled by those moderns who are themselves proficient only in the architecture of fortune? The works themselves would prove a prodigious advance in science, and indicate a most delicate sense of the beautiful and sublime. But even the writings of these ages explain with what profound and accurate views they were constructed. Thus Vincent of Beauvais, who clearly had a knowledge of perspective, and of its application in the representation of objects,* coming to treat upon the parts of architecture, shows what attention is due to symmetry, and proportion, and harmony of members, to disposition, and to collocation, and elegance of composition, to invention, and tempering of parts with regard to the effect of the whole, that the edifice may have solidity, usefulness, and beauty, and he says that to an architect both nature, and learning, and practice, are essential.† In fact, when men ask for evidence of the intellectual cultivation of the middle ages, though one might refer to the imperishable writings of their true philosophers, yet it is sufficient to bid them look upon the monuments of their architecture.

Behold the tranquil grandeur of a Gothic cathedral, a vast symphony as it were of stone, to use the language of Victor Hugo, colossal work of a man, and of a people, one and yet complex like the Iliads of which it is the sister, a kind of human creation, powerful and fruitful, seemed to have attained the double character of divine creation, variety and eternity. Behold within it those myriads of statues which peopled all the inter-columnization of the nave and choir images on their knees, on foot, on horse-back, men, women, children, bishops, kings, warriors, in stone, in marble, in gold, in silver, in brass, even in wax, now in France and England, brutally swept away by men of a false taste. Behold, how these walls harmonize with that Gothic altar, splendidly loaded with reliquaries and shrines, for which a cold simplicity or an unmeaning parade of allegory has been substituted. Gothic architecture has suffered three kinds of degradation; first, that caused by time; then that caused by political or religious revolutions, during which men have fallen on its different parts with savage fury; and lastly, that arising from modern taste, which has caused more ruin than even revolutions, cutting up and disorganizing the edifice, and killing it in form as in symbol, in its logic as in its beauty, and then restoring it with those contemptible and stupid decorations which are supposed to indicate a simple and pure taste." That the erection of these magnificent churches cannot be ascribed to any ordinary cause or mere natural principle will appear most evident on a reference to the history of their construction. How, it is usual to ask, were these prodigious edifices raised? It would defy the known resources of any nation at the present day, that has felt the influence of the modern philosophy, to erect one of them. Indeed, so sensible are their sophists of this fact, that they convert it into an argument which they suppose will prove the intellectual superiority of their own times; for they ridicule the desire which they ascribe to our ancestors of giving form and substance to the objects of thought, as being a sentiment belonging to dark ages, and a half cultivated people, grossly ignorant of the pure and primitive loveliness of truth. Such is the inference that one Scottish writer draws from the erection of so many monasteries and magnificent churches in the middle ages.

* Speculum Doctrinale, Liv. XVIII. c. 43.

† Id. Lib. X. c. 14, 15.

The history of their construction exposes three sources which supplied the means required—consisting in the devotion of the multitude, in the munificence of kings and religious orders and particular families, and in the substitution of such works instead of the ancient canonical penance. All these, it is obvious, must be referred to the faith of the people; and they will be found fully adequate to explain the phenomenon, without calling into our assistance the motive of heathen or modern times, which might lead men to build like the Syracusans, in order, as Thucydides says, ὑπὸ τε τῶν ἄλλων ἀνθρώπων καὶ ὑπὸ τῶν ἐπειτα κολῶν θανμασθήσεσθαι;* though, as has been acknowledged, it will still remain a matter of wonder to know the economy with which churchmen divided these revenues, taking into consideration the prodigious expenses required for the support of such a multitude of churches, hermitages, seminaries, colleges, hospitals and monasteries, besides what was expended in the maintenance of the clergy and a great number of laymen, and what was required by the state. To witness the first cause in operation we need only open the first ecclesiastical chronicle which presents itself; and the passage I have selected is remarkable as showing that the building of churches was then begun with the same reliance upon Providence which has inspired so many venerable priests in these Islands, of late years, to commence the erection of chapels. Fulcuin, in his History of the Abbots of Lobes, relates "that there was a great assembly of people on the spot where their new church was to be built; and such was their devotion, that no one can describe it. With the money then offered by the people, the church," he says, "is marked out and begun: quando vel à quo erit perficienda, in Dei est providentia."† To account for the sufficiency of these oblations of the people, which were either diurnal or hebdomadal, it should be remembered that the laborious and simple tenor of their lives enabled them to have always some supply beyond what was required by their domestic wants. When the church of St. Jacques-du-haut-Pas, at Paris, was to be built, it was the piety of high and low which accomplished the undertaking. The duchesse of Longueville gave money; the owners of the quarries supplied, free of expense, all the stone, and the workmen employed in building gave each one day every week.* To effect the incrustation of marble in the church of Loretto, which alone cost about 300,000 crowns, the carvers gave their work gratis. The chapter-house and the sacristy of the convent of the Carthusians at Paris, had been built at the expense of Pierre Loisel, a shoemaker in the fourteenth century, whose device, representing a boot, was carved there.† When Suger rebuilt the abbey of St. Denis, he assembled the most skillful workmen and artists from all parts of the kingdom. In procuring marble from Pontoise, the zeal of the people left him nothing to expend. Every one thought to receive a blessing from Heaven if he had part in the holy work. Suger was the chief architect. When the most intelligent persons had declared their opinions that there was no timber fit for the work within sixty leagues of St. Denis, the abbot went himself into the forest of Chevreuse, and sought so well that he found a sufficient quantity, which he had cut in his presence. He discovered a method to enable them to work at it through the winter, so that the building was finished in three or four years. The King and all his court, with a number of bishops, had assisted at laying the first stone, and blessing the place. Each had laid a stone, while the monks chanted the 86th psalm, "Fundamenta ejus in montibus sanctis:" and when the choir came to the usual words of the ceremony, "Lapides pretiosi omnes muri tui," the king took a ring of great value from his finger, and threw it upon the foundations, and all the nobles did the same; so that a magnificent church might have been built with the price of the jewels cast into the trenches.‡ In the year 1099, when the Ginsonense church in the bishopric of Urgel was consecrated, most of her parishioners offered voluntarily to pay the tenth of their fruits.

* Lib. VII. 56.

† Fulcuinus de Gestis Abbatum Lobensium apud Dacher. Spicileg. Tom. VI. 579.

In the year 1210, when the cathedral of Rheims was destroyed by fire, owing to the negligence of some plumbers, the canons had recourse to the usual method of gaining a supply. Certain of their number, bearing the relics of the church and apostolic bulls, set out, accompanied by all the clergy, who conducted them as far as the gates of the city, chanting the psalms. The people continued to follow them as far as the nearest town, where, in the first place, they deposited the sacred relics in the church, and then, from a tribune erected on the outside over the door, they harangued the assembled multitude, who came forward to relieve their necessities. Then they visited other places with the same form; and the collection was so considerable, that, in the year after the fire, the chapter of Rheims was able to undertake the rebuilding of the church on a more extensive scale than before. Robert de Conci of Rheims was the architect. It was finished after thirty years. The canons first sung the office in the year 1241.*

* St. Victor, Tableau de Paris. Tom. III. 435.

† Id. Tom. IV. 336.

‡ Hist. de Suger, Lib. VI.

The Pisans erected their cathedral with the spoils which they had won from the Saracens. Men conceived that by these works they testified faith and piety to God. Hence, some are owing to sudden dangers, in which persons pledged themselves to come forward, with pious liberality, to found or restore churches; for in these ages many men deserved the character which is ascribed to Anspert, the illustrious archbishop of Milan, in the ninth century, on whose tomb we read—

Effector voti, propositique tenax.

Thus, in the eleventh century, when the little fleet of Norman knights was passing the dangerous gulf of Messina, in order to regain the coast of Calabria, a violent tempest came on. The church of St. Anthony at Reggio, had been lately overthrown by an earthquake. Roger and his soldiers promised to devote to its reconstruction all the booty which they were carrying, that had been won from the Saracens. On their arrival in that city, they faithfully discharged their vow. The foundation of the illustrious Basilica of St. John the Evangelist, at Ravenna, is due to a vow made by Galla Placidia, in the year 424, during a tempest, as she was returning from Constantinople with her two sons, Valentinian and Honorius; and this event is there represented in mosaïque.

As you leave Ravenna by the Roman gate, the lofty tower of a solitary church rises above the barren plain, far in the distance towards the sea. You approach and find the interior walls painted by Giotto. This is St. Maria in Porto, built by Peter,—surnamed, through his humility, the Sinner,—of the noble family of the Onesti, in pursuance of a vow during a storm at sea, in the year 1096. The body of the founder lies there.

Many votive chapels on our own wild shores might be mentioned, which have no other origin than a similar engagement. Others have an heroic as well as a pious origin. In the year 1142, the troops commanded by the brave Galician, Don Munio Alfonso, made a vow to give to the church of St. Mary of Toledo, the tenth of the spoils which they should take from the combined armies of Cordova and Seville: this they did after gaining the battle.

There are in Spain some churches, which by reason of some especial vow, received taxes from certain towns, whose inhabitants, grateful for the benefit received from God through the intercession of some saints, made themselves tributary, in order to perpetuate the remembrance of their gratitude. The two most famous offerings are those of the vows of St. Billan and St. James. When Don Bamiro I. obtained that glorious victory at Clavijo which was to free his vassals from the infamous tribute of the one hundred maids, he made himself tributary to the church of St. James, through whose intercession he ascribed it, the army having begun the battle with the cry of St James. And in the year 938, the king of Leon having conquered, in a famous battle, the great Abderamen, king of Cordova, with the Mahometan princes of Africa and an army of 200,000 men, and Count Fernan Gonzalez having completed their overthrow, the count and his people bound themselves by solemn vows to pay a tribute to the church of St. Billan.

* Anquetil, Hist. de Rheims, Liv. II. 351.

The magnificent baptistery at Pisa, built in the twelfth century, was raised by the voluntary contributions of one florin from every family in Pisa. Parma heard of this, and her baptistery arose—a monument of that good contention of which the oldest Greek poet speaks in his works and days. When the cathedral of Como was building, besides the abundant alms of the people, all who belonged to certain fraternities of trades, and desired the right of citizenship, were required to pay a certain sum towards it.* The wonderful arcade which crosses hills and valleys, connecting the church of our Lady on the mountain, three miles from the gate of Bologna, with the city, was built in this manner; different families, religious associations, and trades, taking upon them to raise a certain number of arches, over which their names are generally inscribed. Thus some are stated to have been built by a certain number of soldiers, others by some fishermen, others by some strangers contributing to the work with one heart. All professions and trades are there mentioned. Tragedians, booksellers, scholars, boatmen, shoemakers, some pious coachmen of the city, a company of one hundred and twenty servants, the poor by alms. Some are raised by families, such as the Belloni, Dolfi; and others by single individuals, as Count Philip Bentivoglio, Count Charles Ranuzzi, and others. The canons of the cathedral, the master of music of the chapel in the Basilica of St. Petronio, and a number of religious associations, contributed, and all from the motive often formally expressed, namely, out of devotion. This work was performed in the last century: for ages make no difference in the spirit of the faithful.

In the year 1389, Nicolas Flamel, a scrivener, and his wife Pernelle, built one of the arcades of the charnel-house of the Holy Innocents at Paris: many other citizens contributed to this as to a work of religion, and their arms or initials were carved over the vaults. Nicolas Boulard was particularly distinguished as one these pious citizens. The inscription on one vault stated that it was built by Pierre Pottier, furrier and citizen of Paris, in honor of God and of the Blessed Virgin Mary, and all the blessed saints of paradise, “pour mettre les ossements des trespassez. Priez Dieu pour lui et pour les trespassez.” In addition, Flamel built at his expense the portal of the church of St. Jacques-de-la-Boucherie. The inscription stated that this portal was built in honor of God by one of the parishioners and his wife, in the year of grace, 1388. “Pray for the benefactors of this,” it added, “and for all others who have business in it, if you please.” This whole church was built with the alms of pious people. It was demolished in the Revolution, but the tower was saved by the artifice of an architect, who besought the mob to spare it, in imitation, as he said, of the enlightened English, who had pulled down their churches indeed, but had always converted the tower into a manufactory of shot. Mme. de Sevigne gives a description of the crowds that used to assemble in this church to hear the sermons of Bourdalen, on the site of which are now the shops of Jews, who trade in worn garments. Besides the portal, Flamel is supposed to have built one of the columns of the nave; for it was usual that pious people should thus undertake to raise one or more pillars of a church. Flamel was also the chief contributor to building the portal of the church of St. Geneviève-la-Petite, in 1402, on which the inscription stated that it was built with the alms of many persons, though Flamel's figure alone was carved upon it. He also built at his expense the chapel of the hospital of St. Gervais, the walls of which were covered with images of saints and crosses; and Flamel himself was represented on his knees.*

* Storia della Cattedrale di Como, 59.

After the destruction of the abbey church of St. Tron, when the abbot Rodolphus was almost in doubt of being able to rebuild it, from his desolation and poverty, God inspired a certain matron of our town, by name Ruzela, says the chronicler, who at her own expense began to build, and completed one pillar. A certain bailiff of the place followed her example, and finished another: and after them our towns-people, at their own expense, began four pillars, and left two of them imperfect. The abbot perceiving what was the will of God, girded himself to the work, and in a short time both walls of the nave were raised to the proper height.† The great church of St. Riquier, in the eleventh century, having been half destroyed, to the indescribable grief of the people, it was resolved, in order to procure assistance, that the venerable relics of St. Richerius, the patron of the monastery, should be carried to the neighboring castles, that the devout people might be moved to make gifts for the foundation of a new church. The day arrived, and the Count Wido came with many nobles, attended with a vast multitude, to behold the spectacle. With cross and banners, and tapers burning, the body of the saint was borne along; but the devout people could not endure that it should be carried beyond the town of the abbey, thinking that it would be an eternal disgrace to suffer it. So that early the next morning the body was brought back with such joy and triumph, that no one can express it; and then, the people being all assembled, with a prompt mind gave many gifts to restore the church, which offerings are thus related:—

Vaccas atque boves et equos, et oves tribuerunt,
Cappas, mantellos, anulos, vittasque, tiaras;
Cingula, cultellos, manicas, caligasque dederunt,
Auribus appensum tribuuntque monile puellæ.
Sed nostri cives argenti pondera pensant,

* Hist. Critique de Nicolas Flamel et de Pernelle sa femme, p. 32—113.

† Chronic. Abbatie S. Trudonis, Lib. X. p. 471, apud Dacher. Spicileg. Tom. VII.

Librarum solidos quam multos undique donant,
 Rusticus hordea dat, multorum cœtus avenam,
 Plures dant brasium, vinum plerique dederunt.
 Ex his thesaurus fit mercibus amplior unus,
 Quem numerare nequit, vel si quis compota novit.

“By God’s assistance,” continues the chronieler, “a new church is begun from the foundation ; and by the daily gifts of good men, the fabrie rises, the inhabitants more fervently urging one another, that no one should seem inferior to another in giving assistance. Thanks be to God, we now behold it raised on a stronger foundation, and to a loftier height than ever.”*

In England, during the ages of faith, we see the same process in operation. After the dreadful fire, caused by the carelessness of a plumber, which destroyed the abbey of Crowland, in the time of Ingulphus, the charity of people far and near was excited towards the monks. The Bishop of Lincoln gave forty mares of silver and forty days of indulgence to all who would do their service. Richard de Rulos, Lord of Brunne and Depyny, made liberal presents as an ancient friend, and proved, in time of calamity. The people gave money and provisions, fat hogs, and beans, and corn, and oxen. “Nor must we forget,” says the Monk, “among so many benefactors, Juliana, a poor old woman of holy memory at Weston, who out of her poverty gave us all her living, namely, some yarn and spinning thread to make vestments for the brethren of our monastery. Multitudes gave the labor of their hands, taking it in turn to serve one day every month till all was finished.”† Legacies are on record of various persons who left money towards rebuilding the tower of the abbey of St. Edmund’s at Bury. Thus on one beautiful tower of a Franciscan convent between Pisa and Florence, I saw inscribed “Pietas fidelium, 1826.”

In the year 1450 the convent of the Franciscans at Rheims was destroyed by fire, and in the following year it was rebuilt at the expense of a widow, whose name has remained unknown.‡ It is a tradition that the cloth-fullers were the founders of the church of St. Paul at Paris. In the tower there was a window on which they were represented at work in their trade.§ The second source of supply for the erection of churches, has been stated to have been the munificence of kings, and religious orders, and noble families ; and of this we have an early instance in the Saxon chronicle. “In the year 655, when Peada was king of the Mercians, came together himself and Oswy, brother of King Oswald, and said that they would rear a minster to the glory of Christ, and the honor of St. Peter. And they did so; and gave it the name of Medhamsted,” (which is now Peterborough.) “And they began the ground wall and wrought thereon ; after which they committed the work to a monk, whose name was Saxulf. He was very much

* Chronic. Centulensis, sive S. Richarii, Lib. IV. cap. 36. apud Dacher. Spicileg. Tom. IV.

† Hist. Ingulphi, p. 99.

‡ Hist. de Rheims, Liv. III. 7.

§ Lebeuf, Hist. du Diocese de Paris, Tom. I. chap. 4.

the friend of God, and him also loved all people ; he was nobly born in the world and rich ; he is now much richer with Christ. After the death of this king, his brother Wulfhere, who succeeded, loved Medhamsted for the love of his brother Peada, and for the love of Oswy, and for the love of Saxulf the abbot; and he said therefore that he would dignify and honor it. Then sent the king after the abbot, that he should immediately come to him, and he did so. Then said the king to the abbot, 'Beloved Saxulf, I have sent after thee for the good of my soul; and I will plainly tell thee for what reason. My brother Peada, and my beloved friend Oswy, began a minster for the love of Christ and St. Peter; but my brother, as Christ willed, is departed from this life; I will therefore entreat thee, beloved friend, that they earnestly proceed on this work; and I will find thee thereto gold and silver, land and possessions.' Then went the abbot home and began to work. So he sped as Christ permitted him, and in a few years was that minster ready. Then the king sent after all his thanes, after the archbishop and bishops, and after his earls, and after all those that loved God, that they should come to him; and he fixed the day when men should hallow the minster and when they were hallowing it, there was the king Wulfhere and his brother Ethelred, and his sister Kyneburga and Kyneswitha, and the archbishop and bishops, and all his thanes that were in his kingdom.

"Then stood up the king, and said with a loud voice, 'Thanks be to the high almighty God for this worship that is here done, and I will this day glorify Christ and St. Peter. I Wulfhere give to-day to St. Peter and the abbot Saxulf and the monks of the minster, these lands and these waters and meres and fens and wiers. This is my gift.'" Then followed the specifying of the gifts, which were immense. "Then quoth the king, 'It is little—this gift—but I will that thay hold it so royally and so freely that there may be taken therefrom neither gild nor gable, but for the monks alone.' During these words the abbot desired that he would grant him his request. And the king granted it. 'I have here (said he) some good monks that would lead their life in retirement, if they wist where. Now, here is an island that is called Ankerig, and I will request that we may build there a minster to the honor of St. Mary, that they may dwell there who will lead their lives in peace and tranquillity.' Then answered the king and quoth thus: 'Beloved Saxulf, not that only which thou desirest, but all things that I know thou desires in our Lord's behalf, so I approve and grant; and I pray all that come after me that our gift may stand. Whoso lesseneth our gift, or the gift of other good men, may the heavenly porter lessen him in the kingdom of heaven; and whoso advanceth it, may the heavenly porter advance him in the kingdom of heaven.' Then the witnesses subscribed it with their fingers on the cross of Christ, and confirmed it with their tongues."

It would be endless to commemorate the pious munificence of Catholic kings in the erection of churches. In Spain previous to the invasion of the Sarassins, king Sisebut had built the church of St. Leocadia at Toledo; Chindasvint had erected the famous churches and monasteries of Compluto and St. Roman. Recesvint founded the church of St. John de Bano near Duenas; and even Atangild had evinced royal munificence in the erection of that of Agaliensis. When Don Alphonso, the Catholic, had expelled the Moors from Galicia, Asturias, and Biscay, he rebuilt the churches which they had destroyed. The funds for the support of these churches were often the gift of devout kings, where, as in Spain, till after the eighth century, the payments of tithes was only voluntary and partial. Don Sancho the Great granted to the monastery of Leyre the tithes of various towns which he had wrested from the Moors. Don Bamiro of Arragon gave similar privileges to the church of Huesea. Count Petriccio made an equal donation to the apostolic church of St. James, and Don Alfonso I. of Arragon granted to the holy church of Saragossa the right of tithes from certain mills and baths of the city. Don Alfonso the VIIIth granted certain tithes to the church of Burgos, and the king St. Ferdinand similarly endowed the metropolitan church of Seville. When St. Angilbert was abbot of the monastery of St. Richarius in Gall, Charlemagne assisted him in rebuilding that church, and by his orders marble and columns were transported from Rome upon strong wagons, to be employed in its decoration.* Charles VIII. of France, at his coronation in the cathedral at Rheims, was moved to compassion at the sight of its ruinous state, in consequence of a late fire; he immediately granted a considerable sum for its restoration.† The beautiful church of St. Miniato al Monte, at Florence, was raised by Hildebrand, Bishop of Florence, at the expense of the Emperor St. Henry and St. Cunegonde, his wife. At Rome there are churches built by kings of Spain. The expense of the repairs of the Basilica of St. Paul without the walls was always borne by the kings of England. Sometimes it was the magistrates of cities who erected their principal church, of which they might almost have said with truth, "Hic amor, hæc patria est." This was the case at Freyburg, in Switzerland, of which the chronicles relate that its magistrates, after having been detained at Freyburg in Brisgau by the severe Albert of Austria, brought away with them the plan of the cathedral tower, to serve as a model for that which they were to build in their own city.

The decree of the Florentine republic, in the thirteenth century, which orders the reconstruction of the cathedral is cited by admirers of classical eloquence as equal in grandeur to any senatus consultum of ancient Rome. But we must not forget the zeal of the religious orders of knighthood, of the Templars, and of the Teutonic order, to which many noble churches in the west are due. In Prussia, wherever the dominion of the latter penetrated, churches and monasteries were immediately built, and divine service offered up. It was this order which built the beautiful church of St. Elizabeth at Marburg, which is still the admiration of Germany.* Sometimes religious confraternities built churches. That of the holy Sepulchre at Parma was founded in 1262 by pilgrims who had visited Jerusalem. The noblest artists contributed their skill and labor, and sought no other recompense but the remembrance of having done so. On the tomb of Giotto, in the cathedral of Florence, is an inscription, which alludes to his having built the beautiful tower of variegated marble adjoining:

* Vita S. Angelberti, Mabillon, Acta S. Ord. Bened. IV. I.

† Auquetil, Hist. de Rheims, Liv. IV. 59.

*Miraris turrem egregiam sacro ære sonantem,
Hæc quoque de modulo crevit ad astra meo.*

A noble example, surpassed in our days by the great Canova, who, towards the end of his life, erected at his own expense in Possagno, the place of his birth, a little mountain village of difficult access, a marble church of exquisite beauty; and his resources being found insufficient, in order to complete it he recommenced his personal labors with the activity, to which indigence alone had before condemned him. Private families were often at the whole expense of erecting magnificent churches; for luxury was not in those ages personal, consisting in furniture, play, jewelry, dress, and theatres, but it was rather a grand and noble spirit, prompting works of public beneficence. Privatus illis census erat brevis, commune magnum, says Horace, speaking of the early Romans, and Bonald observes, that this was true also of the French till the fifteenth century—the church was more beautiful than the castle.† The sublime church of the Annunziata at Genoa was built at the sole expense of the Lomellini family: that of St. Matthew was built by the Doria family, in which is the tomb of Andrew Doria, the founder, whose descendants continue to support it. In the year 1831 Prince Doria, on visiting this church, perceiving that the gold was tarnished, gave 200,000 francs to have it refreshed.

In the same city, the beautiful church of Santa Maria in Carignano was built in obedience to the will of Bendinelli Sauli, a noble Genoese; and several others were built there by other families, such as the Pallavicinis, Balbis, and Ivreas. The church of the Annunziata at Padua was founded by Henry Scrovigno, whose statue is there seen. The family of Ruccellai at Florence possess the oratory of the holy sepulchre. John Ruccellai sent persons expressly to Jerusalem to take the model of the holy Sepulchre, and he confided the erection to Alberti. This was restored and embellished in 1809 by Joseph Horace Ruccellai. The magnificent front of the church of the holy Apostles at Rome will attest the munificence of the Torlonia family in the present age. The church of Taverny, one of the most beautiful Gothic fabrics in the diocese of Paris, of the thirteenth or fourteenth century, was raised at the expense of the family of Montmorenci. In the year 1237, Buchard de Montmorenci left money for the expense of the glass windows. The word aplanos, belonging to the Montmorencis, is read upon the sanctuary

* Voigt. Geschichte Preussens, II. 294.

† Legislat. Primit. 11.

Many of that family are buried there, under magnificent tombs of marble, and each inscription ends with "Priez pour l'ame de lui :—" one to a boy of that house, who died in 1369 ends thus : "gaudeat in Christo tempore perpetuo."* In the time of Francis I. was discovered under the ancient church of St. Merry at Paris, a stone tomb, containing the body of a warrior with boots of gilt leather on his feet, with this inscription, "Hic jacet vir bonæ memoriæ Odo Falconarius fundator hujus ecclesiæ." This was the famous Odo, the hero of Paris, who with the valiant Godefroi defended it against the Normans in the year 886, under the orders of Count Eudes, who became king two years afterwards.†

But to the personal labors and munificence of bishops and abbots Christendom was still more indebted for the erection and restoration of these magnificent fabrics, though such works were not suffered to interfere with their other duties, as the following instances will show. The first act of the episcopacy of Ebon at Rheims was to obtain leave from the Emperor to demolish what remained of the walls and gates of the city, in order to employ the materials in the reconstruction of the cathedral, which was falling to ruin. In this work he evinced great zeal for the arts, and Rumaldus, serf of the Emperor, was placed at the head of the workmen as the architect. At the same time this bishop was employing learned and holy men to compose penitentiary canons, and such was his zeal that he went twice into Denmark to preach the Gospel.‡

When Yves de Bellême Bishop of Séez, in the eleventh century, was obliged to rebuild his cathedral, which had been destroyed by fire, he made a journey as far as Palestine to seek contributions from some of his rich relations, who were residing there. In the same age, when the Norman knights were at Civitate in Italy, there came to them Geoffrey de Montbray, Bishop of Coutances, who was related to the sons of Tancred, and he received from them considerable treasures, to enable him to finish his cathedral, with which he returned in safety. In the year 935 St. Conrad, count of Altorf, having been made Bishop of Constance, made three pilgrimage to Jerusalem, and during his episcopacy, built at his own expense three churches in Constance, in one of which, that of St. Maurice, he made a sepulchre resembling that which he had seen at Jerusalem. St. Hugo, the sixth abbot of Cluni, amidst all his other labors, was able to rebuild, on an extensive scale, the church of the monastery, and in a style which was admirable for its beauty, employing twenty years on this work.§ We have already seen how the celebrated abbot Suger exerted himself in building the church of St. Denis. The history of his life records a circumstance which was quite characteristic of these holy men who raised cathedrals, while they spent nothing upon themselves, from a sense of one of these great primitive principles expressed by the ancients, as by Aristotle, where he says, ἐν ἐκάστοις τὸ πρέπον· οὐ γὰρ ταῦτ' ἀρμόζει Θεοῦς

* Lebeuf, Hist. du Diocese de Paris. Tom. IV. 96.

† Ibid. Tom. I. c. 6.

‡ Anquetil, Hist. de Rheims, I. 97.

§ Bibliothec. Cluniacens. 458.

*καὶ ἀνθρώποις οὐδ' ἐν ἱερῷ καὶ τάφῳ. When he was made Regent of France, he was so little prepared for such dignity, that he had been that very time meditating a final retreat from court, to procure repose for the end of his life. With this view, he had built a little cell near the church, in which he could retire and meditate on divine things. This was the only apartment which he constructed for himself, and it was so modest and conformable to poverty, being only ten feet wide and fifteen long, that all who saw it were surprised at such an instance of detachment in so magnificent a person. When Peter, the venerable abbot of Cluni, came one day, with many other abbots, to see Suger, after admiring the grandeur of the church of St. Denis, and then coming to view his little cell, he heaved a deep sigh, and turned to those near him saying, "Behold a man who condemns us all. If he goes to great expense in buildings, it is not for himself, like us, but only for the ornament of the house of God."†

In Rome we may see the magnificent churches built in these latter days by saints, by St. Philip Neri and by St. Charles Borromeo. Yet in restoring the ancient churches with greater magnificence, these holy men are sometimes seen fearing the very splendor of their own work, and passing a judgment upon themselves which assuredly they did not deserve. Thus speaking of Wlstan, Bishop of Worcester, William of Malmesbury says, "The fear of God was so constantly in his mind, that what others turned into pomp, he transferred into matter of compunction. When the church which he had begun from the foundations was so far completed that the monks were removing into it, orders were given that the old church, which had been built by the blessed Oswald, should be unroofed and demolished. At this spectacle Wlstan, standing by, could not refrain from tears. What feeling and tenderness belonged to the spirit of the middle ages! Upon which, being modestly reminded by his companions that he ought rather to rejoice on seeing the church so augmented, he replied, 'I think far otherwise, because we miserable men, destroy the works of the saints that we may procure praise for ourselves; that age of happy men knew not the construction of pompous houses, but it knew men who, under any roof whatever, were ready to immolate themselves to God, and to attract subjects by example.' "‡ Ah! what sayest thou, holy Wlstan? Were not these scruples against thine own wiser rule? The saintly Bernard too had fears, lest vain-glory should arise from his success in preaching: but art not thou one of those privileged few who may conclude, as he did, in addressing the insidious enemy, "nec propter te ceppi, nec propter te desinam?"§ And besides, after all the pains which later architects have employed in making old buildings vain to be homogeneous with their own works, by forcing them to display themselves to every passing gaze, how little would their style lead us to suspect the men who raised them of being actuated by personal vanity. It might almost lead us to remember that fact related in the Gospel, that it was he whom all the Jews counted worthy, who loved their nation, and who had built them a synagogue, that cried to Jesus, Lord I am not worthy. Humility is, as it were, the kernel which lies within the beautiful exterior shell of all the creations of religion ; as when you repair to Loretto, and find that poor cottage of Nazareth enshrined within a temple of marble, and surrounded by a palace, which art and riches have combined to adorn.

* Ethic. IV. 3. † Hist. de Suger, liv. VI. ‡ De Gestis Pontificum Anglorum, Lib. IV.
§ In Vita Ipsiæ.

An old writer says, while looking at the chapel of King Henry VII. in Westminster, "I have much admired the curious workmanship thereof ; it added to the wonder, that it is so shadowed with mean houses, well-nigh on all sides, that one may almost touch it as soon as see it. This chapel may pass for an emblem of great worth, living in a private way. How is he pleased with his own obscurity, whilst others of less desert make greater show ; and whilst proud people stretch out their plumes in ostentation, he useth their vanity for his shelter, more pleased to have worth than to have others take notice of it." Indeed it would not be easy to find any thing more expressive of humility than the buildings of the middle ages. With all their grandeur and beauty they are always modest, and never disposed to show themselves off to advantage. They disdain nothing useful for the sake of appearances ; they have no false surface to conceal weakness and deformity ; they are grand without an effort ; and always willing to condescend to the wants and consolations of the poor. In the middle ages when an edifice was complete, there was almost as much under the ground as above it. Whether church or castle there was always a double foundation ; either a subterraneous church, or a suite of apartments, or a labyrinth of vaults, spreading, like roots, far and wide on all sides.

From all this it is sufficiently evident that the construction of these monuments did not involve men in any ruinous expenditure : they were not raised or enriched, like the temples of Rome, when they were rebuilt and re-endowed at the departure of the Gauls, by taxes, imposed upon the citizens, with such little regard to their convenience, that they were compelled to borrow money for their own personal wants, until year after year augmenting their difficulties, they were consigned to slavery, and dragged to dungeons, and the whole commonalty sank under its misery into a state of gloomy submission. The offerings with which they were raised and supported had been always the voluntary contributions of the faithful ; the Catholic bishops would have abhorred the idea of any one being compelled to present them. Nay, the funds were actually the fruit of holiness and austerity ; for wherever decay of discipline occurred in monasteries, even buildings fell to ruin, but a reform was followed with an increase of wealth and magnificence. This was the case at St. Denis, when Suger had introduced the reform.*

Dom Gervaise observes, that the abbey was never so rich as after it had embraced this reform, and he believes that it was in consequence of the blessing of God. This source of ecclesiastical wealth to support the erection of churches, had been remarked in an early age; witness what St. Ambrose says, "If he deserved to be commended to our Lord who had built a synagogue, how much more is he deserving who builds a church? What shall I say of our brethren, the holy men Vitalianus and Majanus? I know that they seek not glory from men but from God; yet if I were not to speak their praise, these works themselves would cry out; for they constructed this tabernacle, and at their own expense, and at what great expense, considering how moderate and slight are their worldly means! theirs was abundance of faith and the riches of simplicity, for to holy men poverty itself is always rich. Therefore I believe that these blessed men built the church no less with their prayers than with their money; they expended all their substance on it, and yet they wanted nothing, which shows how rich is poverty when all is expended."* How justly might we style each of these Christian churches a temple, σεμνὸν ἀγλάαισι μερίμναις,† venerable with noble thoughts. It is to be remembered that the clergy, and even holy laymen, gave not only their wealth but their personal labor, and the assistance of their own genius. St. Victrice, Archbishop of Rouen, in the fourth century, describes himself and his clergy as laboring with their own hands to build the church of God in that city:

* Hist. du Suger, Lib. V.

"You behold on one side a crowd of austere monks, on another a multitude of children, who make the air resound with their innocent voices; a little farther it is a chorus of holy virgins, who carry the standard of Jesus Christ, or a crowd of devout widows, who display none of the ornaments which are despised by those who wish to serve Christ. Every thing is divine—the riches of sacred canticles shine there, not a night or vigil, that is not enlightened by them. Let us then introduce the divine martyrs into the temple prepared for them; let us collect their relics, those seeds of the future resurrection. It is not in vain that I have so ardently desired to build this sanctuary. The arrival of the saints justified my anxiety. We have laid the foundations; we have raised the walls, and we behold this day, for whom the work has been advanced; juvat manibus volvere, et grandia humeris saxa portare. Sudorem meum bibit terra; atque utinam sanguinem biberet pro nomine salvatoris!"‡ The Cardinal de Berulle, who founded the congregation of the Oratoire, was inflamed with such zeal, that when he had purchased ground for the church he used to work himself at the building, like an apostolic man, carrying the hods as if he had been a common laborer. This was so late as in the year 1616.§ Peter, Abbot of Andrenes, had incurred the resentment of a certain wicked man, on account of his persisting in rebuilding a church which the other had resolved should not be rebuilt. The holy pastor went on, however, with the

* S. Ambrosii Serm. LXXXIX.

† Pind. Nem. III.

‡ De Laude Sanctorum, cap. 12. Theod. Liquet, Recherches sur l'Hist. Religieuse et Littéraire de Rouen depuis les premiers temps jusqu'à Rollon, p. 21.

§ De St. Victor, Tableau de Paris, Tom. I. 812.

work, and labored with his own hands. The son of the opponent, that he might please his father, lay in wait for the abbot at the gate of the monastery, and as the abbot was entering aimed a mortal blow at his head; but a youth, Henry de Fernes, his chaplain, bravely threw himself forward and received the stroke: he was immediately carried into the infirmary, where after a few days he departed in holy hope.* The same men who were thus ready to exercise every kind of servile labor, were also zealous in devoting their genius and skill to the same end. In the tenth century the monk of Gozze was a celebrated architect. The church of Santa Maria Novella at Florence, which is so beautiful, that Michael Angelo used to call it his spouse, was built in the thirteenth century by two Dominican friars. The façade of St. Mark's, in the same city, was designed by a Carmelite. In erecting the noble church of the Abbey of Einsiedeln, the architects were Kaspar Moosbrugger, a monk, and Thomas Maier, a lay brother. It was Father Grassi and Father Pozzi, Jesuits, who contributed chiefly to the erection and adornment of the magnificent church of St. Ignatius at Rome. Marius de Canepine, who was the architect to raise the front of the church of St. Charles of Rome, was a Capuchin. So also upon the interior decorations the clergy esteemed their personal labor well employed. At the beginning of the sixteenth century it was Dom Guillaume Lavieille, prior of the Abbey of Fontenelle, who beautifully painted the choir of that church with images of divers saints.† The perfecting of the art of making pictures in Scagliola is due to Father Henry Hugford, abbot of the order of Valombrosa, who was of an English family; and the two organs in the cathedral of Como were made by the celebrated Jesuit Hermann, in the seventeenth century. St. Jerome mentions, in praise of the priest Nepotianus that whatever was beautiful in the Basilicas and in the Courts of the martyrs, was the work of his own hands, that he resembled in elegance and diversity of genius those Greek philosophers who used to boast‡ that whatever they used, even to their pallium and to the ring on their finger, had been made by their own hands. § Even great noblemen were sometimes excited by devotion to labor with their own hands at the erection of churches. Godfrey, the Bearded Duke of Lower Lorraine, in his war against the Emperor, Henry III., had burnt the greater church of St. Mary at Verdun, when that city fell a prey to his arms. Full of repentance for this sacrilege, he caused it to be rebuilt, and took for his penance the labor of frequently working at it with his own hands, carrying the mortar like the meanest workman; this was in the year 1046, as Lambertinus Schaffnaburgensis relates. This example naturally leads us to consider the last source which consisted in the substitution of such works for the ancient canonical penance.

In the ages of faith, when man was not made to consist in his organs, when as Bonald observes, there was in the world another God besides the god of riches,

* Chronicon Andrensis Monasterii, apud Dacher. Spicileg. Tom. IX. p. 445.

† Langlois, Hist. de l'Abbaye de Fontenelle.

‡ Plato, Hippias.

§ Epist. XXXV.

another worship besides that of pleasure, other business besides the intrigues of ambition, it was common to see men in power, who had been misled for a moment by the intoxication of rule, return to themselves, and exhibit profound sorrow for unjust actions, or even for a legitimate war, if they had exceeded the measure of evil which it permits to be inflicted upon enemies. They were then seen to found pious establishments with the profit of iniquity, and offer to the Eternal Justice institutions of a durable advantage to society, in expiation of the passing evils committed against some men, and leave public monuments of their faith in the Divinity, of their hope of a better life, of their charity to their fellow-creatures, monuments which attested their repentance, even after history had forgotten their faults.* We have already seen that by means of indulgences, and the contributions in consequence, a great number of these magnificent churches were built or repaired. The vast and beautiful church of that celebrated Carthusian monastery near Pavia, of which the Marquis Malaspina de Sannazaro has lately given a description, may be cited here. Great as may have been the crimes of Galeazzo Visconti, the founder, great also, it must be admitted, was this monument of his penitence, and desire to redeem his soul, a work worthy indeed of repentance, at once to be the consolation and support of a number of holy men in successive ages, who were to follow there the path of perfection, and a monument that was to adorn and benefit his country, being an object of astonishment and rapture for the men of devout and cultivated minds in all future times. The first stone was laid in September, 1396, and in the year 1399 twenty-five monks were there established. Gelasius II. granted the Archbishop of Saragossa, the power of remitting canonical penances to any one who would give alms for rebuilding his church, which the Moors had destroyed. The Count Don Pedro and his countess gave the town and monastery of Corispindo to the church of St. James, as an atonement for the sin of wounding Don Alfonso before the gate of the altar of the apostle. "In truth," says that author of the work lately published in Spain, on the origin and progress of the income of that church, "corporal mortifications are better than alms for cleansing the soul of its infirmities, because, though the latter are efficacious means of exciting Divine mercy, they stand opposed only to covetousness; and it is easier to a rich man to relinquish part of his superfluities, than to abandon his luxuries and criminal pursuits. Therefore, even when these commutations were flourishing most, there were added to alms, prayers and abstinence from certain dainties." With respect to the principle of the commutation in relation to history, it is certain that, even in the first ages, penitents were sometimes required or induced to contribute to great works of public utility; but the formal substitution of these for the ancient canonical penances, was introduced towards the end of the tenth and the beginning of the eleventh centuries. Every change implies some disorder, and abuse attaches itself of necessity to every possible arrangement of discipline; but it was argued that the evil to which this may have opened the door, was certainly not to the extent that some learned ecclesiastical writers, in their zeal for primitive usages, were found to maintain, for the foundations of truth are never set aside. Pierre le Chantre, a celebrated theologian, who lived in the twelfth century, complained of the abandonment of the ancient canonical penance by this relaxation. The blessed Stephen d'Obasine, who died about the middle of the same century, expressed himself in the same sense, and would not consent to introduce the compensations. The scholastic divines, on the contrary, that is, the wisest and most learned men, argued in defence of this mode of compensation; and while the popes, as Chardon says, seemed always attached to the ancient discipline, they sanctioned the sense of the schools, in recognizing the wisdom and expediency of the change which had been gradually effected. Holy theologians, indeed, of the twelfth century, when found complaining of this alteration, have a claim to the highest respect of those who have continued faithful; but assuredly the men of our times, and of the modern creeds, cannot with any consistency avail themselves of their arguments or opposition.

* Legislation Primit. Tom. I. 240.

How can men of the modern learning lament the abolition of that discipline which required years of weeping, prostration and kneeling without the church in sackcloth and ashes, excluded from communion for seven or ten or twenty years, or even for the whole course of men's lives?

On the other hand, the wisest and most zealous adherents of the ancient discipline acknowledged that after all, these penances did not always necessarily produce conversion of heart, or facilitate the return of men to God, without which the punishment of sins was of no avail: those who advocated the system of compensation, observed that while reason herself could not but approve of that discipline, which directed the internal horror of sin and dread of its penalty to the erection of prodigious works, that would benefit the race of men in future generations, to the ear of faith the arguments of the schoolmen must seem solid and satisfactory, for they rested on the principle of Hugues and Richard of St. Victor, that perfect contrition alone had the power of remitting sins and their penalty, as also on the explanation given by Alexander de Hales, that the punishment due to sin, though not suffered in this life, may yet, by the indulgence of the Church, which is only an application of the merits of Jesus Christ, granted to contrite sinners, be considered punished by God in the person of Jesus Christ; so that there would remain nothing to be suffered by the contrite penitent, who had not fulfilled the canonical penance, but who had worthily received the indulgence of the Church, granted from her treasure, which consisted of the superabundant merits of the whole mystical body of Jesus Christ. They observed that the greatest admirers of the canonical penance were obliged to admit, that in the first ages the bishops had the power of dispensing with the whole or a part of the penalty, which was an admission that sin might be wholly remitted, without suffering its penalty.

either in this life or in the next ; and they denied that any other prerogative was exercised in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, when, to persons truly contrite, works of charity and of pious utility were substituted for the solitary exercises imposed by the canons, which would not have produced any fruits beyond the breasts of the individual, and which could not have been always of absolute necessity since they had been sometimes remitted.

But to return to the churches. We have now seen from what sources the funds for their erection were generally drawn ; so that the phenomenon seems to be explained, with respect to the difficulty of accomplishing works of such prodigious magnitude ; for they are monuments of faith, and they testify the zeal with which men of former ages followed and worshipped Christ. It is not that undue importance was attached to material fabrics, or that Christians in faithful ages needed the light of modern philosophy to entertain spiritual notions of what is pleasing to the majesty of God. It does not follow that they were unable to make the proper distinction, because we do not find them imitating Xerxes, when he burnt all the temples in Greece, the Magi having persuaded him that it was impious and detestable to include the deity within walls. "God himself takes care," said St. Zeno of Verona, "to warn us that all this worldly and terrestrial pomp, without true adorers, is neither necessary nor sufficient to honor him worthily. 'What house worthy of me can you build to me,' saith he in the words of Isaiah ; and does he not show us all the vanity of the Temple of Solomon, when he says, 'Of this temple there shall not rest stone upon stone.' Ah ! without doubt, he shows us in these words that a similar edifice, however great or magnificent, cannot please him by itself alone. He desires above all to be surrounded by true adorers, and he finds in their hearts a temple, which is far more agreeable to him than all those which the hands of men can build to his honor."* In the middle ages we find these sentiments in the ordinances of holy kings, who were the most distinguished for their magnificent foundations of churches. "Although it is good," says a capitulary of Charlemagne, "that there should be public edifices for the church, nevertheless, the ornament and elevation of good morals must be preferred to all other kinds of building : because, as far as we can discern, the construction of basilicas belongs to a certain custom of the old law, but the emendation of manners appertains properly to the New Testament and to the Christian discipline." This was published at the time when the monks of Fulda expostulated with him, beseeching him that the immense and superfluous buildings and other useless works of their secular rulers might be omitted by which the brethren were harassed. "Sed omnia," they added, "juxta mensuram et discreti-onem fiant."† In the exhortations which he addressed to the new abbot St. Egilus, the emperor quoted the observation of St. Chrysostom, that no churches are raised to the glory of God, in the building of which the interests of the poor are compromised, and that the martyrs are not honored, when their basilicas are enriched with the spoils of the living.* But, as illustrating the creative spirit of the Catholic society, the number of these beautiful and sublime fabrics may be a subject for lasting admiration and pious gratitude.

* Tract. Liv. 1.

† Mabillon, Præfat. in IV. Sæcul. Benedict. § 6.

"The Catholic religion," says Chateaubriand, "has covered the world with its monuments. Protestantism has now lasted three centuries; it is powerful in England, in Germany, in America. What has it raised? It will show you the ruins which it has made, amidst which it has planted some gardens, or established some manufactories.† The debasement, indeed, of our ecclesiastical architecture, which, as a modern writer says, "immediately ensued upon the reformation, is only less disgraceful than the destruction to which so many venerable edifices were condemned by the brutal rapacity of their lay possessors. That glorious and elevating art had attained its highest perfection; and no degradation was ever more rapid or more complete. But the Reformation," adds this writer, with amusing simplicity or shallowness, "was not in any degree the cause of this: it was produced by the spirit, or rather the taste of the age."‡ The Catholic religion is essentially a creative power, to edify and not to destroy, because it is under the immediate influence of that Holy Spirit which the Church invokes as the Creative Spirit—"Creator Spiritus." The Protestant, or modern philosophical, is a principle of destruction, of perpetual decomposition, and disunion. Under the dominion of the English Protestant power, for four hundred years, Ireland presents, as a great prelate of our time observes, the appearance of a new country, in the same manner as France under the sophists of the Revolution, is rapidly becoming as naked and void of ancient memorials as the wilds of America. That the Catholic spirit in this respect continues to be exactly what it was of old in the twelfth and fourteenth centuries, may be witnessed in the works which are still pursued in Italy and Spain, or in any of the Catholic states of Europe, however poor or insignificant, as in some of the smaller cantons of Switzerland.

Florence, for instance, during the last fifteen years, has beheld the prodigious work continued of finishing the chapel of the Medicis in the church of St. Lorenzo, at the private personal expense of its pious and munificent dukes. This famous chapel is incrustated with jasper, agates, chalcedons, lapis lazuli, and marble of every color, and adorned with tombs of Egyptian granite and statues of bronze. At Rome too, is seen, at the present day, the same spirit for constructing churches as in the middle ages. Witness the vast labor of its devout people in rebuilding the Basilica of St. Paul; on entering which solemn and majestic sanctuary, it is difficult to refrain from tears; caused, not merely from beholding such stupendous ruins, but also by an impression, which comes suddenly over the mind, of astonishment and affection for the present generation of men, who employ such pains to repair it: and in fact it is with an indescribable emotion that one stands by and beholds these prodigious columns of granite arrive at their final destination, having been drawn along from the distant regions of the Alps; and one cannot avoid for the moment feeling, as it were, a greater love for men who are capable of conceiving and of undertaking such enterprises through the love of Christ and of his saints. Alas! with how much nobler an order of monuments than that which the present race of men erects, would England be now adorned, if her rich and powerful nobles, and her laborious population, had continued Catholic! What splendid churches, monasteries, hospitals, colleges, and halls would have risen everywhere! With such means, and with the activity inherent in the national character, what might not have been done if all had been animated with the generous and self-devoted spirit of the Catholic religion! And here I cannot refrain from hazarding a remark which was often suggested to me by what I observe of Italy: for after all that can be advanced in praise of its climate, subject to such extreme vicissitudes, and of its scenery, where clear rivers and beautiful verdure, and even if we except its maritime and Alpine borders, abrupt and striking mountains are so rarely seen, it seems to me as if one cannot avoid coming at last to the conclusion, that the classic land of artists and poets owes its principal charms, even those which strike the eye, not to any extraordinary liberality of nature, but to the works which have been inspired by the Catholic religion.

* In Vita S. Egidii. Acta S. Ordinis Benedict. IV. p. 1.

† Discourse, Hist. Pref.

‡ Quarterly Review, No. LXVIII.

The palaces of Genoa and of Venice without their churches, would not compensate for their scorched and formal hills and unhealthy marshes. The monotonous plain of Milan would be no delightful recollection without the thought of its cathedral; the formal hills which border the pale and turbid Po at Turin, would inspire no interest if they were not crowned with that votive church of the Superga; the low sandy banks of the Arno would not arrest the pilgrims at Pisa if there were not the soil of Calvary in the Campo Santo, the cathedral, the baptistery and the Campanile. The vale and hills of Florence, with their famed but disappointing stream, are unquestionably surpassed in natural beauty by the English valleys of the Severn or the Wye: but art, inspired by the Catholic religion, has raised that dome and tower in the Tuscan plain, and crowned the hills which encircle it with those beautiful convents which Michael Angelo used to regard with rapture. How hideous would be the range of the adjoining Apennines if it were not for Camaldoli and Alvernia! Who would be attached to Sienna if it were not for its cathedral and its Gothic towers? And what pilgrim from the North would be attracted to Ancona by the scenery of that level shore of the Adriatic, if it were not for the hope of arriving at the house of our blessed Lady?

I would suggest another observation, less hazardous, which must have been made by most travellers; that the unity of the Catholic religion is not more admirable than the variety of her monuments. In both we can trace the influence of the same creative spirit which presided over the formation of the earth and the waters, in which, as ancient philosophy observed,* one living universal principle is simultaneously developed in a countless multiplicity of beauteous forms, designed for a beneficent end. To have a personal experience of the unity of the Church, we should traverse the whole world, to witness, under every indifference of nature and climate, one family likeness among her children, one faith, one hope, one baptism, one spirit of charity, one sacrifice of atonement, one pervading type, and one idea determining all institutions, manners, and even intellectual conceptions; —but to behold its variety, which is produced by this unity, we need only observe what is established in any one city. See the noble cathedral rising from the centre, as the parent of all the lesser fabrics ! though it is not always the principal church ; for at Verona, Padua, Bologna, and Ravenna, the churches of St. Zeno, St. Anthony, St. Petronio, and St. Apollinare, are in a rank before it, and to the latter the archbishop and clergy repair every year, processionally to honor the tomb of the apostle of Emilia. Observe on one side is the vast monastery of the Benedictines for the learned, with its spacious and beautiful cloisters under noble libraries and solemn halls ; on the other rises the immense college of the Jesuits, for the reception of studious and saintly youth. Here you see the magnificent hospital for those who love to minister to the sick ; and there is the hospice for him who desires to entertain the stranger. Nor do you overlook the charitable school for the pious lay brother who devotes himself to the instruction of the children of the poor. Without the walls, in some sequestered vale, stands the Carthusian monastery and Cistercian abbey, for those who served God in penitence and retirement ; and crowning the beautiful heights which encircle the city, appear the humble but picturesque convents of the Capuchins and Franciscans, for the active brothers of the poor. Among the groves adjoining you discern numerous religious houses, under various rules, for holy virgins. Rising on the highest rock, above them all is the votive temple of our Lady, for the devout pilgrims ; and deep in the recesses of the neighboring forest you will discover the mossy cell and simple oratory, for him who loves to dwell in prayer amidst the silence and solitude of nature. What a multitude of magnificent and useful creations have thus arisen from one faith ! What variety, and yet what harmonious concord !

* Arist Metaphysic. Lib. I. c. 4.

But let us proceed to the building of the churches, for the ability to construct which we have been attempting to account. This may seem to propose a dry study ; but as Quintilian says of his own subject, “Plus habet in recessu quam fronte promittit.” In these days, when men have so forgotten the ancient practices and traditions of the Christian society, it might be supposed that formerly men were directed in the selection of sites for the erection of churches, either by the facility of procuring ground, or by some circumstances connected with caprice or accident ; but it was not with such views that churches were erected in primitive times, or during the ages of faith. In the second council of Braga, the bishops were prohibited consecrating any church built for the sake of any temporal utility. Catholics built not temples to saints as heretics affirm, nor to great men, as the sophists of France, but to the omnipotent God alone. They place them, indeed, under the invocation of saints ; but their altars are consecrated to the God of martyrs. Not, however, without regard to the memory and the prayers of saints was the site of their temples chosen. The spot which had received the blood of a martyr, or witnessed his confession, or heard the preaching of a holy man, or that on which his house had stood, or on which any remarkable event had occurred connected with religion, was always the first selected for the purpose, so that almost all the ancient churches in every country thus placed, convey a substantially faithful remembrance of great men and great events, disproving the justice of that observation made by Cicero, that the memory of the wicked is sometimes stronger than that of the good, and really extending to the friends of the true God, that earthly honor of which the ancient poet so beautifully sung—

Tu quoque littoribus nostris, Æneïa nutrix, Æternam moriens famam Caieta dedisti.*

Of churches thus situated, uttering as it were the solemn voice of ancient tradition, none are more illustrious than those three at the Salvian waters, beyond the Basilica of St. Paul at Rome, on the spot where that apostle was beheaded, that of St. Peter, in Montorio, on the Janiculum, in the cloisters of which is a small chapel, on the spot where the Prince of the apostles suffered on the cross ; that of St. Agnes, without the walls, which was built by Constantine, at the request of his daughter Constance, on the spot where the body of that holy virgin was found ; and the Basilica of St. Peter on the Vatican, which was erected over the grotto near the Circus, where the body of St. Peter was placed by Marcellus. Pope S. Anaclet erected an oratory on the spot, which Constantine the great raised into a Basilica, over which the present dome was erected in later ages. This ancient oratory is the present confession of St. Peter, under the altar of which reposes part of the bodies of St. Peter and St. Paul, before which in the upper church, one hundred and twelve lamps are burning for ever, day and night. Endless are the memorials of profound interest attached to the different churches of the holy city : on almost each of them a folio history has been written. One vast work of erudition by Cancellarii, is merely upon the sacristy of St. Peter. The church of St. Marcellus was built on the spot where stood the house of St. Lucina, a Roman lady, at the beginning of the fourth century.

An ancient tradition relates, that where stands the church of St. Maria in Via Lata, St. Paul resided with the centurion, who by order of Festus conducted him to Rome. The original oratory is now below the ground. The church of St. Clement stands on the site of the house of St. Clement, where his body and that of St. Ignatius of Antioch now repose under the great altar. The church of St. Maria in Domincia was built over the house of St. Cyriaque. The origin of the church of St. John and St. Paul, dates from the fourth century, when the monk Pammachias changed into a church the house of St. John and St. Paul, martyrs. The church of St. Pudenticienne occupies the site of the house of St. Pudentius, the Roman senator who lodged the apostle St. Peter, and was his first convert to the faith, with his sons Novatus and Timothy, and his daughters Pudenticienne and Praxeda. Pope St. Pius I. changed this house into a church. Here is the altar on which St. Peter celebrated the divine mysteries; and in the well which is railed round in the nave was preserved the blood of more than three thousand martyrs, who are interred under the church. The Basilica of St. Sebastian was built on the cemetery of St. Calixtus, where many Popes and one hundred and seventy thousand Christians were buried, where the body of St. Sebastian was transported by St. Lucina, and where the bodies of the apostles St. Peter and St. Paul were concealed for some time. The church of St. Prisca was built on the site of her house, in which she was baptized by St. Peter, with many other converted pagans. The church of St. Cecilia was built on the site of her house, and was consecrated by Pope St. Urban, about the year 230. The house of Pope St. Gregory the Great, who was descended from the ancient and noble Anician family, was changed by him into a monastery, where he continued to reside. After his death, the church which he built there in honor of St. Andrew, was placed under his own invocation. Here you see the chapel where St. Gregory recited his Homilies, and the marble table on which he used to feed, every morning, twelve poor pilgrims. The church of the Holy Cross was built by Constantine on the spot where he rested after escaping from the persecution at Rome.

* Æn. Lib. VII.

Turning to other cities, we find the same associations of sanctity with the site of their churches. Thus at Genoa the cathedral of St. Laurence stands on the site of the hospice in which that holy martyr had lodged as he came from Spain to go to Rome, where he suffered three years afterwards under Valerian. It was immediately changed into a church, which at the end of the eleventh century rose into the present majestic structure. The church of our Lady of Graces in the same city, was built on the spot where St. Nazarus disembarked to be the third apostle of Genoa. The house of St. Catherine of Sienna was converted into two oratories, which form the church and the oratory of the confraternity of St. Catherine della Notte, so called because they accompany the blessed sacrament in the night to the sick. The church of St. Theodore in Ravenna is on the site of a house in which the primitive Christians assembled to celebrate the divine mysteries; for whom also the grottoes under the church of St. Nazair and St. Celsus at Verona served as a retreat. The church of St. Alexander in Zebedia at Milan was built on the ruins of a prison called Zebedia, in which an ancient tradition states, that an ensign of the Theban legion, named Alexander, was confined, who was afterwards martyred, at Bergamo. The little church of St. Protasius ad Monachos in Milan, was built on the site of the house where lodged the holy martyrs, Gervase and Protasius, who suffered under Nero in the year 77. At Arona the church incloses the very room in which St. Charles Borromeo was born. At Loretto the magnificent Basilica is raised over the blessed house of Nazareth, as tradition testifies, as history, with astonishment, concedes; and as it is acknowledged by those of the Dalmatian shore, who lost it to their shame. At Einsiedeln it incloses the hut of a poor hermit, who came into those mountains in the ninth century. Meinrad (for that was the hermit's name), who was of the illustrious family of the counts of Hohenzollern, in Suabia, retired into a forest on the mountains of Schweitz, near a fountain, where Hildegarde, daughter of Lewis, king of Germany, and abbess of the convent of St. Felix and St. Regulus at Zurich, built him a cell and chapel, and gave him an image of our Lady. There he lived from the year 837, till his death, which was in 863: and on the spot was subsequently erected the vast abbey of our Lady of the hermits, and over his cell arose the church: but as the declivity of the mountain did not admit of extending the nave to the fountain, it was found impossible to place the cupola, according to the original plan, immediately over the cell, which was on much higher ground; therefore we find it standing enclosed within a marble chapel, near the western entrance. That cell has been moistened with the blood of the murdered saint; and the very image which beheld the horrid deed, is still upon the altar. His fountain, which is in front of the church, is covered with a beautiful dome, supported upon arches, and the pilgrims drink from it.* At Lyons the church of St. Irenæus was built over the tomb of St. Epipoy and St. Alexander, who were martyred under Marcus Aurelius. It was at first subterraneous; but in the fifth century St. Patiens erected the present church. Here were collected the bones of the martyrs under Severus in the year 202. St. Patiens placed on it an inscription inviting the faithful to prayer, and stating the number of martyrs whose bones were there collected, including those of women and children, to have been one thousand and nineteen. In the year 1562, the Calvinists took Lyons, demolished the altars, and mixed the bones of beasts with those of the martyrs. In the cathedral of Rheims is St. Peter's chapel, now under the invocation of St. Nicholas, to which the clergy, on the first day of Lent, used to go in procession, chanting the anthem of St. Peter. It was on that spot that St. Remi instructed Clovis for baptism.† Pope Urban IV. having been a native of Troyes, caused the house of his father to be dedicated to God, and on the spot built a beautiful church, which bore his name.‡ In this city, the procession on Sundays, before high mass, used to make a station at the chapel of St. Saviour in the church of St. Peter, because this chapel is on the spot where the first church was built in Troyes by St. Potentian, in the first century, who dedicated it to the Saviour.§

The site of many churches recalls events of the utmost interest, which would furnish episodes that could not be surpassed in beauty by any to be met with in the history of the world. This is the case with that of a church near Troyes, of

* Tschudi Einsiedlische Chronik.

† Anquetil, Hist. de Rheims, I. 42.

‡ Desguerois, Hist. du Diocese de Troyes, 362.

§ Id. p. 2.

which the origin is thus related. In the year 451, St. Loup being bishop of Troyes, Attila and his Huns came like a devastation over the plains of Champagne, and having destroyed the city of Rheims, passed on to Troyes. The holy bishop, warned by a vision, deputed his deacon Memier, and seven of the most holy children of the choir, to go out to meet the barbarian, clad in albs, to signify their innocence, and bearing the cross and the holy gospels. When intelligence came that Attila was arrived within six leagues of Troyes, St. Loup, evincing the obedience of the patriarch Abraham, presenting his children in sacrifice, sent his chosen band of innocent and holy youths to receive the crown of martyrdom. So these innocents departed from the city, and arrived in presence of the general of Attila, who was seated on a fiery horse, surrounded with sanguinary soldiers, who all hastened to meet this troop of lambs. The innocent children, according to the directions of their bishop, bowed down in reverence before the barbarians, who seemed seized with admiration; but suddenly a gust of wind raised the dust in clouds, and the albs and sacred vestments of St. Memier and his companions were agitated, so that the horse of the general taking fright, reared up, and became ungovernable, and threw his rider, who was killed on the spot. The soldiers, seeing what had happened, cried out that this was a troop of magicians, provided with charms, whose acts of apparent homage were mortal enchantments; and with these words they fell upon them with swords, and massacred them. Then they tore off the gold and precious stones from the binding of the books of the gospel, and seized the cross and the other sacred ornaments which the little saints had carried with them. After this event, the advanced guard moved on to the city, and the holy bishop, clad in his pontifical vestments, with a great company of his clergy and people, came out to meet it. "Who art thou that comest to subject all things to thy empire?" said the holy bishop to the tyrant; who replied, "I am Attila, king of the Huns, the scourge of God:" to which words the bishop made answer, "What man is there then that can resist the scourge of God? Pass on then, O scourge of my God, and accomplish what shall be permitted to thee." At these words the barbarian was mollified, or rather struck with fear by the hand of God, so that the whole army passed through the midst of Troyes without doing any injury. Attila is said to have shown great reverence to the holy bishop, and to have begged him to follow his army. St. Loup, in hopes of converting the cruel tyrant, complied with this invitation, and accompanied him as far as the Rhine, whence he returned safe to Troyes, where he died in 479, on the 29th day of July, which is observed as a great festival through the diocese. The deacon, St. Memier, and the holy children, were massacred on the spot, which was called Brolium, and which now bears the name of St. Memier. It is on the banks of the Seine, about four leagues from Troyes, where a priory and a church were built, and where the relics of the martyrs were preserved in a golden shrine.*

* Desguerrois, Hist, du Diocese de Troyes. 86.

In the ninth century, St. Lindger built, in Friesland, a church on the spot where the great St. Boniface and his companions had been martyred by the barbarians ; and these verses, composed by Alcuin, were inscribed upon it :

Hic Pater egregius meritis Bonifacius almis
Cum sociis pariter fundebat sanguinis undam,
Inclita martyrii sumentes stemmata sacri.
Terra beata nimis, sanctorum sanguine dives,
Transvolat hinc victor miles ad præmia cæli,
Ultima cæspitibus istis vestigia linquens.
Suadeo quapropter curvato poplite supplex,
Tu quicumque legis, terris his oscula fige,*

After the Saxons had laid waste the country about Darentre, and had destroyed the church in which was the sepulchre of the holy priest Liufwin, St. Lindger repaired thither and sought for the body of the saint, but without success. Nevertheless, that the place might not remain desolate, he began to build the church upon the space within which he thought it must be contained. After the foundation had been laid, instructed by a vision, he found the body under the wall which he had built next the south ; therefore he extended its base, so as to comprise the sepulchre within the church, which was preserved afterwards from all the fury of the Gentiles.†

On the spot where St. Adalbert, the apostle of Prussia had been martyred in the tenth century, which was in a wood near the sea shore, a chapel under his invocation was erected and founded for four priests and two scholars, where the office of Our Lady was to be daily sung, and mass said every morning, at four o'clock. To this wild but holy place devout pilgrims repaired from distant lands, attracted by the renown of his sanctity and by the indulgences attached to it by Pope Eugene IV. Of St. Adalbert's chapel, there remain at present but a few mouldering walls which the instructed traveller beholds with sorrowful reverence. Abandoned, in consequence of the change of religion, it had been overthrown in the year 1069 by a furious storm.‡ This had been erected by the knights of the Teutonic order, who made it a custom to commemorate great events in the history of the country by building similar chapels. Thus we find another to the memory of the knights that were slain on the field of Tannenberg. The origin of the foundation of the church of St. George at Rouen, was represented in stained glass upon the windows. It was founded by an English gentleman, at the time when his countrymen had possession of Rouen. This nobleman, being very ill, sent to ask for the blessed sacrament. The priest coming to the hotel, stumbled in the street, and the blessed host fell to the ground. Having heard of what had occurred, this nobleman, a true Christian and good Catholic, being filled with sorrow,

* Vita ejus, Mabillon, Acta S. Ord. Bened. Sæc. IV. p. 1.

† Vita ejus, Mabillon, Acta S. Ord. Bened. Sæc. IV. p. 1.

‡ Voigt. Geschichte Preussens I. 4. and Biel. III.

vowed to God that he would build a church on the spot, under the invocation of St. George the martyr, which he did on his recovery, and he placed canons in that church, which he richly endowed.* When St. Ouen, bishop of Rouen, died at Clichy in the year 683, his body was to be conveyed to his episcopal city. For this purpose, the king Thierry, the queen, the mayor of the palace, and all the court, accompanied it as far as Pontoise, where it was delivered to the clergy of the province of Rouen, accompanied by the nobility. On the spot on the river's side where his body was laid down during this exchange, a chapel was erected in his honor, and finally the church of St. Ouen, which is now the parish of the village.† St. Ouen having died in the royal house at Clichy, his memory was in such benediction that though his body was immediately removed to Rouen, the palace was ever after called St. Ouen, or the cell of St. Ouen, and this was the origin of the parish church of St. Ouen-sur-Seine. A multitude of chapels and oratories were similarly erected, in commemoration of events in the history of holy men; and if any one should object and be troubled on account of the fact, that in many places he sees memorials of the same personages, he might be referred to the observations of Dionysius, in answer to those who advanced a like objection with respect to the many sepulchres of Æneas that existed; for, he says, they should consider that this difficulty attaches itself to many, and especially to those men who were rendered illustrious by fortune, but yet who led a wandering and uncertain life; for though only one place received their bodies, their monuments were erected in many places through gratitude for the benefits which they had conferred upon certain men: as when some city had been founded by them; or, as when some of their race still survived; or, if they had inhabited that foreign place for a certain time, and had conversed humanely with the natives. And all such things are related of Æneas in ancient legends. For in one place it was commemorated that he had saved Troy from perishing utterly; and in Phrygia he left a son, king Ascanius; and at Pallenene he founded a city bearing his name; and in Arcadia he left his married daughter; and in Sicily he left a part of his army, and since he lived benevolently with men in many other places, he conciliated their favors, and on that account when he had ceased to live with mortals, a sepulchre and monument is raised to him in various places.‡

St. Thomas of Canterbury, during his exile residing for some time at Rheims, the little oratory which he used in the abbey of St. Nicaise became afterwards a celebrated chapel, bearing his name.§ At Segovia again is still to be seen a little oratory by the river side, which was built expressly to preserve the memory of the holy father St. Dominick having preached in that spot. St. Germain, Bishop of Auxerre, after one of his journeys into England, is known to have passed through Orleans on his return to his diocese, by observing the oratories erected

* Taillepiéd, Recueil des Antiquitez et Singularitez de Rouen, 257.

† Lebeuf, Hist. du Diocese de Paris, Tom. IV. 177.

‡ Antiquit. Rom. Liv. I. cap. 54.

§ Hist. de Rheims, Liv. II. 309.

on his way ; for such was the veneration of the people for his sanctity, that whenever he stopped to deliver an instruction the people used to erect a cross in memory of the fact, and after his death oratories were erected over these crosses. Such were those at Châtres, at Estampes, at Sarlas, and at other places.* On the north side of the city of Troyes there was a well, called the well of St. Julia, where tradition taught that this holy virgin had been martyred in the time of Aurelian. The well was arched over in form of a chapel, and an image of the saint was at the front, and a chapel was built at the side.

The mind, which rendered men so attached to these recollections, is expressed by the good Jaulnay, canon of St. Rieule, at Senlis, where he says in his history of that city, "As Dean and Canon of the church, I am now inhabiting the spot where the saint resided ; and what is a greater consolation, I drink of the water of which he used to drink, for the fountain is in my court. May I obtain from God the same sanctity !" Any indication of a spot having been once hallowed, was enough to endear it to the imagination of saintly men, as appears from the following circumstances, related in a very ancient chronicle. During the reign of the emperor Otho, at the time when the illustrious Gauzelin occupied the episcopal see of Toul, his brother Hardrad was devoted to arms, a brave knight, and greatly beloved on account of his goodness. They were of a noble race of Franes. It happened once that the soldier was out hunting, on the banks of the river Murt, when his dogs followed a ferocious boar, which endeavored to escape from their devouring jaws, running for a long time through various alleys, till at length it took to the mountain above the town of Buxer, and having penetrated for some distance, it placed itself under a thorny tree till the pack of hounds came up with open mouths ; the beast stood intrepid under the tree, and the dogs for a long time remained stupid, and not daring to advance near the thicket, till at length the said knight, following on horseback, came to the spot and wondered at such an unprecedented circumstance. Leaping from his horse, he entered the thicket, and there he beheld an altar half demolished amidst other ruins : venerating the spot as holy and suffering the beast to depart in safety, he returned home and related what he had seen to his brother the Pontiff, who, sending messengers to the place, and interrogating some of the oldest men in the neighborhood, found that formerly there had been a church there, under the invocation of the blessed Mary, and that through age and neglect it had fallen to decay : they said, moreover, that lights were often observed over the spot during the night. The Bishop meditated upon constructing a church there, which was accordingly done, and on the stump of that withered tree an altar was raised ; and after some time a convent was added for nuns of the order of St. Benedict, and the first abbess was Rothil-

the Catholic religion enjoyed a divine privilege, by means of which all things were made to serve it as its own; and accordingly the site of the ancient heathen temples, and even, as in the case of the Pantheon at Rome, the very temples themselves of the heathens, were consecrated to the worship of the true God. The temple of Vesta, where the fire called sacred was preserved, is now the church of St. Theodore. The hall of the baths of Diocletian is the church of St. Mary of the angels. In the Flavian amphitheatre, where so many holy Christians were worried to death, you follow the via crucis to the fourteen altars which faith has erected there. The Temple of Bacchus was converted in the middle ages into the church which is now that of St. Urban. How soon the Christians converted works of pagan genius to the purposes of true religion, not disdaining even to use their sepulchres, may be seen at Pisa also, and in other cities. At Marseilles the church of des Accoules is built on the ruins of a temple of Apollo. At Ancona the Norman cathedral of St. Cyriaque upon the rock, occupies the site of the ancient temple of Venus. The Carmelites of the Street of St. James at Paris, occupied the site of the Temple of Mercury; the abbey of St. Germain des Près that of the Temple of Isis. The wild or lovely spots of nature, too, which cruel and blind superstition had profaned, were now seized upon and sanctified by religion. The Isle of Sayne of the druidesses is become the Island of Saints, on the coast of Bretagne, at the extremity of the diocese of Quimper; the convent of the Holy Passionists now stands upon that alban mount where was once the temple of Jupiter Latiaris, to which the victorious legions used to be led in triumph; and that famous monastery of great St. Benedict, on the summit of Mount Cassino, was built on the ruins of a temple of Apollo. No foul delusion or dire heresy of disobedient mortals, could infect material walls, if men brought within them hearts pure and humble.

* Lebeuf, Hist. du Diocese de Paris, Tom. X. p. 237.

† Acta Tullensium Episcoporum apud Marten Thesaur. Anecdol. Tom. III.

The mosque in the Alhambra was consecrated to the Catholic faith when it passed under the dominion of the Castilian sovereigns. The cathedral of the Arian bishops at Ravenna, built by king Theodoric, their baptistery, and the mausoleum of their misbelieving king, became, in the sixth century, by the consecrating hands of Archbishop Agnello, churches of the faithful fold, under the invocation of the mother of God. Here we may remark how the spirit of the Catholic religion was favorable to the opinion of those philosophers who attack some degree of spiritual importance to locality; and how it cherished and refined that taste in the arts, which dictates the necessity for combining natural with artificial beauty. How grandly stands the Gothic cathedral of Auxerre, crowning the hill under which that noble river winds its majestic way! And in the heart of cities, what stillness and repose and variety of beauteous form around those vast minsters, which seem to impart somewhat of their aspect to the dwellings accommodated to ordinary wants adjoining them. These churches had not theatres, at their side, as we now mark at Como; nor prisons, as at Pavia; nor arsenals, as at Paris; nor barracks, as at Milan. Our ancestors would have been shocked at such monstrous approximations of things most opposite ; but silence and sanctity announced the vicinity of the house of prayer. King Robert of France, used to build many churches in the midst of great forests.* See that little chapel on the steep mountain of the holy Saviour at Lugano, which seems to have been let down from heaven, to which it belongs more than to earth. Devout people contrived to fix it there to commemorate their love for the mother of God. See again that ancient chapel, on the brow of the wild and dangerous coast, where scarcely a blade of grass is found to grow. Beaten with the winds, the rain, and the waves, it stands solitary between the sea, the earth, and heaven. Its origin is unknown. Monument of the piety of ages of faith, it attests some secret of providence, or some mystery of grace. Even amidst the waves of their blue lakes, upon the stones which rose out of the water, like miniature rocks of the ocean, men built little oratories resembling chapels, where the boatman in his course, or the youth who sported in his little bark might love to stop and offer up a secret prayer to sanctify his labor or his play. Many such are seen on the lake of Lucerne. That beautiful marble cathedral in miniature on the banks of the Tagus near Lisbon, which is so chaste, so completely in harmony with the loveliness of nature, that without any great effort of fancy one might suppose it to have been deposited there by the hands of angels, was erected by the husband of queen Mary, as a grateful memorial of his escape from an attempt at assassination.†

At the same time the position of churches was in some instances determined originally without any regard to ancient associations, or afterwards changed by circumstances of mere spiritual utility. Thus the church of St. Mary of Peace at Rome, was erected by Pope Pius Sixtus IV. in gratitude for the peace which was obtained between Christian princes, with regard to its locality. The splendid churches of the Redeemer and of St. Roch at Venice, were similarly erected to commemorate the cessation of the plague, as was also the noble Gothic church of Or-san-Michele at Florence, of which Giotto was one of the architects, on the cessation of the pestilence described by Boccacio ; and with the same intention was that of St. Maria delle Grazie on the lake near Mantua, built by Francis Gonzaga and the Mantuans in the year 1399. In the time of the episcopacy of Herbert Poore, the cathedral of Salisbury was removed from the heights of Old Sarum to a different site, for the motives thus expressed in the Pope's bull : " That forasmuch as your church is built within the compass of the fortifications of Sarum, it is subject to so many inconveniences and oppressions, that you cannot reside in the same without great corporal peril ; for being situated on a lofty place, it is, as it were, continually shaken by the collision of the winds, so that whilst you are celebrating the divine offices you cannot hear one another the place itself is so noisy ; and the roof of the church is constantly torn by tempestuous winds. Being within the fortifications, there is no access to it without the license of the Cas-

* Lebeuf, Hist. du Diocèse de Paris. VII. 211.

† Letters to Osorius on Portugal.

tellan, so that it happens on solemn days, the faithful being willing to visit it, entrance is denied them by the keepers of the castle, saying that thereby the fortress is endangered." Pope Honorius, therefore, authorized the clergy to remove the cathedral to a more convenient place, where it now stands. At Ravenna, on the contrary, in the ninth century, it was found necessary by Archbishop John IX. to transfer to a church within the fortifications of the city the relics of St. Apollinaire, under whose invocation it was afterwards placed, as the basilica which had before contained them, being without the walls, was exposed to the attacks of the Sarassins.

Proceeding to speak of the building of the churches, it will be well to allude to the ceremonies observed at the first commencement as also at the final accomplishment of the work, for these will give us an idea of the importance ascribed to it. Here again we behold the operation of faith; for the church provided a solemn prayer to be offered up before the commencement of building, to beseech God in behalf of the architect, that his mind might be purified by the infusion of heavenly grace, that he might commence it by the divine inspiration, perfect it by divine assistance, and receive the reward of his labor in the land of the living.* San Micheli the celebrated architect of Verona, never undertook any work without having mass solemnly sung to invoke the divine assistance. In the year 1700, when the monks of Jumièges were about to enlarge their convent, by building a new dormitory, the first stone was blessed by the prior, and laid by the poorest man in the parish, who was newly clad for the occasion; and the general alms for the week were increased by one half, in order to draw down the blessing of Heaven upon the work of the laborers.† When the first stones of the new church of Crowland were laid, in the time of Abbot Joffridus, the Abbot gave a grand dinner to the assembled nobles and people, all in common, men and women, rich and poor. The refectory held four hundred, and counts and barons dined in the abbot's hall, and others dined in the cloisters, and others in the open air in the court, and there were more than five thousand men and women who dined there that day; and the Lord gave his benediction, and all were glad and rejoiced in the Lord; and the day was fine, and the whole passed in the utmost peace and good humor, and not a dispute or murmur was heard; and the monks served with their own hands.‡

A minute description remains of the building of Salisbury cathedral on the present site. "The primate, the young king Henry III., and all the other chief persons of the realm were invited to attend when the foundation should be laid. Mass was performed by the bishop in a temporary wooden chapel, after which he went to the ground barefoot, in procession with the clergy, singing the Litany. Thereafter, consecrating the ground, he addressed the people, and then laid the first stone in the name of the Pope, the second in that of the Archbishop of Canterbury, the third for himself; the fourth was laid by William Longspear, Earl of

* Ordo Roman. de officiis divinis.

† Deshayes, Hist. de l'Abbaye de Jumièges, 156.

‡ Petri Blesensis continuat. ad Hist. Ingulphi in Rerum Anglic. Scriptor. Tom. I. 120

Sarum; the fifth by Ela de Vitri his wife. Then the nobles who were present, laid each a stone, and after them the dean, the chapter, the chancellor, the treasurer, and the archdeacon and canons of the church of Sarum, in their turn, the people weeping for joy and contributing thereto their alms with a ready mind, according to the ability which God had given them. Several nobles, on their return from Wales (where the king was then concluding a treaty with Llewellyn ap Iorweth), repaired to Sarum to partake in the merit of the work which was going on, and laying each a stone, bound themselves in some special contribution for seven years. In the course of five the building was so far advanced that all the canons were cited to be present at the first celebration of mass. On the eve preceding, the bishop consecrated an altar in the east to the Trinity and All Saints, and made offerings for the priests who should for ever officiate there, and for the lamps which should be kept ever burning. He consecrated an altar in the north part of the church to St. Peter, and one in the south to St. Stephen and all martyrs. On the morrow, being Michaelmas Day, Archbishop Langton preached in the new church to a great assemblage of persons and sung the first mass, Otto the Nuncio being present, as also the Archbishop of Dublin, and the bishops of Durham, Bath, Chichester, Rochester, and Evreux in Normandy. In the course of the week, the young king arrived with the Justiciary, Hubert de Burgh; and Henry, after hearing mass, offered ten marks of silver and a piece of silk, and Hubert made a vow that he would give a gold text for the service of the altar, with certain precious stones, and more precious relics of diverse saints, in honor of the blessed Virgin. The young king then offered a ruby ring, that both the gold of the ring and the stone might be employed to adorn the covers of the text; at the same time he gave a gold cup weighing ten marks. The said text was presented first by proxy for Hubert, and afterwards offered by himself in person on the altar with great devotion."

In the cathedral of Florence, there is an inscription which commemorates the dedication of that church in 1436, by Pope Eugene IV., and it adds that such was the multitude of people assembled, that the Pope could not well have passed from his lodging at Santa Maria Novella, if there had not been a beautiful wooden bridge erected along the entire way. So again, when Pope Pascal II., being in France, came to La Charité on the Loire, for the purpose of consecrating a church there, the festival was most splendid. Besides the court of the Pope, a number of the bishops and nobles of France, assisted with an immense multitude of people, who came there from all parts. On the dedication of the abbey church of Ely, when rebuilt by the abbot Brithnod, after it had been destroyed by the Danes, there was a solemn feast for seven days, celebrated with great joy; "and from that time forward," says the chronicle, "the immaculate sacrifice was daily offered to the Lord in the odor of sweetness."* When the magnificent church of St. Denis had been rebuilt by Suger, the ceremony of the consecration was of the most solemn and pompous description. The historian of Suger gives a minute account of the whole. The king and a multitude of bishops were present. Thibaud, Archbishop of Canterbury, consecrated the high altar; and at the same moment the other twenty altars of the church were severally consecrated by bishops of France; and such was the beautiful order observed in the august ceremony, that there was not the least confusion amidst such an extraordinary multiplication of offices, so that nothing could be more edifying or majestic.* Even amidst these magnificent ceremonies, the holy men of ancient times found opportunity to practise their favorite virtue. Such was the humility of St. Swithin, bishop of Winchester, who always paid diligent attention to restoring the decayed churches of the diocese, that whenever he had to consecrate a new church, however distant the place might be, he would never go on horseback or in a carriage, but always on foot; and that this might not be a subject of ridicule to ignorant people, or of boasting to the proud, he used to avoid the observation of men, and would make the journey at night, going the whole way a nocturnal traveller,—Solitariae sanctitatis amator. At his death he ordered that his body should be buried without the church, where the people might tread upon his grave, and where the rain and the water-spouts might fall upon it.†

* Hist. Eliensis, Gale, Hist. Brit. Liv. II. cap. 1. Tom. III.

The office of the dedication is of the most solemn description, and the longest that occurs in the whole order. At each place the anniversary of the dedication of which the interior walls bore a perpetual memorial, was observed as a festival for ever, and that of the dedication of St. John Lateran, the metropolitan of the whole world, was a festival of the universal church. Each church, besides its primal dedication to God, in honor of the holy cross, was placed under the especial invocation of some particular saint whose name it afterwards bore. The minor churches were generally in this manner commemorative of some local interest of piety, bearing the names of saints whose memory was in benediction within that particular diocese; but all the churches of the Cistercian order were consecrated under the invocation of the blessed Virgin.§ That these magnificent ceremonies were conducted with the most profound sense of the spiritual nature of religion, might be learned from every allusion which occurs to them in old writings. “We read of the ancient saints,” says a preacher in the thirteenth century, “that they adorned the front of the temple with golden crowns, and dedicated an altar to the Lord, and that there was great joy among the people. If they were zealous and devout in the material temple, should not we be much more devout in respect to the dedication of the immaterial temple in which God dwells with all his saints? Seek ye the spiritual sense in the letter, the hidden honey in the wax, and let your souls delight in the living God, and in every word which proceedeth out of the mouth of God ; for then by the ladder of holy words your souls will ascend to the height of heaven, being filled with the thoughts of spirit and of God alone. Brethren there is the great festival of the dedication of a church where is the purity of an innocent life, the liberty of a good conscience, and the sweetness of spiritual joy : there is the true beauty of the temple, and the adornment of the church with branches and odoriferous flowers where is true contrition of heart, humble confession of mouth, and worthy satisfaction for sins committed : there is the joyful dedication of a new altar, where is new fervor of devotion with thanksgiving from the heart's core. He it is that truly adorns the front of the temple with golden crowns, who reads, writes, and preaches the illustrious acts of the saints : he it is that suspends golden shields in the church, who describes to others the bright deeds of the fathers of the Old and New Testament, the contests of the martyrs, the labors of the confessors, the trophies of virgins and widows. He paints beautiful images who edifies his neighbor by his life and manners. Lo ! there are as many golden shields in the church as there are names of saints, as many festivals as there are good examples. O what a festival is the dedication of the church triumphant, where all enemies being subdued, the saints and the angels together rejoice, clothed in white robes and crowned with golden crowns that will never perish !”*

* Hist. de Suger, Liv. VI.

† Wilhel. Malmesbur. de Gestis Pontif. Anglorum, Liv. II. Harpsefield, Hist. Eccles. Sæcul. Nono.

§ Card. Bona de Divina Psal. 256.

Let us now attend to some of the most peculiar characteristics in the structure of the churches. It was not on account of temples of the ancients having been so built, that those who prayed within them had their faces to the east, that a similar custom became prevalent with the Christians. Cardinal Bona supposes that the first reason was, that as exiles and pilgrims we might turn towards the land whence we were ejected, to the terrestrial paradise which God planted in Eden in the east. St. Basil says, that few are aware of this reason, though the Church has it in view to direct us to our ancient country.† The most ancient Basilicas were built always in the direction of the equinoctial east, for the sun was then supposed to rise over the seat of Paradise ; another reason was suggested by the fact, that it was in the east that the spiritual sun of justice, Christ our God appeared upon the earth. St. Justin Martyr assigns another cause, that it is the duty of men to devote whatever is best to God, and that part of the world was considered the most excellent and noble ;‡ to which opinion Dante alludes where, speaking of the east, he says, “that region where the world is liveliest.”§ It was another reason that Christ was the true light and the true east, and therefore St. Chrysostom says, “turning from the west, we look towards the east, expecting the omnipotent God :”|| and St. Athanasius also shows that we look towards the east, not supposing that God is circumscribed by any limits, but because God is the true light, and therefore turn-

* Thomas de Kempis. Sermonom. Pars III. 10.

† De Spirit. Sanc. c. 27.

‡ Justin. qu. 118.

§ Parad. V.

|| 101 Hom. in Zach. cap. 6.

ing to the created light, we adore the Creator of that light; and St. Clemens Alexandrinus speaks to the same effect.”*

Elpidius who lived for twenty-five years in a cave on the top of a mountain, had such a regard for this symbolical practice, that he was said to have always looked towards the east: and John Moschus, in his Spiritual Meadow, relates of a young man who was falsely accused by soldiers, that he entreated them to suspend him with his face towards the east, that he might die regarding it: but the chief reason for this observance is mentioned by Damascenus and Cassiodorus, that our Lord upon the cross had his face directed to the west, and therefore we pray turned to the east, that we may behold the face of Christ. Hence, perhaps, in many languages of Europe, we say to find the east, when we express our wish to determine our relative situation to the heavens. The Church of God adhered to this custom with more strictness, as it was usual with all who separated from her communion to disregard it. The early heretics sometimes chose to turn to the west, or to the south, or to the north. The Sarassins turned to the south, the Manichæans to the north, but the Jews prayed towards the west.† At the present day, it may be observed at Rome, that the old churches are turned to the east, such as those of St. Paul, that of the three fountains, St. Lorenzo, the Holy Cross, St. Agnes, and others, but that some others have the altar at the west end, as at St. Peter's, St. John Lateran, St. Mary Major, St. Mary Trastevere, St. Cecilia, and St. Sebastian. Perhaps this may arise from the ritual in the Basilicas, in which the priest turns to the people, so that here he would regard the east. Walafrid Strabo, in the ninth century observes, that some churches and altars were turned from the east, although in general it was the rule to build them in such a direction, that men might pray looking to the east. The church of St. Benedict in Paris, having its high altar to the west in the thirteenth century bore the name of St. Benedictus male versus, but being rebuilt in the reign of Francis I. with its altar to the east, it was afterwards called St. Benoit le bétourné benè versus.‡ The conclusion of Walafrid Strabo, the Abbot of Fulda, shows the judgment of the middle ages on this question. “Unusquisque in sensu suo abundet. Propè est Dominus omnibus invocantibus eum in veritate, et longè a peccatoribus salus: quia neque ab oriente, nec ab occidente patet locus fugiendi, quoniam Deus iudex est, hunc humiliat, et hunc exaltat.”§

When religion made to pass under the yoke of the cross the charms and the genius of Greece, her architecture, like the wisdom of the ancients, was symbolical, and fraught with typic and mysterious lore. These buildings are living, the city of God is intelligence itself. Nothing is matter in the abodes of spirit. Nothing is dead in the places of eternal existence. “The Church in which the people assemble to praise God signifies,” says Walafrid Strabo, “the holy Catholic Church,

* Strom. Liv. VII.

† Bona de Divina Psalmodia, 165.

‡ De St. Victor, Tableau de Paris, Tom. III. ii. 359.

§ De Rebus Ecclesiasticis, cap. 4.

which is constructed in heaven of living stones. This house of the Lord is firmly built, the corner stone of its foundation being Christ, upon which, and not beside it, is the foundation of the Apostles and prophets; while the upper stones are Jews and Gentiles from the four parts of the world coming unto Christ. All the stones are polished and square, that is, holy, pure, and firm, disposed by the hand of the great Architect so as to remain for ever. Of these some are borne and do not bear, answering to the simpler members of the Church; others are borne and do bear, answering to those of the middle class; others only bear and are not borne, excepting by the foundation, which is Christ; for in this edifice by how much any one excels more eminently, by so much the more does he humbly sustain others; but one charity cements all together in one body. The cock on the summit denotes the vigilance, and eloquence, and prudence of the preacher, who excites himself with his own wings before he calls others. It turns against the wind to show that he argues against the evil customs of the world, and applies himself to resist the wolves. It is seated on an iron rod, which denotes the straight-forward and just doctrine of the preacher; and this rod is placed upon a cross, surmounting a globe, to represent the triumph of the faith over the world. The Church is adorned splendidly within and not without, to imply that all its glory is internal." "Licet enim sit exterius despicibilis, in anima tamen, quæ sedes Dei est, radiat." Thus speaks Hughes of St. Victor, in his Mirror of the Church.* A modern German writer, in treating of the Christian churches of Germany, and the public edifices of the middle ages, explains the necessity for considering them in this mysterious symbolical point of view. Each of these Gothic cathedrals, saith he, was only a symbol of that magnificent invisible Church which, pervading the whole state, had spread its roots to the lowest depths of life, and raised its branches, its flowers, and foliage to the sublimest height: he shows in theology, philosophy, science, policy, and in the ecclesiastical constitution of the middle age, the principle of that social order and harmony which distinguish this remarkable epoch, and which are symbolically represented in these temples; for society was then constructed on the plan of the cross; Rome was placed as an altar, at the point of intersection,—mystical altar, containing as in a tabernacle the source by which faith is communicated. Around it was gathered the devout multitude, united in one faith and one hope. The light of the divine sun, too brilliant for the eyes of mortals, descended softened and colored by the fathers and doctors of the Old and New Testament. At the extremity were placed the emperors and kings who guard the church and defend the door, as we see at Exeter, and at the church of St. Zeno, at Verona, at the entrance of which stand Roland and Oliver with drawn swords. Durandal is one of them, guardling the gate over which are the three queens who contributed to found the church, Bertrade the mother of Charlemagne, his wife.

* Hugo de Sanct. Victor, Speculum de Mysteriis Eccles. cap. 1.

and his daughter Ermengarde, wife of Didier. The towers were placed at the west, for the royal power in relation to the Superior Power is as something that passes away and dies. Horned demons attached themselves to the walls of the edifice, and grinned horribly blaspheming against God, and this too even in the interior. All the arts and sciences paid homage there to the divinity, and all learning bowed down to him. Aristotle was placed near St. Peter, and Virgil near Isaiah. It is impossible to separate these monuments from the faith of the middle ages, because they are intimately united as soul and body.* According to the mystical interpretation, the corbels carved grotesque and grim, are no longer a difficulty. Besides, it should be remembered that these men's mirth was innocent, and their sportive fancy all life and cheerfulness. They had a playful imagination which did not seem to them in the least inconsistent with gravity and holiness, their gravity being sincere not affected; and their holiness the result of faith, not of a wavering shadowy opinion. They feared nothing, and therefore not the conceptions of their mirthful mood; they evidently sought contrasts. Witness the books of hours of Rome, Paris, and Rouen, which were printed in the fifteenth century, in which facetious miniatures were placed in the borders of large funeral engravings of the vespers of the dead. In the same book, as on the same walls, we find paintings or images of the passion which can draw tears, so full are they of angelic tenderness and awful sanctity, by the side of these grotesque figures and monsters to conceive which Leonardi de Vinci had recourse to that extraordinary expedient of filling his chamber with scorpions and toads, and even the genius of Michael Angelo disdained not sometimes to employ itself.

Possibly, indeed, these carved corbels may have been designed to convey a secret, profound instruction, and to awaken minds that would have been to any other prospect of the trials of the human course terror-proof; for their ghastly grin is caused by the absurdity implied in every defeat in the spiritual combat, and thus shame and guilt are shown inseparable. True the temptations that assail spirits of human kind in their course from youth to age, the wiles of the demon to delude them, the snares laid to make them captive as the prelude to the horrid agony of hell, are the last subjects, if we regard their origin and their consequences, that could be associated with any but solemn or melancholy thoughts; and yet on the other hand, if we attend to the detail and form of their development, which these figures are designed to indicate, and for a moment forget the woe in store, the very gravest philosopher, Heraclitus, himself, will be compelled to relax into a smile, albeit provoking bitter moans. Here, for instance, is a man born in heresy, moved to renounce it, and yet who declares that he is afraid to unloose the clasps of a book of Catholic devotion, adding, that he feels assured it would lead to his entering upon the surer way: here is another, who has been received into the fold of safety, and who shortly after being seized with melancholy, accuses the gentle guide, who had admitted him within the promised land, saying, that he has caused him to embrace a life which will deprive him of pleasure. Thus men seem like children, frightened with grotesque masks, or left blindfolded, in order that their successive falls may furnish matter for the laughter of those who look on. Some of these corbels were probably intended to show the contrast between the moral and even physical deformity belonging to the spirit of the world and to heresy, and the angelic grace of faithful souls: they bear that expression of vulgar mockery and suppressed buffoonery marked upon the countenance of Arius, in the painting of the Council of Nice at the Vatican, a look which is always characteristic of those opposed dogmatically to the Catholic religion.

* Grund und Aufrisz der Christlich-Germanischen Kirchen und Staats-Gebäuder im Mittelalter, by Adolph Marcus. Bonn. 1828.

The illustrious Hammer attempted to find corroboration for his accusation of the Templars, in these figures of animals, some of them imaginative and grotesque, carved upon their churches which he conceived symbolical of the Gnostic heresy, though he might have remarked that they occur also on other churches, which never belonged to that order, as on that of St. Michael, at Pavia, which was built in the sixth century, on the marble pulpit in the cathedral of Ravenna, which is a work of the same age, on the Baptistery of Parma, which was built in the thirteenth, and on the columns of St. Germain-des-Près at Paris, of which the capitals are but another development of the same imagination which is admired by artists, in those of the Basilica of St. Lorenzo at Rome. It is not surprising that such ideal forms and combinations should have given rise to sundry interpretations by German writers, when we remember that even the devout images and devices which Flamel carved on the churches, and hospitals, and charnel houses at Paris, to which he was a benefactor, seemed to the French antiquarians of the last century so many symbols of alchemy, though to ordinary eyes nothing could be more simple or devout.* The custom of representing upon churches the various tribes of animals which the earth, and water, and air produce, may have originated in that verse which calls upon them to praise the Lord: though some of the Italians go too far in affirming with Ciampine,† that the Christians merely borrowed this usage from the Greeks, without any reference to an allegorical meaning. St. Michael's church, at Pavia, and the Baptistery at Parma, will never admit of such a conclusion. I would rather say, that many of these devices, carved in that old and simple age, humble, but profound, intended to represent the lofty mysteries of our divine faith, might remind one of the reply which is given in an ancient book to a philosopher, who inquired the meaning of a symbol which he saw represented in a temple: "The explanation will be attended with danger to yourself, since if you understand what is delivered here, you will become wise and happy; but if you do not, you will afterwards have an evil, a foolish, and a wretched end: for this is like the enigma of the Sphinx, which kills those who do not understand it. So likewise this symbol, if you do not profit by it, will kill you, not at once indeed, as if you were devoured by the Sphinx, but gradually it will consume and destroy you like those delivered to a slow punishment, and it will rise up in judgment hereafter to condemn you; but if any one should understand it, then, on the contrary, madness and ignorance will perish, but the man will escape safe, and lead ever afterwards a happy and a blessed life.”* The exterior walls, too, as at Melrose, presented in characters legible at once to all, the scrolls that teach thee to live and die. Over a door of the Baptistry at St. John Lateran, there is written, “Diligite alterutrum.” The word “Humilitas,” the motto of the Borromean family meets your eye in vast letters on every part of the cathedral of Milan. Over the ancient gate of the church of St. George, in that city, was an invitation to the faithful in Leonine verses.

*Hist. Crit. de Flamel, 26, 200, 392.

† Vet. Monum. T. I. cap. iv. p. 35.

*Janua sum vitæ, precor omnes, introvenite;
Per me transibunt, qui cœli gaudia quærunt,
Virgine qui natus, nullo de patre creatus,
Intrantes salvet, redeuntes ipsa gubernet.*

In a lower arch is an inscription in Græco-barbaric letters which Duc Holstenius and Leon Allatius interpret to be Vitæ da Porta Deus quærentibus istam.

In the porch of a little lonely chapel on the way side, between the Basilicas of St. Paul and St. Sebastian, without the walls of Rome, I read this epigram, which contains a summary of Catholic manners.

*Fide Deo. dic sæpe preces. peccare caveto.
Sis humilis, pacem dilige. magna fuge.
Multa audi. dic pauca. tace secreta, minori
Parcite, majori cedite. ferto parem.
Propria fac. non differ opus. sis æquus egeno.
Pacta tuere. pati disce. memento mori.*

On entering the cathedral of Sienna, one's eyes are arrested with these words in vast letters of black marble on the pavement. “Castissimum virginis templum caste memento ingredi,” and on the exterior steps, one sees the figures of the publican and the Pharisee going to the temple.

With respect to the external character of churches, it may be sufficient to make brief mention of that which served to distinguish them at a distance, alluding to the toll of those vast bells, sometimes of forty thousand pounds' weight, whose sound used occasionally to split the thickest walls and to overthrow huge towers, of the invention of which Nola and Campania may be justly proud. The bell, which may be said to be the expression as well as the invention of the middle ages, in the same manner as the drum of the Turks from whom it was adopted, may be considered the symbol of a noisy, unreflecting and unspiritual society, is the subject of an immortal chant by one of the greatest poets of later ages, but in point of sublime and impressive imagery, that admirable song does not surpass the language of the Church respecting it, as, when in the office of its consecration, the bishop prays that as the voice of Christ appeased the troubled sea, God would be pleased to indue that sound with such virtue, that it may intimidate the enemy and encourage the faithful people; and that as the Holy Ghost formerly descended upon David when he struck the chords of the harp, and the thunder of the air repelled adversaries when Samuel offered up the lamb, in like manner, at the sound of that vase, passing through the clouds, flights of angels may surround the assembly of the Church, and save the minds and bodies of the believers with an everlasting protection. Well might one conclude that the arch-heretics had read this prayer with trembling, when with such a determined will they refused permission to the Catholics under their subjection to make use of bells. Indeed, for their zeal in removing them from the churches which they seized one may otherwise account. "When I was a child," says Sir Thomas Spelman, "I heard much talk of the pulling down of bells in every part of my country of Norfolk, then fresh in memory. And the sum of the speech usually was, that in sending them over sea, some were drowned in one haven, some in another, as at Lynn, Wells, or Yarmouth. The truth of it was lately discovered by God himself, for he sending such a dead neap as no man living ever saw the like, the sea fell so far back from the land at Hunstanton, that the people going much farther than ever before to gather oysters, they there found a bell with the mouth upwards, sunk into the ground to the very brim. They carried the news to Sir Hamon Lestrangle, lord of the town, and of wreck and sea rights there, who shortly after sought to have raised up and gained the bell, but the sea never since going so far back, they could never find the place again. The bells from Edinburgh being pulled down and shipped to be carried into the low countries were all drowned in Leigh haven. Sir Hugh Paulett pulled down the bells of the churches of Jersey, and sending them to St. Malo's in Britain, fourteen of them were drowned at the entrance of that harbor. Whereupon it is a by-word at this day in those parts, when any strong east wind bloweth there, to say, 'The bells of Jersey now ring.' "*.

* Cebetis Tabula.

With the solemn magnificence of the Gothic cathedral, most of the northern nations are familiar, but religion knew how to adapt her architecture to the locality and the climate. There is sanctity, and faith, and the deep thoughts of a revering spirit, in the mysterious piles of York and Canterbury, but there is something of the beauty of paradise at those eastern steps of St. John Lateran, when the morning sun gilds the blue distant hills of Tusculum. To form an adequate idea of that perfect loveliness which is derived from the union of noble edifices with the delightful aspect of nature, one must see the dome and the church of the Vatican, rising in the midst of gardens with mountains beyond, from the groves of the villa Doria Pamphili, or from the bowers of St. Onufrio's holy cloister, or one should see St. John Lateran and the Basilica of the holy cross from the vineyards which are among the baths of Titus, or of Caracalla, or the tower and domes of St. Mary Major, from the gardens near the gate of St. John. But we should never finish if we pursued this path. Let us at length approach and enter the churches; for here is matter that will banish the recollections of all trivial things.

* The History of Sacrilege. p 284.

"Hail! sacred tabernacles, where thou, O Lord, dost descend at the voice of a mortal! Hail, mysterious altar, where faith comes to receive its immortal food. When the last hour of the day has groaned in thy solemn towers, when its last beam fades and dies away in the dome, when the widow holding her child by the hand has wept on the pavement, and retraced her steps like a silent ghost, when the sigh of the distant organ seems lulled to rest with the day to awaken again with the morning, when the nave is deserted, and the Levite attentive to the lamps of the holy place with a slow step hardly crosses it again—then is the hour when I come to glide under thy obscure vault, and to seek, while nature sleeps, him who aye watches! Ye columns, who veil the sacred asylums where my eyes dare not penetrate, at the feet of thy immovable trunks I come to sigh. Cast over me your deep shades, render the darkness more obscure, and the silence more profound! Forests of porphyry and marble, the air which the soul breathes under thy arches is full of mystery and of peace! Let love and anxious cares seek shade, and solitude under the green shelter of groves, to sooth their secret wounds! O darkness of the sanctuary, the eye of religion prefers thee to the wood which the breeze disturbs. Nothing changes thy foliage, thy still shade is the image of motionless eternity! Eternal pillars, where are the hands that formed thee? Quarries, answer, where are they? Dust, the sport of winds, our hands which carved the stone, turn to dust before it, and man is not jealous! He dies, but his holy thought animates the cold stone, and rises to heaven with thee. Forums, palaces, crumble to ashes, time casts them away with scorn; the foot of the traveller who tramples upon them lays bare their ruins; but as soon as the block of stone leaves the side of the quarry, and is carved for thy temple, O Lord, it is thine: thy shadow imprints upon our works the sublime seal of thine own immortality! Lord, I used to love to pour out my soul upon the summit of mountains, in the night of deserts, beneath rocks where roared the voice of mighty seas, in presence of heaven, and of the globes of flame whose pale fires sprinkle the fields of air: methought that my soul oppressed before immensity, enlarged itself within me, and on the winds and floods, or on the scattered fire, from thought to thought, would spring to lose itself in thee! I sought to mount but thou vouchsafest to descend! Thou art near to hear us. Now I love the obscurity of thy temple; it is an island of peace in the ocean of the world, a beacon of immortality! Inhabited alone by thee and by death, one hears from afar the flood of time which roars upon this border of eternity ! it seems as if our voice, which only is lost in the air, concentrated in these walls by this narrow space, resounds better to our soul, and that the holy echo of thy sonorous vault, bears along with it the sigh which seeks thee in its ascent to heaven, more fervent before it can evaporate !

“How can it signify in what words the soul exhales itself before its author ? Is there a tongue equal to the ecstasy of the heart ? Whatever my lips may articulate, this pressed blood which circulates, this bosom which breathes in thee, this heart which beats and expands, these bathed eyes, this silence, all speak, all pray in me. So swell the waves at the rising of the king of day, so revolve the stars, mute with reverence and love, and thou comprehendest their silent hymn. Ah, Lord, in like manner comprehend me : hear what I pronounce not ; silence is the highest voice of a heart that is overpowered with thy glory.” It is Lamartine who thus speaks, but every one who enters here perceives within his mind the gift of genius high, though it may not be given him to develope it in words. Some men affect to doubt the importance of the grandeur of churches ; but why then, as Fleury asks, can they not pray in a tavern resounding with tumult, in a guard-house or in a busy street ? Why avoid such places, unless they find it necessary to assist the weakness of their senses ? It is not God who has need of temples and oratories, but it is we who need them.* This was well understood in the ages of faith. Of the treaty concluded between the Prussians and the Teutonic order, in presence of the Pope’s legate, one of the articles stipulated that the churches should be built in so beautiful and stately a manner that the devotion of the people might be more assisted in the churches than in the woods where they had been accustomed to offer up their impure worship.† The soul being acted upon by the passions of the body, and as Vincent of Beauvais says, being led out of itself by sensible forms, forgets what it was, and remembers nothing of itself but what it sees. Learning, the study of wisdom or philosophy, repairs this, and reminds us of our nature ;‡ but by availing herself of the forms of material order, religion in many instances removed the necessity for their assistance, or rather converted the very senses themselves into teachers of wisdom and made them the handmaids of philosophy ; and thus the space within the walls of a Catholic church became completely another world, for those who have need of higher and nobler emotions than are inspired by the dull phantoms of a sensual life, and the very pleasures which elsewhere endangered and misled men, were here employed in guiding them to truth. “There is no soul so harsh as not to feel itself moved with some reverence on considering this solemn vastness of our churches, the diversity of ornaments, and the order of our ceremonies, and hearing the devout sound of our organs, and the religious harmony of our voices. Even those who enter them with disdain feel a certain shuddering in their heart,

* Mœurs des Chrestiens, 241.

† Voigt. Geschichte Preussens, II. 630.

‡ Speculum Doctrinale, Lib. I. c. 23.

and a kind of awe which makes them distrust their own opinion." This is what Montaigne says. But let us proceed and examine the various parts of the interior. Dante borrows a noble simile from the amaze of one who enters :

And as a pilgrim when he rests
Within the temple of his vow looks round
In breathless awe, and hopes some time to tell
Of all its goodly state; e'en so mine eyes
Cours'd up and down.*

But who can describe these wondrous sanctuaries which have survived the desolation of wars, the fall of empires, the rage of heresies, the confusion of earthquakes and plagues, which like St. Theodore's at Ravenna, have been served at different periods by the two great monastic families of the east and west,—these piles, on which art and wisdom seem to have lavished all their stores, the form of beauty, the secret mystery, the only remaining memorial of strange histories of ancient times, the emblematical lesson of the wise and holy ! Here is one still retaining somewhat of its grandeur, although since its erection, dynasties have passed away, seas have receded, atmospheres changed. It still retains its pillars of ancient oriental marble and porphyry, its altars covered with lapis lazuli and alabaster. Solitary in the midst of a vast plain, the Basilica of San Apollinare in Classe stands the sole vestige of a once flourishing city, now deserted, and visited only by some devout friar, who leaves Ravenna under a scorching sun to say mass at the tomb of its martyr and apostle. An inscription over the entrance relates its history.

Erected in the year 534, it beheld the overthrow of the city which gave it birth ; laid waste by the Sarassins, profaned by the barbarians, and pillaged by invading enemies, it was finally abandoned in consequence of the pestilential air to which the plain became subject. Here is another, the Basilica of St. Vitale, which, in the time of the Goths, was considered the masterpiece of art ; on which are Mosaics representing the offerings of Justinian and the Empress Theodora. On the walls of another, the Basilica of St. John the Evangelist, you see carved the events of past imperial story. On those of St. Apollinare within the city, you have a representation in Mosaic of Ravenna, as it existed in the sixth century when that church was built ; and there is shown also the city of Classe which then existed, of which now not a trace remains. These churches, with their historic imagery, their emblematical lore, their long series of saintly figures, bring the mind back to the first ages of Christianity, and to the earliest traditions of the human race. No one but some learned priest can explain who were many of these meek men of God, and these humble bearers of the martyr's palm. Who, for instance, are these twenty-two holy virgins with crowns in their hands, and these white robed fathers in long procession which are represented in Mosaic, on each side of the nave of St. Apollinare at Ravenna? No one but some eastern scholar can explain the secret allegory. What mean these figures with such art and care inlaid? Crosses upon sleeping wolves, crosses enclosing doves, crosses surrounded with mystic characters, clusters of vines and corn, palms on which doves are seated, anchors from which fish hang suspended, anchors within the spiral folds of dolphins, men who angle by a brook, and others who carry a lamb, stags that run to the mountain stream, and lambs which bear upon their heads the sign which gave empire to Constantine, serpents twined round a tau, and a hand within a wreath letting loose the thunder? All these are seen along the nave of St. Apollinare in Classe. What mean these fruit trees on which youths are mounted, at the roots of which horrible dragons are vomiting flames, while under them dogs are contending for the fruit which falls to the ground? What mean these representations of the sun and moon in chariots with accompanying circles, in which are awful phantoms sounding trumpets, all which we see carved over the portals of the Baptistery at Parma? What are these allusions in arabesques, these profound moralities of the middle age, which are upon the church of St. Zeno at Verona, or these supposed prophetic emblems which are upon the pavement of St. Mark? No one again but some learned and profound philosopher can trace the vast plan to embody and portray here the proofs of the universality of the Christian religion; for these it is evident the very pavement of the Gothic cathedral of Sienna shows. There one sees, beautifully portrayed in black and white marble, by means of an art which is now forgotten, the figures of Hermes Trismegistus, who received his learning from Zoroastres, and who lived in Egypt a contemporary of Moses, presenting to a Gentile and to a Christian a book, in which is written sentences from the Pemandro, as "That God who made all things, the Creator of the earth and of the stars, has greatly loved his Son, and called him the Holy Word." There too stands Socrates, with a book, receiving a palm from a woman sitting, who represents virtue, who with the other hand offers a book to Crates, who is represented emptying a cask of jewels, in order to receive it. This profound view is taken also in that ancient painting of St. Thomas, by Traini, pupil of Andrea Orcagna, which is in the Church of St. Catherine at Pisa, where the angel of the school is represented sitting, surrounded by his disciples, with Plato and Aristotle on each side, looking up to him, and presenting him with their works, while those of many other philosophers, with those of heretics, are seen torn in pieces.

* Paradise XXXI.

Hence, even without reference to the ordinary impressions of devotion, to enter some of these churches at Rome, or Florence, or Pisa, or Ravenna, is like hearing for the first time some grand poetry. One feels a sudden cold chill run through one's veins, the heart is pierced with dread, and if one did not practise some of those little familiar artifices, which the sublimity of the Catholic ritual obliges men to learn for themselves, one's tears would break forth in abundance. In the Basilica of San Vitale at Ravenna, are inscribed broken sentences, awful and pathetic, which come upon us as if it were the voice of the martyrs : such words as these occur, "Consider our victory ;" and again, "Filiæ Jerusalem, venite et videte martires cum coronis quibus Deus coronavit eos in die solemnitatis et lætitiæ ;" and again, "Doctrinæ sublimitatem attende."

Indeed, unless he be evidently one of the dry-eyed race, genus siccoꝑulum, as old Plautus calls it, it is no cause for wonder if a stranger should be seen even to weep on entering St. John Lateran, that mother church of Rome and of the world, or St. Peter's or the vast and solemn Basilica of the Santa Croce at Florence, where are the tombs of Michael Angelo, Alfieri, Leonard Bruni, Cavalcanti, Aretin, and the sublime monument erected, after three attempts frustrated, to Dante.

Independent of what meets the eye, who can remain unmoved when he is told as under the domes of Parma painted by Corregio, that these walls around him, were consecrated by Pope Paschal II., in presence of St. Bernard and of the Countess Matilda ? or as in the church of Einsiedeln, that they witnessed an angelic dedication, which dispensed with mortal lips, as was revealed to the holy Conrad, when he had repaired thither from Constance to dedicate them ; or as in the Cathedral of Florence, that they beheld the council, under Eugene IV., when the Greeks were reunited with the Latin church ? Who can behold unmoved in the Church of Dole that pulpit, from which preached St. Francis of Sales, that well-spring from which such copious floods of living truth have issued ? or in the Church of St. Theodore at Ravenna, that from which the first pastors who succeeded St. Apollinare preached to the people ? or at the entrance of the Church of St. Eustorgio at Milan, that from which St. Peter Martyr refuted the proud Manichæans ? Does he only desire to examine the wonders of art ? who can sufficiently admire the brazen gates of the Baptistery of Florence, or of the Cathedral of Pisa, or the sepulchral lore of the Campo Santo ? It would require many weeks to go round that Baptistery, the work of Diotisalvi in the twelfth century, and mark all its wondrously wrought stones, representing holy, wise emblems, and stories from sacred history. From the portals of that at Parma one may learn the genealogies of Christ and of his blessed mother, which are there carved with analogous inscriptions in semi-gothic characters. Nor can I omit again to mention thee thou beauteous Temple of Sienna, which the humble men of former days, in times too of their calamity, erected to the glory of the Eternal, and through the love of Mary. With a mystic joy and wondrous eagerness did I go about thy sacred walls, and trace out the emblematic lore engraven upon them. With what glad surprise did I recognize beneath my feet the verses of the great Mantuan, who from the archives of the Palatine mount, which Augustus permitted him to examine, published the prophecy of the Cumanean Sybil, that already the last ages of her song was come, that a great order of ages was again born, that a virgin hath returned, and Saturnian kingdoms, and a new offspring had descended from the high heavens ; fruitful lines, which were a light to Stacius when first he opened his eyes to God. There too, as in the chapel of Loretto, and as in the Basilica of St. Anthony at Padua, were represented the whole mysterious sisterhood, whose prophecies to the Gentiles respecting an universal king, made Rome tremble, though both Varro and Fenestella affirm that they had been gathered by the Romans from all parts of the world where they could be heard of, and laid up in the capitol, where no one might see them but only the fifteen magistrates to whose care they were confided. There I marked the Erythrean Sybil, whom Varro and Apollodorus mention, whose acrostics Cicero translated, as Constantine bore witness, and who is saying "De excelso cœlorum habitaculo prospexit Dominus humiles suos. Et nascetur in diebus novissimis de virgine Hebræa in enabulis terræ." There also was Sibylla Cumæa, whom Piso names in his Annals. Her prophecy is this: "Et mortis fatum finiet, trium dierum somno suscepto. Tunc a mortuis regressus in lucem veniet primum resurrectionis initium ostendens." There was Sibylla Delphica, of whom Chrysippus speaks, and she says, "Ipsum tuum cognosce Deum qui Dei filius est." Sibylla Lybica was there, whom Euripides mentions, and she says, "Immanus iniquas veniet, dabunt Deo alapas manibus incestis, miserabilis et ignominiosus miserabilibus spem præbebit." There too was Sibylla Hellespontica, born in the Trojan field, of whom Heraclides says that she lived in the time of Cyrus: she predicts the inhospitable cruelty and the darkness of three hours; and at her side I beheld Sibylla Phrygia, saying, "Tuba de cœlo vocem luctuosam emittet, tartareum chaos ostendet dehiscens terra, venient ad tribunal Dei reges omnes; Deus ipse judicans pios simul et impios. Tunc demum impios in ignem et tenebras mittet, qui autem pietatem tenent iterum vivent." The next was Sibylla Samia, of whom Eratosthenes speaks; and she says, "Tu enim stulta Judæa Deum tuum non cognovisti lucentem mortalium mentibus, sed et spinis coronasti horridumque fel miscuisti." Lastly there was Sibylla Albunea Tiburtina, so called by those who worshipped her as God upon the Tibur; and she says, "Nascitur Christus in Bethlehem. Annunciabitur in Nazareth regnante Tauro Pacifico fundatore quietis. O felix mater ejus ubera illum lactabunt."

But here a question occurs which the learned only are competent to answer. Mabillon asks, what is to be thought respecting the Sibylline oracles? * are these the sentences of the Hebrew Sibyls, whose existence is unquestionable? or are they to be treated as wholly spurious, according to the opinion of Blondell† and Vossius,‡ who waste a vast deal of learning on the supposed foundation of some Catholic doctrine, notwithstanding the contrary opinion of the learned theologians of Paris,§ of Persons and others who were quite as well versed as they could be in classical researches? That some of the Sibylline books have perished, the learned are generally agreed, but whether all perished with them is quite a different question. "Unless we despise all antiquity," says Maio, "we cannot laugh at the authority of the Sibylline poems."|| The writings of the Fathers everywhere

* De Studiis Monast. P. II 272.

† De Sibyllis.

‡ De Sibyllinis Orac.

§ Who published Castigationes ad Opuscul. Vossii de Sibyll. Orac.

|| Sibyllæ, Lib. XXIV. Præf. 6.

prove that the Christians used often to refer to themselves the celebrated verses of the Sibyls. St. Augustin had read them in Greek and Latin.* Procopius says, that they were appealed to in Rome in the sixth century; and in the seventh Isidore witnesses that they were everywhere spread.† In the tenth century Liutprandus Ticinensis affirms that they then existed with the Greeks and Saracens, conformable to the testimony of St. Justin Martyr that they were dispersed throughout the whole world.‡ Their greatest destruction occurred under Honorius, when Stilicus burnt them, as is lamented by Rutilius in his Itinerary.§ But to resume our study of the pavement: here too were memorials of tragical events of olden time, such as a representation of the famous battle of Monte Aperto, in the year 1260, mentioned by Dante, in the tenth canto of the Inferno, as the slaughter and great havoc and on the high altar stands the very crucifix which the Siennese carried into the field, on that disastrous day, which gave occasion for the world to understand what dark and barbarous thoughts the savage minds of Ghibellines could conceive, when by consent of all, Florence had to the ground been razed. Other memorials were wrought here, which time had rendered doubtful. How was I pressed with keen desire to read and explain the faint inscription, and discover what the four philosophers were predicating who are represented in the centre, standing by an emblematic wheel, on which were many men attempting to mount; but it was in vain I gazed upon it, and there was no one to instruct me. Here too were lessons of evangelic wisdom in symbolic figures: in one place is represented the parable of him who saw the mote within his neighbor's eye, and knew not the beam within his own; in another, is a man who gives alms to a woman with a child enfolded in her arms; on the left is another, with two blind men and a little boy, with a label, on which is writtin "notate," to teach men to beware of taking themselves for guides.

That color'd Arbia's flood with crimson stain;

Here too was ritual-historic lore, for those who love that mystic knowledge, for on the western steps are the figures of two vessels, containing milk and honey, which in the primitive church used to be given to the newly baptized, to indicate the entrance into the true land of promise, which is the Church. In almost every ancient church the pavement itself furnished thus matter for a study. That of St. Paul's Basilica at Rome was full of remarkable inscriptions; that of the Cathedral of Durham has its tender traditions, which are transmitted from age to age by three monks of the holy Benedictine order; that of the Church of St. Anthony at Padua contains letters and mysterious signs, which defy the skill of antiquarians, such as the great I, which some supposed did indicate the spot where the tongue of the saint was found; that of the Cathedral of Canterbury shows the spot which

* De Civit. Dei, XVIII. 23.
§ Lib. II. 51.

† Etym. VIII. 8.

‡ Cohort. ad Grace. CXXXVIII.

receives in our days the devout kiss of the faithful stranger, though his faith has to sustain the astonished gaze of more than pagan irreverence ; that of the monastic Church of St. Richarius, in the ninth century, was composed of the most beautiful marble in different compartments, and the following verses were read upon it before the altar of St. Richarius :

Hoc pavementum humilis abbas componere feci

Angilbertus ego, ductus amore Dei.

Ut mihi post obitum sanctam donare quietem

Dignetur Christus, vita, salusque mea.*

There was nothing in Catholic churches to conceal this beauty and learning of the pavement, unless, indeed, as around the holy house of our blessed Lady, where the marble is worn into furrows by the knees of the pilgrims, for there were no closed immovable seats occupying the nave, where all ranks were equal, and where the duke and the beggar might be seen side by side, praying to that all-good and almighty Being, who knows no exception of persons. The moderns wish to be isolated even in their churches ; but Catholicism, even though St. James had not been so explicit, would have abhorred the feeling from principle. Her piety was not torpor nor pampering of the flesh ; and it required that the body should be free to exercise its external homage, and to assist the devotion of the heart, by bending the knee, kissing the ground, as at the chanting of the Passion, and remaining in a posture of gravity and reverence during the tremendous mysteries ; therefore there was nothing to disfigure or degrade her temples. Underneath the shrine of St. Cuthbert, in the church at Durham, there were, indeed, four seats or places, convenient for pilgrims or lame men, sitting on their knees, to lean and rest on in the time of their devout offerings and fervent prayers to God ;† and Lebeuf observes that straw used to be spread in winter ; but these were no obstruction or deformity. Not but that the ingenious tenderness of religion had made provision for the retiring piety of the penitent, and for the hours of despondency which all must experience. In the old churches there were always some dark recesses and corners, shaded by those granite pillars so emblematic of stability, which were well known and dear to those who, in moments of dereliction, sought retirement in their devotions, even in the church. John Le Blond, enumerating the various parts of the interior of a church, speaks of “Les lieux contemplatifs.”‡ After a long absence, the joy of returning to one's house was not equal to that sentiment, combining a crowd of holy thoughts and beautiful meditations, with which one entered the church of his youth, and knelt down behind the particular pillar or sepulchre where he had, in days of yore, offered up the prayers and holy rapture of his youthful heart, and sought privacy in the temple. Besides these, to which

* Chron. Centulensis sive Richarii, Liv. II. c. 7.

† The Ancient Rites and Monuments of Durham, p. 6.

‡ Gouget, Bibliotheq. Française, Tom. XI. 108.

any one might have access, there were crypts, subterraneous caves, or little cells inhabited by recluses, women, and sometimes even hermits of great sanctity, which had grated apertures or windows looking into the church.* This was the case at the abbey of St. Geneviève, and at other churches of Paris, as those of St. Severen, St. Paul, St. Merri, the Holy Innocents, and at the abbey of St. Victor. When one of these pious women died, there was also another anxious to succeed her. The ancient necrology of St. Geneviève states, on the fourteenth of October “obiit piæ memoriæ Hildeardis reclusa hujus ecclesiæ.† The blessed Etheldrita, the daughter of Offa, King of the Mercians, was a recluse in the monastery of Crowland; and St. Finden was a hermit out of Ireland, who lived a recluse in a cell towards the north part of the church of the monastery Rhinaugiensis, in Suabia.‡ So also at Durham, at the east end of the north alley of the choir, betwixt two pillars, opposite one to the other, was the goodly fair porch which was called the Anchoridge, having in it a marvellous fair rood, with an altar, for a monk to say daily mass, being in ancient times inhabited by an anchorite.

Sometimes, too, in the vast towers of churches, there were little cells which some holy man would inhabit, for the sake of solitude and contemplation, with the whole city under his feet. Thus we find, from St. Gregory of Tours, that Cautinus, Bishop of Arverna, while in the rank of deacon, attached to the church of the village Iciodorens, used to sleep every night in a little cell which was within the upper part of the wall of the church; for it is said, that one night he heard many voices, as if of persons who chanted psalms below, and rising from his bed, he opened the window which looked into the church, and there he beheld the vision of white-robed angels.”§ History relates the names of many of the holy men and women recluses, who resided in these cells of churches and monasteries. Such were Dungall from Ireland, at the abbey of St. Denis; St. Wiborade at St. Gall, in the eleventh century; and the mother of the abbot Guibert, and the venerable matron Hildeburg, and many others.|| In the subterraneous church of St. Irenæus at Lyons, where the bones of the martyrs had been placed, I saw the grave-stone of Marguerite de Barge, who died in the year 1692, having spent the last nine years of her life, which extended to forty-five, in that church, having never left it day or night; and so she was buried there, hoping to rejoin the martyrs in heaven. In the old monastery of Jumièges, St. Filibert, the founder, had his room placed by the side of the church, with a window pierced, through which he could see the altar without leaving his room. This custom became so general, that it gave rise to one of the many features which rendered the small but solemn churches of the religious houses very impressive. These walls of the sanctuary, pierced with windows, through the grates of which the holy members of that devout family

* Durandi Rationalis, I.1.

† Lebeuf, Hist. du Diocese de Paris, Tom. II.

‡ Mabillon, Acta S. Ordinis Benedict. Sæcul. IV. Pars I.

§ De Gloria Confessorum, 30.

|| Mabillon, Præfat. in VI. Sæcul. Benedict. 12.

would assist at the divine office, raised before the imagination, the images of saintly men or women, who passed their lives under that roof in peace and holiness. Like the pictures of saints, they refreshed the eyes of those that were weary with the vanities of a wretched world. That union of domestic privacy with the solemn order of public worship, was a delightful and soothing combination. At noons or complin you thought of those early beams of the succeeding day which would gild the opposite walls, that were now in darkness. How many a saint will then regard these images and paintings on which I now gaze! Every spot within this sanctuary is familiar to the eye of persons that are dear to God. How solemn I have felt it in the vast church of the Annunciata at Genoa, when, in the obscurity of evening, a solitary Franciscan is seen to move along through the upper passages which encircle the roof of the sanctuary, and to retire under a vista of arches into the interior of the monastery, to which that church is attached! Raising our eyes from the pavement, no one need be reminded, that the point in which was concentrated all the riches and splendor of the sanctuary, being in fact the object for which the whole was originally conceived and undertaken, was the altar, which was nothing, as Optatus says, but the seat of the body and blood of Christ.*

The Christian writers of the primitive ages, describing the heathen persecutions under Diocletian, says, "We beheld our temples destroyed, our altars overthrown."† Fleury, indeed, shows how impossible it was for the pagans, with their notions, to recognize the existence of an altar with the Christians, or to trace any resemblance between the Christian Basilicas and their own temples.‡ But we see at Rome, at the present day, in the cabinets of the Vatican, with what beauty and magnificence the sacred tabernacle which contains the adorable victim for the Christian altar, was constructed even during the times of persecution. At the end of the fourth century, the altars were always of stone. "This holy altar at which we stand," says St. Gregory Nyssen,§ "is a common stone by nature, differing in no respect from any other slab of stone with which our walls and pavements are adorned; but since it is dedicated and consecrated to the worship of God, and hath received a benediction, it is a holy table, an immaculate altar, which no longer is to be touched by all, but by the priests alone, and those venerating."

To the law of Nature may be traced the consecration of altars, as when Jacob anointed the stone.|| Julian was offended at the magnificence of the chalices of the Christian altars, and used to say, "En ejusmodi vasis Filio Mariæ ministratur."¶ But the holy Fathers had remarked, without his assistance, that although "that table was not then of silver, nor that cup of gold, from which Christ gave

* Lib. VI. Cont. Parmenian.

† Euseb. Cæsar. Hist. Eccles. Lib. VIII. I.

‡ Mœurs des Chrétiens, 235.

§ Orat. de S. Christi Baptismate. 801.

|| Gen. xxviii.

¶ Theodoret, Hist. Eccles. Lib. III. c. 8.

his own blood to his disciples, yet all these things were precious and tremendous, since they were full of spirit.”* It was truly meet and worthy that all the grace of art and all the splendor of wealth should be consecrated to the adornment of that spot which was to receive the desired of all nations, from which the house was to be filled with glory, and God to give his peace. Accordingly, the altars of churches were, in the ages of faith, a mine of incalculable riches.

It is a fact well ascertained by mineralogists, that the most precious gems known to be in existence, are still belonging to the sanctuaries of churches. The high altar of the Carthusian monastery near Pavia, is enriched with an immense number of precious stones, lapis lazuli, agates, cornelians, and others. The church of St. Mark at Venice received the spoils of Constantinople. The riches in the church of Loretto exceeded all calculation. Topazes, emeralds, sapphires, rubies, diamonds, agates, and lapis lazuli, lost their value there, being accumulated in such abundance; for Catholic princes and private persons from all quarters sent their richest jewels there, as tokens of devotion to the mother of God. Immense too were the treasures at the three principal shrines in England, of St. Alban, St. Edmund, and St. Thomas, as were also those at Walsingham, Ipswich, Worcester, and Winchester. St. Gregory of Tours relates, that Childebert, king of Paris, having invaded Spain, carried back with him twenty gospel cases, which, though richly ornamented with pure gold and precious stones, were more valuable still on account of their workmanship than on account of the materials.

The piety of the faithful of successive generations was constantly employed in enriching altars with costly presents. Nicholas Flamel, the scrivener of Paris, left by his testament nineteen chalices of silver, gilt, to as many churches. The duke of Orleans, brother of Charles VI. dying in 1407, besides leaving twenty thousand livres to the poor and to monasteries, bequeathed a silver chalice to every church in the cities of Paris and Orleans. Historians, observing that it would be impossible to calculate the prodigious quantity of gold and silver which existed in the middle ages, remark that the opulence of the churches and the incredible abundance of alms and offerings, prove it to have been immense. Thus we read of Durham, “that many were the goodly rich jewels and reliquaries appertaining to the church, some of which would have ransomed a prince.” King Richard gave his parliament robe of blue velvet, wrought with great lions of pure gold, a marvellous rich cope. There was another by another prince, such love had the godly minds of kings and queens, and other great estates, to God and holy St. Cuthbert, in that church.” In the year 1443, Robert Norwych, Squire, gave to the cathedral of Norwich his silver collar, which had been presented to him by the emperor; and in 1499, Lady Margaret Shelton offered a gold chain, adorned with jewels to the same. St. Wilfred, bishop of York, in the ninth century, shortly before his death, invited certain abbots, for the purpose of showing to them the precious stones and gold and silver which were in the treasury of his church.* William of Malmesbury says that in his time they showed, in the church of Sherburn, several precious gems which Sighelm, the bishop of that see, had brought from India, having been sent there to carry the alms of King Alfred, and to visit the shrine of St. Thomas.† At Winchester was preserved the crown of Canute the Dane, which he had placed on the crucifix over the high altar, after the memorable rebuke which he made to his courtiers at the sea-shore near Southampton. In the cathedral of Genoa I saw the emerald hexagonal dish found at Cæsarea, when that town was captured by Guglielmo Embriaco, in 1101, and chosen by the Genoese in preference to all other spoils. It is supposed to have belonged to the temple of Solomon. It is known all over Christendom by the name of the Sacro Catino; and if the tradition concerning it be credited, it is only for another Sir Perceval to look upon it.

* Hom. LX. ad Popul. Antioch.

The religious care with which the sacred ornaments and relics of churches were preserved, will account for their prodigious antiquity. On the entrance of the Moors into Spain, which was signalized by the pillaging of cities and churches, those who could not withstand their impetuosity, but retired into the recesses of mountains, carried with them the relics and sacred ornaments, which were more esteemed by them than their own treasures, which they abandoned to the rapacity of the conquerors. In the revolutionary wars of France, the sacred treasury of the monastery of St. Maurice, in the Valais, was taken up to the high Alps, and concealed there by the shepherds. This had been enriched by Charlemagne and St. Louis; but the offerings of the people were often employed in the adornment of the sanctuary, and these were immense. When Pope Leo IX. consecrated the new church at Rheims, the offerings of the people, who flocked from all parts, are described as incalculable. During the mass, the crowd pressed round the tomb of St. Remi, to present their offerings. Those who despaired of reaching it, threw their offerings from afar.‡

The liberality of the Saxons to the church of New Corby was so great, that St. Adalhard, the abbot, was obliged to moderate it. When he found the church sufficiently adorned, he placed limits to the reception of offerings. "It is not for us to be enriched by that which renders others poor, nor to be glad at what causes them sorrow. Let us be content with a sufficiency."§ At that time no offerings were received from any that were not at peace with the church. St. Liudger rejected a vessel of honey, which had been presented at Billurbek by a certain woman who had contracted an unlawful marriage.|| At Durham, "there did lie on the high altar an excellent fine book, very richly covered with gold and silver, con-

* Mabillon, Acta S. Ord. Bened. Sæc. IV. p. 1. † De Gestis Pontif. Anglorum, Lib. II.

‡ Anquetil, Hist. de Rheims, Lib. II. 231.

§ Vita ejus, Mabillon Acta S. Ord. Bened. Sæcul. IV. p. I.

|| Vita S. Liudgeri, Episcop. Acta S. Ord. Ben. IV. 1.

taining the names of all the benefactors to St. Cuthbert's church, from the first original foundation thereof, the very letters being all gilt. The laying that book on the high altar did show how high they esteemed their founders and benefactors, and the daily remembrance they had of them in the time of mass and divine service." From the year 666, it was ordained by the Council of Merida, that all priests should mention the names of the founders and benefactors of their churches on Sundays. Anastasius, the librarian, in his Lives of the Roman Pontiffs, describes the magnificent presents which are offered in the church of St. Peter from the King of France, the Emperor of the East, and the King of Italy. Pope Victor II. gives a similar account at a later period. St. Jerome, through his affection for the poverty of the desert, which, as he said, loves the naked, condemns the use of gold in churches, though he praised those who adorned them.* But the Lord of armies had himself declared, that gold was his, and that silver was his.† It was not a love of profane pomp which made the bishops so earnest to procure means for raising and adorning the churches. Their motive was well expressed by a council in the year 1368 : "Since the present visible church militant is justly compared to the celestial and triumphant city of Jerusalem, and since it is the place where the most sacred body of our Lord Jesus Christ is made and preserved, and where the instruments of our reconciliation with the Lord, namely, the ecclesiastical sacraments are administered for the offences and sins of the people, it ought to be strengthened and completed with firm foundations, that it may be grateful to God and venerable to those who enter and behold it"‡

So we read of Olbertus abbot of Gemblou, in the tenth century, after a beautiful description of his piety and charity to the poor, "nor is it to be passed over in silence how zealous he was in adorning the Church ; for although it is said in sancto quid facit aurum ? yet he had not in external things whence he might show the desire of his soul towards God, excepting inasmuch as they tended to the worship of God ; and these things, no doubt, avail somewhat, because they show forth more the advantage of the Church, and because men of brutish minds, who esteem all things more according to their own mind than to their truth, think that nothing is worthy of reverence unless what they see adorned with the things which they temporally love."§

Fleury shows the magnificence of the Christian churches, how they were adorned with columns of solid silver, and with images of solid gold, and had their walls wholly incrustated with marble and mosaic, and covered with pictures, representing the histories of the Old and New Testaments, while in each church the history of the martyr, whose relics were there preserved, occupied the chief place. But before we go into any detail on this subject, it will be necessary to pause awhile to notice one of the most remarkable circumstances connected with the magnificence,

* Epist. XXXIV.

† Agg. c. II. 7.

‡ Concil Lavaurensis, Can. 91.

§ Libellus de Gestis Abbatum Gemblacensium, 528, apud Dacher. Spicileg. Tom. VI.

and, indeed, with the very origin of many churches. I allude to the veneration entertained for the bodies or other relics of the saints, and to the circumstance of their being preserved in every place where the divine mysteries were celebrated. Cardan says that it is a general rule of great importance, not merely for physicians like himself, but for all persons, that whenever we approach to accost any one, or to discuss any subject, we should sit down, for many precipitate things by standing.* The Protestants thus lost themselves on the subject of Catholic relics, as on other matters, by noticing them standing. If they had sat down to inquire dispassionately and with deliberation, they would not have been impelled afterwards to sally forth like wild barbarians, destroying the beautiful and glorious monuments of ancient piety, with which faith had filled our churches, committing to the flames, as they did in England, the venerable bones of St. Alban, St. Edmund, and St. Thomas, or, as in France, those of St. Irenæus at Lyons, of St. Hilary at Poitiers, and of St. Martin, at Tours. They would have found that in fact nothing is more ancient in the history of the Christian religion than the custom of collecting the limbs or blood or vestments of the holy martyrs, and of preserving them with religious reverence, enshrined as they found them in the Catholic churches.†

This is part of the primitive discipline of the church, which dates from the apostolic age, as appears from the acts of St. Ignatius, and the encyclical letter of the church of Smyrna respecting the relics of St. Polycarp. The care of the pagans to prevent the Christians from gaining possession of the bodies of the martyrs is well known, as also the zeal with which the faithful cherished their relics. The work of Boldetti, on the ancient cemeteries of the martyrs, furnishes interesting details. In the history of Ammianus Marcellinus, the basilicas of the Christians are called sepulchres,‡ and the council at Rome, under Pope St. Sylvester, in enumerating the list of orders which had nine degrees, names, instead of chanter, custodes martyrum.§ In fact, till the third century at least, no church was ever built excepting over the tombs of saints. Seven women were put to death for having collected the drops of blood of St. Blaise, during his torments; and the blood of St. Cyprien was received on cloths spread by the Christians for that purpose. In a work of Julian, which has come down to us, the homage rendered to the tombs of St. Peter and St. Paul is attested. Rufinus describes the solemn translation of a martyr's body with hymns and psalms, while Julian beheld the spectacle with indignation.|| The holy bishops of the two first ages used to carry the relics of the martyrs inclosed in cases of gold. St. Cyril of Jerusalem speaks of the reverence with which Christians regarded the relics of saints' bodies.¶ St. Augustin describes the multitudes who came to venerate the relics of St. Stephen, the first martyr, which were discovered by Lucianus in the reign of the emperor Honorius, and

* Prudentia civilis, cap. XCII.

† Baron. Ann. 261.

‡ Lib. XXII. cap. 11

§ Chardon, Hist. des Sacraments, Tom. V. 1.

|| Hist. Eccles. Lib. I. c. 35

¶ Catechet. VIII.

the miracles which were wrought by their means.* The bodies of Saints Perpetua and Felicitas were in the great church of Carthage in the fifth age, as St Victor informs us. St. Augustin says that their festival drew yearly more to honor their memory in their church than curiosity had drawn to their martyrdom. St. Ambrose gives a description of his finding the relics of Saints Gervaise and Protasius in the Ambrosian basilica, and of the devotion of the people, and of the miracles which attested the holiness of that pious solemnity.† “Are the lighted wax tapers burning before the tombs of the martyrs signs of idolatry?” asks St. Jerome.‡ “Is it idolatry,” he asks again, “to kiss the vase which contains their ashes?”§ Suppose some one does light a taper in honor of the martyr? He has a reward according to his faith, for the Apostle says, “Unusquisque in suo sensu abundet.” St Basil even says, “Whoever touches the bone of a martyr, on account of the eminent grace of the body, will become a partaker of the sanctification;” and St. Chrysostom says, speaking of St. Ignatius, “not the bodies alone, but the very tombs of the saints are filled with spiritual grace.” “Does Vigilantius grieve,” asks St. Jerome, “because we wrap the sacred relics of martyrs in precious cloth, and because we do not cast them on a dunghill? Are we sacrilegious when we enter the basilicas of the apostles? Was Constantine sacrilegious when he translated the holy relics of Andrew, Luke, and Timothy to Constantinople? Is the present emperor Arcadius to be called sacrilegious for translating the bones of the blessed Samuel from Judæa into Thrace? Are all the bishops sacrilegious and fools for carrying ashes in silk and vessels of gold? Are all the faithful people fools for running to the holy relics and receiving them with such joy, as if they beheld the living prophet?”|| That the bodies of saints are precious, may be inferred also from visions, such as that of the holy Pontiff St. Paschalis I., related by himself, relative to the body of St. Cecilia. There are many instances in a very early age, of the elevation and translation of the bodies of saints, both in the East and in the West. Not to speak of the relics of the first martyrs in the Apostolic age, and of those translated by Constantine and Arcadius, as St. Jerome testifies, we find it recorded that Pulcheria translated the relics of the forty martyrs, and that after the consulship of Basil, the body of St. Anthony the hermit was carried, with great honor, to Alexandria, and placed in the basilica of St. John the Baptist.

St. Ambrose moved the relics of St. Gervaise and St. Protasius to another place. Pepetius Turonicus translated those of St. Martin; Gregorius Lingonicus, those of St. Benign; Palladius Sautonicus, those of St. Eutropius; Germain, Bishop of Paris, those of St. Ursinus; but after the pontificate of St. Gregory the Great, these translations became less frequent, insomuch, that the bodies of St. Germain, St. Remy, St. Gregory the Great, and St. Alban the Martyr, were not translated from the place of their first burial till the eighth century. In fact, the danger of abuses,

* De Civitate Dei, XXII. c. 8.

† Epist. LXXXV.

‡ Epist. XXXVII.

§ Epist. XXXVIII.

|| Epist. XXXVIII.

alluded to by St. Augustin, had induced the clergy to abrogate the ancient custom. In the seventh century, however, it began again to prevail, but, as Mabillon shows, it was deemed religion not to dismember their bodies. The exhumation of any bodies for convenience, which is now practised, or their mutilation through sacrilegious levity, which has been lately witnessed within the ancient cathedral of Durham, on occasion of the supposed discovery of St. Cuthbert's grave, could at no epoch have occurred during ages of faith; but the dismemberment and translation of bodies were frequently practised, though from a motive of the utmost reverence, and with ceremonies of the most solemn description, of which it will be well to give an instance, for the devotion of Catholics in times past will furnish a more worthy spectacle than the curiosity of the moderns, whom I gladly leave, while employed, as in the church of Durham, in picking up the holy vestments and vessels, fingering and analyzing the decayed members, and speculating on the supposed errors of monks in days of yore. We read then, in an ancient chronicle, how it was commanded that the body of the venerable Gerard, bishop and confessor in the time of Otho the Great, should be removed to a place of greater honor in the church, and how the devout Pope Leo, having a desire to be present when his remains should be raised from the tomb, departed from Rome expressly for the purpose, and after traversing a great part of Belgic Gaul, arrived in the midst of the clergy and people assembled, to their great joy.

The fame of this approaching event had drawn an immense multitude, of all ages and of both sexes, to the town, and a devout number of holy pontiffs had already met there from distant countries. With the venerable Archbishop of Lyons, there was Hugo, Archbishop of Chrysopolis, George, Archbishop from Hungary, Frotmundus, Bishop of Treassinus, Herbert, Bishop of Antum, and Lupus, an English bishop. These holy men accordingly appointed a certain day for the translation; but the influx of people had so increased, that our Lord the Pope, fearing lest the venerable relics might be exposed to injury amidst such a crowd, decreed that the translation should take place during the night, with no other witnesses but clerks and monks; therefore on the Sunday, the twelfth calend of November, when the shades of evening had come on, holy vigils are instituted and continued through that long night by the clerks and monks, and then lauds of jubilation are sung; then our Lord the Pope, with the assembly of pontiffs, preceded by burning tapers and the fragrance of incense, proceeded to the spot, removed the stone which covered the sepulchre of the saint, and beheld within it the venerable body, more precious than any treasure. There you would have seen his reverent countenance defiled with no stain, as if sleeping with closed eyes, his white hairs flowing down at great length on both sides of his neck, his body clothed in his pontifical vestments, which were not in the least decayed or injured by moisture. Before their eyes he lay with such composed beauty that they beheld, as it were, a certain image of the resurrection, for he did not seem dead but sleeping, and about to open his eyes at the voice of the summoning angel. Then these blessed members were raised up most reverently and involved in linen, and throughout the whole of the next day were presented to the veneration of the people, and on the following day there was a plenary solemnity, and the body was placed at the right hand of the altar of the blessed protomartyr Stephen, where an altar was consecrated with apostolical benediction.* This is but an instance of the respect with which the moving of a holy body was universally conducted.

Thus in the year 974, at Troyes, on the translation of the relics of St. Mastie, by Bishop Milon, the people from all parts assembled in crowds, and remained in the church of St. P  ter from the first vespers till the mass of the next day, passing the night in fasting and prayer.† The bodies and relics of saints originally were deposited in a kind of crypt, which was under the altar, into which were small apertures, through which they might be regarded or touched by cloth or palls let down upon them. Such is the description given of the altar in the basilica of St. Peter by St. Gregory of Tours.‡ Henricus Valescus says that the Christians at the tombs of the martyrs were accustomed to let down veils, which might touch the relics of the saints, qua pro magna benedictione accipiebant.§ St. Ambrose placed the relics under the altar,|| and Mabillon gives other examples: but the relics of St. Walpurg are stated by St. Odo to have been placed upon the altar. In the ninth century it became general to place them upon the altars. In the eighth century, when the body of St. Emmeramnus was translated, the books of the Gospels were placed in the coffin with the body; and in the chronicle of Fontenelle there is mention of a copy of the Holy Scriptures placed with the body, which was dressed in the habit it had worn. Until the ninth century, the bodies of saints, for the most part, were deposited in subterraneous places, with altars or merely shrines built over them. The chests which contained the pignora sanctorum, contained probably nothing but linen and other substances which had touched the relics, and this explains the multitude of relics associated with the name of the same saint, which were preserved in different places. The faithful also made copies or images of relics, which, after being touched to the real, were afterwards venerated as partaking of their grace, and this was the case with the thorns of the crown, the wood of the cross, and the heads and vestments of saints.¶ When relics were removed, it was rather by pious violence than by the result of prayers. For the clergy continued adverse to any removal or dismemberment as before and such acts of violence gave occasion to the most solemn professions of penitence. In the seventh century, when Antioch was taken by the Sarassins, and the cities of Alexandria and Jerusalem were possessed by the Persians and Arabians, a vast number of holy relics of the bodies of saints were brought into the West, for multitudes of the Christians of those centuries removed with all their treasures to

* Acta Tullens. cum Episcoporum apud Marten. Thesaur. Anecd. Tom. III.

† Desguerrois, Hist. du Dioc  se de Troyes, 21. ‡ In Lib. I. de Mirac. Martyr. cap. 28.

§ In Sozomen. Lib. IX. cap. 2.

|| Epist. LXXXV. ad Marcellinam.

¶ Sardagna, Theolog. Dogmat. Tom. III. 467.  Mabillon, P  fat. in II. Saint Ben. § 5.

escape the fury of the Mahometans. Some churches were built expressly to receive precious relics : that of St. Peter, in Vincoli, was erected in the year 442, by Eudoxia, wife of the Emperor Valentinian III., to preserve the chain with which Herod bound St. Peter, in the prison of Jerusalem. Every one knows what a feature in the churches of the middle ages were the crystal-girded shrines and reliquaries of the saints, meekly revered at a holy distance, before which were suspended vast lamps of silver : those of St. Denis, of solid silver, were so old that they looked like lead. "Our happy and holy mother, the Church," says a writer of the thirteenth century, "for the great comfort and decorum of the house of God, has many bodies of saints in custody, at the sight of which many persons are excited often to the love of God, and to weeping, and to the desire of eternal joys. For where is there a church or chapel so poor and little as not to have some sacred relics for the ornament of his oratory, through devotion to the souls of the saints reigning with Christ in glory."* Many of these bodies were in a state of extraordinary preservation. Such were those of the holy Anselm, Cuthbert, Claude, Edmund, Remi, Catharine of Bologna, Clare of Montefaucon, Agnes of Politian, Rosa of Viterbo, Charles Borromeo, Ferdinand, Isidore, Theresa, Elizabeth of Portugal, Edward of England, Francis Xavier, and Magdalen de Pazzi. Plato might have supposed that "their shape regarmented with glorious weeds of saintly flesh, would, being thus entire, show yet more glorious." It was with awe and trembling that I beheld, in the church at Saxeln, the body of the blessed hermit Nicholas of the Rock, erect, appearing suddenly like an apparition over the altar, and by his side the habit which he wore, to be devoutly kissed ; but it was hard to refrain from tears when admitted into the small chapel within the convent at Bologna, I saw that body of St. Catharine, there wonderfully seated during four hundred years uncorrupted, unsupported, unmutilated, on a throne surrounded with burning tapers, so humbly amidst so much grandeur, one of the tender affecting spectacles which the church shows in secret to her children.

Sometimes the bodies of saints were placed within crystal shrines, so as to be constantly visible. This is the case in the great Benedictine abbeys of St. Urban and Einsiedeln, in the latter of which we see the skeleton of St. Gregory, the son of one of our Saxon kings, who made there a blessed end. In the churches of the martyrs at Rome, as at the confession of St. Peter, the basilica of St. Paul, of St. Sebastian, of St. Cecilia, and others, we find at the rails of the altar which contains their relics a tablet, on which is written the responses, antiphons, and prayer of the church relative to that martyr. In the ancient monastery of Larrivour, in the diocese of Troyes, there were relics of saints' bodies, of whom no record remained, excepting that they were of persons who had died in odor of sanctity: yet the custom had never been laid aside of tolling the bells on the first of May, to commemorate the day of their being deposited in that church.† This was according to a general custom. When a certain holy relic was sent as a present to the church of Argentueil by Charlemagne, it arrived there at one o'clock, and to commemorate that arrival a bell was tolled ever after at that hour.* "The relics of the saints are to be venerated, say the canons of Theodore of Canterbury. "If it can be, let there be a taper lighted during the whole of every night, but if the poverty of the place do not permit it, it is no injury to them: but there must be lights on the nativities of the saints, because like lilies they gave an odor of sweetness and refreshed the church of God, as when the church is sprinkled with incense near the altar."† In the chapel of the great Hospital de Pammatone at Genoa founded in 1420, we see the body of St. Catherine of Genoa, well preserved in a shrine of silver, on the spot where she died in 1510. At Milan, early in the morning of St. Charles's Day, before light, vast multitudes, composed, not of the citizens only, but of the inhabitants of the surrounding country, who hasten into Milan from a great distance, descend into the confession of St. Charles, which is illuminated, and there the descendants of the well-tended flock pay their honor to his venerable relics, while several great pictures representing the principal events in his life, are suspended along each side of the nave. Cities as well as churches derived an importance from these treasures. To whom was not Thoulouse interesting on account of its containing in the subterraneous chapel of St. Saturninus that venerable body of the Angel of the Schools? What a treasure does Milan possess in the body of St. Ambrose, which reposes in a vault under the high altar in the Ambrosian basilica? How precious was that incorruptible tongue of St. John Nepomucenus to Prague, and that blood of St. Januarius to Naples? With what a rich treasure did Luitprand, the Lombard king, endow his capital, when, in the year 723, during the pontificate of Gregory the Great, he ransomed the bones of St. Augustin from the Sarassins, and transferred them to it, going himself as far as Genoa to meet them?‡ I was at Pavia when these precious remains were moved, and placed in the Gothic shrine adorned with three hundred statues, which had been made for them in the fourteenth century, and which was now transferred from the church of St. Augustin, which had been desecrated by the French, to the cathedral. It was a festival of public rejoicing for three days, and the whole city was illuminated. When the Archduke Boleslaus of Poland received tidings of the martyrdom of his holy friend St. Adalbert, the apostle of Prussia, he ransomed the body from that heathen people by the gift of its weight in silver, and had it transported with the greatest honors to the metropolitan church of Gnesen, where it was enshrined and visited by devout pilgrims from Bohemia, Germany, and Italy, among whom the emperor Otho III., with an immense attendance of knights, repaired to beseech God at the grave of the martyr, the friend and instructor of his youth.§

* Thom. de Kempis, Sermon Pars III. 10. † Desguerrois, Hist. du Diocese de Troyes. 355.

An instructed reader finds nothing but an adherence to the spirit and practice

* Lebeuf. Hist. du Diocese de Paris. Tom. IV. 10. † Theodori Cantuar. Archiep. Capit. 29.

‡ Sigon de Regno Ital. Lib. III.

§ Voigt. Geschichte Preussens, I. 4.

of the primitive times in these acts of the middle ages, which are such an offence to ignorant scorers, as when queen Radegund sent servants to Jerusalem and through all the East to procure the relics of holy bodies, * or as when St. Germain Bishop of Auxerre, passing into England with St. Loup, of Troyes, in the year 429, to extirpate the Pelagian heresy, being deputed to that end by a council of Gaul, made a visit to the shrine of St. Alban, and took up some of the earth on which the martyr's blood had fallen, and carried it back with him to France as a holy treasure;† or, as when in 780, at a great assembly of bishops and princes at Aix-la-Chapelle, a number of precious relics were publicly shown, which had been sent to that church as a rich present by the emperor of the East; or, as when at Senlis the chasuble of St. Frambault, who died in the sixth century, used to be kissed by the people instead of the paten at the offertory, in the high mass on his festival,‡ or as when the kings of France, with their own hands, used to show the relics of the holy chapel to the people on certain days.

Charles V. showed them on Good Friday, and in 1423, this custom was observed by the Duke of Bedford, acting in the name of the king of England, and by order of the Parliament. § In all these instances it was practice conformable to the spirit of the first ages, which impressed the minds of men with salutary reverence. Petrarch was at Padua on the day of the translation of the body of St. Anthony, and he says that he was one of the immense multitude who were admirers of that solemn and admirable ceremony. Every one has heard of the immense multitudes that used to visit Canterbury and the shrine of its holy martyr. Petrus Cellensis, who was his contemporary, says in a letter to the Bishop of Exeter, "Who will give me wings like a dove, that I may fly to visit the tomb of the precious martyr St. Thomas." || "Not undeservedly do the people hasten thither from all sides, to venerate that tomb and to bless that nation and people, amongst whom has risen such a witness of Christ:" ¶ and, again, writing to John of Salisbury, he expresses the same desire, adding, "that I may adore God in his saint before I die." These feelings, though true to nature and to faith, are an astonishment to those who have been perverted by the modern philosophy, whose blindness would not have ascribed hypocrisy but superstition to the Pharisees, who built the sepulchres of the prophets. †† They talk of visiting tombs of poets, warriors, and kings, but it never occurs to them to add of saints, as if human sympathy and all associations of reverence were to be excluded alone when the memorials related to persons who have been dear to God. When they have not indulged a satiric vein in speaking of Catholic practice, they have expressed themselves like Jews in their abhorrence of dead bodies. ‡‡ Yet assuredly, even independent of the Christian tradition, there can

* Greg. Turon Miracul. Lib. I. 5.

† Hist. du Diocese de Troyes, 52.

‡ Hist. des Evesques de Senlis. 252.

§ Lebeuf, Hist. du Diocese de Paris, Tom. I. XI.

|| Liv. V. Epist. XVI

¶ Liv. VI. Epist. IV.

 Liv. V. Epist. XII.

†† Matt. c. xxii. 29.

‡‡ S. Hieron. Epist. XXXVII.

be nothing more venerable, or in the best sense of the term more natural, than such devotion ! When Moses departed from Egypt,* he took with him the bones of Joseph, which the Patriarch himself had commended to his brethren,† and it is said, Ossa ipsius visitata sunt et post mortem prophetaverunt.‡ There is again the same sanction in the fact relative to the bones of Elisha,§ and in the apostolic history, which records the use made of the handkerchiefs and aprons. But without reference to these supernatural motives, what practice can be more conformable to the deepest sentiments of the human heart? Every where has mankind, without assigning its reasons, regarded as sacred the remains of virtuous men. We read in Homer that the faithful Eumæus wept when he saw the bow of his ancient master.

Κλαίει δὲ βουκόλος ἄλλος', ἐπεὶ ἶδε τόξον ἄνκκτος. ||

And can it be thought that there was no spiritual advantage to be derived from exhibiting the crosier of a sainted pastor, or the staff which had supported a martyr to his death? St. Gregory of Tours says, “there lives in the suburbs of the city of Lyons a woman, who is said to have picked up the shoe of the blessed martyr Epipodius which fell from his foot as they were leading him to martyrdom.”¶ Where is the discernment of the philosopher who would set no value on such a relic? I would not contend with him if he dissents. The voice of nature will consent whether the voice of man do so or not. Would you learn the impressions experienced by a French scholar, on witnessing the late translation of the body of St. Vincent de Paul to the chapel of the Lazarists in Paris? “O how noble, how pure to the eye of faith and of Catholic charity is that body, sanctified by the passage of a holy soul, which has been in the service of that soul during eighty years of earthly life, fatigued, tormented by it for the sake of the poor, for the salvation of prisoners, of the sick, of orphans, of all the unhappy! Those arms, which used to pick up the little infants from the snow to bear them to the hospital, those limbs which continued infirm ever after they had borne the weight of the chains, voluntarily assumed to redeem others, that countenance which has consoled so many miserable, revived so many hopes, filled so many hearts with charity, that tongue, which had a sound so sweet, and so powerful to announce the word of God, that whole body, so often offered to the Almighty in penitence and mortification, that body now passes before our eyes, borne through the streets of Paris. Behold it, still clad in its ancient vestments, the cassock, the surplice, and the stole! Cold, immovable, to rise no more, till, at the sound of the trumpet of the angel, which will summon it to glory! See around it what a multitude of men, great and small, princes and people. Sophists who pass by, do you comprehend this movement of the people towards this man, who had conferred so many benefits upon their fathers, and whose prayers can still

* Exod. 13.

† Genes. 49.

‡ Eccles. 49.

§ IV. Reg. 13. Eccles 48.

¶ Od. XXI 83.

¶ De Gloria Confessorum, 4.

cause the divine goodness to descend upon them? Do you discern this mysterious chain which unites earth and heaven? And in this body, which they bear along thus magnificently enshrined, is there nothing that moves you? Is there nothing in this astonishing and sublime symbol of charity."

St. Augustin replying to the pagans, explains the homage paid to the saints and to their relics, as a Catholic writer might now address the Protestants. "We do not erect temples to the martyrs, but we honor their sepulchres as having rendered testimony to the truth. Who ever heard a priest officiating at the altar of God over the ashes of a martyr pronounce these words: Peter, Paul, or Cyprien, I offer to you this sacrifice?*" The Holy Ghost reposes invisibly in the relics of those who are dead in the grace of God, until he appear visibly in them at the resurrection; and it is this which renders the relics of saints so worthy of veneration. For God never abandons his own, not even in the sepulchre, where their bodies, although dead to the eyes of men, are more alive before God, on account of sin being no longer in them, the roots of which at least must have been there during their lives." These are the words of Paschal. † "Would you know the precise date of the worship of the relics of martyrs?" asks Fénelon. "It is as ancient as martyrdom itself. These bones are already out of the tomb, because they have strengthened Jacob and redeemed themselves by virtue of faith. When Agleus sent his servant Boniface from Rome to visit Asia in search of the bodies of martyrs, he said, 'Know, O Boniface, that the bodies of the faithful who go to collect those of martyrs, ought to be pure and without a spot.' It is superstition to honor the martyrs without desiring to imitate them. These bones have no virtue for such men. This is a place into which faith alone should enter."‡

But let us turn now to mark the decoration of the churches, and the memorials of antiquity which they presented. One who has only seen the desecrated cathedrals of England, or even the churches of France since the revolution, can hardly form an idea of the number of interesting objects for observation, furnished by the interior walls of an ancient Christian church, in consequence of the Catholic principle of divine appropriation by the original bond of all things to God, or by their special application to his glory. Of these to speak at full were a vain attempt; but a few instances, promiscuously taken, may serve to lead persons upon this inquiry. Thus, omitting for the present to mention the imagery and inscriptions upon sepulchres, of which I shall speak in a future place, there were so many memorials of every description, preserved from different ages, that to the examination of a church it was as necessary to bring learning and attention, as to the study of some book of ancient or of mystic lore. On the windows of the Gothic church of the convent of the Celestines at Marcoucies was painted the word Ilpaidelt, which no one could explain until a Turk, who had received baptism, and was in the suite of Francis I., came to Marcoucies in the year 1523, and decided that it was Syriac, and that it meant, "God is my hope," which explanation was then registered in the library of the abbey. These words had been the device of John de Montaignu, the great founder who had built the abbey and enriched it with many precious relics, pursuant to a vow which he made during the sickness of Charles VI. The capitals of the columns in the basilica of St. Vitale at Ravenna, contain monograms, of which the learned cannot give an interpretation. Every thing that could interest the scholar, the poet, the philosopher, and the Christian was to be found in the ancient churches. On the west front of the cathedral of Como, raised in the fourteenth century, are two statues of the elder and younger Pliny, who were natives of that place, and an affecting inscription invites the passer to fix his eyes upon them, adding

* De Civitate Dei. † Pensees, II. Partie, art. 17. ‡ Fénelon pour la Fete d'un M

*Lætus eris sed mox
Non sine lachrymulis.*

In the artists who placed these figures at the sacred portal, we can recognize the same mind as guided Dante, when he represented the four mighty spirits separate from all the rest, for one might infer that they stand there as if to signify that the renown of their great names, that echoes through our world, acquires favor in heaven, which holds them thus advanced.* In the sixteenth century, a visitor of the diocese required their removal as profane, but the calmer and deeper wisdom of the sacred college, to which the citizens of Como appealed, sanctioned their preservation. The cathedral of Parma bears monumental tablets to the memory of ancient Roman families, which are celebrated in the classic annals.

Some arts and languages have perished since these churches were constructed. If it were not an interminable office to enter upon such details, a pilgrim who had visited Italy might attract around him many a circle of intelligent listeners, by merely telling them of the memorials of antiquity which he has found in churches; he might describe that ancient Pascal cycle fixed in the wall of the cathedral of Ravenna, or that pastoral chair of ivory which reminds him of classic story, or that stationary cross of St. Agnello, which has stood for thirteen hundred years in the same; he might describe the bas-relievos on churches which have survived heresies, and which represent the forgotten error as those on St. Michael's church at Pavia, where an annunciation is represented conformable to the Arian opinions, or the ancient images of the cross of our divine Lord, like that awful figure in the church at St. Dominic at Ravenna, which is in a form unlike what we now ascribe to it. He might relate of the calamities to which mortal men are subject, in connection with which he saw, in the cathedral of Milan, the crucifix which was borne processionally by St. Charles, during the plague of 1576; and in the church of St. Vitale at Ravenna, where, in the year 1636, the waters had risen fourteen feet above the pavement, an inscription which invited the traveller to pray that their rivers might softly glide :

* Hell. IV.

Molliter ut jaceant flumina nostra roga.

How in the church of St. Praxides at Rome, where two thousand three hundred martyrs were buried, he saw in the nave a well railed round, in which that saint used to deposit the blood of the martyrs which she could collect, and in the nave of the church of the Passionists, on the Celian hill, the spot railed round on which St. John and St. Paul were martyred, and in the basilica of St. Vitale at Ravenna, on the pavement, a slab representing a man beheaded, over which were these words : “Hic Ursicinus capite obtruncato martyrii palmam adeptus est.” Why think you, he might ask, is the bronze statue of that aged pontiff of the Farnese race without the triple crown, which all his fellows bear, in that basilica of St. Peter? Why does he stoop his head with such marks of grief and humiliation? It is because England was lost under his pontificate ; and when this Paul III. was on his death-bed laid, he told them to represent him thus upon his tomb, but that when England revived again they might restore his emblematic crown. He might tell you of a silent but impressive lesson furnished by that tomb of Christine, queen of Sweden, in the same church, which bears for its sole embellishment a crown laid upon a tablet ! That crown, you are told, was renounced for the sake of embracing the true faith of Christ. What a strange reversion is here of the spiritual order to behold the mighty exalted and the poor left prostrate, to see princes resigning their crowns rather than resist the Catholic church, and men of humble state, for the sake of vile profit, or some worthless distinction, for which beggars might contend, remaining obstinately deaf to her gracious call ! He might relate how he read, with trembling, those short words, inscribed over the high altar in the church of the convent of St. Mary Magdalen di Pazzi at Florence : “Una de numero prudentium.” Alas ! of what number are the giddy race who flock hither to gaze at paintings and the antiquated works of Tuscan art ! Of what number was the wanderer himself who took such note of altars ? He might describe that marble tablet in the cathedral of Milan, called Chrysmon St. Ambrosii, of which Landulph, its old historian, says, that it served as a table for the initiation of catechumens in the mysteries of our faith, and over which these verses are inscribed :

*Circulus hic summi continet nomina regis
Quem sine principio et sine fine vides
Principium cum fine tibi designant A et Ω*

He might describe that mosaic in the choir of the Ambrosian basilica at Milan, representing St. Ambrose, who seems to fall asleep in celebrating mass, under which the word Mediolanum is written, while by the side is shown the funeral of St. Martin, celebrated at Tours with the word Turonica, indicating that his death was revealed to St. Ambrose, or, in the same basilica, that granite column supporting a serpent of brass, which has employed the pens of so many learned antiquarians, who have left it as they found it, an uncertain memorial of the highest antiquity, or, in the church of St. Stephen at Milan, which stands upon the field of battle, where the Arians fought against the Catholics, that aperture in the nave, covered with a grating of iron, in which is worked the crosier of St. Ambrose, on which fell, as some suppose, the blood of Diodorus and three other martyrs under Valentinian, or that stone, which is inserted there in a column, supposed to relate to the suffering of some martyr. He might repeat what he has read on the walls of the basilica of St. Sebastian at Rome, and give you the words of St. Jerome, describing his emotions on descending to the catacombs beneath ; or he might, from the inscriptions on other churches, give you an account of the most memorable events connected with them, as from that in the basilica of St. Apollinare in Classe, which states how the emperor of Germany, Otho III., on account of his crimes, and in obedience to the austere discipline of St. Romuald, after walking barefoot from Rome to Mount Gargano, remained in this basilica and cloister during forty days, a penitent, lamenting his sins in sackcloth, and giving an august example of humility. He might relate how at Poissy in the ancient church, he saw the font in which St. Lewis was baptized, and then, going on to speak of votive gifts, how in the ancient church of the Carthusians near Bologna, he saw the great iron chains that had been worn by poor Christian captives in the dungeons of Tripoli, Tunis, and Algiers, who suspended them in this church on their return, and how at Pisa, in the church of St. Stephen, belonging to the knights of St. Stephen, he saw the banners surmounted by the crescent, and the immense brazen lanterns taken from the Turkish galleys by these knights of old, whose service consisted in protecting the Christian vessels on the Mediterranean from their corsairs.

An acquaintance with history may have prepared some of his hearers for such details. They may have read how Prince Boëmond having been caught by the Sarassins, and thrown into a dungeon, loaded with chains, made a vow to God, that if by help of his grace, and the intercession of St. Leonard, he should recover his liberty, he would go to the church of that saint at Limoges, and would attach to its altar a chain of silver of the same weight as that with which he was then bound in prison ; which vow he accomplished with a fervor worthy of the most zealous Christian, and then shortly after the assembly at Poitiers, took the cross and set out for Jerusalem.

Celebrated also was the gift of the Prince of Condé who having been long confined as a state prisoner in Vincennes, made an offering to the church of our Lady at Loretto, of a model of that castle in solid silver. The ex voto figures frequently represented the illustrious pilgrims who had visited the church: Popes, emperors, and steel-clad warriors, are there along with peasants. The lapse of ages had sometimes involved their history in obscurity. In the church of our Lady at Fournes, in Flanders, were suspended in one chapel several huge heavy rings of iron. Certain paintings also there, of vast antiquity, represented persons from whose hands and feet these rings and fetters were dropping off. Time had obliterated all trace of the names and events, but the substance of the story was sufficiently clear.* These votive offerings, eyed by the moderns in disdainful mood, towards which they sharpen their sight as keen as an old tailor at his needle's eye, may nevertheless be traced as a Christian usage from the primitive ages of the Church. Theodoret† says, that those who ask with faith obtain their requests, "as appears from the donaries which testify their cures; for some hang up the resemblance of eyes, some of feet, others of hands made of gold or brass, to indicate the infirmities from which they were delivered, and to be a memorial of the power of the true God." The walls of the vast temple of our Lady of the oak near Viterbo, have not space enough to contain the votive offerings of successive generations of men, to express the eternal gratitude of those who had received signal gifts from heaven. A memorial connected with the simplicity of the middle ages, consists in those horse shoes which used to be nailed on the gate of churches, out of devotion to St. Martin, whom painters always represent on horseback, and all persons who travelled in that manner, invoked as their patron, under whose guidance they could hardly fail to practise blessed charity on their way. On their return, these horse shoes were nailed up as a sign of acknowledgment.‡

With respect to the decoration of churches, we have already seen how magnificently they were adorned in the third century. Pope Gregory II. writing to the Emperor Leo, the Iconoclast, explains the advantage derived from the paintings and images in the churches. In the very first age, there is mention of golden candlesticks given to churches, and of perfumed tapers. The Roman church had lands in Syria and other provinces of the east, for the supply of perfumes; and at the close of the third century, Optatus Milevitanus, is a witness that there were many ornaments in the church of gold and silver. From the beginning of the fourth century to the end of the ninth, the richest presents were continually made to the churches of Rome by popes, emperors, and private persons. Images of our Saviour and of the Apostles of solid gold and silver, with crowns of jewels, were given to the Lateran Basilica by Constantine. Fleury gives the prodigious value of the different objects presented, such as golden chalices, lamps, censers, and images of saints, besides houses, and lands, and money. In the tenth century, the ravages of the Normans and other wars, and the opinion that the end of the world was near, occasioned the destruction and neglect of most of the churches of the west. When they were rebuilt, the ancient form was preserved, but as we have seen it was found impossible to imitate their magnificence, or to adorn them with equal splendor, for the riches of the church which remained were passing in another direction. It was much if they could be built with cut stone, and adorned with bronze; and it was even necessary to prohibit the use of clay or wooden chalices. Still there were many vestiges of ancient splendor. In the year 1034, the Bohemians pillaged the church of Genesne, in Poland, and carried off a crucifix of gold of nine hundred pounds, and three golden tables of an altar enriched with precious stones. The interior decoration of the churches in the middle ages was of an astonishing magnificence. We have a minute description of the church of the monastery of St. Richarius, in the time of Charlemagne: over every altar there was a picture which was set in precious stones; in the middle of the church the sacred passion was represented figured in gypsum and inlaid with gold and other precious colors. On the south side was the Ascension, on the north the Resurrection, and in the porch the Holy Nativity, all similarly represented. Three of the altars were furnished with pure gold.* Suger placed in the church of St. Denis a golden crucifix weighing eighty marks, and besides the value of the gold and enamel, there were in it pearls and precious stones: two years were required to finish it, though seven of the most skilful artists, who had come expressly from foreign countries, were occupied on it day and night. It was so brilliant that the eyes could not rest upon it without being dazzled. This was solemnly consecrated by Pope Eugene, who came to the abbey with the king for the purpose.† We read also that in the monastery of Luxneil, there was a cross wondrously fabricated of gold, and covered with precious gems, which had been given by St. Ansegisis, Abbot of Fontanelle. The roof of the abbey of Crowland was golden, as appears from the epitaph on the Abbot John, in the reign of Edward IV.

* Hist. des Saints de la Province de Lille et Douay, p. 572. † Orat. VIII. Contra Gentiles.

‡ Lebeuf, Hist. du Diocese de Paris, Tom. I. c. 4, and Tom. IV. 126.

Mente Maria vacans, sed membris Martha ministrans,
Quæque Dei laudem sapiunt, super omnia fovit,
Sed reputat fraudem, quicquid proprium sibi novit,
Quam sibi dilecta fuerant Domini sacra templa
Laudis in exempla demonstrant aurea tecta.‡

No labor or expense were spared in adorning the interior of churches. Bede relates of his abbot Biscop, that he brought from Rome and placed in his church pictures of sacred images of the blessed Mary, and the twelve apostles, and images of the evangelical history, and of the visions of St. John the Evangelist: all who entered the church, though ignorant of letters might, to whatever side they turned, have contemplated either the gracious and loving countenance of Christ, and of his apostles, having them as if before their eyes, or they might be led to meditate with amaze upon the mystery of our Lord's incarnation; or else the danger of the final judgment which was presented before them might have moved them to examine themselves more strictly.§

Most of the artists employed upon the cathedral of Pisa in the eleventh century

* Mabillon, Acta S. Ord. Bened. Vita S. Angelberti, IV. 1.

† Hist. de Suger, Lib. VI.

‡ Ingulph. Hist.

§ Bed. in Lib. I de Vita Biscop.

were Greeks.* The paintings on its walls and roof, executed in the fourteenth century, are sublime in the highest degree. The figure of our Saviour on a colossal scale in the apsis with the inscription, "Ego sum lux mundi," strikes one with dread on entering. The admirable sculpture in the Baptistry, was the work of Niccolo Pisano. The fresco paintings of the fourteenth century round the walls of the Campo Santo represent the lives and death of saints, the history of Job and others from the Old Testament, the adoration of the Magi, the Crucifixion, Resurrection, and Ascension, the Triumph of Death, the General Judgment, in which Solomon's fate is represented doubtful, the Inferno of Dante, and other subjects which are executed with a genius that is the admiration of every intelligent beholder. What mind, what spirituality appears in that sublime form which we see there of the Saviour pronouncing the divine malediction in the Last Judgment! It surpasses the corresponding work of Michael Angelo, in the Sistine chapel. What awe is excited by that painting of the Last Judgment by Giotto, after the inspiration of his friend Dante, which is in the Annunziata at Padua! What a solemn impression steals upon the mind on beholding that assembly of venerable sages in the cathedral of Sienna, surrounding the entire church in continued series, and yet composed alone of the holy pontiffs who have sat in Peter's chair! or that in the Basilica of St. Apollinare in Classe, comprising the one hundred and twenty-six archbishops of Ravenna, who have succeeded in an uninterrupted order from St. Apollinare, the disciple of St. Peter! Who would have thought that death so many had despoiled! for what must be the multitude of the faithful when their chief pastors form such a crowd! Many of the paintings and decorations in the churches were designed with so deep and subtle an idea, that none but the initiated could trace the grand mystery. Such is that surprising painting on the ceiling of the Gesu at Rome, by Baccio, which is to express that every knee shall bow at the name of Jesus. In like manner, in the masterpiece of Raphael, there is the same principle of unity to the eye of those who are accustomed to the thoughts of faith.

These vast solemn frescoes, which are found in so many churches, in which there is discovered something new every time one regards them, something not there because men have read of it, but as if they have read of it because it is there, make every beholder imagine himself actually present at the awful scene, and are sufficient to soften the most obdurate. Those mosaic apses of the sixth century, like that in the Basilica of St. Vitale, at Ravenna, seem to give us an insight into the very thoughts of the early Christians; and who does not stand rivetted with devout attention to that great altar in the Basilica of St. Anthony at Padua, containing so many symbolical figures which teach heavenly lore: such as the propagation of the church throughout the world, the abundance of her spiritual gifts, the prudence requisite in her pastors, the detachment from the world which should distinguish every Christian, the punishments of the future life, the peace which is enjoyed in the church, the mysteries of the passion of our Lord? Father Angelo Bigoni describes these in his book, published lately at Padua. I saw the representation of beautiful woods and mountains painted in frescoe, on the interior walls of the ancient church of St. Martin at Rome. The fathers of the desert were seen in these landscapes, and thus the beauties and sublimity of natural scenery were introduced within the sanctuary. Desiderio, Abbot of Monte Cassino, in order to adorn the new church he had built there, brought over Greek painters and artists from Constantinople: that church is like a grotto of jewels and precious stones. In their choice of materials, the men of these ages showed how they valued durability. The gates of cypress wood which Adrian III. erected in St. Peter's were in good preservation five hundred years afterwards. In fact, there are examples of the almost incorruptibility of that wood. The Basilica of St. Paul was roofed with cedar of Libanus, and it was the oldest church in the world. The ceilings of St. Mary Major, St. Clement, and St. Mary in Trastevere, are wrought with a skill and magnificence that would defy modern art, as in fact the skill of carpenters in the middle ages greatly exceeded what is possessed at the present day. In the church of the monastery of Cluny, there was before the great altar a candelabra of prodigious magnitude of Cyprus wood, gilt and covered with crystalline stones and beryls. It measured the height of a spear of eighteen feet in length, and six branches extended from it. This was the gift of queen Matilda.* Over the entrance of the choir, in the centre of the entire structure, where the moderns in England have generally placed a shapeless organ, there was always a vast crucifix, with images of our blessed Lady and St. John, to denote that the cross should be in the heart of all Christians. This was the rood loft, the destruction of which was so delightful a task to the self-styled reformers.

* Merrona Pisa Illustrata.

Thus in the churches all things reminded men of the passion and sacred humanity of Jesus Christ. They might feel as if in Palestine, in Bethlehem, or on Calvary. Frequently too, as in the cathedral of Sienna, there was in another part some solemn representation of the holy sepulchre, with a figure of our divine Lord, and a light always burning before it within an iron grate. In short, as far as poor material works could act upon souls, the world was excluded and all its vanities; for it was not there as within that chief temple of the Anglican sect, in which one beholds nothing but the trophies of great captains, where one might suppose that all the naval battles of which history tells, from that of the Corinthians and Coreyrians were to be commemorated, and where one beholds heroes, not in their death or in their devotions, but in all their temporal glory, and in the exultation of their victory. What a contrast is seen in Catholic churches where, as in the Carthusian monastery of Ferrara, one may find the tombs of Paladins, such as the Strozzi, and other heroes who had fought against the Turks! The sepulchre of Marc Antonio Martinengo della Palata is at Brescia. That illustrious hero, though twice wounded, took prisoner with his own hand Louis Gonzaga, and died three days after his victory. He had magnificent funeral honors, and this mausoleum was erected to his memory : yet excepting his arms, which are an eagle, nothing recalls his glory on this sepulchre. The medallions and bas-relievs of marble and bronze, represent the passion of Jesus Christ and other sacred subjects, which have no relation to the brilliant exploits of the hero. The ancient warriors and kings of England are only represented on their tombs, either in the solemn ecstasy of repose, or as meekly invoking Christ in the posture of that knight described by Tasso, indicating one that ever

* Chronicon Cluniacens.

Had to heavenly things desire, holding
His weapon in his right hand closed,
His left upon his breast was humbly laid,
That men might know that while he died he pray'd.*

At the same time countless images of saints rendered you familiar with the ineffable joys of devotion, and like the hymn of the church seemed to proclaim on all sides the brave actions, and the immortal palms of the best kind of conquerors.† Many experience a delightful astonishment on entering a Catholic country to find the art of sculpture applied to Christian subjects ; for they had only before seen it under the genius of paganism. The admirable basso relievs, representing the life and death of St. John Gualbert, and other events which passed in the convent of Vallombrosa, executed by Benedetto di Rovezzano and Luca della Robbia at Florence, prove how capable this noble art is of expressing the character of Christian sanctity. The meek angelic looks of the monks in those relievs, could not have been surpassed in painting. A similar instance is seen on the Gothic altar and shrine of St. Dominic, in the church of the Dominicans at Bologna, which was carved by Nicholas of Pisto in 1200. The sculpture on the front of the cathedral of St. Laurence at Genoa, is enough to draw tears, so awful and piteous is the spectacle there represented of the martyr's passion ! and the figures representing the eight beatitudes in the church of St. Anthony at Parma, proclaim with an irresistible force the vanity of man's wisdom. Duplessis speaks of certain figures in bad state which were in the abbey church of Fontenelle, which draws the judicious remark from a modern writer, that in the time of Duplessis good taste was nothing else but a pretentious and theatrical affectation ; the charm of simplicity was not then felt or esteemed ; the great traditions of art were abandoned ; so that many works of sculpture executed during the middle ages from the time of St. Louis resembled much more the antique than the greatest part of the productions of the modern school.‡ Even De Saint Victor, like the excellent Fleury, is too much disposed to speak of the barbarous taste of the middle ages ;

* Book VIII. 33.

† Hymn for many martyrs.

‡ Langlois Essai Historique sur Saint Wandrille.

and the learned Abbé Lebeuf, in his History of the Diocese of Paris, shows with regard to the churches of the Templars, great ignorance of ecclesiastical architecture in the middle ages, and insensibility to its beauty.

The observation of Müller that the Doric character created the Doric architecture, may be applied to the Catholic religion, and to the whole development of the arts in ages of faith : for it is clear from the ancient monuments that our ancestors, like the Dorians, attended to the beauty of form to a degree that might lead one to suppose they had always used that prayer, "give us what is good and what is beautiful." In Oxford, as in any of our cathedrals you can trace the date of the modern philosophy by observing the imagery employed upon edifices. We cannot be mistaken in the date wherever we find the old Christian images superseded by statues of Jupiter, Neptune, and Apollo. Even on the portal where Laud feebly restored an image of our blessed Lady there are placed by the side of it, two naked figures of heathen graces. In Westminster Abbey, pagan imagery appears upon the tombs, not such as is merely symbolical like the hearts which the first Christians continued to engrave as we see in the catacombs, but fair imitations of the deities. The moderns, indeed, seem never satisfied unless the whole pagan mythology is before their eyes. Moreover, the old mosaics and paintings in the churches, as in Italy to this day, show evidently that the artists in the middle ages knew the necessity of making art symbolical rather than imitative ; and this proves the inconsistency of the moderns who would admire and preserve the monuments of Catholic genius, but destroy the idea which inspired it. But what is above all characteristic of the paintings and sculpture of the middle ages, which are often yet more precious for their artist's sake, is the predominance of mind and spirituality, whether the form be executed with skill or only in a rude manner.

In the church of the Capuchin convent, without the walls of Sursee, are two altars, over which are placed groups of images. One represents the blessed Mary holding the dead body of her divine Son ; the other represents our Lord in the garden, with the angel offering him the chalice. At first the eyes might turn elsewhere, as though the form but ill accorded to the design of art, through sluggishness of unreplying matter : but their final conquest is no less certain : curiosity prompts them to return, and one finds one's self arrested by an indescribable emotion of pity mixed with devout awe : then it is all over with one's proud science : one's eyes are rivetted upon them, and one feels one's whole soul overcome with a sense of that dread mystery which they describe with such pathetic simplicity. But after reading that St. Eloy used to have always some holy book open before him to sanctify his soul, while his hands were working at the shrines, and that others, like Guercini, never commenced a painting without first purifying their souls by sacramental confession,—can we wonder that the works of such ages should be unlike our own? Aurelius Lomi, of Pisa, wrote upon his picture of the Adoration of the Magi these pious lines : "Et quid retribuam tibi, O bone Jesu, pro omnibus quæ retribuisti mihi? Non aurum, non thus, nec mirram, sed cor meum et de thesauro cordis mei hoc opus manum mearum."

The great Bolognese painter, Augustin Carracci, used to make a retreat in the convent of the Capuchins, where he died. Hence these paintings can sometimes give us quite a new view of scenes with the history of which we had been long familiar, ennobling them to a degree far beyond any conception we had formed from books. Such is the case on regarding that gracious fresco in the church of the Carthusians near Pavia, which represents St. Paul and St. Anthony dividing the loaf, and the raven sitting by them on the rock. In fact, the early Christian painters were generally monks and men of the interior life. Raphael had a friar for his master in the divine art. This was friar Bartholomew, the Dominican, who is regarded as one of the greatest painters of the Florentine school. Bramante, too, made his first studies in drawing from the works of the friar Bartholomew. The beautiful miniatures in the Antiphonarium and Liturgical Books which belonged to the choir of the great Carthusian monastery at Pavia, were executed by monks. These ages possessed numerous painters of great excellence, whose names are now nearly forgotten; such as Belius, Verrochio, Montagna, Perousin, Bourdichon, John of Paris. Princes were even celebrated as painters, like the pious Count of Provence, Renè of Anjou. The passion for the arts was then constantly allied with Christian fervor, and the idea of salvation. Michael Angelo composed his testament in three lines. "I bequeath my soul to God, my body to the earth, my goods to my nearest relations. I recommend them and my friends to bear constantly in mind the sufferings of the Son of God." Art has felt deeply the loss of this profound religious sentiment, and has been reduced to a mere mechanical display of skillful execution, indicating often the most offensive affectation, rather a mockery or a caricature than a just expression of the desire of the human soul.

It is by no means certain that, even in point of execution, the noble arts of design and sculpture were so far behind during the middle ages, when it is supposed they were in infancy; the broad seals of churches, abbeys, schools, cities, and castles, to which an historian may refer with such delight as illustrative of ancient manners, are sufficient to demonstrate the contrary. Many of these, still to be met with in England, are worthy of the finest epoch of art. The seal of a small convent of the fourteenth century, might now make the subtlest workman wonder. What ages must these have been, when taste and beauty extended even to the appendages of their title-deeds! The mutilated images which I saw on the west front of the ruined abbey of Crowland, would not disgrace the cabinets of the British Museum, though placed along with the spoils of the Parthenon. There is a book existing, a Benedictional, written by Godemann, who in the year 970 was appointed first abbot of Thorney, by the founder Ethelwald, Bishop of Winchester, in which the paintings are a proof of the fact, which will astonish many, that the fine arts in England, in the tenth century, had attained to a high perfection in their noblest capacity. These figures are drawn in the most graceful manner of the antique, and being surrounded with shining gold and fraught with all the simplicity of the old Christian paintings, they unite the perfection of the classic style and the saintly tenderness of the middle ages. That of our Lord's entrance on Palm Sunday, and the portrait of St. Elthelreda, are of such exquisite grace, that the eyes which bend on them seem never to have their fill. The collar of the golden fleece, which the emperor, Charles V. used to wear, which is a chain of gold with twelve medallions, representing the stages of the Passion, is a work of such beauty, that it is doubtful whether any artist, goldsmith, or engraver, at the present day, would be capable of executing it. Of late years, indeed, men have begun to do justice to the arts of the middle ages. In Germany, copies of its devout historic paintings are multiplied by means of lithography. The great Catholic painter Cornelius has recalled the art to its religious original. Oberbeck paints in the style of the middle age; and his pictures are inspired by piety and grace. The brothers Eberhard are the living masters of Catholic sculpture, like their fathers of the thirteenth century. But to proceed.

The religious use of images and paintings appears in the first age of Christianity. As Mabillon says, it was most ancient in the Church, and instituted in the first cradles of the Christian religion.* Tertullian describes in what form our Saviour was then generally painted;† and Eusebius mentions the painted images of Christ and of the Apostles which had been preserved from ancient times. St. Augustin alludes to the number of these paintings,‡ and speaks of one in these terms: "Dulcissima pictura est hæc," in which you see St. Stephen being stoned and Saul holding his vestments. St. Basil, St. Chrysostom, and other holy Greek Fathers, bear the same testimony to the universal use of pictures and images. It appears also that a symbolical painting of the blessed Trinity was known to the first ages, as was seen in the Basilica of St. Felix at Nola.§ We observe that the chapels in the sepulchres of the martyrs at Rome, where the Christian mysteries were celebrated in times of persecution, are adorned with paintings, of roses, birds, crosses, and images of saints. Some of these I copied in the catacombs of St. Cyriac, the descent to which is from the garden of the church of St. Lorenzo. The passage to this chapel extends more than a quarter of a mile, and is literally between the dead, whose mouldering skeletons are still remaining in the hollow places on each side. Over the stone altar which was discovered in the baths of Titus, is a fresco painting of St. Felicità, and her sons; and on the side walls are images of the Apostles. In the lowest subterranean chapel in the church of St. Martin, you see the mosaic of our Lady, which existed at least in the time of St. Silvester. In the church of St. Denis at Rome is the image of our Lady, which belonged to St. Gregory the Great.

* Præfat. in IV. Sæcul. Benedict. sec. 3.

† Lib. I. de Conscusa, Evang. c. X.

‡ De Pudicitia, cap. X.

§ S. Paulin. Epist. XII.

The arts were adopted and cherished by the church with a parent's care and the result was a new era in their history. Nothing is more evident, says Northcote, than that the Church of Rome alone has been the creator and sole nourisher of the art in its grandest aspect, from which it has received all its dignity.

It has now been clearly proved for some ages past, that there is a moral impossibility in the way of this noble art, in its loftiest aims, ever arriving at any degree of respectability in a Protestant country, where it cannot rise beyond the mechanical exercise of a portrait, or the humble baubles for a cabinet: all its struggles are but vain: as well might we expect to see corn grow on the barren rock.* The spirit of these concessions of a great artist will not be approved of by the supporters of the modern school; but without going into the argument at length, on a subject which is admitted by theologians to be one of those which are named adiaphorus, we may be permitted to observe, in opposition to them, that had the Church never imposed any veneration for pictures and images, which were memorials of the persons and actions they represent, she would have opposed a law of nature, and established what Luther was so fond of,—a distinction between theological and philosophical truth, and made that true by her decrees which reason pronounces to be absurd and impossible. To seek to take any part from the Catholic religion, would be as insane as to wish to expunge a tint from the prism, or a principle from the laws of Nature.

Boleslaus IV. King of Poland, used to wear round his neck a golden medal with the portrait of his father; and when he had to perform any action of importance, he used to move it to his lips, and kiss it with veneration, saying, "God preserve me, my father, from ever doing any thing unworthy of thy royal name."† That an expression of reverence, which the moderns themselves involuntarily admit to be pious when used towards a parent, should become impious when its object was God or his blessed saints, cannot be believed by them without supposing that truth is divided against itself; but many would rather condemn the nature of things than their own error. The grounds on which Christians use images and paintings, as contrary to the abominable customs of Pagans, who, as Niebuhr remarks, believed, notwithstanding what Julian and later sophists might say, that when an image was consecrated, the Deity entered into it as into a body, and dwelt in it, ‡ are shown in detail in that curious Dialogue, composed in the fifth century, between Zachæus, a Christian, and Apollonius, a philosopher.§

The first who declared war against the Christian images were the Jews, and also the heathens, in consequence of their detestation of Christ and the martyrs. To them succeeded the Marcionites, Manichæans, and Phantasiastans, who abhorred the image of Christ, because they did not believe that he had taken true flesh, as St.

* Life of Titian, Vol. I. 397.

† Savedra, Christian Prince, I. 174.

‡ History of Rome, Vol. II. p. 102.

§ Consultatio Zachæi Christiani et Apollonii Philosophi, Lib. I. c. 28, apud Dacher. Spicileg. Tom. X.

Augustin testifies.* In the seventh century, the impure sect of Mahomet severely prohibited the use of images. The Turks have such a horror of all paintings of creatures that have or had life, that with them a naturalist, who should make a drawing of a bird or a fish, would be deemed guilty of mortal sin. In the eighth century, the emperor Leo, the Isaurian, deceived by some Jewish impostors, commenced the impious war against the Church; but he was resisted by the Roman Pontiffs, St. Gregory II. and St. Gregory III. as also by St. German, the patriarch of Constantinople. Under succeeding emperors the Iconoclastic heresy was pursued till the Second Council of Nice, since which it was extinguished in the East. From the twelfth century, various obscure heretics prosecuted it in the West, until the great revolution of the sixteenth century, when it was sustained and established by the civil power in various nations, as it continues at the present day. It is infinitely remarkable that this detestation of images should have been first defended and eventually perpetuated by the secular power, in opposition to the sentiments of such men as St. Basil, St. Gregory the Theologian, St. Gregory Nyssen, St. Chrysostom, St. Augustin, and other illustrious doctors of the Church, who probably were quite as acute philosophers as the Emperor Leo the Isaurian, Michael Balbus, or even Edward VI. and his sage counsellors. The childish and servile fears of the moderns on this subject were calculated to excite only the sorrow and compassion of the meek, who are inheritors of the earth and of all that it produces. For the sake of an argument, granting it possible that images might be abused, they remarked, that at all events images, like the cherubim, whether representing angels as they appeared to men, or as Clemens Alexandrinus, in his eagerness to discover hieroglyphics every where, fancifully argues, signifying only the rest of the glorified spirits,† were things that, in either sense, the people, surrounded with idolatrous nations, might have abused, and yet they were made by the express command of God.

Why were the Jews so expressly forbidden to touch the ark, though a thing inanimate, and to venerate it so religiously, unless because it was an instrument of religion, and because to fall down at the sight of it was nothing else but to adore God, of whose presence it was the symbol? These objectors to paintings and images might as well object to God for having made the lights of heaven so resplendent, and the plants and herbs so beautiful and odoriferous, because Divine honors have been paid to them by erring creatures, deluded by the artifice of demons. This is what even Walafried Strabo says, which shows that the abbots of the ninth century were men who knew what they were doing.‡ In fact, it may be seen in Mabillon's Preface to the fourth century of the Benedictines, that the great ecclesiastical writers from the sixth century uniformly inculcated the necessity of guarding against abuse, though the most vehement never proceeded so far as to ~~tax~~ with idolatry the practises which they condemned. The writings of Dungal, the recuse of St. Denis, and of Walafrid Strabo, evinced more than a reasonable caution ; yet "images and paintings are so to be had and loved," says the latter, "that neither the utility be nullified by contempt, which irreverence would then be extended to those whose resemblances they are, nor by an immoderate worship, the soundness of faith be wounded, and too much honor being paid to corporeal things, we might seem to contemplate too little things spiritual." In every age of the Church their use was defended with the most perfect sense, at the same time that there was a possible danger to be guarded against ; for where is there not danger for man, who abuses the best things ? But it was well understood that, by the mystery of the Incarnation, idolatry was a crime, as Bossuet says, impossible to a Christian ; for wherever the Mediator, man and God, was adored, there was no possibility of supposing, like the Pagans, that men could be made equal to God, since their distance from him by sin was so fully revealed by that doctrine. The vehemence of Agabard and Jonas was to be ascribed to the accounts which had been transmitted to the West of the conduct of the Greeks ; but the synod of Paris wisely determined, that the peace of the Church in Gaul was to be preferred to this controversy, which then agitated the Greeks. Besides, as was observed by the fathers of the second Council of Nice, the advantage to be derived from imagery, under the spiritual revelation of the Gospel, was something too positive for reason to sanction the neglect of it. The ancients often used the word Γράμμασιν, to imply that a wall or a robe was adorned with paintings, for these were in fact the best letters for most men.* Hence, always to the illiterate, and frequently to philosophers themselves, the walls of a Catholic church were the best of books, and even the windows, which showed many a prophet, and many a saint, served to the end of instruction, † as that of York Cathedral to the east, on which was painted almost the whole history of the Bible. In the Festival, which was a devotional book published in the reign of Henry VII. the use of sacred images was thus clearly explained: "Men should learn by images whom they should worship and follow in living. To do God's worship to images every man is forbidden. Therefore, when thou comest to the church, first behold God's body upon the altar, and thank him that he vouchsafes every day to come from the holy heaven above for the health of thy soul. Look thou upon the cross, and thereby have mind of the passion he suffered for thee ; then on the images of the holy saints, not relying on them, but that by the sight of them thou mayest have mind on them that be in heaven : and so to follow their life as much as thou mayest." Plutarch, in his Treatise on the manner in which one ought to hear, says, "that while there are many parts of the body through which vice passes to the soul, virtue has but one hold on young persons, which is by means of their ears." The church improved on Nature, and made the eyes and other senses minister to sanctity. To this Dante alludes, saying,

*In Lib. de Hæres. cap. XLVI. † Stromat. Lib. V. c. 6. ‡ De Rebus Ecclesiast. Cap. VIII.

* Eurip. Io, 1159.

† Durandi, Rationale, I. 3.

Since from things sensible alone ye learn
 That, which digested rightly, after turns
 To intellectual. For no other cause
 The Scripture, condescending graciously
 To your perception, hands and feet to God
 Attributes, nor so means; and holy church
 Doth represent with human countenance
 Gabriel and Michael.*——

A most admirable passage on this theme occurs in the great work of Vincent of Beauvais. "Superstition," he says, "is a vice contrary to religion. Superstition is said to exceed the medium of religion, not because it exceeds in doing more in the Divine worship than religion would do, or that it tends more to any thing, but because the worship which it pays, it exhibits either to whom it ought not, or in a manner in which it ought not. It is fourfold—consisting in idolatry, divination, observances, and in paying respect more to the written figures than to the meaning of the words. The first is the most grievous of all offences against God. To God the Creator alone, on account of his singular excellence, is due the worship of divinity: therefore, if one should pay Divine worship to any creature, he incurs the vice of superstition, of which idolatry is a species. If we read of images of cherubim in the Old Testament, as we now have in the churches images of the Blessed Virgin and of Christ, it is observed that the worship of latria is not paid to them, but they are used to a certain signification, that the images may impress on the hearts of men the memory of the persons they represent, and that faith may be confirmed as to the excellence of the Creator of the angels."† Assuredly, these were not men to stand in need of the counsels of modern spirituality. "The soul never thinks without a phantasm," says Aristotle, "which shows the error of those who seek for intellectual perfection in what is ἁσωματώτατον."‡ Fichte, an authority not to be suspected here, confesses that, respecting its external operation, philosophy is less powerful than painting; for the latter has a sympathetic power to transfuse sentiments into the souls of other men, which philosophy has not: he says, that painting and sculpture are capable of giving to all persons some kind of perception, that there are pleasures which far surpass any pleasures afforded by the senses. In regard to its outward influence, philosophy is worse off than art, since the latter, by a secret magical sympathy, which runs through the spiritual world can elevate even such as are aliens from art, for a few moments, into some communion with it, and can give them a foretaste of her joys; whereas, the mysteries of philosophy are altogether closed to those in whose souls the idea has not burst forth into life. Would you now remark the effect which is produced upon minds of different degrees of cultivation and intelligence, by the images

*Parad. IX.

† Vincentius Bellovacensis, Speculum Morale, Lib. III. Pars 3. Dist. 26, 27.

‡ Aristotle, De Animâ, A. F.

and paintings in the churches? Mark then, first, the impression upon the multitude, from which Dante borrows that sublime comparison,

Like one who comes from far to see
Our Veronica; and, the while 'tis shown
Hangs over it with never-sated gaze,
And, all that he hath heard revolving, saith Unto himself in thought: "And didst thou look E'en thus, O Jesus, my true Lord and God?
And was this semblance thine? so gaz'd I then Adoring."*

Open the writings of Leibnitz and of Lavater, and you will find evidence that the study of philosophy, so far from depriving men of such transports, only renders them more profound. Nature, in the tender and ingenious solicitude for the wants of all, imparts them even to humanity in its lowest state; witness that effecting description by a modern writer, of a poor little deformed orphan, whom a priest of blessed charity had nourished, and made a bell-ringer in Nôtre Dame at Paris. "After all," he says, "this poor creature turned his attention with regret to the side of men. His cathedral sufficed to him. It was peopled with marble figures of kings, saints, bishops, who at least never laughed in his face, but had always for him a tranquil and benevolent look. The very monsters in stone had no hatred against him; they rather seemed to mock other men. The saints were his friends, the monsters were his friends, and the cathedral was to him society, nature, and the universe." All that we have said can give but a feeble idea of the interest, in point of literature, art, and history, attached to the ancient churches; but even this little is sufficient to account for the intense affection with which persons of every description, during the ages of faith, revered and loved them. At Florence, in the Piazza del Duomo, the place where Dante loved to sit contemplating the cathedral is distinguished by a white stone. In the nave is an old painting, in which this poet is represented walking outside of the walls of the city, holding a book in his hand, and the dome of the cathedral appears the most conspicuous object of the landscape. In allusion to the baptistery, he says himself, —Saint John's fair dome, of me belov'd.†

Lebeuf is enabled to trace the site of the palace of the pious King Gontran, by observing that of the church of St. Marcel, for whom he had so great a devotion;‡ and in Spain, the castles of nobility were always constructed so as to front the church. St. Odo, the second abbot of Cluni, describes the grief of kings and people on the burning of the church of St. Martin at Tours, and says, that not only the rustics, who so peculiarly loved the blessed man, but even kings were seen to weep.§ Petrarch's love for churches appears strongly marked in his cor-

*Parad. XXXI.

†Infern. XIX.

‡Hist. du Diocese de Paris, Tom. III. 213.

§De Combust. Basil. Bibliothec. Cluniacens. 146.

respondence. In a letter to William de Pastrengo he says, "I dwell at Parma, and pass my life in the church or in my garden : tired of the city, I wander often into the woods ;" but his chief affection was for the church of St. Ambrose at Milan, to be near which, he hired a house in that quarter of the city. He says that he never entered it without feeling an extraordinary fervor. There was an image of St. Ambrose, said to resemble him. Petrarch was never weary of beholding it. "This great archbishop appeared to give me his blessing. What majesty in his countenance ! what sweetness and expression in his eyes ! This sight spread over my heart a lively and inexpressible tranquillity. I rejoiced that I came to Milan." Afterwards, when inviting a young man of genius, named Modi, to live with him as instructor to his son John, he ends his letter, which stated the advantages he could promise, by saying, "I forgot our being near St. Ambrose, which may perhaps have more influence with you than all I have said." Hence, we do not find these great Christian poets and philosophers procuring curious or exquisite dwellings for themselves. Petrarch composed his Africa in a gloomy house in a narrow street of Parma ; and the house of Ariosto, in the little street of Miresole, in Ferrara (though, as the inscription modestly states, suitable to him), is small, and devoid of every advantage which we might suppose would endear it to a poet. But the one was near the cathedral and the other adjoining the great abbey of Benedictines ; and this was sufficient.

The temporal power and the voice of genius co-operated with the affections of the people and the faith of the clergy, to preserve the churches from all profanation. The first churches were called Basilicas, as if they were royal dwellings : for even the word in its ordinary usage with the Romans had reference to kingly jurisdiction, though in the litany at the consecration of a church, the title of regal house is given to it, no doubt, on higher than such temporal and human grounds. According to the statutes of the council of Lyons, we all decree, said the Fathers assembled at Sens, in the year 1460, that no one in churches shall raise any sedition, or clamor, or confusion. Let there be no councils of Universities, or of any societies held in them ; neither convocations nor public parliaments, nor vain and profane conversations.* By the canons of the Council of Mayence, in the year 813, it was forbidden to hold any assemblies in churches for temporal affairs. This sense of what was due to the sanctity of churches, appeared even in warriors and conquerors. Henry, King of England, making war upon Fulco, Count of Anjou, was defeated and forced to fly with great loss of prisoners. Early the following morning the count gave directions to the monks who were in the Camp, to prepare to sing a solemn mass ; but when they came to the church they could not enter it, in consequence of the crowd of prisoners who had been captured on the preceding day, and placed there in confinement. The count, turning to his own people, grievously reproved them. "What have ye done," said he, "fearing not God, neither having any reverence for men ! Are you ignorant that the Jews were severely rebuked by our Lord for this very offence ? ‘ Domus mea domus orationis vocabitur.’ By the canons of the church, whose sons we are called, we are told that whatever criminal shall escape to a church, he should be suffered to depart without punishment ; and we who judge the land should love justice, that we may live to justice, delivered from sin.” Then he called his steward, and ordered him to provide an abundance of meat and wine, that, strengthened with bread and made joyful with wine, these prisoners might all return to their own homes without any ransom : they were in number about five hundred.*

* Concil. Senonens. Cap. II. apud Dacher. Spicileg. Tom. V.

Even in their vengeance, the men of these ages respected the churches. Barbarossa,—that name ne’er uttered without tears in Milan,—in pronouncing its destruction, commanded that the cathedral should be spared, as also the Ambrosian Basilica, and the monastery called the Greater, which was enriched with the gifts of the Emperor Otho, in the tenth century, and by Didier, the last King of the Lombards. Philip II. King of Spain besieging the town of St. Quintin, and having to make a breach, was forced with his cannon to batter down a small chapel on the wall, dedicated to St. Laurence, in reparation of which destruction he afterwards built, under the invocation of the same saint, that famous chapel in the Escorial in Spain, which is, for workmanship, one of the wonders of the world. Even Alaric, when Rome was taken and sacked, allowed the church of St. Peter and that of St. Paul to serve as an asylum. The barbarian soldiers protected the translation of the treasures of the altar, such an influence had the force of the Christian tradition upon the minds of the rudest warriors ; so that the security of the churches from the hands of men appeared to become known even to the instinct of animals, for the stork would build her nest on their towers, and by the holiness of its dwelling, secure the right of succession.

Some churches acquired a peculiar interest from the saints who had frequented them in their lives. Thus the church of St. Merri at Paris, used to be visited as that in which St. Edmund, Archbishop of Canterbury, when a student of theology in the year 1220, used to assist every night at matins, † and that of St. Etienne des Gres, as that in which St. Francis de Sales used to perform his devotions when a student. Others had claims to veneration of a more historical or poetic kind, as that old Baptistry, where were made Christian the great spirits sung by Dante. But all were holy and venerable places corresponding with that desire imprinted in the soul of man which prompts him to seek places even on this earth, where he may feel, that in a more especial manner, God is honored and adored, and where the very ground is sanctified and holy. Every church, under whatever saint, was consecrated in honor of the holy and victorious cross ; every consecrated church had beheld the twelve mystic lights which were borne round it in procession, commemorating the eternal light and the lucid mansions where rest the souls of the saints.

* Gesta Consulum Andegavensium, Dacher. Spicileg. Tom. X.

† Lebeuf, Hist. du Diocese de Paris, l. 6.

Sublime are the words of the divine office in the preface of the dedication. "This is truly the house of prayer, the temple of the habitation of thy glory, the seat of unchangeable truth, the sanctuary of eternal love. This is the ark which leads us from the flood of the world into the port of salvation; this the only and beloved spouse whom Christ acquired with his blood, whom he vivifies with his Spirit; in whose bosom, being regenerated by thy grace, we are fed with the milk of the word, we are strengthened with the bread of life, we are consoled with the assistance of thy mercy. This he preserving, militates faithfully on earth, and he crowning, triumphs, everlastingly in heaven." "Who," cries St. Bernard, "would fear to call the walls of this church holy, which the hands of consecrated priests have sanctified with so many mysteries, within which the sacred lessons are read, and the devout whisper of holy prayer ascends, walls which are honored by the blessed presence of the sacred relics, and where flights of angels are known to keep watch? Yet these walls are not holy on account of themselves, but by reason of those who are sanctified. The house is holy on account of bodies, bodies are holy on account of souls, and souls are holy on account of the Spirit of God dwelling in them."* Men there are indeed, who have yet to learn with what veneration, as St. Jerome says, they ought to regard the Catholic altar, its sacred chalices, and holy veils, and other things pertaining to the worship of our Lord's passion; who have yet to learn that these are not empty things without sense or holiness, but that from their connection with the awful mysteries of our Lord, they are to be venerated with the same respect.† They have been accustomed to assume the manners of those who ascribe all things to fortune and deny a Providence.

Atque adeo intrepidi quæcumque altaria tangunt.

But the profound awe and scrupulous reverence with which St. Jerome used to enter the churches‡ continued during the ages of faith to move the mind of Christians with respect to them. The primitive Christians used never to enter the churches without washing their hands and putting on their cleanest apparel.§ The inscription which was on several of the vases for the blessed water in the churches of Paris NIΨΩN ANOMHMATA MH MONAN OΨIN, was said to have been originally engraved on that of the church of St. Sophia at Constantinople.|| Kings took off their crowns, and in some countries it was even the custom to make bare the feet at the threshold.

"Follow my advice," said St. Jerome to a heretic, "enter the churches of the martyrs, and you will soon be cleansed. You will be kindled not by those lighted tapers at the tombs of the martyrs which displease you, but by invisible flames, and you will then confess what you now deny."¶ This remark leads me to the conclusion, for it completes the explanation of the secret, why such importance was ascribed in a spiritual philosophy, even to the material temples during the ages of faith ; why they were constructed with such zeal, and preserved with such veneration. From what motive do you ask were men so indefatigable in constructing and preserving these magnificent churches ? Was it, as a late writer says, from the want which they felt of something visible to demonstrate the power of unknown and confused principles ? Was it from any such vague indefinite speculation, or for any positive object of mere temporal good and national glory ? No ; the modern philosophers may languish over their proud theories respecting them ; their feeling artists may admire and attempt to imitate them ; under the encouragement of those who frequent them like the bats in former times, who used to feed upon the oil of their lamps, there may be some who are ready to do full justice to their admirable grandeur, in an architectural or even in a poetical point of view ; but they must be seen in another light, and with more philosophic eyes, if men would rightly understand their true connection with the ages of our past history ; they must be considered in their character of Catholic sanctuaries disposed for certain specific moral ends, towards furthering the sanctification of souls, and hastening the number of the elect, as having their splendor within ; and as being remedies and instruments of deliverance for the wretched captives of this world.

* In Dedicat. Ecclesiæ, Serm. IV. † S. Hieronymi Epist. LXXXVIII. ‡ Epist. XXXVIII. § Benedict. XIV. de Sacrificio Missæ, Sect. I. 65.

|| De St. Victor, Tableau de Paris, III. ii. 425.

¶ Advers. Vigilant.

Churches were formerly asylums to save man from the death of the body, and still they continue to be spiritual asylums, to which men can fly at every moment and escape the death of the soul, recover the joy of salvation, and be strengthened with a perfect spirit. Behold them, for instance, on the vigil of a festival. But if you be of those who are with error yet encompassed, let me first attempt to instruct you. Ah ! it is afflicting to see you enter our churches ! What furious or what suspicious looks do you dart at the holy place, as if, in the obscurity of this vast edifice, you supposed that God was concealing an avenger, armed to inflict punishment on you for your own calumnies and for the sacrilege of your fathers ! But no : thou art within the house of peace. Here thou must all distrust behind thee leave ; here be vile fear extinguished. This choir resounds with the sweet hymns of evening, and all these retired chapels along the nave, are thronged with children preparing for their first communion, or with weeping penitents confessing their sins, and hearing the wonderful words of the Catholic church, which she alone can pronounce,—penance and restitution. Tranquillized as to what respects yourself, say where do you find indications here of unknown and confused principles ? but mark with joy and with astonishment how this sublime work, raised by mortal hands, encompasses and assists a mighty spiritual operation ! Here is a spectacle to give delight to angels ; for here is visible, to the eye of those winged messengers, the elevation of innocent souls to God ; here they witness that which in heaven makes the wheel of justice run counter to the edge, the sinner's cheek stained by the precious streaming tears of self-accusing : here they mark the first steps of a renovated life, resolutions to forgive enemies, perhaps to forget your re-proaches, your calumnies, vows to found hospitals for the poor, to deliver the helpless, to forsake all things for Christ.

"The whole sacred place ought to be neld by us always in great reverence," says a writer of the thirteenth century, "on account of the many benefits which are there vouchsafed to those who there devoutly pray. For there the penitent sinners receive pardon; the just, returning thanks merit grace; the poor, lamenting and praying, receive alms; the rich, showing mercy, merit for themselves in return God's mercy; there the priest, celebrating, offers to God, for himself and many others praying, on bended knees, the sacrifice worthier than all sacrifice. There the devout supplicant at mass meditates with tears on the sacred passion of Christ. There the stranger and traveller, wandering over the earth and sea, receives a blessing, and Jesus Christ as a faithful friend and guide, who leads all wanderers safe through every way. There the youth, who serves the priest, supplies the place of an angel. There the communicant receives the most holy body of the Lord, the food of angels, the most precious of all gifts. There, before going to his daily labor, the disconsolate receives comfort, the timid confidence, the contrite spiritual joy. There the tempted finds a remedy, the distracted counsel, the fainting help. There the sound receives support, the sick medicine, the dead by prayer that riseth up from the heart which lives in grace, deliverance from penal fire. It is good therefore to enter the house of God, to go about the tombs, to contemplate the relics and images of the saints, suppliantly to adore the sacrament of Christ, not to discuss high things, or wish to penetrate difficulties, but secret things humbly to venerate, and profound things to commit to God. For truth deceives no man. Almighty God can do all things. Brethren, mark these portals, and remember now is the time of grace; a little while and we can seek and knock, a little while and we can merit an eternal kingdom. Lo the gate of heaven is not yet shut; the doors are open for all who will to enter them.

"O faithful and humble soul, consider how great is the mercy of God upon thee in all thy life, which still delays and waits for thee. O happy church: truly in thee is a hidden God, an infinite treasure, a copious redemption, an everlasting safety. Human eye seeth not, nor can any finite intelligence penetrate that mysterious ineffable presence of heaven's great Lord, the almighty foe to ill. O salutaris hostia quæ celi pandis ostium, wondrous things are related of thee, to whom, by high effect of surpassing grace, nothing is impossible, who canst in mercy or in judgment do all things in heaven and on earth! Let weak and frail man prepare himself then before he enters the church, remembering what majesty is there veiled, and presuming not of himself, but seeking pardon in holy fear with the publican, that he may deserve with Lazarus, in the future country, to find eternal rest.* That men to whom such thoughts were present, might forget all that material beauty and sublimity of arches and towers, which alone arrest the attention of those who have never beheld churches, unless in their perverted and desecrated state, should fill no one with surprise. But it is from considering them in their spiritual point of view, as sacramental instruments, assisting sinners to enter upon salvation's way, and as supplying that living water, of which those who drink shall never more feel thirst, that you can comprehend the consolation of those who, with faith and meekness entered them, and that you can explain why those very doors, as at the four basilicas of Rome, are literally worn down with the kisses of the faithful : it is from such reflections that the disciple of the modern religions, who returns from visiting the threshold of the apostles, may perhaps gain sufficient wisdom to exclaim with Jacob, when he rose from sleep, Truly that place was holy and I knew it not."

* Thom. de Kempis, Sermonum Pars III.

The privileges of sanctuary, attached to the churches in the middle ages, so secure from violation, even from the most flagitious, in consequence of the terror inspired by the tradition of the deaths of Robert de Clermont, Marechal of France, and of John de Châlons, Marechal of Champagne, who broke open the gates of St. Mère, need not detain us long. For that of Westminster, Shakespeare has inspired us all with a poetic affection. That of the temple still gives its name to an adjoining street. In the old time, long before the house of Durham was suppressed, the abbey church, and all the church yard, and all the circuit thereof, was a sanctuary for any man that had committed any great offence, and fled to the church door, knocking at it, to have it opened. "There were certain men that did lye always in two chambers over the said north door, for the purpose, that when any such offenders did come and knock, straitway they were let in at any hour, and then they did run straitway to the Galilee bell and did tole it, to the intent that any man that heard it might know that some man had taken sanctuary : and when the prior had intelligence thereof, he sent word and commanded them to have a gown of black cloth, made with a cross of yellow, called St. Cuthbert's cross, set on the shoulder of the left arm, to the intent that every one might see that there was such a privilege granted by God unto St. Cuthbert's shrine for all such offenders to fly unto for succor until such time as they might obtain their prince's pardon ; and likewise they had meat and drink, bedding and other necessities for thirty-seven days at the expence of the house, till such time as the prior could get them conveyed out of the diocese."* There is something in this ancient privilege which pleads forcibly in its defence, at least where poets are the judges, one of whom after describing a poor victim who had taken sanctuary in the church of our Lady at Paris, concludes thus : "We may add that the church, this vast church which surrounded her on all sides, which guarded and saved her, was itself a sovereign source of calm. The solemn lines of this architecture, the religious attitude of all the objects which were before her, the pious and serene thoughts which disengaged themselves, as it were from all the pores of this stone, produced an impression upon her. The edifice also had sounds of such blessedness and of such majesty, that they soothed this suffering soul. The monotonous chant of the clergy, the responses of the people, sometimes inarticulate, sometimes thundering, the harmonious vibrations of the glazed casements, the deep and solemn bell murmuring from the towers above, made her lose the memory of her woes and soothed her imagination. Thus each sun that rose found her more consoled, with healthier looks, less pale." But the need for sanctuaries has ceased. They have nearly every where disappeared; and though in Italy, in the fifteenth century, that regal age of darkness, from the clouds which attended and facilitated, if they did not even occasion, the rise of heresy, the asylums or sanctuaries were dreadfully abused, we may with truth apply to them as they existed in the middle ages, the observation of Müller, that in heroic times those institutions must have been of double importance which checked the fearful consequences of a rash act, sanctified the workings of an uneasy conscience, or rather gave time for reconciliation with God, and provided against the eager thirst for revenge which would have involved both the aggressor and the injured in equal misery.

* The ancient Rites and Monuments of the Church of Durham, 71.

CHAPTER III.

BUT it was not alone within towered cities, or the walls of vast basilicas that religion gave to the meek the possession of the earth. Religious men possessed the isles of Iona and Lindisfarne, and hermits wild rocks in the desert sea. For those who lived well, who gave their hearts to God, and placed their happiness in him, the whole world was but a temple, as Vauquelin, the Lord of Iveteaux, said in his address to princes.* "To a faithful man the whole world is full of riches," as St. Bonaventura said, "fideli homini totus mundus divitiarum est :—for all things good and evil are made to serve him."† Whatever in creation was beautiful, being referred to the glory of God, who alone is the origin and source of all things, was part of the inalienable inheritance of the meek, so that Louis of Blois says, "If you once possess God you possess all the rest. He comprises within himself all that delights our hearts and gives us pleasure. Being himself the model, the first type of all things, he is every thing: he is the increated essence of all that is; for without doubt, in his eternal science, he has had from all eternity the plan and idea of all that he has made; all that has received existence from him has been known to him always,

* Gouget, Bibliotheq. Française, Tom. XVI. 113.

† Meditationes Vitæ Christi, c. XXI.

always lived, and will live for ever in his divine thoughts. We ourselves have in this manner been eternally present to the thought of God. In this sense we are in him from all eternity; in this sense we are uncreated, because in him, in his thought, all things live eternally. Thus, in the essence of God are the models of all things which remain for ever without degenerating. Whereas in this material world, made for our senses, we have only, as it were, the signs and emblems of real things. Now these signs and emblems pass with time, but the perfections of the Creator are everlastingly the same.”* “Seek whatever you wish,” says St. Augustin, “nevertheless you will find nothing dearer, nothing better than Him who made all things : seek him who made, and in him and from him you will have all things.”† “Observe,” says the holy Eucher in a letter to Valerian, “that what I say here is entirely in accordance with that attachment which we all have for life. Yes, it is the interest of this love of life that I speak to you now on the part of God : for if you find such sweetness in it, all miserable and rapid as is this life which passes, ought you not to feel far more attached to that which will be eternally happy ? ought you not to desire to perpetuate that which gives you so much pleasure, to add a thousand new charms to a state which is already so agreeable to you ? in a word, to render infinite and immortal this imperfect and transitory happiness, which, notwithstanding its deficiency, appears still worthy of all your affection ?” We see, therefore, how the saints were disposed to enjoy and to sanction that present possession of the riches of the visible nature, which was promised from the mountain. It seemed to them as highly useful in the two first of the three conditions of the internal life, in correspondence to which the holy church proposed the recital of the gradual Psalms, on which foundation the great Bellarmin composed his book De ascensione mentis in Deum, which Cardinal Bona said should be read by all those who desire to understand the invisible things of God, by those which are made, and who greatly wish not so much to know as to use the mystic steps of spiritual ascension, for whom what serves to the ruin of others becomes an instrument of elevation, to whom the aspect of creatures is a ladder of ascent, not a stumbling-block of offence.‡ It seems then as if this seat of earth were to them like heaven ; as if angels might repose there or wander with delight and love to haunt her sacred shades ; their days are only a constant ecstacy, their soul a song of praise. These are the meditative souls described by the poet, whom solitude and contemplation elevate irresistibly towards ideas of infinity, that is, towards religion : all whose thoughts turn to enthusiasm and prayer ; whose whole existence is a mute hymn to the Deity and to hope ; who seek in themselves and in the creation which surrounds them steps on which they may ascend to God, expressions and images to reveal him to themselves, and to reveal themselves to him,§ because God is clearer seen

* Institutio Spiritualis, cap. VIII. † Traet. in Ps. xxxiv. ‡ De Divina Psalmodia, 289.

§ De Lamartine Harmonies Poétiques et Religieuses, Tom. I.

by reflection in his creatures than in his essence, as the sun in the morning was seen first by the Sidonian servant who looked towards the west when he beheld its light shining upon the mountains.

Profound and astonishing are the meditations of holy men respecting the love with which these sanctified creatures may be regarded by a meek and faithful soul, living in deep discernment of goodness celestial, whose broad signature is on the universe. For "what is paradise?" asks the author of Theologia Germanica. "Paradise is whatever exists : for whatever exists is good and delightful and agreeable to God. Therefore also it exists and may rightly be called paradise. Paradise is also said to be a vestibule or a suburb of the celestial kingdom. Thus also every thing that exists may well be called a suburb of eternity. For creatures are a demonstration and a way which leads to God and to eternity. So all things are a vestibule and suburb of eternity, and therefore may deservedly be styled paradise. In this paradise all things are allowed to man excepting the fruit of one tree, and that is self-will, or the willing of any thing contrary to the eternal will."* Here arises a question. Since all things ought to be loved, ought sin to be loved? The answer is that it ought not : for when it is said "all things," good is understood ; for all that exists is good inasmuch as it exists. The Devil, as far as he exists, is good. In this respect, there is no such thing as evil, or what is not good. But sin is to wish, to desire, or to love something contrary to God, and to wish this is not to exist, therefore it is not good. In brief, nothing is good unless inasmuch as it is in God ; but all things, as far as they exist, are in God, and indeed much more than in themselves ; therefore all things, as far as they exist, are good. If there were any thing which was not in essence in God it would not be good ; and to wish and desire any thing which is against God, is not in God, for God cannot wish or desire any thing against God, or otherwise than God, therefore that is evil and not good, and also clearly it does not exist.† Let us remark here, that in this manner the desolations introduced by heresy were unable to disturb the possessions of the meek ; for all that existed in heresy was good and Catholic ; its negations corresponding with all evil, did not exist, for they were against God ; but all that remained could have been used by Catholics and was used by them : heresy therefore is truly nothing, excepting in the form of speech. St. Anselm pursues the same argument. "Sin and evil," he says, "are said to be nothing ; for God made all things, and all things made subsist, and all substance is good in itself. Therefore, what is called evil is nothing but the absence of good : heresy is nothing but the absence of Catholicism, as blindness is the want of sight, and darkness the absence of light."‡

This restored harmony between the soul of man and nature, is one of the mys-

* Theologia Germanica, cap. XLVII.

† Theologia Germanica, cap. XLV.

‡ S. Anselmi Epist. Lib. II. 8. Elucidarii, Lib. II.

teries of the Catholic religion, respecting which Baader makes divine reflections. "When God the original and positive centre of man dwelt within him, man knew centrally all nature; but since through sin nature has been transposed and materialized, deprived of its primitive spirituality, and that God dwells in man only in an external manner, man no longer knows things centrally but views them from aside, and from a part of the circumference." The effect of faith and meekness consequent upon it, is to restore man to his centre, and to reconcile him with the universal order; for as St. Thomas says of light, that it meets with nothing contrary to it in nature, since darkness is only the absence of it in places to which it has not penetrated, so in nature there is no opposition to God, nor to the will of those who are united to him. The saints, therefore, have a devout love for nature, because it is in the divine order; and they have a human affection for it, because, as Frederick Schlegel says, they can at present perceive in it certain indications as it were, pointings and winks, which it is impossible to overlook, denoting a sympathy with the desires and hopes of their own hearts. In general nature is only the silent echo and earthly repetition of the divine revelations; and yet it is not without ground and meaning, when it is said in allusion to the great day of universal deliverance, that nature like a groaning creature sighs for it with an unutterable longing.* "Do the elements perceive God?" asks the disciple in the dialogue Elucidarium, ascribed to St. Anselm, to whom the master replies, "God never made any thing which was insensible. For things that are inanimate to us indeed are insensible and dead, but to God all things live and all things perceive their Creator."† Not without reason then may it be affirmed that the meek of faithful ages loved and possessed the joys of nature in all her variety of creatures, of hours, and of seasons. Truly to their perfect spirits sweet was the breath of morn; sweet her rising, with charm of earliest birds; pleasant the sun

"When first on this delightful land he spread
His orient beams; on herb, tree, fruit, and flower, Glistening with dew :—— to them, indeed, the heavens were a ceaseless hymn, and each hour was a morning. The tribe of lowly ones may have left for the silent cloister, raftered halls of state, and the paths to the forest glade where knights were wont to hold their tournaments, yet not the more ceased they to wander where the muses haunt, clear spring, or shady grove, or sunny hill, smit with the love of sacred song. It is related in an ancient life of St. Maur, from an old manuscript, that St. Babolein, the first abbot of the abbey des Fossés used to recite the Psalms every night on certain great stones in the river Marne.‡ Such was his employment all through the night, while Philomela wept, and renewed her piteous song from bough to

* Philosophie des Lebens, 93.

† Lib. I cap. 5.

‡ Lebeuf, Hist. du Diocèse de Paris, Tom. V. 161.

bough. Peter the venerable, mentions too, a certain holy Carthusian monk who used often to spend the night in the open air in order to contemplate the sky and the works of the Creator.* Daniel's fountain near Malmesbury, was so called from the holy Bishop Daniel, who was fond of spending whole nights at its side while singing the praise of God. Gervais, the excellent Archbishop of Rheims, a holy, learned, and prudent prelate, had so loved forest wanderings in his youth, that he placed before the gate of his palace a brazen stag, with an inscription, stating that he did so, in order to be reminded of his native woods. They loved the clear fountains, and the asphodel meadow, and the countless forms and tones of that admirable nature which each returning spring seemed more fair than ever; it filled their eyes with pleasant tears to trace the goodness of their God in these his lower works, and they no longer wondered that the Samaritan woman should have recognized, and confessed the Messiah at the fountain whom the Jewish people knew not in the temple.†

What a deep sense of the loveliness of this beautiful earth is shown by the Capuchin friar Lombez, where he reproves the complaints of earthly sadness, and traces expressions of sorrow for the world to a root of dangerous melancholy.‡ “If,” saith he, “amidst so many riches and beauties we are in a hard exile, as we are in fact, the dignity of our souls must be very great, and our true country wondrous fair, and the love of God for us surpassing all conception, since he banishes us to such an admirable world, a place so adorned with all kinds of loveliness.”§ Even the austere Carthusian order, bred in the ancient forest, the deep stable of wild beasts, rejects not the possession of nature's softer beauties. Witness Calci's holy pile, with its lovely cloister, and its separate gardens, so fair and odoriferous with orange trees and every sweet flower, with its enchanting groves of olives clothing those surrounding Apennines, which are seen through long vistas of arches. The Hexameron of St. Basil, a kind of course on natural history, was preached during the fast of Lent both morning and evening: the scientific part is defective, but one of the greatest modern writers admits that the details are charming. The history of plants and animals gives rise to moral instructions, a common practice of the middle ages, as when those cones of the pine which cover the mountain side, composed of a multitude of grains which are kept in close union by a resinous cement, are said by father Elzear of Archer to be an emblem of religion which consists in the union of many persons connected by charity; or as when father Diego de Stella compares the pleasures of the world to those reeds which when they shoot out first in the spring of the year, do with their fresh green color delight the eyes for a while, but if you do break them, and look within them, you shall find nothing there but emptiness and hollowness; or again, as when Dante compares the dropping away of earthly pleasures to the fall of the light autumnal leaves,

* S. Petri Ven. de Miraculis, Lib. II. c. 29.

† Traité de la joie de l'ame.

‡ S. Hieronym. Epist. XCV.

§ Id. Chap. VIII.

"One still another following, till the bough, Strews all its honor on the earth beneath;"

or as when Albert the Great shows in his eighth book on animals, that in their instinct we should recognize the divine wisdom, since in whatever degree possessed by some, it is still but the universal instinct, and not greater in one than in another, excepting that it may be more developed in some by certain circumstances. All creatures were objects of their love, so that even the authors of fable conceive a case of one who condemned himself to a voluntary penance for having killed a faithful dog. The multitude of dogs without masters which are found in Lisbon, is attributed to the sensitiveness of the Portuguese, and their unwillingness to deprive any animal unnecessarily of life.*

Monteil, in describing the virtue of the French curates, takes care to show that one point of their charge to rustics and peasants was to be kind to their animals.† He quotes one question in an ancient tract De Institutione Confessorum, from the chapter concerning husbandmen and rustics, in which the demand occurs "si boves nimis fatigavit undedestruantur." "The sorrows of beasts," says Frederick Schlegel, and he expresses but the sentiments of men in the ages of faith, "are certainly a theme for the meditation of men, and I could not agree to the justice of regarding it as a subject unworthy of reflection, or of permitting sympathy with them to be banished from the human breast."‡ And yet to plead in behalf of that sympathy would now be often considered an indication of a weak or defective intelligence; and rather would he seem of sound and perfect nature who would be willing to partake of that amusement of the Roman epicures which Seneca describes, of watching the mullet expiring in the channel on the table, in order to observe how its golden and red colors faded, so alive are men to every barbarous joy! The notion of religion as compatible with natural savage cruelty and hardness of heart was unknown in the middle ages. St. Pius V. prohibited the bull-fights as inconsistent with piety.

The monk Frodoard, speaking of St. Remi, in his History of the Church of Rheims, says, that "his sanctity moved not only rational creatures but even tamed those that are without reason, and that one day as he was giving a familiar repast to some intimate friends and rejoicing to see them happy, some sparrows came down and began to eat crumbs out of his hand;"§ he relates also that St. Basle, who lived as an anchorite on the mountain near Rheims, having saved a poor beast that had fled from the forest, pursued by a hunter whose dogs seemed to forget all their ferocity on approaching his little cell, it used to be marked by all hunters in that forest ever afterwards that any beast who could gain the heights in that forest was safe, for that then the dogs would lose their ardor and the hunters their courage.||

St. Meinrad, the hermit of Einsiedeln, in the ninth century, after the example

* Letters on Portugal to Orosius, 11.

† Hist. des Français. Tom. III. 384.

‡ Philosophie des Lebens.

§ Lib. 1. cap. xii.

Id. Lib. II. cap. 3

of St. John the apostle of charity, had tamed two ravens which showed their fidelity at his death, by pursuing his murderers to Zurich with horrible cries, which led to their detection.* The same affection for animals, is expressly ascribed to St. Anselm, St. Francis, and many other great servants of God. St. Francis used often to say his canonical hours with the birds, near their leafy houses. St. Bonaventura describes the rapturous joys of contemplative devotion by a divine irradiation in the mind as exerting an influence even externally upon the body, and filling the soul with a desire to embrace every creature of God, sometimes impelling the body to motion, and at others to rest from excess of sweetness. Then whatever the mind beholds it considers it as abounding with a certain divine sweetness.† The master of the sentences declares it to have been the opinion of the holy fathers, that no creature would have been poisonous, or hurtful to man if he had not sinned.‡ In the ages of faith men believed that the friends of God would be protected from the evil which nature had contracted; they evinced an affection even for inanimate creatures which were not excluded from the sphere of their benevolence. St. Severinus repented having uttered an imprecation on the tree whose branches had wounded him as he hastened to serve a church, and alighting from his horse, he prostrated himself at its roots, and besought God to spare it. St. Gregory of Tours, says, that this noble saint used to gather flowers in the season when lilies unfolded their beauteous forms, and that he used to fasten them on the walls of his church.§ On the external walls of churches, these humble plants were carved in stone, as we read of Melrose.

"Spreading herbs and flowerets bright,
Glistened with the dew of night;
Nor herb, nor floweret glistened there,
But was carved in the cloister arches as fair."

The holy vestments used in the abbey of Lindisfarne were adorned with figures of the wild animals that lived upon the neighboring shore. Books of hours used to contain lessons in agriculture attached to the calendar: these appear in the Heures de Rouen in Gothic letters and in many others. The miniatures of the ecclesiastical calendar represented the rural labors of each season, which are also sculptured along with the signs of the zodiac on the front of the cathedral of Cremona, built in 1274: and on the brazen gates of Loretto, the rustic youth beholds an image of his own occupations in the noble figure of Adam, breaking the ground in pursuance of the primal sentence. Nor was it only in speculation that nature was enjoyed; the undertakings of men in the middle ages, in favor of material interests, were as arduous as our own, though generally for a nobler end. Dante does not disdain to borrow a similitude from the Flemings, "and their mound 'twixt Ghent and Bruges to chase back the ocean, fearing his tumultuous

* Tschudi Einsiedlische Chronik.

† Stimul. Divini Amoris, Pars III. cap. 6.

‡ Petr. Lombard Sentent. Lib. II. Distinct. 15.

§ De Gloria Confessorum, 50.

tide that drives towards them, and from the Paduans and theirs along the Brenta to defend their towns and castles, ere the genial warmth be felt on Chiarentana's top." But mightier tasks than these were accomplished by the Teutonic order in Prussia, of which the greatest was the Cyclopiæan bank of the grand master Meinhard, in the thirteenth century, between Elbing and Marienburg, to prevent the inundations caused by the Nogat and the Weichsel, by means of which a vast portion of land was reclaimed and made subservient to human wants. During six years thousands of men and thousands of wagons were employed day after day till 1294, when the amazing work was finished. The wanderer in our day stands rivetted with astonishment at the spectacle, and admits that the name of Meinhard must be immortal. "His magnificent works proclaim how excellent he was," says the old chronicle, "for he dared to undertake a thing which other men would not have had courage to imagine."*

In ages when the ideal of justice was believed to be St. Louis seated after hearing mass at the foot of an oak in the forest of Vincennes, making his friends sit round him, and then giving audience to all who had business to transact with him, it is not strange that independent of motives of public economy the beauty and interests of nature should have become even an object of legislative care. The wisdom of the middle ages provided by a multitude of minute statutes and practices for the preservation of forests and secured their perpetuity. To protect the celebrated pine forest near Ravenna, many sovereign pontiffs issued briefs, testifying the utmost watchfulness in its regard: as in the Virgilian line alluding to the provision of the early Roman laws,† the woods were deemed worthy of consular solicitude. The simple manners which prevailed among all classes of society kept men familiar too with the humble charms of the animal world. The δῖος ὑπορβός was a personage belonging to our Christian annals. The blessed confessor Pachelis, when a youth, tended the flocks in the fields, and he ever loved that kind of life, as being favorable to the exercise of humility and the preservation of innocence. The occupations of agriculture form part of the work entitled the innocent pleasures by Platina of Rome. The sons of kings used to be familiar with their flocks upon the mountains, beauteous with wild flowers, as the Pass of Storek and the Leibern See, which looks on Engelberg's holy pile. Charlemagne, every morning after mass, used to pass in review the poultry of the lower court. We read of many nobles in the middle ages who believed, as Poggins says, that a country life and the woods, conduce more to the attainment of nobility than cities, and who would have approved of no passage in Cicero's Orations more than that in which he asks, "What cupidity could be in Roscius, who always lived in the country, and was occupied in agriculture,—a life greatly removed from cupidity, and connected with duty."‡ Men were then subjects, but not citizens,—a term which the modern sophists have adopted, without troubling themselves to reflect upon its meaning. In the heathen time, city states really existed, as in the Athenian and every similar democracy, where each citizen was in some way settled in the city, and had the right of possessing a house there.

* Voigt. IV. 34.

† Petrus Crinitus de Honest. Discuss. V.

‡ Pro C. Roscio, Amer.

Even in Homer's time, every thing that concerned the government of a state was connected with the city, and the military families and the nobles dwelt in it.* Hence, it is viewed in Homer as a disgrace or a misfortune for a noble to live among the bondsmen in the country, which was abandoned to laborers of the soil. Hence the distinction between the term an Athenian and inhabitant of Attica. Even Plato used the former as a more honorable appellation than the latter, though Müller remarks, that even in Athens there was among the people a constant struggle of feeling between the turbulent working of the democracy and the peaceful inclination to their ancient country life. The Christian state left men free to choose the latter, which religion sanctified, and the term of citizen would thenceforth only be applied in its natural and classical signification, to denote those who had a corporal residence in cities.† The country was no longer left exclusively to the rustic laborers; the priests of the holy church spread themselves over it; the nobles were attached to their ancient forest life; and we read of many who in youth, or in seasons of recollection, from a desire of greater innocence, would have deigned, like Apollo, to dwell beneath the roof of Admetus, mixing with his menial train, driving along his flocks, whether they roved through the winding valley or rested in the upland grove. So clear and powerful is Nature's voice, that even Socrates, after all his arguments to prove the superiority of the city to the country, was no sooner seated peaceably in the cool shade of the plane-tree on the banks of the Ilissus, than he confessed that he felt the sweet influence of that retreat. "O dear Phædrus," he exclaims, "do I seem to you, as to myself, to be experiencing a divine impression?" and his companion replies, "Truly, O Socrates, contrary to custom, a certain flow of eloquence seems to have borne you away." And he resumes,—“Hear me then in silence; for in fact this place seems to be divine.”‡ This loving familiarity with nature was inseparable from men in whose hearts resided so deep a tone of the eternal melodies; but so also was the conviction which experience had given to St. Augustin, that it was not nature alone, or the beauties and delights of earth, that could ever satisfy the soul of man: “that which it seeks is the true and supreme joy, which as St. Bernard says, is derived, not from the creature but from the Creator, which, when received, no one can take from it, to which, in comparison, all gladness is affliction, all tranquillity pain, all sweetness bitterness, all that can delight, vexation.”

The pretended revelations of nature, independent of that tradition by which society exists, are but the empty boast of a vain philosophy. Left in the presence of nature alone, uninformed and unsanctified, man degenerates rapidly into a savage

* Od. XXIV. 414.

† An instance is cited by Voigt. Geschichte Preussens. III. 484.

‡ Plato, Phædrus.

state. Without religious worship, which is the realizing of the abstract idea of the divinity, that idea would soon be effaced from his thoughts ; and, as Lord Bacon says, "No light of nature extendeth to declare the will and true worship of God.* However conducive to the physical enjoyments of man, experience shows that a life in the country, without the constant resources of the Catholic religion and its rites, becomes in the end completely a Pagan life, natural in its motives as well as in its pursuits and pleasures. Without an altar, not the shade of the lofty groves, not the soft meadows, not the stream descending from the rocks, and clearer than crystal, winding through the plain, can sanctify the soul of man. Left in the presence of nature alone, it faints and becomes like earth without the dew of heaven ; it is oppressed by the contemplation of that vast immensity ; it loses its tranquillity and its joy. Man in himself can find no rest or peace : and how should he find repose in the works of nature, when these are themselves for ever restless ? The fire mounts in a perpetual course, always flickering and impatient ; the air is agitated with conflicting winds, and susceptible to the least impulse ; the water hurries on, and knows no peace ; and even this ponderous and solid earth, with its rocks and mountains, endures an unceasing process of degradation, and is ever on the change. Besides, how should spirits of human kind find content in nature, when, as the Stagyrите proclaims, nature is in most things only the slave of man ?"† But in his Creator has the creature present rest, and in the pledge of grace revealed supernaturally from on high, has he eternal peace, immortal felicity. We must leave the laurels, and the fountains, and the swans, and all the harmonies which resound along the margin of rivers, and we must enter the streets with the multitude, in quest of that temple of peace where the Lamb of God is offered up for sinners. Abandoned to nature, the man who is endowed with a delicate and sentimental soul, is found to breathe only the vague desires of the modern poet, whose ideal may be seen in that Burns, of whom we read that "he has no religion ; his heart indeed is alive with a trembling adoration, but there is no temple in his understanding : he lives in darkness and in the shadow of doubt : his religion at best is an anxious wish—like that of Rabelais, a great Perhaps."‡ The error of the modern poets consists in their not viewing the visible world in union with the mysteries of faith, and in supposing that a mere description of its external form can satisfy even the thirst after poetic beauty, which is inherent in our nature. Dante is blamed by them for mixing scholastic theology with his song ; but it is precisely this very mixture which gives that charm to it which attracts and captivates the thoughtful heart. The same error is committed with regard to life ; and while spirituality and faith, with all their beauteous expressions and sublime affecting symbols, have been effaced, instead of increasing, proud and sensual men have forfeited the possession of the present good. The earth is infected by its inhabitants and its joy is passed away. Observe the character of those cantons of

* Advancement of Learning. † Aristot. Metaphysic. Lib. I. 2. ‡ Edinburgh Review, 1828.

Switzerland where the Catholic religion is unfelt, and men are left in presence of nature alone, without an object or a sound to recall the images of faith. What overpowering melancholy reigns in those valleys, notwithstanding all that dressing, fattening, harrowing, and distillation of the earth, in hopes of gain! What a silence is there, excepting when interrupted by the fall of avalanches, the roar of torrents, and the eternal sighing of the winds! What a moral blight has attended the political demarcation of the territory! There are indeed, here and there, some immense enterprises for the sake of profit and pleasure, some unsightly buildings, the fruit of careful speculations to afford luxury and ease to the distempered inhabitants of licentious cities, who come here in the summer season, in hopes of enjoying some vague dream of Arcadian life, united with the solid advantages of the Epicurean form; but no where do you see the beautiful chapel or the venerable cross; no where any thing to realize a tender or a sublime idea; no sacred sentences, no devout image, to exalt men to the spiritual life. You pass, as on the borders of those Berne Lakes, whole villages without a church; and upon the sloping lawns you can only hope to find some ruins of a convent, or the tower of some ancient church, which you will find converted into a barn or a magazine. Yet even amidst the devastated valleys, covered with sand and rocks and the bare trunks of broken pines, ploughed up with the rains and burnt by the fire of the summer's day, which now present that pale and horrid aspect of a fearful nakedness, the Catholic religion would have planted her peaceful and her beauteous trophies.

That religion has left the stamp of her genius and the imperishable monuments of her faith in the deserts of the East, and on the wildest rock of the Alps or Pyrenees, amidst the lions under the fires of the tropic, as well as amidst the bears and icebergs of the pole. Where is there a garden of more rich and beauteous variety than in the valleys surrounding the tracks over which heresy has passed? Even to the mere poetic soul, what a delightful accompaniment to the silent hymn of nature is that chiming of angelic bells which rises at evening and at noon, and at the sweet hour of prime, from all sides of a Catholic valley?—bells that may well be termed of the angel, that are not rung, as in other lands, by base hands, through love of sordid gain, to celebrate some occasion of sensual joy, temporal and vain, soon to change to mourning as vain, but by pious hands, through the devout intention of inspiring men with thoughts of prayer. How inspiring is it to hear the great bells of the abbey of Engelberg at the fourth hour of the morning, awakening the echoes, amidst the rocks and eternal snows of Titlis, and piercing the vast forests of the surrounding Alp! What consolation to the weary pilgrim, when stopping to shelter from the storm under some covered bank which charity has erected by the mountain's side, he beholds even there, some poor prints, representing in successive stages, the sacred passion of our Lord, and dictating some seraphic aspiration! How sweet and cheering,—and in a philosophic point of view, how important,—is all this, and how it cherishes and strengthens our young affections! But as the swimmer in the blue flood of the arrowy Rhone sees the pale line of snowfed waters issuing from the devastated bed of the Arve, and no sooner plies his right arm to be borne up that new channel, and enters its sullen wave, than instantly a sudden cold and deathlike chill strikes through his whole body ; so is the full glow of youthful devotion checked and chilled when we pass from Sarnen to the Scheidek, or from Soleure and Freyburg to the shores of the Lemman Lake. Protestantism knows no neighborhood : it goes on repeating its old and barbarous invectives, like those sullen waters of the Arve, which pass down with the Rhone in the same channel without blending into it, without losing their chilling aspect or acquiring the least portion of its warmth or of its purity. And would you know how the loss of the joys of the Catholic faith is felt by those of the moderns themselves, who seem to have a finer and more spiritual nature? Here these lines that are enough to make the blood well from one's heart :—

“Alas ! our young affections run to waste,
Or water but the desert ; whence arise
The weeds of dark luxuriance, tares of haste
Rank at the core, though tempting to the eyes ;
Flowers whose wild odors breathe but agonies,
And trees whose gems are poison ; such the plants
Which spring beneath her steps as Passion flies
O'er the world's wilderness, and vainly pants
For some celestial fruit forbidden to our wants.”*

The ancients tried all the means which imagination could propose or wealth and power execute, in order to enjoy Nature, and avail themselves of her possession. The emperor Adrian, after visiting the provinces of his empire, wished to concentrate, at his country villa of Tivoli, whatever had most struck his attention. There he built the Lyceum, the Academy, the Prytanea, as they were at Athens. There he formed the valley of Tempe, like that in Thessaly ; there he constructed the Canope, like that near Alexandria. All this was not sufficient ; he conceived the design of representing there the Elysian fields ; but at this stage he was attacked by the mortal illness of which he died at Baia. The poor insatiate moderns too, in vain attempt to satisfy themselves with the beauty of parks, and the imitation of nature, in lakes and gardens, interspersed with objects of heathen art and the plants of eastern clime, the cypress and her spire :—

“They show the plants divine and strange
That every hour their blossoms change,
Ten thousand lovely hues !
With budding, fading, faded flowers,
They stand the wonder of the bowers
From morn to evening dews.”

Then comes the complaint of Gilbert, lamenting that the hopes of genius, the joy and triumph of nature, should be at an end. "Unhappy guest at the banquet of life, I appear for one day and die ! I die : and on my grave no one will scatter flowers. Farewell, fields that I love ! and thou, sweet verdure ! and thou, smiling solitude of woods ! Sky, beauteous canopy for man ! admirable Nature ! for the last time farewell !"* And even before they learn to contemplate this separation, after all their pains, there is, even amidst these beauteous bowers, the

"Something still that prompts the eternal sigh !"

For, even to the mere poetic imagination, nature alone cannot suffice ; and in Paradise itself, man could not be happy if God or his angels did not visit him. They look around from their fairy halls, and inhale the ambrosial aspect ; but do they not sometimes lament that, when evening sinks o'er the earth, so beautiful and soft, there sounds no deep bell in the distant tower, no faint dying-day hymns steal aloft from cloistered cells, to make the forest leaves seem stirred with prayer ? Their own poet represents his hunter looking from the steep promontory upon the lake, and exclaiming, "What a scene were here, could we but see the turrets of a convent gray on yonder meadow !—

"For when the midnight moon should lave
Her forehead in the silver wave,
How solemn on the ear would come
The holy matin's distant hum :
While the deep peal's commanding tone
Should wake in yonder islet lone
A sainted hermit from his cell,
To drop a bead with every knell."

Sweet is the breath of morning: but when so sweet as during those early walks between paintings of the sacred Passion, to the first mass of the Capuchins, whose convent crowns the towering rock, or is embosomed in the odoriferous grove ?

"The youth of green savannahs spake
And many an endless, endless lake,
With all its fairy crowds
Of islands, that together lie,
As quietly as spots of sky
Among the evening clouds."

Lovely is this painting of your Wordsworth, but would it acquire no fresh charm from thinking of those convents, which might cover them, as in those islands of the Adriatic Gulf, seen from the towers of Venice, and from the music of those bells, which would sound along its shore, for the angelus or the benediction ? might not the vesper hymn suggest a sweeter image than occurs in the Virgilian line, which speaks of the hour in which begins the first rest of wretched mortals ?† Contemplate again the seasons of the year; see what a charm descends upon the enamelled

* Ode, written eight days before his death.

† Æneid, II.

garden, from its reference to the altar ; for why, cries the tender poet, "O flowers, raise ye your full chalices to the light of morning, why in the damp shade exhale those first perfumes which the day breathes ? Ah, close them still, flowers that I love ; guard them for the incense of the holy places, for the ornament of the sanctuary. The sky inundates you with tears, the eye of the morn makes you fruitful ; you are the incense of the world, which it sends up to God."* Sweet is it to recline, composed in placid peace, upon the shady lawn, when violet and hyacinth, with rich inlay, embroider the ground, more colored than with store of costliest emblems, and to hearken to the verse of some wild minstrel, who sings by the clear stream which flows through the meadow, on a summer's day ; but sweeter still to hear the litanys and hymns of holy church rise from the midst of waving corn, when her annual rogations implore a blessing on the first fruits of the earth, and when the cross and banner of her bright processions glitter through the darksome foliage.† Nor are thy reviving sports, innocent and playful youth, insensible to the universal influence of the church's season. Well I know how dear to the bold swimmer is the plunge into the clear blue flood of the impetuous Rhone, which hurries him along amidst froth and waves, sporting as in a bed of waters, or the fall from those projecting rocks, which stand at the entrance of the Gulf of Lecco, under that noble promontory on which stood the Tragedia of Pliny ; but there is to him even a sweeter moment, when winter first departs, and he hastens to the remembered pool, along the embowered banks of the bright stream which first hears the sweet bird that harbingers the spring, and there gathers those budding osiers, which each returning year our mother Church puts into his hands to serve as palms, to be borne on that day of mystic triumph, when she celebrates the entrance of the Son of God into Jerusalem. These are the resources of a northern clime ; but yet, methinks, even thy stately forests, noble Valencia, where innumerable old and lofty palm trees shade the shore of Alicant, would lose half their interest to the Christian eye, if their branches were not yearly thinned for that solemn festival, and sent in offering to the eternal city. In a country stripped and dismantled by the modern philosophy, one lives only in visible presence of what passes, like the leaves of the trees, or the flowers of the fields ; and the youthful race, which is the most susceptible of the charms of nature, like summer flies, is sought for in vain, when autumnal rains have cooled the rivers, and despoiled the bowers of their foliage. Without very extraordinary grace the progress of seasons and of years is felt by the noblest dispositions, which are the most apt for every change, with an emotion of deeper and deeper melancholy ; but in a Catholic land one consorts continually with things that never die ; and as one grows older, one only feels as if endowed

* De la Martine.

† The benediction of the new fruits of the earth used to be celebrated on the feast of the Ascension, that of orchards on the festival of St. James the Apostle, and that of the new grapes on the day of St. Xystus.*

* Martene, Tom. IV.

with higher and higher privileges, which are to be crowned at length in the last supernal state, to which death is but the momentary passage.

This mutual influence of nature and faith, multiplying and expressing each other's joys, was profoundly felt by the meek possessors of the earth during the middle ages, and hence arose a number of beautiful monuments, the mouldering ruins of which still adorn our country, though their origin and object may have been long forgotten. Historians record the profusion of oratories which were destroyed in England when the new religion was first established. These little chapels, embowered amidst the pale ivy or the myrtles that love the shore, were common in the days when above all things the woods were dear to men, and the divine muse was beloved every where, found to be sweet upon the woods and sweet upon the waves, combining all the fabled charms of Orpheus and Arion.

Petrarch beautifully moralizes upon the fountain of Vaucluse, and declares that it is his resolution to raise an altar there in the garden which hangs over the water. "It shall not," he continues, "be dedicated, like those of Seneca, to the gods of the rivers, or the nymphs of the fountains, but in honor of the Virgin Mother of that God who has destroyed the altars and demolished the temples of all other gods." The month of May was called the month of Mary, when men would devoutly repeat her office as they walked in some garden, bright with the sweet hue of eastern sapphire that was spread over the serene aspect of the pure air, at the rising of the sun, and beheld the swans majestically resting on the limpid waters. The waters too were claimed, and images of saints and hermits, and mitred fathers, were seen, stretching the hand of benediction over them, as at the Balbian promontory on the Larian lake. The course across the Lagunes, for eighteen miles from Venice to the Camaldolese convent on the isle of St. Clement, is marked by an image of our Lady, with a lamp burning, which seems almost to touch the sea, over which it casts so far its placid beam. In the midst of the lake of Garda is a point, mentioned by Dante, where the bishops of Trent, Verona, and Brescia, would have the right of giving their benediction; and I have heard the sweet and solemn sound of litany or sacred hymns rise from boats of pilgrims, bearing cross and holy banners, across Lugano's lake, when boat used to respond to boat while onward hastening.

Wherever a wild and broken rock projected, or a beauteous hill rose from a river's bank, there was sure to be some spot dear to piety, which scholars and poets would unite to celebrate, like that of Mount Valerien on the Seine, which forms the subject of an elegant Latin history by Briezac. As the morning sun first visits the mountain heights, so does the great and admirable sun of justice make his grace to shine first at the door of the solitary hermit, and of those who live retired upon the points of rocks. When St. Vincent of Paul was ordained priest, he repaired to a chapel situated on a mountain in the midst of a wood, near the river Tarne, and there he said his first mass. The presbytery of St. Vit of Mont-Meillan, being on the side of a hill, commanded a most beautiful view over the country. The curate, in the year 1695, thought this garden was too beautiful to be left without rendering service to religion. Accordingly he had the piety to convert it into a Calvary, with grottos and cells for prayer; so that a crowd of devout people used to come there on Sundays and festivals from the neighboring parishes.*

Marchangy makes his traveller of the fourteenth century remark, that as he mounted the heights of Fourvières at Lyons, the view became so enchanting, that he was almost certain to find at the summit of the mountain some place of pilgrimage. "For I have remarked," he adds, "in the course of my travels that religion never fails to invite tender or suffering souls to places, whose natural beauty attests the power of the Creator."† The fields and level shores were, indeed, associated with religious mysteries: for, that standing of Jesus by the lake of Genesareth with the multitude pressed upon him, that seeing of the two boats and the occupation of the fishermen, that walk through the corn with the disciples on the Sabbath, of which men had heard from infancy always in the same sweet season of the summer,‡ made such an impression, that they could never enjoy the beauties of nature, or the recreations of a country life without thinking of their blessed Redeemer; but mountains were especially dear to religion from the remembrance of that mount whose name has given an universal and beloved fame to the pale verdure of the olive, from that of Thabor, and Sinai, and Ephreim, which fed the holy Samuel. It was on mountains that God manifested himself to the Hebrews of old, and it was on them that the tremendous mysteries of human redemption were accomplished. Mountain heights, enclosing on their brown and mossy moors the spot where earliest wild flowers grew, were dear to village children, but so were they also to the eye of faith, as symbolical of a religious life; for mountains are the abodes of the most noble animals, the lion and the eagle; the source of the mightiest and purest streams; the soil congenial to the loftiest trees, the cedar and the pine; the places most secure to helpless innocence, in consequence of their distance from the haunts of men; the spots which are the first and last to enjoy the golden light of day, and which afford the farthest prospect over this world of woe.§ During the ages of faith in reference to the holy enclosures on their summits, it might with truth be said, that the mountains distilled sweetness, and the hills flowed with milk and honey; for there was heard at many seasons of every year a voice of the multitude on the mountains, as if of a people gathering, a voice of the sound of kings and of the nations assembling. Then used each man to say joyfully to his neighbor, "Come, and let us ascend to the mountain of the Lord, and to the house of the God of Jacob; he will teach us his ways, and we will walk in his paths; because a law hath gone forth from Sion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem."

* Lebeuf, Hist. du Diocese de Paris, Tom. V. 544.

† Tristan, Tom. V. 333.

‡ Fourth Sund. after Pentecost.

§ Le Sacré Mont d'Olivet ou le Paradis de la Religion du Seraphique Pere St. François, p. 10.

The blessed John of the Cross distinguishes three kinds of holy places, that is, places where God is accustomed to excite the will to devotion. The first are certain spots rendered agreeable by the extensiveness and variety of the view, by the verdure of trees and plants, by solitude and silence. The end in employing such places is to elevate the heart to God. Almost every Christian city, and even village, was adorned and consoled by some place of this kind, on which a Calvary was erected, where devout persons went at all times to pray; and where at intervals, as on the festivals of the holy cross in May and in September, the whole population would assemble then in peaceful pilgrimage, to assist at the divine offices celebrated in an adjoining chapel, and to hear some man of God discourse upon the love of Jesus. Such was the Mount Valerien near the city of Paris, where hermits had resided since the eleventh century, whose sweet solitude even kings protected, for in the year 1633 there was a royal decree forbidding any one to keep a hostellerie upon that mountain nearer than the village of Surène. * In the house of the missionaries on the summit, it was the custom to admit laymen who desired to make retreats. The Cardinal de Noailles came there every year for that purpose, and the Cardinal Borromeo used in like manner to retire to the Calvary on Monte Varale, where were represented the mysteries of the Passion. Here were fields of roses, which embalmed the air with their sweet fragrance; and when the multitude assembled, such peace and joy beamed from every countenance, that one might have thought that the reign of universal order was already come.

One of the first acts of the sophists who wrought the last revolution, was to throw down the crosses and desecrate the sanctuary, that all men might know them by their fruits. The second kind, continues the blessed Friar, are particular places, whether solitary or not, in which God is known to have had extraordinary intercourse with just men, thither sending his winged messenger on errands of supernal grace, so that these persons continue ever after attached to them, though it is not the place but the soul which draws down the grace of God. Thus Abraham raised an altar on the spot where God had appeared to him; and in passing by it on his return from Egypt, he again worshipped there; and Jacob also made an altar of stone in the place where the Lord appeared to him. Such are the famous churches of the Portiuncula and the seraphic mountain of Alvernia in Italy, exhibiting those wondrously split rocks, which a pious tradition ascribes to the earthquake at the death of Christ, and clothed with that deep and solemn wood, which so often beheld the secret wanderings and heard the infinite sighs of the fervent servants of God, Francis and Anthony, where the former, while praying at day-break on its rocky side, received the stigmata which his limbs two years did carry. Such, too, is that high mountain called Cruachan Ailge, in Ireland, so memorable for having been the place where St. Patrick spent a Lent in great abstinence and solitary meditation. The places where hermits had lived or where holy men used to preach, were often called ever afterwards the holy place. Thus, in the diocese of Paris, there is a lieu-saint, so called from St. Quentin having lived there a recluse. There is another lieu-saint, in the diocese of Coutances near Valogne, where holy solitaries lived under the first race of kings. In Germany there is Heiligenstad, where Dagobert I. had a vision of saints.* That tower of Ader, where St. Jerome says the angel appeared to the shepherds who were watching their flocks by night would be a place of the same order. The third kind of places are those which God has destined, by an especial choice, for his service. Such were Mount Sinai and Mount Horeb.†

* Lebeuf, Hist. du Diocese de Paris, Tom. VII. 129.

The Carmelite friar Nicholas, who describes his pilgrimage to Jerusalem in the year 1487, visited these holy mountains, to which he could travel only by night, through the midst of horrible deserts. Arriving at length within view of the convent of St. Catharine, he says that every one wept for joy. The monks received them with great charity, but the pilgrims were only disposed for prayer. After mass matins were sung, after which every one retired to rest for the remainder of the day. The pilgrims disposed themselves to visit the holy places of the mountain by confession and devout prayer. On Mount Sinai and Mount Horeb, he says, there were many holy chapels to honor the spots which are consecrated by events of the sacred history. He describes his ascent and the views from the summit, and no book of modern travels will convey the same impression of reality as this holy man's simple relation. In few words he makes you behold the two mountains of Sinai and Horeb, and the holy places and the dreadful wilderness, and the Red Sea with its desert islands and the horrible mountains of Thebaid.‡ The moderns have lost the idea of holy places, and are often disposed to condemn and ridicule those who have retained it. Had they been with Moses upon Horeb, they would have imagined some figure that would dispense their making bare the feet. Let us pause a moment, therefore, to hear the sentiments of men in ages of faith respecting the origin and influence of that idea. In the first place, they needed not the discourse of Milton to teach them as a general precept, —“that God attributes to place

No sanctity, if none be thither brought
By men who there frequent, or therein dwell.”§

This was a Catholic maxim, which he had gathered, as many things besides, from the writings of the olden time. St. Bernard had said, “Let no one flatter or congratulate himself respecting a place, because it is said, this place is holy, non enim locus homines, sed homines locum sanctificant;” to which words the pilgrim brother Nicholas alludes, saying, “Le canon dit, l’homme fait le saint lieu, et non le lieu

* Lebeuf, Tom. XIII. 188.

† B. John of the Cross, ascent of Mount Carmel, Lib. III. c. 41.

‡ Le grant voyage de Hierusalem, Paris, 1517.

§ Paradise Lost, XI.

fait la sainte personne.”* “Neither do holy places,” says Walafrid Strabo, abbot of Fulda, “profit those who lay aside holiness, nor do horrid places injure those who are protected by the grace of God. The angels fell in heaven, whereas Moses was preserved in the waters; Daniel among the lions, and the three children in the fire.”†

St. Peter the venerable, abbot of Cluni, writing to the monks of Mount Thabor, exhorting them to be especially devout and fervent, from the consideration, not only of their being Christians and monks, but also because they inhabit a holy place, desires them to remember well that a holy place can never save them.‡ “As for these places of pilgrimage, and the extraordinary graces which are vouchsafed to those who visit them,” says the blessed John of the Cross, “the reason of their existence is to give occasion for more ardent fervor and opportunity for men to awaken their piety. It is for this end that miracles are wrought in those places where the faithful assemble to offer up their vows to heaven, in sight of the sacred images. Their faith in God, their confidence in his goodness, their singular devotion for the saints whom these celebrated images represent, and their continual prayers, sustained by the intercession of the blessed, obtain from God these extraordinary prodigies, of which the whole glory returns to the Creator. We find that these operations generally occur in places where the painting or image is some simple and common work, and where the place itself is retired and solitary, far from the haunts of men, where simplicity and faith alone are favored, where the length and difficulty of the journey may prove the devotion of the heart, and where the solitude of the place itself may deliver the pilgrims from the noise of the world, and favor their devotion, as when our Lord withdrew to deserts and to mountains for his prayer.”§ The zeal with which such places were visited by the early Christians may be learned from St. Augustin, where he says, “Brethren, recall to mind how, on any festival of the martyrs, when any holy place is named for any certain day, the crowds flow in together, to celebrate the solemnity. How they excite one another; how they encourage one another, and say, Let us go; let us go; and when it is asked whither? they reply to such a place, to such a holy place: they talk together, and as if catching fire from one another, they kindle into one flame, which impels them to that holy place which saintly meditation points out to them. She is the holy love which makes men visit temporal places of sanctity. What then ought to be their ardor in hastening to heaven.”|| If men would only observe what passes within themselves with regard to human things, they might learn to understand the principle of devotion to holy places, with regard to God: for instance, they esteem one chapter of a favorite book more highly than the rest, because they remember having read it in presence of a friend who is now absent. If they have executed any work of art while conversing with him, they prize it more than all others on that account. What intense and subtle feeling connects itself with the most trifling circumstance which has any relation to the earthly affections of the heart ! and so it is with those who love God in his saints. Their habits, the staff they used to bear, the chamber they used to inhabit, the rock on which they used to pray, the well from which they drank, the sepulchre where they repose, become precious and venerable and holy.

* Le grant voyage à Hierusalem, f. CVIII.

† De rebus Ecclesiasticis, cap. XIII.

‡ Epist. Lib. II. 44 § Ascent of Mount Carmel, Lib. III. c. 35. || Tractat. in Ps. cxxi.

From St. Gregory of Tours we can learn the usual mode in which such places were visited, for he says, "On one occasion, as I was going about the city of Lyons to visit the holy places, the man who walked before us coming to the crypt of the blessed Helius, invited us to pray, saying, because a great priest rests in this place."² Cold ungrateful men may argue or condemn, but reason will admit the wisdom of a devotion which is founded in the deepest principles of our nature. Ah, why are men so undoubting and resolute to admit an excuse for omitting the memory of God ; why so backward and forbidding, so full of scepticism and difficulties, when an occasion is offered of invoking him ? Never can I lose the remembrance of that evening of sweet peace, when with the holy monks of Vallombrosa I went the round of all their blessed spots, sanctified by the wondrous life and blissful death of the ancient eremites of that cloister, when the narrow cell which had sheltered one, the rocky bed on which another had expired, and every other revered memorial was visited with solemn litany or hymn to Christ's blessed mother, or offering of glory for everlasting to the triune God. Thus did we ascend that mount of Paradise, when each step they invited me, thoughtless and obdurate, to turn from nature unto nature's God. To Vallombrosa one repairs with recollections that centre upon the poesy of Milton, and from it one returns with a mind refreshed, exalted, enraptured with a sense of that supernal music which can be known fully but where day endless shines. By the erection of stations in some retired spot, in the neighborhood of every town, the church proposed to multiply places which, by the representation of our blessed Saviour's sufferings, might move the hearts of her children to greater fervor, and serve as a perpetual instruction to the ignorant : and in connection with the great historical facts and awful mysteries of religion, these affecting memorials of piety contributed to the riches which the earth was found to yield to the meek in ages of faith.

What was the idea of their institution ? at Jerusalem was their original. There tradition has preserved even many circumstances of the passion, which are not related in the Gospel. The spot is shown where Mary met Jesus bearing the cross ; driven away by the guards, she took another road, and was found again further on, following the Saviour. It is Chateaubriand who thus speaks : "Faith is not opposed to these traditions, which show to what a degree this wondrous and sublime history has been engraven on the memory of men. Eighteen centuries passed over, persecutions without end, unceasing revolutions, ruins piled up, and still ever increasing, have not been able to efface or conceal the trace of this divine mother weeping for her son !” The Church was well aware of the impressions felt by those who visited these stations, and with her constant tender solicitude she endeavored to provide the same for all her children. Every town and village, therefore, furnished places where, in some degree, they might be experienced by those who had a devout heart and sincere contrition. There, after the business of the day was over, when the angelus had tolled and the hour came when nature makes that awful pause and inclines the soul to meditation, the pious youth or holy matron would steal softly from the crowd and repair thither, to shed the sweet undiscovered tear on the Mount of Olives, on the spot where Pilate cried Ecce Homo ! on the place where our Saviour sank under the cross, on that where he said unto the women, Weep not for me, and so on the rest. At Rome these were represented in the Colosseum, within that very inclosure where such multitudes of martyrs had followed Christ to the bitterness of his passion.

* De gloria Confessorum, 62.

On certain days the clergy, followed by a devout multitude, visited these places in procession, sung the litany, recited prayers, and delivered a short instruction. Nor was this all. Innumerable crosses of stone or wood were erected by the public ways, in the heart of forests and amidst the wildest scenes of nature, on bridges, which heard amidst the eternal murmur of the streams, the chant of nocturns in the night, and on the craggy summit of islands, that lay far in the melancholy sea; that no place might be left without the symbol of human redemption, and the memorial of the passion of Jesus. Descending from the mountain of St. Bernard, under that fort of Bard, in a spot which seems made by nature herself for the destruction of an army, and where modern art now vies with her in appalling frowns, with what delightful surprise does one discover the peaceful images of heaven’s mercy, the Madonna and the cross ! Time was when England too possessed them. In the vast fens surrounding Crowland, we read of there being immense crosses placed, as on the boundaries between Holland and Kesteven, Alderlound and Goggisland.* In the ancient groves, too, which never heard the woodman’s stroke, amidst the giant trunks projecting withered arms, like that forest which clothes the shore of Bolsena’s Lake, through which the pilgrim mounts to Montefiascone, you would find the cross to sanctify the melancholy shade. Thus we read in the books of chivalrons fable, how the knight errants used to hang up their shields by the stone crosses in the forests. In poetry, as in nature, we sometimes come upon them suddenly with glad surprise. How impressive is that instance, amidst a battle-scene, in the lay of Marmion, when Clare looks round for water to slake his dying thirst as he lay wounded on the wild heath, near a stone cross:

“Where shall she turn? Behold her mark,
A little fountain-cell;
Where water, clear as diamond spark,
In a stone basin fell;
Above, some half-worn letters say,

* Hist. Croylandensis in Rerum Anglic. Script. Tom. I. and Ingulphi Hist. p. 39.

Drink, weary pilgrim, drink and pray
For the poor soul of Sybil Gray,
Who built this cross and well."

Frequently, too, these were memorials also of historical events, to which piety gave an immortal remembrance, as at Ravenna, near which a simple Greek cross indicates the spot where formerly stood the superb basilica of St. Lorenzo, founded in the year 396, and destroyed in the sixteenth century. King Philip, carrying the body of St. Louis, his father, from Paris to the abbey of St. Denis, wherever he halted to repose crosses were erected on the spot, which stood till the revolution. On the similar occasion of the body of Queen Eleanor, wife of Edward I., being conducted from the north to Westminster, those beautiful crosses were erected, of which the ruins may still be seen at Waltham and other places. At Rievaulx Abbey, when the body of St. Wilfred had been washed, and the water then poured out upon the earth, a wooden cross was erected on the spot.

The first amongst the Christians who opposed the worship of the cross was Claudius, a Spaniard, in the ninth century, and in the same age the Paulicians, who appeared in the East. The Wickliffites called the images of the cross putrid trunks, less estimable than the trees of the wood, for the latter, said they, had life, but these were dead, a passage which shows how profoundly these first reformers could philosophize. The succeeding heretics were animated with a most invincible hatred against the crosses, so that they disappeared every where before them, while statues of kings, in the heathen style were erected in their stead, as at Charing Cross, the demolition of which was effected amidst loud cheers from an immense multitude. Yet such was the inconsistency of these men, who mistrusted or condemned the impression produced by the representation of the cross of Christ, that some of them were heard to say, that they could never hear the loud solitary whistle of the curlew in a summer noon, or the wild cadence of a troop of grey plover in an autumn morning, without feeling an elevation of soul, like the enthusiasm of devotion. Our forefathers, too, may have known nothing, or next to nothing, of the structure of their souls, but yet they could give a reasonable account for their attaching more importance to the impressions which they felt at the sight of a cross, than to any of the seeming caprices of their nature. "The mere sight of a crucifix is never useless to the soul," says Louis of Blois, speaking of the spiritual ascetic.* "A Christian of orthodox faith," he says again, "can never behold the image of a crucified Redeemer without great utility."† "The moderns are not unwilling to kiss the books of the Gospels before a judge," observes Bossuet, "and what is the cross but the whole Gospels in one sign and character contracted? What is the cross unless the whole science of Jesus Christ crucified? Why then should we not kiss that and bow the knee to it?" Does not the very instinctive aversion with which it is regarded by all enemies to Christianity prove it to be holy? What other inference can be drawn from these late horrors in Gallic land, where the symbol of salvation was overthrown with such demoniacal ferocity, and replaced by the symbol of the revolution, by that of Atheism? The moral influence of the Christian symbol was so clearly seen by its enemies, that among the articles of capitulation to be observed by the Christians on the fall of Jerusalem, the Turks stipulated that they should place no crosses upon their churches, nor bear them or the Gospels about in procession, and that their bells should not be tolled, though they might be allowed to observe their religious rites in all the churches already built. Elsewhere, indeed, the same enactments, with the exception of the latter indulgence, were enforced by men who continued to profess a belief in Christianity; but the results proved the acuteness of the Sarassin policy, and the folly of those who, with different intentions imitated it. By degrees the race which had lost faith lost also the memory of Christianity; its thoughts were wholly engrossed with business or political debates, or with the delusive phantoms of sense; if it heard mention of God having come down on earth, chosen apostles, and sent them to found a religion, the impressions excited were not different from those with which it read the history of Romulus or Alexander. Now one can easily understand why, in a Catholic country, such a godless crew should feel startled and disquieted; for there men may indeed fall victims to passion, may aspire to rob or remain tangled in a net of sensual delight, but never for a single day can they forget the great and awful facts of the Christian dispensation. Faith has raised too many memorials of its history and of its mysteries for their minds, to be ever reduced to a state of nature or mere animal perception, that is left without either the consolations or the terrors of religion.

* Institutio Spiritual cap. VI.

† Enchirid. Parvulorum, Lib. I. doc. XII. append.

Thus then, during ages of faith, was nature enjoyed in connection with religion, by those to whom meekness imparted the privileges of simplicity. Thus was the exterior and interior life brought into perfect harmony, so as to produce that expansion of the heart which is the real cause that makes a Catholic country so delightful to men of good-will; for so sweet is it to them, that "they whose verse of yore the golden age recorded, and its bliss on the Parnassian mountain," may be thought to have foreseen it in a dream. The earth was adorned with beauteous monuments, and the luminous air itself seemed to diffuse sweet harmony, not alone those wild and melancholy strains of which the poet speaks as heard in Scottish land, rising from the bands of busy harvest,

"When falls before the mountaineer,
On lowland plains, the ripen'd ear;"

but oftener, as in the neighborhood of Rome when peasants in the evening return from the vintage, some litany or sacred hymn, for even festive songs, like those of that devout people, had in some manner still a religious burden. The author of the Martyrs ascribes this custom of pious ejaculations and responses by the rustic laborers to the first Christians, and traces it to the days of Ruth.* In the time of St. Jerome, the laborers in Palestine conducting their carts, and the husbandmen in dressing their vines, used to refresh their spirits with the chant of Alleluia, and the presence of Christian youth was recognized by hearing the shepherds and peasants singing canticles of devotion by the side of their flocks, a scene which then recalled the primitive innocence of the pastoral life of the ancient patriarchs. The old French kings endeavored to promote this custom by their paternal ordinances, which said, "Let all sing on the Sabbath, going to vespers, or to matins, or to mass, chanting Kyrie Eleison; and in like manner let the herdsmen of cattle sing as they go into the fields or return to the house, ut omnes eos veraciter Christianos et devotos esse cognoscant."† Wandering among the olive groves of Fiesole, I have heard children in cottages chanting the Kyrie Eleison, while mothers at the doors handled the distaff and the flax. The very reverence with which the humble friar and the village pastor were regarded was a source of social and serene enjoyment to the people among whom they walked. Their sweet and holy countenances were felt as a benediction, in the same manner as the entrance of the unblest feet of modern sophists is always felt as an interruption to joy, though these are the men who have the confidence to speak of applying their moral energies to the gradual extinction of Catholicism, and the consequent increase of social enjoyment, "as if," cries an excellent writer, "men who are themselves incapable of social enjoyment, their principles being a condensation of selfishness and repugnant to all sociability, their rudeness, and even ferocity of look and manner, being sufficient to enable travellers to recognize them in any place, could increase or secure social enjoyment in others." In short, the meek felt themselves in every object that struck their senses, and at every hour of their existence, endowed with hidden riches, and in possession of an innocent and a happy earth. If they had lived more years than Abraham, they would not have had time to use this long series of sanctified pleasures and natural enjoyments which life distilled drop by drop, sweetly and secretly upon their lips. Thus "through a wilderness of primy sweets that never fade they walked in thoughtfulness, and yet expectant of beatitude more high."

So far we have considered the blessedness of the meek in relation to the material advantages which could be drawn from the possession of the earth. It remains to take a brief view of the more spiritual and interior riches which were attached to that inheritance, and the attempt to show in what manner it became subservient to the extension of intellectual good will be the object of our next disputation.

* Lib. II.

† Capit. Carol. mag. 202. Liv. VI.

CHAPTER IV.

It is the object of our enterprise to discover in what manner the meek, in ages of faith, availed themselves of the intellectual treasures which the earth is capable of yielding, and for this purpose we must direct our thoughts to those spiritual and interior riches which are derived from poetry, from learning, and from friendship, for it is clear that, in one sense, these rise to mortals from the earth, and are an essential part of its inheritance. Of themselves, too plainly imperfect, and liable, as experience proves, to the most lamentable abuse, we shall find that they were enobled, perfected, and secured by an alliance with the principles of faith, which gave purity to their object and stability to their possession. Poetry was perhaps one of the original gifts which the bountiful Creator attached to the present condition of man's life, in order to enable him to sustain the wretchedness of his exile. Philosophers observe that the sensible world, being inferior in dignity to the rational soul, poesy seems to grant that to human nature which history denies, supplying shadows in place of substance to the mind; and Lord Bacon says that if any one should examine attentively, a firm argument is derived from poesy that there is a more illustrious and perfect order of things than can in any manner be found in Nature herself after the fall; therefore, as realities cannot satisfy the mind, poesy feigns actions more heroic; it corrects history, and therefore conferreth not only to delectation but to magnanimity.* Pindar had remarked that truly there are many things wonderful, and that legends adorned with varied fables lead away the minds of mortals more than a true discourse.† Yet if attention be paid to the original source of all poetic fable, there is deeper penetration shown by Homer, where he invokes the muses as divinities who alone know all things, and then adds, but we hear only rumors and know nothing:

“ἡμεῖς δὲ κλέος οἶον ἀκούομεν οὐδὲ τι ἴδμεν.”‡

“Fancy itself,” as Frederick Schlegel observes, “is one of the essential ground works of consciousness. It is in its foundation nothing but memory; and what we commonly call fancy is in fact only a delirium of the memory.”§ True art and all higher poetry, is the beautifully adorned summit, the promising blossom, nay, the very flower of hope.|| “And man,” as he says, “from childhood to youth,

* De Augment. Scientiæ, Lib. II. c. 13.

† Olymp. I.

‡ Il. II. 465.

§ Philosophie der Sprache, 136.

|| Id. 190.

from youth to manhood, from manhood to death, is, above all other creatures, a being of hope.”* The same view is taken by Huet, in accounting for the disposition of men to love romance : “It arises,” he says, “from the faculties of the human soul, which, being too vast in capacity to be satisfied with any present object, seeks gratification from the past and the future, from truth and fiction.”† St. Augustin had said that those fictions which are significative and emblematical are not falsehoods, but figures of truth, of which some of the wisest and most holy men have availed themselves, and we find the same doctrine well explained and diffused in the middle ages, in proof of which we may witness the words of John of Salisbury, where he says that “the lies of the poets serve truth ;”‡ and those of Christine de Pisan, where she says, “although in general the name of poesy be taken for some fiction, and though it is a common saying, Les poètes mentent de moult de choses, yet the end of poetry is truth, to advance which these feigned images are formed, enveloping the real and occult sense.”§ Indeed, such has been the universal judgment of mankind. The Persians, who had such a reverence for truth, and who regarded every species of lie with such horror, were nevertheless peculiarly fond of works of ingenious fiction, and many of their books of instruction for youth were in the form of romances. Their legislator Zoroaster employed fabulous adventures for this object. Strabo says that their masters of youth gave their precepts of morality in tales and fictions. Seneca observes that the ancient Romans made frequent use of fabulous adventures for the purposes of instruction ; and Macrobius reckons works of the nature of romances among those which administered instruction with delight. In the middle ages the title Romant was applied to true histories, as to that of Du Guesclin, for it signifies any work which was written in the langue Romane ; but it was at length applied exclusively to those works which, as Huet observes, were true in their details, and false only in their general object, which differed from many of the ancient historians only on this account, that they were false in their details, though faithful in their general outline. After all, romances in this sense had their origin in the beautiful East, and they were allied to those parables which have the highest of all sanctions. Huet supposes the Egyptians, Arabians, Persians, Indians, and Syrians, to have been the first writers of romances, and he shows that the great authors of antiquity, who composed romances, were all of oriental origin.||

Aristotle, and after him Cornutus and Priscien, mention the Libyan fables. The Arabs brought their romantic poetry into Spain ; but their dominion, during the first period, so far from assisting, kept down and stifled the genius of that people, and by imposing the Arabic tongue, put off the rise of the Spanish literature, so that Italy, Provence, and even Normandy, had their poets and writers in the language of their country before Spain had produced any. A Spanish

* Id. 125. † Huet, de l'Origine des Romans. ‡ De Nugis Curialium, Lib. II. cap. 6

§ Livre des Fais et bonnes Mœurs du sage Roi Charles V. Liv. III. chap. 68.

|| De l'Origine des Romans, 13.

bishop complains, that while his people can write verses in Arabic, they cannot say their prayers in Latin, by which he meant the Spanish in its infant state. In the hands, however, of the ecclesiastical and chivalrous writers, the object of romance became, in the middle ages, still more under the influence of idealism and allegory. Josaphat, Percival, Arthur, Wigalois and Tschionatulander, were mystical personifications of sanctity and knighthood. According to the doctrine of Boethius in his Consolatio Philosophica, the ideal was represented as a person, and the Germans are delighted to find, in the middle ages, poets of their nation who professedly pursued this object, such as Konrad of Wurzburg, Peter Suchenwirt, Henry Muglin, Hadamar von Laber, Hermann of Sachsenheim, and Melchior Pfinzing.

Nothing is more easy than to collect passages condemning poetry from the writings of the holy fathers, and nothing simpler than to arrange and connect them in such a manner as to convey the idea of a final and absolute prohibition, when men have taken in hand to write a formal treatise against it, or to show the danger of its abuse: but whether Religion might avail herself of the assistance of poetry, and include that beautiful world in the promise which gave to meekness the possession of the earth, was, at no time, as the lives and writings of the holy fathers prove, made a question virtually in the Christian schools; while the splendid triumph which the eighth Clement had prepared for Tasso at the capitol left a positive and ever-memorable testimony that the love of poetry is not incompatible with supreme solicitude for the first and highest good.

Repeatedly, during the ages of faith, the holy bishops of the Church, by their instructions and by their example, sanctioned its diffusion, and allowed men to mix serious things with trifles, and false with true, "in order," as John of Salisbury says, "that all things might be referred expressly to the worship of the highest truth."* So that, as at the beleaguered city sung by Æschylus, at whose seventh gate royal Apollo took his awful stand,† the purified and innocent Muse was permitted to appear as the champion on one side of the city of the church, that city which is besieged at all times by proud and deluded men. Celebrated was the ingenuity evinced by the Christian pastors in the time of Julian, when they contrived to elude the decree of that emperor, who sought to deprive their youth of the advantages of an acquaintance with the great poets of antiquity. The Greek tragedy entitled the Passion of Christ, composed of verses taken from Sophocles and Euripides, whose choruses are converted into Christian hymns, is said to have been formed by St. Gregory Nazianzen on this occasion, when the Christians were forbidden to study the original classical writings. This tragedy has been lately consulted with success, in order to correct the present texts of Euripides. Not without surprise will some hear mention of a German nun, Hroswithe, in the eleventh century, who, merely through a sense of the beauties of the classical writers, adopted a similar expedient, and composed Latin dramatic pieces upon Christian subjects, in a style well imitated from that of Terence. Christianity has always had its poets, under the white robes of the Apollinares in the first age, as under the episcopal mantle of Fenelon after the lapse of eighteen centuries. Ecclesiastical history makes frequent mention of bishops, like Sidonius in the fifth age, who cultivated the Muse, and associated it with their apostolical labors, not disdaining to hearken sometimes to the ancient classic bards, but as Dante, when he followed the souls of Statius and Virgil, “Listening that speech, which to their thoughts convey’d Mysterious lessons of sweet poesy.”*

*De Nugis Curialium, in Lib. VII. Prolog.

† Æschyl. Sept. cont. Theb.

St. Cyprian of Carthage, Pope St. Damasus I., Paulinus Bishop of Nola, Victorinus, Fortunatus, and Hilary of Poitiers, Prosper of Aquitaine, and St. Avitus, Archbishop of Vienne, are illustrious examples; to which may be added priests not invested with the episcopal character, as Tertullian of Carthage, Lactantius, Juvenus of Spain, Cælius Sedulius of Ireland, Arator of Rome, and Claudian Mamertus of Vienne.† The subjects chosen by Paulinus are the death of the son of Celsus, the turbulent condition of his own times and trust in God, the ancient festivals of the church, newness of life, and the creation of man. Many of the little pieces of St. Fortunatus were addressed to St. Radegonde or to St. Agnes. One was “on some violets,” another “on some flowers which were placed on the altar.” He composed many fine sacred hymns, among which the Vexilla Regis has been adopted by the Church. The oldest monument of German literature is an epic poem relating the slaughter of Roncevalles composed by a priest Conrad. The romance of Barlaam and Josaphat, published in the thirteenth century, by Rudolf of Montfort, had been composed by St. John Damascenus; it treats of the love of God and the heroism of the martyrs. It was greatly admired by the Christians of Egypt, being translated into the Coptic tongue. Eustathius, Bishop of Thessalonica, about the middle of the twelfth century, was said to have composed a romance, though it was one unworthy of his genius. The Count of Stolberg might have appealed to the authority of Huet, who also is inclined to disbelieve the report of Nicephorus that Heliodorus had been deposed by a council for having composed the adventures of Theagenes and Chariclea, and the latter grounds his argument on the purity and virtue of the work itself.‡ That learned and holy prelate, Camus, Bishop of Belley, as well as the great St. Francis de Sales, spoke in terms of high admiration of the romance of Astrea. Fenelon may be said to have composed both a poem and a romance in the adventures of Telemachus, as also Æneas Silvius before succeeding to the apostolic chair, though in one of his letters, this learned Pope expresses bitter regret for having left such a production among his works. Octavien de Saint Gelais, Bishop of Angoulême, * Purg. XXII. † Fabricius, Poetarum Vet. Eccles. Opera. ‡ De l'Origine des Romans, 70.

was regarded as one of the greatest poets of his time. He saw the reigns of Charles VIII., Louis XII., and Francis I. He gave translations of the Greek and Latin poets, of the whole Æneid, and of many books of the Odyssey, yet, from the tone of some of his early poems, perhaps Dante would have found him in the number of those who wept. On being invested with the episcopal character, he indeed abandoned all former amusements, and gave himself up wholly to the study of holy things, and to the service of the church, but still on the death of King Charles VIII. whose body he followed to St. Denis, he testified his regrets in many verses which were afterwards published in the Vergier d'Honneur. Our great St. Dunstan was both a poet and musician, whose works no purifying flame need have feared, and the Scottish minstrel who has sung the Lady of the Lake alludes to the harp which erst Saint Modan sway'd.* St. Aldhelm, Bishop of Shireburn, cultivated poetry with such success even in his native tongue, that it was said no one could equal him in the composition of English verses. Eldred mentions a certain poem of his which the common people continued still to sing; for when this blessed man led a hermit's life in the woods of Malmesbury, he used often to station himself after mass on a certain bridge over which the people returned from the town, and there he used to stop them, endeavoring to correct and reform those semi-barbarous rustics by the melody of his verses. He composed at various times a multitude of poems and other works, and he expressly wrote on the rules of versification. To convey an idea of the interest which poets in the middle ages could excite among the higher orders of the clergy, we need only to refer to that scene painted by Marchangy, where he represents some rude warriors relating what had passed during their reception in an apartment at Avignon. "A gentleman of Padua entered the hall and spoke a few words to the Cardinal of St. Vitalis, who uttered a loud cry, and gave signs of the utmost affliction. This cardinal then spoke to those who were near him, and they in their turn lamented with hands raised up to heaven. The news was soon known to all excepting to us, who, comprehending nothing of this general desolation, were thinking that it must mean at least the sack of Rome, or some new schism in Christendom. It was in vain for us to ask the cause. Hardly would any one condescend to answer us, as if we were not worthy to feel this privileged grief, too delicate to reach hearts encased in steel. In the mean time there came in Mathieu Le-Long, Archdeacon of Liege, whose hands the cardinal seized, saying, the celebrated companion of your studies, whose genius all Europe admires, the divine Petrarch, is no more! It is even so, adds the gentleman of Padua, for I have just come from assisting at his obsequies; he died in his house of Arqua, the 18th of last July. The company soon broke up, each retiring to his own home apparently in equal consternation at this common loss."†

If we now repair to the solitude of holy cloisters, we shall find the same affec-

* II.

† Tristan, Tom. VI. 101.

tionate converse with the Muse, disproving in its effects that maxim of the old Cratinus, that no verses can long survive which have been written by water-drinkers.* The saintly recluses of the middle ages were far from evincing that contempt for poetry and gentle studies which is so loudly professed by those modern theologians who are seen welcoming vile political debates, and engaging themselves in the vain and odious controversies of men. "For what reason I compose this work in verse," says Caelius Sedulius, the Irish priest in the sixth century, speaking of his great poem, "I will briefly explain. There are many whom an harmonious style and the songs of poets delight to such a degree that they take no interest in any work of rhetorical eloquence, neglecting all such studies, and being so fond of the sweetness of verses that whatever they receive in that way they commit to memory. I thought then that the manners of such persons ought to be not rejected, but cultivated, in order that every one according to his genius may be procured in a more voluntary manner for God."† But, independent of the efforts excited by charity, Plato would have said, that the monks were poets by profession, and sooth I believe if any convertite had proposed to them the question of the Athenian, "Are we to receive tragic poets into our state?" there would have been always some father sufficiently imbued with deep philosophy to make a reply in words similar to his, and with the smile of saintly brightness: "O reverent stranger, we are ourselves poets and makers of tragedies, authors of the best and most beautiful tragedy. The whole of our state is but an imitation of the best and most beauteous life, and we say that in fact that is the truest tragedy."‡

But in a lower and more ordinary sense we gladly admit the children of the Muses, among whom did not disdain to walk the great St. Francis of Assisi, and St. Columban of Ireland, and Jacopone, that saint and poet, monk, mendicant, ascetic, and traveller, that worthy predecessor of Dante. Was it not a monk of good life, John of the Abbey of Hauteselve, who translated into Latin the ancient romance of Dolopathos or the seven sages, the French translation of which was addressed by Hebers to the Bishop of Meaux? Was it not Guillaume de Guigneville, a monk of Chalis, who composed the romance of the three pilgrimages, that of man while on the earth, that of the soul when departed from the body, and that of our Lord who comes to visit his people? Did not Adam of St. Victor, that holy monk, during his travels in Greece, compose some sacred poems?§ And did not Thibaud de Marly, a monk of the Cistercian order in the Abbey of Vaux de Sarnay, where he died in the odor of sanctity, in the year 1247, write a celebrated romance in verse?|| Bernard of Cluni wrote a poem in Latin of three thousand verses on the contempt of the world,¶ and Mabillon commends the verses of Marc, of Monte Casino, the disciple of St. Benedict, which are the

* Hor. Epist. I. 19.

† Plato de Legibus, Lib. VII.

‡ Id. Tom. VI. 73.

§ Sedulii Epist. Fabricius, Poet. Vet. Eccles. Opera.

§ Lebeuf, Hist. du Diocese de Paris, Tom. I. ii. c. 5.

¶ L'Abbe Massieu, Hist. de la Poesie Française, 87.

only vestiges that remain there of the studies of that time.* Who has not heard of Aboon, a monk of St. Germain des Pres, who died in 924, and of his Homeric poem on the siege of Paris, by the Normans in the year 885? John du Pin, a monk of Vaucelles, who was a good theologian, a great philosopher and naturalist, was also a poet of renown. He employed sixteen years in composing his great work, entitled, "Le champ vertueux de bonne vie," having begun it in the year 1324.† Is it forgotten that the first treatise on the art of poetry, which appeared in the French tongue, was written by a prior of the abbey of St. Genevieve at Paris?‡ or that the oldest Italian poet is the great St. Francis of Assisi? or that friar Guittone of Arezzo is reckoned among the founders of Italian poetry? or that the most ancient poem existing in a vulgar tongue, if we except the Niebelungen lay, was composed by the monk Otfrid, of the monastery of Weissenburg, who lived about the middle of the ninth century? This is a versified translation of the Gospels. The author was a disciple of the celebrated Raban Maur, Abbot of Fulda, and he dedicated his work to Luitbert, Bishop of Mayence. This monk Otfrid, in the preface, blames the French of his time for neglecting their own language, and complains that no one will write excepting in Latin; his object was to impart the advantages of poetry to the people.

The historians of German poetry will tell you also of a remarkable poem, composed by a monk Werner in the twelfth century, of which the subject was the life of the blessed Virgin, in which were united the epic repose with the eulogistic transports of revering gratitude.§ A poem of great interest on the same subject was also composed by Philip the Carthusian. The courts of princes could bear witness that poetry was cultivated by religious men. Helynaud was a poet who used to be invited every day after dinner to recite his verses before Phillippe-Augustus. The most celebrated piece of his composition was a poem on death, which is allowed to contain passages of great sublimity. After passing his early years at court, and in the castles of nobility, he became a monk and retired to the abbey of Cistercians at Froimont, in the diocese of Beauvais. On leaving the world he left also all the spirit, views, and interests of the world, but he did not forsake the Muse; he led so holy a life that he was regarded as one of the lights of his order. France beheld in him a poet who was a saint; he was also a man of profound learning; he composed many works in prose, a chronicle, a treatise on the advantages of a monastic life, and one on the policy of princes, which evinced great wisdom and ability. His poems continued to be held in such esteem, that Vincent of Beauvais, who wrote under St. Louis, speaking of the year 1209, says, "At this time lived Helynaud, monk of Froimont, a man of extraordinary knowledge and virtue, to whom our language is indebted for the poem on death, which is now in the hands of every one as a work of great elegance and of acknowledged utility." Will you hear now for what favors the abbot Guthbert, the disciple of Bede, writes to his most loving and sweet friend in Christ, Lullus the bishop? "Since you have asked for some works of the blessed father Bede, I have prepared, with the help of my boys, to the best of our power, what I now send you, namely, his books on the man of God, Cuthbert, composed in prose and verse. I should willingly have sent you more had I been able. But the present winter has been so severe in our island with intense frost and dreadful winds, that the fingers of our transcribers have been unable to execute more books. If there should be any man in your parishes who can make glass vessels, I beg that you will induce him to come here as soon as the season becomes mild; for we have no one who is acquainted with the art. It would delight me also to have a harper who could play upon the harp which we call rotta, because I have a harp, but no artist to play upon it. If it be not too much, I wish that you would send me such a person. I beg that you will not despise my petition, nor turn me into ridicule on account of it, and as for the other works of Bede, of blessed memory, I promise you if I live that I will fulfil your desire."*

* Tractat. de Studiis Monasticis, cap. 11. † Massieu, Hist. de la Poesie Fran aise, 212.

‡ Id. 222.

§ Rosenkranz Geschichte der Deutschen Poesie im Mittelalter, 177.

It may be remarked in conclusion, relative to the monastic poets, that many of their legends or short histories of holy persons have been acknowledged to possess considerable poetic merit. The German critics speak with fondness of the legend of Alexius, by Konrad of Würzburg, of that of the two Johns, by Heinz of Constanx, of the journey of the holy Brandan, in old German verse, which was celebrated in the middle ages, of the legend of St. Martina, by Hugo of Langenstein, and of that of the holy William of Oranxe which was sung in the twelfth century in the language of the northern Franks, by Guillaume de Bapaume, and in German by Wolfram von Eschenbach. But it was not only men separate to the Church who possessed the enjoyments of the holy Muse; history records the names of multitudes in every walk of life during the middle ages, whose works evince a tender and poetic mind of boundless fecundity, and alive to the noblest and loftiest conceptions.

It would not be too much to affirm that the people generally were then, not as is now supposed, mere animals of clay and spirits gross, but poets; and the reason of this phenomenon we shall better understand hereafter when we come to speak of the offices and festivals of the church. Dante and Petrarch do not stand isolated like beings of another world in their generation. They possessed but the art of expressing that which they felt in common with their contemporaries, and of developing in the language of genius the sweet and profound impressions which the multitude also experienced from the mysteries of faith, and the loveliness of nature. Do we suppose that ordinary men, in those ages of whom history takes no note, had not also their visions of hell, purgatory, and heaven? That they had not also their seasons when the love of solitude would impel them to fly the city, and go wandering about the country, in summer seated in the shade on a green lawn or reclining on the bank of a river, and when autumn approached repairing to the woods, followed by the Muses? That they could not taste also how sweet was the pure and serene air, that their eyes would not contemplate with joy the stars which shown over them? Socrates says, that while Homer lived, he used to be utterly neglected,* but it was not so with the poets of the middle ages. When Petrarch came to Arezzo, his native town, all the inhabitants went out to meet him, and paid him the same respect and homage that they would have shown to a king. Such was the enthusiasm of a goldsmith at Bergamo, named Henry Capra, that he renounced his trade to commence the study of philosophy and poetry in the steps of Petrarch, whom he persuaded to come to his house, where he received him in a style of royal magnificence, with such joy and honor, that people feared he would lose his senses.

* S. Bonif. Epist. LXXXIX.

That noble cavalier, Pandolphe, of the ancient house of Malateste, was so delighted with the works of Petrarch, that he sent a painter to make his portrait. Rienze at one time owed his preservation, as Petrarch relates, to this love of poetry: for it being rumored at Avignon that he was a great poet, they thought it a kind of sacrilege to put a man to death of so sacred a profession. In another letter Petrarch describes the passion for poetry which prevailed at this time, not in the city of Avignon alone, but in all parts; for he says, "Verses rain in upon me every day from France, Germany, Greece, and England. Our lawyers and physicians will listen to none but Homer and Virgil. What do I say? Even laborers, carpenters, and masons, abandon their hammers and shovels to lay hold of Apollo and the Muses. The other day a father came up to me in tears, and said, 'See how you treat me who have always loved you: you have been the death of my only son.' I was so struck with these words, and the air of the man who spoke them, that I remained for some time motionless. At last, recovering myself, I replied, that I neither knew him nor his son. 'It is of little consequence whether you know him or not,' replied the old man; 'he knows you too well. I have ruined myself to bring him up to the law; and now he tells me he will follow no steps but yours. I am thus disappointed of all my hopes.'" —Charles Fontaine, in like manner, used to be often lectured by his uncle, Jean du Guè, a lawyer and avocat of the parliament of Paris, who endeavored to prevail upon him to forsake the Muses for the bar, saying to him—

"Mieux vaut gain que de philosopher
A gens qui ont leur ménage à conduire;"†

But it is hardly necessary to add, such arguments had little weight with youth during these spiritual ages, when even tradesmen devoted themselves to the Muse. The famous Nicolas Flamel, from being at first but a simple scrivener in Paris, became a painter, a mathematician, an architect, a chemist, a philosopher, and poet! What an extraordinary state of society was that which existed in Provence,

* Plato de Repub. Lib. X.

† Gouget, Tom. XI. 118.

under the sceptre of those amiable and poetic princes, who used to exempt their subjects from paying subsidies on condition that they could produce amongst them a troubadour!*—or that which was seen at the court of Urbino, when it was the asylum of the Muses, under the Duke Guidobaldo da Montefeltro? Historians relate that many cities in the middle ages were in a peculiar degree favored by the Muses. The poetic fame of Tholouse was inherited in Germany in the fourteenth century by Mainz, Strasburg, Colmar, Frankfurt, Würzburg, Zwickau, and Prague; in the fifteenth by Nürnberg and Augsburg; and in the sixteenth by Regensburg, Ulm, Munich, Steiermark, Breslau, and Dantzie. But generally speaking, as was before observed, the multitude, from which a great part of poetry springs, and to which, in one sense, it must return to be judged, was then inclined to receive poetic inspiration. The Muses would not then have separated their admirer from the people, according to the expression of the Roman poet;† for ordinary life was then poetical, so that the personal impressions and recollections of men corresponded with the beautiful creations of poesy. The poets of these ages, like Guillaume de Lorris, frequently trace the origin of their works to some dream which they really had experienced while sleeping upon some sweet violet bank of a clear river in the season of spring, or to some ride by night in the midst of a tempest over a moor, or to some lonely watch near the battlements on narrow wall, marking below the sudden hastening of the swine, who snatch up straw in foresight of a storm, while the distant howl of wolves rises over the surrounding forest. It was not strange that youths who had swam by night in Menai's straits, when "the livid sparkles, those lightnings on the wave, crested the broken tides," should afterwards have had a wild romantic dream, which, with little effort, might employ the genius of a poet. Life admitted then of high natural enjoyments, and consequently men were formed to poetry. They were poets precisely because they lived simply and had an unsophisticated heart. It is a false, and not a Christian civilization, that kills the imagination and banishes the Muse from all converse with mankind.

Moreover, meekness and humility are essential to poetry, for pride is incompatible with its joys. The proud are too knowing to become or to continue poets. The sensations caused in us by the various beauties of literature and art are so fine and delicate, that they perish at the first effort of the mind to understand their causes and relations. In general, pleasure defies analysis, and we are affected exactly in proportion as we are ignorant of the manner how. The proud curiosity of the moderns has impoverished their imagination. That sensibility, which, in youth, extended to all surrounding objects, gradually departs, and the same men who had once so lively a sense of beauty, finish by regarding it with indifference. Do not these observations of Arnaud on the style of Plato, show clearly that meekness conduces to the possession of poetic enjoyment?‡ Now this artificial and perverted state, the result, not of a law of nature, but of a formal apostacy, which is substituted for the natural and renovated order of human life,—this proud curiosity, which only condescends to accept the gifts of heaven on condition of submitting them to an analysis,—did not exist in the ages of which we are attempting to relate the moral history; and therefore the assistance and the consolations of poetry were possessed in all their fulness. The very names of the streets of cities, as in Paris, bore testimony to the importance of the harper, who, like Reginald, had inhabited them, and the roads through forest wilds were designated by the titles that were celebrated in heroic song.* This poet, or harper, was a welcome visitor in the castle or in the cottage—men listened to him, as Plato says, as to one who knew many things; and they used him as boys make use of aged persons,—loving to hear their sweet tales.† Even amidst the cold regions of the North, the people were not all in these ages, as one might at present suppose, men like those described by Æschylus, whose lively blood dull draughts of barley wine had clogged.‡ These were the days when a young Har-old bard of brave St. Clair,

* Tristan, Tom. VI. 233. † Hor. Car. I. 1. ‡ Mem. de l'Acad. des Inscriptions. Tom. XXXVII.

———“born where restless seas
Howl round the storm-swept Orcades:
Where erst St. Clairs held princely sway O'er isle and islet, strait and bay!”

would come to Roslin's bowers,—

“Where, by sweet glen and green-wood tree,
He learn'd a milder minstrelsy;
Though something of the northern spell
Mix'd with the softer numbers well.”

These were the days when nobles in the castle halls, Μύθοισιν τέρποντο πρὸς ἀλλήλους ἐνέποντες, as Plutarch says,

“And noble youths, the strain to hear,
Forsook the hunting of the deer.”

Even the pages of princesses were poets then, as was Michael Marot when page to Marguerite of France; and noble barons expected a poetic nature in their squires, as when Marmion, sitting under the wide chimney arch of the hostel, says,

“Fitz Eustace, know'st thou not some lay
To speed the lingering night away?
We slumber by the fire.”

King Edward I. had a poet in his camp on his expedition into Scotland, who was a monk, named Baston. He was present in the dreadful battle, and describes the death of Sir Giles de Argentine with great feeling.—

* In the diocese of Paris there was a road called le Chemin de la Table de Ronde; and the Rue de la Harpe was Vicus Reiginaldi Citharistæ. Lebeuf, Tom. I. II. 567.

† Plato, Hippias Major.

‡ Suppl.

"Nobilis Argenten, pugil inelyte, dulcis Egidi Vix scieram mentem cum te succumbere vidi."

Who need be told, that even the banquets of these ages were associated with a poetic taste? Τὰ Διωνύσου χάριτες, of which Pindar speaks,* were as familiar with our feudal ancestors as with the ancients.† For Christianity did not declare war against all Homeric manners. Speaking of the Provençal poets, Huet says, that the verses which Homer puts in the mouths of Phemius and Demodocus at the courts of Penelope and of Alcinous, and those which Virgil makes Iopas sing in the court of Dido, may prove the antiquity of the Guay Savoir. Simonides was a troubadour in the Castle of Scopas, and Lord of Thessaly; and Arion represented the same character with the princes of Italy. The ancient Gauls had also their romantic bards: and we learn from Possidonius, as quoted by Athenæus, that Luer-nus, Prince of Auvergne, holding plenary courts and open table, presented a sack full of gold to a strange poet, who had come to honor the feast. Samson gives his robe to the Philistines who explained his enigma; and Pisthæterus, in the Birds of Aristophanes, advises another to give his tunic to recompense a poet, who was come to celebrate the praises of their new city.

I know not whether, among the ranks of modern society it would be possible to select one to which justly would be applicable the words of Plutarch respecting the majority of kings, that they are not Apollos to sing, but Bacchuses to drink, οἱ δὲ πολλοὶ οὐκ Ἀπόλλωνες μὲν ἄν μινυρίσωσι, Διόνυσοι δὲ, ἄν μεθύσωσιν,‡ but I am convinced that these could not be used with truth, in reference to the character of the nobility of the middle ages. To propose giving instances illustrative of this assertion might well alarm a reader who was conversant with the pages of Wharton, Gouget, Renaudot, Millot, Tiraboschi, or any of the great literary historians of Europe. But those who have only met with modern descriptions of the feudal age, which ascribe to it the character of their own, may not be unwilling to hear some evidence in proof that the dignity of a noble was not synonymous with a profound contempt and incapacity for every thing but the dull realities of a materialized existence.

In the first age of French poetry there are recorded the names of Thibault de Mailly, of the illustrious house of Mailly, in Picardy, at that time one of the greatest in France, of Tristan, the châtelain of Concy, and of Blondel, whose faithful attachment to King Richard I. of England was so celebrated in romantic annals. The oldest known poet of Provence was William IX. Count of Poitiers. In the time of St. Louis, nothing was more common than for great nobles and princes to be poets. Charles of Anjou, the king's brother, and afterwards king of Naples, Henry of Soissons, who followed him to the crusade, Henry, Duke of Brabant, Pierre Mauclerc, Count of Brittany, Raoul, Count of Soissons, Thibaut, Count of Champagne, and King of Navarre, were all celebrated for their love and cultivation of poetry. Thibaut, not content with repeating his verses, had them written on the walls of his hall at Provins, and in that of Troyes. Henry of Soissons was a worthy rival, who followed St. Louis to the East, and was made prisoner at the battle of Massoura : so that what Pindar says of the Locrians, Epizephyrians, might with strict justice be applied to the devout Paladins, who sought to deliver the Holy Land :—

* Olymp. XII. † Plutarch, Quest. Græc. § 36. ‡ How to discern true Friends, cap. 16.

———Μέλει τέ σφιβι Καλλιόπα Καὶ χάλκεος Ἄρης.*

And as at Corinth, where the bit was first joined to the rein of horses, and the eagle of Jove displayed upon the two parallel frontispieces of Temples, and the sweetly-breathing Muse cultivated amidst the dreadful spears of heroes,† so to their towers might have been ascribed poesy and art, and the triumphs of a saintly warfare. How dear was poetry to Charlemagne, who collected all the ancient compositions of the bards ! In the time of Charles, Duke of Orleans, father of Louis XII. and uncle of Francis I. the greatest seigneurs of France aspired to be poets and men of learning ; and as Gouget says, the majority of them were writers. The Duke of Orleans had a noble genius and an admirable taste for poetry. In the manuscript collection of his poems on vellum, which the Abbé Gouget consulted, were also the poems of John Duc de Bourbon, of Philippe-le-Bon, Duc de Bourgogne, of Renè d'Anjou, of John of Lorraine, of the Duc de Nevers, of the Comte de Clermont, and of John, Duc d'Alençon. Spain, England, and Italy, could early boast of having poets among their highest princes and nobles.

Illustrious women were inspired by the same enthusiasm. Marguerite of Austria, while regent of Belgium, was the distinguished patroness of the poets, Jean Moulinet and Jean le Maire. She was herself a poet, and also an excellent prose writer : her most considerable work is the history of her misfortunes. The highest nobles of Germany followed in the same track, as Henry of Breslau, the Markgraf of Meissen, Otto of Brandenburg, John of Brabant, Ulrich von Lichtenstein, whose Castle of the Frauenburg was renowned in heroic song.

The Swabian poets flourished a century later than the Provençal, and derived their models from them. Frederic I. composed a short history of Provence. Many verses of the Count Rudolf of Nürnberg resemble those of Folque of Marseille.‡ Celebrated in the middle ages were the German poets Hartmann von der Aue, who sung the Knights of the Round Table, Wernt of Gravenberg, who composed the Wigalois, Walther of the Vogelweide, Konrad of Würzburg, Henry Frauenlob Wolfgang Röhn, Marner Müglin, Klincksor, Boppo, Regenbogen, Konrad Nachtigal, Herman Oertel, and Fritz Zorn, who composed the mystic twelve of the Nürnberg school, that were entitled the poets of the Wartburg. The wise grand master of the Teutonic order in the fourteenth century, Luther of Brunswick, loved poetry and music, and was himself a poet, singing the praise of the Holy Barbara, a saint greatly venerated in the order, whose relics had been brought to Kulm by the brave Dietrick of Bernheim. His example had such an effect, that throughout all the land of Prussia a taste for poetry became general, and poetic paraphrases were made of the Prophet Daniel, and of the Book of Job. The head convent of the order at Marienburg became the resort of minstrels and poets, some of whom were also knights and priests who made religion and history the first subjects of their muse.* Spain could boast of her poetic princes: Don John the First, King of Arragon, was thought by his people to devote too much of his time to poetry; he lived always in the company of poets, whom he invited from every country.† Martin Franc in his Champion des Dames, says,

* Olymp. X. † Id. XIII. ‡ Rosenkranz Geschichte des Deutschen Poesie im Mittelalter, 52.

Lisez souvent au Breviaire,
Du doux poëte Alain chartier,
Eslevez toujours le viaire
A haultes besongnes traictier,

This is an allusion to the Breviaire des Nobles, of which he says, that all knights,

Le Breviaire de Maistre Alain,
Doivent lire deux fois le jour.

In fact, John le Masle, an Angevine, who has written a commentary on this poem, says, that in the time of our ancestors it was in such esteem, that all pages and young gentlemen were obliged to learn it by heart, and to repeat it every day. The verses of these noble poets are often associated with the memory of an affecting and heroic history. John Regnier, escuyer and seigneur of Garehy, a counsellor of Philip the Good, was a great poet, whose affection for the poor was noticed in the last book. He had travelled, as he says, instigated by youthful desire to see strange countries, and had visited not only Italy and many parts of Europe, but also Greece, Turkey, the Holy Land, Armenia, and many other kingdoms. On his return he resided at Auxerre; but in the wars between Philip and Charles VII. of France, he was seized by the latter and imprisoned in a tower at Beauvais, which was opposite the cathedral. In his prison he composed many poems, one of which was entitled, his fortunes and adventures, which begins with a devout prayer to Jesus Christ. The other prisoners, finding out his talent, used to entreat him to write poems for them, which he did. One is entitled, for John Fauleon, a Norman esquire. Besides this, every solemn festival received his offering, that is, a poem on the subject which it commemorated. The poet, Charles de Clavison, who made it his pride that, in an age of heresy, he had always been attached to the Catholic religion, was a knight and lieutenant of the king of France; he dedicated his poems to his sister, Constance de Bauffremont, who was abbess of the royal monastery of St. Menoulx.

* Voigt, Geschichte Preussens, IV. † Diego Savedra Faxarda Christian Prince, Tom. I. 62.

Here then, I conceive, is proof sufficient that the race of men during these ages of faith, loved and possessed the consolations of poetry : it may be required however, to state briefly what were the merits of those compositions, and their claims to the honor of the Parnassian mount. In the first place, the enthusiasm with which they were received ought to be a sufficient warrant to us that they fulfilled at least one of the essential ends of poetry, which is to move and to exalt. In their rapturous delight the men of these ages cried, "the course of the Loire swells with pride for having beheld the birth of Jean de Meun upon its banks." Jean de Meun, thus celebrated as a poet who finished the Romance of the Rose, was a doctor of theology, and with him and Guillaume de Lorris, in about the year 1050, under Henry I., the French poetry may be said to have commenced.* Such was the admiration excited by Bernardo Accolti, in the time of Leo X., that when it was rumored he was about to recite his verses the shops used to be shut, and the most learned men would crowd to hear him.

The applause with which the divine comedy of Dante was received at the time, is attested by the fact of pulpits having been erected in many cities, from which it was expounded. Boccacio was employed for that purpose by the Florentine republic; to him succeeded in the same office Antonio Padovano and Philip Villani. In Bologna, Benvenuto of Imola became a public lecturer upon it in the year 1375. In Pisa, Francesco of Bartolo da Buti gave a similar course in the year 1386. The celebrated Giovanbatista Gelli, from being a shoemaker in the streets of Florence, became one of the greatest writers of Tuscany, through the intense admiration which he conceived for the divine comedy. He used to say, that after being born a Christian, he knew no greater happiness than to have been born in the country of Dante. Yet when that immortal poem first appeared, there was nothing new or singular in its design, which was but a development of the deepest and loftiest thoughts that had long moved indistinctly through the minds of men, perpetuated by the tradition of many visions, like that related by St. Boniface, or that of the knight Tundal in Ireland, or that of Rotcharius the monk, in the time of Charlemagne. But, in general, the character of the poetry of the middle ages was religious, in so much that when poets produced works of a contrary tone, they were indebted for their success to the ingenious fervor which enabled the people to put a devout construction upon them, and by means of a supposed allegorical sense to impart to them a holy character.

Thus it was maintained, notwithstanding the indignant and impressive eloquence of Gerson, that the Romance of the Rose was all allegorical, and that it contained sublime wisdom to correct men, that no attention was to be paid to the letter, but that the deep religious sense was to be carefully investigated. This rose, so difficult to gather, was wisdom, truth, grace, Christian piety, salvation, and, finally, the beatific vision. The Abbé Massieu says, that it is impossible not to smile at the simplicity with which all this is supposed in the editor's preface. But still this judgment of its contemporaries is interesting; it shows that in these ages men exercised as much ingenuity in turning to a religious and virtuous sense what might have been really objectionable, as the moderns evince in detecting a bad motive for every production. For such ingenuity, indeed, there was no occasion in order to discern the religious sense of the greater poets of the middle ages, those monarchs of sublimest song, who even in their lightest productions, like Shakespeare, evinced the constant action of a profound revering spirit. Dante lived at the time of the crusades, when all Europe rose against Asia; and yet, as a French writer remarks, this immense and awful event was not the subject which seized his poetic imagination. There was in the interior of Europe something still greater than this sublime episode, that which was the cause of this prodigious movement, religion. Three centuries later, the beautiful imagination of Tasso, amidst the delights of the court of Ferrara, found nothing more admirable to commemorate than the crusades. But even in presence of these holy wars, and while their memory was fresh, there was something still above them, the church, and it was this which he comprised in his mysterious and immortal Vision of the Life to Come.

* L'Abbe Massieu, Hist. de la Poësie Francaise, 67.

The example of St. Avitus, Archbishop of Vienne, has been already adduced as that of a pontiff and a poet. He was born in the middle of the fifth century, and was a firm supporter of the Catholic faith against the Arians. His poems, in hexameter verse, being six in number, are on the Creation, on Original Sin, on the Expulsion from Paradise, on the Deluge, on the Passage of the Red Sea, and on the Praise of Virginity. The three first are only, as it were, cantos of one poem, which may be called the Loss of Paradise, and which modern critics acknowledge deserves to be compared with that of Milton. It has been thought by some, that his description of the garden of Eden is rather superior than inferior to that of the English poet; for, though so shortly removed from paganism, he mixes in his pictures fewer mythological images, the imitation of antiquity is less visible, and the description of the beauties of nature more varied and more simple. Like Milton, he has imparted to Satan some traits of his original state, and a certain vestige of moral grandeur; he too has painted Satan, at the moment when he enters Paradise and perceives Adam and Eve for the first time,

"Proh dolor, hoc nobis subitum consurgere plasma,
Invisumque genus nostra crevisse ruina?
Me celsum virtus habuit, nunc ecce neglectus
Pellor, et angelico limus succedit honori.
Nec tamen in totum periit, pars magna retentat
Vim propriam, summaque cluit virtute nocendi.
Nil differre juvat: jam nunc certamine blando
Congrediar, dum prima salus, experta nec ullos
Simplicitas ignara dolos ad tela patebit."

It will be easier, he continues, to deceive them while they are alone, and before they shall have launched a fruitful posterity into the eternity of ages.

“Immortale nihil terra prodire sinendum est ;
 Fons generis pereat, capitis defectio membris
 Semen mortis erit.
 Hæc mihi dejecto tantum solatia restant:
 Si nequeo clausos iterum conscendere cœlos,
 His quoque claudentur : levius cecidisse putandum est
 Si nova perdatur simili substantia casu.
 Sit comes excidii, subeat consortia pœnæ,
 Et quos prævideo nobiscum dividat ignes.
 Sed ne difficilis fallendi causa putetur,
 Hæc monstranda via est, dudum quam sæpe cucurri
 In prorum lapsus : quæ me jactantia cœlo
 Expulit, hæc hominem Paradisi è limine pellat.
 Sic ait, et gemitus vocem clausere dolentis.”

The departure from Paradise is thus described :

“His pater exactis, hædorum pellibus ambos
 Induit, et sancta Paradisi ab sede rejecit.
 Tunc miseri egressum properant, mundumque vacantem
 Intran, et celeri perlustrant omnia cursu.
 Et quanquam variis herbis ac gramine picta
 Et virides campos, fontesque et flumina monstrat,
 Illis fœda tamen species mundana putatur
 Post, Paradise, tuam, totumque videntibus horror.
 Quæque magis multo paradiso extenditur, illis
 Angustatur humus, strictumque tuentibus orbem
 Omnia lata nimis parent angusta duobus.
 Squallet et ipse dies, caussantur sole sub ipso
 Subductam lucem.”

The middle ages were familiar with innumerable poems of a high moral interest, the fragments of which still charm and astonish us. Celebrated with our Anglo-Saxon ancestors was the poem of Beowulf, which has been termed a Gothic Iliad. It is so full of noble sentiments and poetic imagery, that the learned Dane, Grundtvig, affirms without hesitation, that any poet of any age might have been proud to have produced such a work. Equally renowned were the song of the Traveller in Anglo-Saxon, which is found in the great book at Exeter, bequeathed to the library of that cathedral by Bishop Leofric, at the close of the eleventh century, the triumphal song of the battle of Brunanburh, and also the funeral dirge over Brithnoth, who, during the unhappy reign of Ethelred, fell gloriously fighting in the battle of Meldun.

Genius, indeed, must not be estimated by years, nor is every old poem holy or inspiring ; but yet what reader of taste at the present day does not recur with pure delight to those English poems of the middle ages, collected by Percy, Wharton, Ellis, and Scott, which recount the heroic deeds, the mourning, and the devout joys of our Catholic ancestors? Many of these are by poets whose names have remained unknown; and some are said to have been the sole productions of their authors, who never made any other, like Tynnichus, the Chalcidian, who never composed any poem but that Pæon, which Plato says all used to sing, and which he affirms to be nearly the most beautiful of all hymns, the invention of which, having been without art, he therefore thinks was justly said to be divine rather than human.* In other works I have made use of these ancient Christian poems, in reference to the manners of chivalry.

“ When all of wonderful and mild
Had rapture for the lonely child.”

The interest attached to the poetic associations of those days defies the cavils of modern criticism. Lord Byron, writing as a reviewer, attempted to despise the Lay of the Last Minstrel; but while he travelled amidst the beautiful scenes of Greece, he could not refrain from calling to mind, even at the court of Ali, the description of the castle of Branksome.

In turning to consider the merit of the early poets of France, we do not leave names and works of a domestic interest; for to Englishmen these old French poets were in some manner naturalized. Several of them had visited England, and were received in illustrious houses, where they nourished the genius of many of our own bards, and instructed the youth of noble families; as was the case with Denisot. The poesies of Ronsard were a consolation to Mary Stuart, who used to read them in the days of her sorrowful captivity, and to find in them a relief that could lighten the burden of her chains.† The modern French have nothing to despise in these ancient poets, but rather from them they might learn simplicity and nature, as well as beauty and force of language. Even the Abbé Massieu admits that the old metrical romances of France contained sometimes passages approaching the sublime. Where we least expect it, we find them giving to Christian virtue a most gracious, venerable, and august character, and striking terror into the guilty. Their object is not to represent the varieties of human character, but to move the soul with admiration and surprise, and that is the end which Aristotle had in view where he affirms that a philosopher is a lover of fables.‡ Henry Stephens made a collection of sentences, from the old French romances, which he said were like Rabbis for the knowledge of many things which belong to the French language. These men, like Guillaume de Lorris, the Ennius of France, who began the Romance of the Rose, or like the songster of Limoges commemorated by Dante, could not at least be condemned as movers and fabricators of new words, an offence so alien from the office of a poet,§ though so common with those of our age who have risen to fame. William of Malmesbury observes, that at the time when the English were fond of making use of abstruse and pompous words derived from the Greek, their greatest poet St. Aldhelm, Bishop of Shireburn, was remarkable for not using exotic words unless very rarely, and when they were necessary. In the descriptive poetry of the middle ages, there was not that fault of attempting to conquer difficulties which do not repay the conqueror, of describing what has no need of being described; objects are only named, and the rest is left to the imagination; a word or a comparison place them before our eyes. It did not resemble the descriptive poetry of our times, which, as Guizot justly remarks, is scientific rather than picturesque, and which by dint of analyzing objects minutely like an anatomist, makes them appear dissected and decomposed.

* Plato Io. † Gouget, Bibliothèque Française, Tom. XII. 265. ‡ Metaphysic. Lib. I. c. 2.

§ Aristoph. Nubes, 1397.

It is easy to perceive too, in many instances, that this old poesy embodied the thoughts of men who possessed, as Marot says, "un gentil entendement." The modern critic Gouget admits, in praise of the poet Andrieu du Hecquet, that he reproves vice without sourness, instructs without being morose, that he is playful without insolence, that he assumes a tone of irony without saying a word that is personal, and that he praises without flattery. Huet, though he derides the old romantic poetry, seems delighted to find that the learned Italians acknowledge that they learned it from the provençals. He remarks that the ancient romantic poems have served to throw much light upon the history of Spain, and to correct the order of its chronology; and though he affirms that D'Urfe was the first to elevate romances from barbarism, it is not to be doubted but that those old Spanish poems, which he so much despised, will survive the fame of that incomparable Astrea to which he assigned the palm. In truth, it appears that very high notions were entertained during these ages of the nature of poetry, and of the object to which even its lightest effusions should be directed. The troubadour has songs for all kinds of glory, and a tear for all misfortunes. "Jonglerie," says a contemporary of St. Louis, "has been instituted to put the good in the way of joy and of honor." Then came the troubadours to sing the history of past times, and to excite the brave in relating the prowess of the ancients. Half a century afterwards the maintainers of the "gai savoir," at Toulouse, exhorted poets to fly from sadness, and to make noble verses in order that all the world might be the more disposed to faith, and to virtue. There was to be nothing childish or effeminate in their verse. The advice given to them resembled that of Milton to Battos, recommending the choice of an heroic theme.

ταῦτα χρὴ μοχθεῦντας ἐν ἀλίῳ ἄνδρας αἰεῖειν

But as for these songs about private little domestic affections, it is only fit that you sing them to your mother at her toilet.

Μυθίσδεν τᾷ μητρὶ κατ' εὐνὰν ὀρρενοῦσά*

Poetry, said they, is not to be degraded to an art merely administering to pleas-

* Theocrit. Id. V.

ture. The sages of antiquity had nobler sentiments respecting it, one of whom noticing the saying of the majority that the great object of poetry and music should be the giving pleasure to the soul, adds but to utter such word is neither endurable in any manner, nor holy, ἀλλὰ τοῦτο μὲν οὔτε ἀνεκτὸν οὔτε ἔσιον τὸ παράπαν φηέγγεσθαι.* “So far I agree to the general opinion,” says Plato, “that music should be estimated by the delight which it inspires, but it is not by the delight of any one taken promiscuously; but that is the most beautiful muse which delights the best men, and those who have been best educated—those who are most remarkable for their virtue. Therefore, we maintain that virtue is an essential qualification for a judge of such things; for neither in the theatre ought a true judge to take any notice of the clamor of the multitude, and of its undisciplined judgment. The practice of determining the victory by the clapping of hands corrupted the poets themselves, who were induced to consult only the vicious pleasures of the multitude, and to look to them for instruction; and it corrupted the pleasure of the theatre, for it ought always to have exhibited better manners than those of the people, and to have inspired them with a sense of higher pleasure than their own.”† What a contrast is there between the judgment of the ancient sage respecting poetry, and that of our contemporaries! “That which does not admit justice,” says Socrates, “does not admit any thing pertaining to the Muses, whatever is unjust is unpoetical,” Ἀμουσον τὸ δὲ ἄδικον.”‡ In their estimate of the importance and object of poetry, our ancestors adhered to the spirit of the ancient world, whose expressions only needed a correction, as where Pindar says of their Apollo, that he invented the harp and bestows the Muse on whom he wills, in order to introduce peaceful laws into the heart,§ and as where Hesiod says, in a connected strain,|| that poets and kings are from the gods, for under a legitimate domination, the gifts of the Muses to men seem to emanate from the demon. Nostradamus, in his lives of the Provençal poets, says, that the monk of the golden isles expressed himself as follows, respecting Phanette and Estaphanette, “They excel in poesy, having a kind of divine inspiration, ‘laquelle estoit estimée en vray don de Dieu.’” Horace thought that the Iliad of Homer conveyed a better moral instruction than the works of the most able philosophers, and certainly there is much to learn from the poets of the middle ages, though they might have little to expect from a critic like Quintilian, who excusing himself from deciding between the rival poets Sophocles and Euripides adds, that no one need hesitate to affirm that for all practical purposes Euripides is by far the more useful.¶ To a judgment formed on loftier and less earthly views, the simplicity of their constructions, the profound piety of their sentiments, the corresponding tone of candor and innocence which characterize them, attended with some degree of that Homeric excellence of sublimity in great things, and of propriety in small,

* Plato de Legibus, Lib. II.

† De Legibus, Lib. II.

‡ Plato, Phædo. 105.

§ Pyth. V. 63.

|| Theogon.

¶ Instit. Orat. X. 1.

for government may be learned from the names which they give to wines in the fabliaux, cannot but conciliate the affection even of the modern readers, and perpetuate the renown of books which were alike recommended by the consent of the learned as well as by the love of boys. By the poets of the middle ages, nature was shown in her totality with a holy earnestness. The solution for all temporal difficulties was sought for in the traditions of spiritual wisdom; and a grand universal view was exhibited of the origin and destiny of the human existence, as may be witnessed in that remarkable book entitled, "Hortus Deliciarum," composed in the twelfth century, by the abbess Herrad of Landsberg, at St. Odilien, near Strasburg, for the instruction and recreation of her sisters. It may be remarked too, that there was nothing forced or still-born in the poetry of the middle ages, because it was in accordance with the living faith of men. It was Homeric and Virgilian not from a cold repetition of Pagan fable and exploded error, but because in accordance with the true ideal exposed by Tasso it was employed upon such themes as Homer and Virgil would have chosen if they had lived in Christian ages.* How well does Mamertus of Vienne direct his companion—

"Quanto major ab his cedit tibi gloria cœptis,
In quibus et linguam exercens, mentem quoque sanctam
Erudies, laudemque simul vitamque capesses:
Dumque legis catus et scribis miracula summi
Vera Dei, propior discas, et carior ipsi
Esse Deo."

But with this principle constantly borne in mind, there was nothing to prevent a Christian poet from knowing and mentioning all things. It was said, that he should read all books, so that strange works ought to be found in his study.

"—Mais cela n'est offense
A un Poëte, à qui on doit lascher
La bride longue, et rien ne lui cacher,
Soit d'art magique, négromance, ou caballe,
Et n'est doctrine escripte, ne verballe,
Q'un vrai Poëte au chef ne deust avoir,
Pour faire bien d'escire son devoir."

But whatever might be the multitude of discordant subjects to which he alluded there should be never any difficulty in discovering what was the poet's own opinion: and heathen imagery was never to be used as a heathen would have applied it. Certainly no poet of the middle ages describing Adam and Eve in Paradise, would like Milton, have compared them to Jupiter and Juno.† Nor have been obliged to say of Eve,

"With goddess-like demeanor forth she went."‡

Nor, on the other hand, would he like Milton have described angels in language that belonged rather to a heathen. What Villani chiefly admires in Dante,

* Dialoghi degl' I'doli.

† Book IV. 500.

‡ Book VIII. 59.

is the art by which he reconciled the ancient poets with Christianity, and transferred their treasures to illustrate the Christian doctrine. In fact, the meek possessed all the intellectual as well as material riches of the earth, on the principle that was even known to Cicero. "Recte ejus omnia dicentur, qui scit uti solus omnibus."*

In the poetry of Dante, Guinicelli, Cavalcanti, and even Petrarch, were united philosophy and theology, civil science and poetry, the beautiful and divine, earth and heaven, not from a defective direction of the intelligence as the modern sophists affirm,† but from a thorough initiation into the mysteries of wisdom, and in accordance with that divine fiat which gave to the poor in spirit, and to the meek, both heaven and earth. To the ages of faith was unknown that erroneous philosophy which first appeared in France during the time of the fourteenth Louis, which rendered men scrupulous and afraid, whenever they beheld religion attended with the chorus of glorious and beautiful offerings of nature, and which taught that men could not have fancy as their companion along with reason as their guide. The great spiritual writers had shown to the exclusive admirers of every thing positive the danger of affecting to despise poetry. "There are some," says Taulerus, "in this life who too quickly bid adieu to images before truth has delivered them from their power: and because they deliver themselves they scarcely or never can attain to truth." The danger arising from the power of the imagination when not under the control of reason, that Socratic medicine, as Cicero terms it, was indeed never more carefully and acutely explained than in the writings of St. Anselm and other masters of the school, in which we may find passages exactly parallel to that sentence of Tieck, that if the feelings and imagination succeed in setting up their own supremacy, and in overthrowing reason, then each of our higher impulses begets a giant as its son, that will war against God. For doubt, wit, unbelief, and scoffing, are not the only faculties that fight against God; our imagination, our feelings, our enthusiasm, may do the same, though at first they seem to supply faith with so safe and mysterious an asylum." In the blessed John of the cross, the holy Theresa found a monitor to correct those wanderings of the imagination which had sometimes caused her so much pain, and who enabled her to read from experience that the imagination and the understanding, as she says, are not the same thing.‡ It was not overlooked that the possible errors of fancy are as great and their delusions as dangerous as those of reason; but neither was it unobserved in those times which beheld the fall of an Abailard, that as Frederick Schlegel says, there was much more occasion for pointing out the errors incident to reason, than for anxiously warning men against the possible abuse of fancy.§

Upon the whole, therefore, to the philosophic views of the ages of faith the

* De Finibus, Lib. III. 22.

† Antichita Romantiche d'Italia, II. 213.

‡ The Castle of the Soul IV. dwelling.

§ Philosophie der Sprache, 180.

object and employment of poetry were not different from those of religion. Tasso says, that the poem of Dante has contemplation for its object;* and accordingly we find that many of the poets then renowned, never began to compose without a formal and devout invocation of the Almighty.† Moral and pious reflections in verse are mixed up with their histories, as in that celebrated account of the life of Louis de la Tremouille, by John Bouchet, who proposed as his chief object to edify and instruct young knights in their various duties, as also in his book "Séjour des trois nobles Dames," though it was written for a particular occasion on the death of Arthur de Gouffer, in which he says, that his object is to inspire hope and comfort to all persons in adversity, and to supply brief instruction to teach men how to pass the perilous ways of this dispiteous world. Thus again, Claude Mermet, entitled the collection of his poems, the past time of Claude Mermet, of St. Rambert in Savoy, a poetical work sententious and moral, to give profitable instruction to all persons who love virtue. One poem of Arthur Desire, is entitled, Les Batailles et Victoires du Chevalier Céleste contre le Chevalier Terrestre. Raoul de Houdan, of whom Huon de Merry says, that no mouth of a Christian ever said things so well, composed a work entitled, the Story of the way of Hell, which those follow who go to visit the Lord of Hell, "Plaisant chemin et bonne voye." As they began with a religious invocation, so they used to finish with a devout prayer. Thus concludes John Ruyr one of his poems.—

"Jesus soit mon art studieux Et sa sainte croix mon volume."

And the only reward which Martin Franc requires for his long labors in the composition of the champion des Dames in defence of women, to disprove the slanders brought against them in the Romance of the Rose, is that they for whom he has composed it, would please to pray for him that he might obtain the kingdom of Paradise. Many of these poets too, were themselves men of innocence or of sincerely penitential lives. Such were Luis of Leon, Gower, Lydgate, Southwell, Tasso, Dante, and Petrarch. The exquisite Latin poems of Mark Antonio Flamminio, the friend of Cardinal Pole, are associated with the image of the most amiable of men, those of Vida, Bishop of Alba, with that of a prelate whose generous disposition had endeared him to the poor, those of Sannazzaro with that of a poet comparable to Virgil, whose heart was ever bent on heavenly musings. In reply to the heir of Petrarch, and on hearing of his death, Boccacio says, in his epistle, "After having read your letter, I wept all night for my dear master; not indeed for him; his prayers, his fasts, his life, permit me not to doubt his happiness, but I weep for myself." Philip Villani relates that when Petrarch had grown mature with age, he devoted himself without intermission to the study of theology, to the ecclesiastical office, to prayers and fasting, and that he lived piously and with simplicity. How engaging is the portrait which John Bouchet

* Discorsi sul Poema Errico, I.

† Gouget, Bibliothèque Française, Tom. XI. 4.

gives of the poet Pierre Riviere, in the verses which he placed on the tomb of "this child of Poitiers."

"En son jeune âge il fut fort studieux,
A Dieu devot, aux gens très-gratieulx,
Humble et courtois, et de bonne nature,
Prisé de tous par sa littérature."

The Poet John le Masle, who expressly sung the moral excellence of poets, and their honest freedom, and who was celebrated as the commentator on the Bréviaire des nobles of Alain Chartier, who had so well explained all the virtues and perfections which belong to the nobility of a gentleman, could bear this testimony to himself, that he had never sought—

"Pour estre grand en biens, se mettre en servitude,
Mais tousjours libre et franc, a mis tout son estude,
A poursuivre la vertu."

These are examples and lessons which ought not to be withheld from the youth of our times, which is in such danger of losing sight of the true ideal of the poet, familiar to men in ages of faith, and of mistaking for it the gloomy and delusive phantom of modern genius. The human intelligence is, to the ear of faith, like the statue of Memnon, which sends forth no harmonious sound, unless it be shone upon by the sun of justice. Without those rays to sanctify it, the extraordinary gifts of the Creator may astonish and impart a transitory pleasure to wretched mortals; though, after all, what is Childe Harold by the side of Dante, or Juan compared with the hero of the Jerusalem? but they can never yield a complete and unfailling joy. Sad, at all events, and unutterably miserable is the attempt of those who look to them for models of imitation. Modern literature shows how easy it is to catch the licentiousness and the gloom, without the freedom and the depth of Byron, the frivolity of the Troubadour without his grace and tenderness. As Marot says, in allusion to the celebrated but immoral poet Villon,—

"Peu de Villons en bon savoir, Trop de Villons pour decevoir."

But how feeble is language to express the desolation which awaits genius misdirected, and employed to an unholy end, when, as in this once gay and licentious Villon, it beholds the early victims of its influence prematurely departing, and itself comfortless, self-tormented, and alone! Would you hear the mournful testimony of an old poet to the inefficacy of his heart to sweeten such days:

"Quand on est jeune, en grand esbattement
Pour passe-temps et pour contentement,
C'est un plaisir de sonner la musette;
Mais puis après, quand l'âge et la disette
Surprennent tost le poëte estonné
Alors s'en va son chant mal entonné
Diminuant tout petit à petit,

Car de sonner it pert tout appetit :
 Alors il haït sa musette et sa muse ;
 Si elle s'offre, il la jette et refuse."

St. Fortunatus of Poitiers taught the same lesson in his poem on human life :

"Cum venit extremum, neque Musis carmina prosunt, Nec juvat eloquio detinuisse melos."

I am not ignorant that there is a dark and deplorable side belonging to the poetic history of the middle ages ; but I reserve my observations respecting it to a future place, where I shall speak in general of the virtue and vice which distinguished them, for the modern opinions will necessarily require an explanation, with respect to the profligacy of the licentious poets, when we may be able to place the fact of their existence in its just and natural point of view. At the present, let us direct our attention for a moment to the theatre, as it was reconstituted in the middle ages. All things, say the teachers of divine wisdom, are lawful to the pure ; but some are so essentially tyrannical, so powerful and universal in their tendency, to bring men into subjection, to give force to the passions, and to enervate those higher powers of the immortal nature which are to wage war against the ancient serpent, that Christianity has pronounced them to be eternally separate from the sphere of her dominion, and from an association with her consoling promises respecting the enjoyments of a future life. In the form of the ancient world, the theatre evidently stood condemned on different grounds, but whether it was possible to revive it in any other, so as not to have it included among those things, through prudence, and almost necessity, forbidden, was a problem which did not admit of an easy solution. Some, in considering it, might indeed be influenced by caution and unwillingness to sanction any unnecessary restraint which might affect the interests of human genius, while others, with equal zeal in behalf of poesy, might question whether the interests of intelligence were really so concerned in the result as was pretended. Probably it would be very easy to have demonstrated that they were not ; and, indeed, the experience and testimony of men the most removed from ascetical influence, will go far to show that the grandest creations of dramatic poets are not developed by a representation on the stage of a theatre. But, however that question be determined, it is certain that genius lost that instrument of expression when the belief in the heathen mythology was destroyed. From that hour the real dramatic effect, in relation to higher poetry, could only be revived on the stage by an alliance between the theatre and the Christian faith, an association most difficult, most delicate, which it was obvious could not be accomplished until the Church had seen many ages and generations of her children, and which, if ever formed, the least relapse to heathen incredulity, or the scepticism of later philosophers, the least relaxation or diminution of simplicity and faith, would inevitably and for ever abolish. Such an union, however, did take place during the middle ages, and it was at an end when they closed, and from thenceforth the genuine children of the muse, they who had really drunk deep of the spirit of Æschylus and Sophocles might have regarded with the utmost indifference the controversy respecting dramatic representation between the Church and the self-imagined poets who sought to identify the interests of human genius with the success of their art and the encouragement given to their own profession.

This brief statement may serve to account for the seeming inconsistency in the language of the clergy, who at one time cry out with the primitive Christians, What union is possible between the Gospel and the muses, between Calvary and the theatre? and at another, are heard to invite men to the new plays, which they have themselves composed, and in which their students perform characters, at the same time that they are condemning actors in ordinary theatres, saying, with John of Salisbury, that it is unquestionably a shameful thing to be an actor; "satiùs enim fuerat otiari quam turpiter occupari," declaring that actors and buffoons are excluded from the holy communion while they persevere in their malice, thence leaving the patrons and favorers of actors and buffoons to collect what awaits themselves, if those who do and those who consent are to be punished alike,* and adopting as a passage to be for ever read by their successors in their office for the vigil of Pentecost, the solemn words of St. Augustin, which refer to the theatre in its ordinary state, in that to which it had always a tendency to return: "these things you must renounce, not in word alone, but in deed, and in all the acts of your life. For you are caught and discovered by your cunning enemy, when you profess one thing and perform another, faithful in name, and not holding the faith of your promise, at one time entering the church to pour forth prayers, and shortly after in the theatres crying out shamelessly with actors. Quid tibi cum pompis diaboli quibus renuntiasti?"†

The history of the Christian drama, though in many respects interesting, need not detain us long: its first efforts are witnessed in those mysteries, as they were termed, of the nativity, of the passion, of the resurrection, and of the acts of the apostles. This forced union, which, however, be it remembered, was the only possible device for affording to a Christian society a dramatic representation of the highest tone, is one of the chief grounds for the accusation of grossness, and barbarism brought against the ages of faith by modern writers, who thus enable us to estimate pretty clearly the consistency of their own faith as Christians, and the depth of their sagacity as philosophers. In the villages, on the patronal feasts, the mysteries of their respective patrons and of other saints, used to be performed when every one would contribute, from the baron who lent his finest tapestry, to the poorest rustic, who gave his labor to construct the stage. There were pious spectacles at Paris, Metz, Angers, Poitiers, Rouen, Limoges, and in other cities of France. At Rheims, in the year 1624, mysteries of the Saints were transferred to the theatres of colleges. The personages were not libertines, adulterers, robbers, and gamblers, but angels, apostles, doctors of the law, scribes, and tyrants. The people were so familiarized with these scenes, that if any actor of the troop were absent, there were always some young man ready to take his part, and play an angel or a martyr. In England, the first trace of dramatic representation is found in the history of Matthew Paris, where he relates that Geoffrey, a learned Norman, master of the school of the abbey of Dunstable, composed the play of St. Catharine, which was acted by his scholars in the year 1110. Another writer, in 1174, mentions that religious plays were acted in London, representing either the miracles wrought by holy confessors, or the sufferings of the martyrs. The Grey Friars at Coventry used to represent mysteries on the festival of Corpus Christi, comprising the story of the Old and New Testament, composed in the old English rithme, which used to attract vast multitudes of people to the city. In the year 1483 Richard III. visited Coventry in order to see the plays, and in 1492 they were acted in presence of Henry VII. and his queen. In every great castle the children of the chapel used to act religious plays during the twelve days of Christmas and at Corpus Christi. There is notice of this in the Earl of Northumberland's household book. In every college pieces of this kind used to be performed. The confraternities of the mysteries were composed of persons of the most innocent manners and of the purest intentions, and who can doubt but that these spectacles tended to keep men familiar with the themes which should be ever dearest to the Christian family? * At the same time it is to be remembered that, owing to incorrigible abuses, they were not every where equally favored by the encouragement of the religious. The reply of the Sacristan, in the convent of the Franciscans at Poictou, to Villon, who came to borrow a magnificent cope, to be borne by one of his actors in the piece entitled The Passion, proves that such spectacles were sometimes regarded with displeasure by the clergy. †

* De Nugis Curialium, Lib. I, c. 8.

† Tractat. de Symbol. ad Catechumen.

With respect to the literary merit of these pieces, their most disdainful antagonists admit that they are enlivened by boldness of incident, and that occasionally they evince an unexpected tenderness and delicacy of expression. It was from one of these plays called Adam and Eve, which Milton saw represented in Italy, that he is said to have taken the first hint for his poem of Paradise Lost. In Catholic countries, at the present day, there are sometimes to be seen, at banquets, certain religious shows in miniature, representing the annunciation, the nativity, or the epiphany, and the kind of galvanic effect which these innocent spectacles produce upon the sophists would be unaccountable, if one had not perceived that they were associated with a deep religious feeling, the attempt to recall which produces in minds that detest God, those paroxysms, which are supposed to arise only from the pain which all indications of a popular and barbarous taste occasion in persons of delicacy and philosophic refinement. When brought unexpectedly in presence of these innocent representations, they rail like the demoniac who came out from the tombs, and sometimes might be observed to use almost his words: "Quid mihi et tibi est, Jesu Fili Dei altissimi? obsecro te ne me torqueas."* There were other spectacles exhibited in the middle ages to which I shall merely allude. Those professedly ludicrous, though associated with solemn forms, were offensive abuses against which the clergy loudly protested. Contemporary writers speak of them with the utmost abhorrence, and yet perhaps they were only the indication of a natural disposition which belongs to men in their noblest state, which merely required to be directed and moderated. Müller speaks of the inclination of the Doric race to mirth and merriment, under which a very serious character was frequently concealed;† and, in fact, when these diversions of the middle ages are described, we might imagine that we were reading of those sports of the Lacedemonians which mingled in the same breath the grave and solemn lessons of philosophy, and the most ludicrous mimicry and buffoonery. Persius, the disciple of the Stoic sect, made Sophron the mimographer, the model of his satires; and the grave and philosophic Sparta was the only Greek state in which a statue was erected to laughter. Religion, indeed, would have the right to reject such a plea in mitigation of sentence, but when human wisdom proudly inveighs, we may, in justice to the character of the middle ages, reply, with the historian of the Doric race, that among that people the strictest gravity was found closely united with the most unrestrained jocularity and mirth; in the same manner as the modern society can lay claim to neither; for as every real jest requires for a foundation a firm, rigorous, and grave disposition of mind, so moral indifference and a frivolous temperament not only destroy the contrast between gravity and jest, but annihilate the spirit of both.

* See Monteil, Hist. des Français, Tom. III. Hist. du Théâtre Française, par Parfait, Tom. I. II. Hist. de Poésie Française, par l'Abbé Massieu, règne de Charles VII. Historia Universitatis Parisiensis a Buleo, annis 1469. 1483. 1487. Antiq. de Paris, par Sauval. Wharton, Hist. of English Poetry, &c.

† Hist. de Poésie Française, par l'Abbé Massieu, 257.

* Luc. VIII. 28.

† Hist of the Dorians, Book III. c. 10.

CHAPTER V.

RETURNING now to matters of more interest, we should observe that from the very nature and origin of the Christian religion, there was clearly no inconsistency between its principles and the possession of human learning. Truth admits of no separations or exclusions. In the first astonishment of the awakening soul of men and of nations, when apprised of the advent of the Son of God, it was indeed to be expected that there would be a temporary suspension of all intellectual exercise, and a total obliteration from the memory of all former and perishable things; but the universal and continued indulgence in such a quiescent state would, beyond all doubt, be contrary to the order of Providence, and opposed to the intentions of the Divine announcement. They who had been permitted to see the end of all perfection were at the same time made sensible that the commandment was very broad. The interests of truth sometimes required the employment of learning to illustrate and confirm it, and the Divine promises sanctioned the enjoyment of its advantages in declaring that the meek should possess the earth. St. Clemens Alexandrinus was the first among the Christians to attack the profane authors with their own arms, and to make use of their learning. Origen followed in that track, but as St. Augustin says, "the faithful always accommodated what was good to their own use, wherever it was found. How much gold and silver," he says, "did the blessed martyr Cyprien carry away from Egypt? How much Lactantius? How much Victorinus? Optatus? Hilarius?" We ought not to disdain what is good in the learning and arts of the heathens: "imo vero quisquis bonus verusque Christianus est, Domini sui esse intelligat ubicunque invenerit veritatem."* St. Basil, treating expressly on the advantages to be derived from the learning of the Gentiles, found much to praise in Homer and the Pythagoreans. The Greek fathers, indeed, are known to have endeavored to imitate the style of Demosthenes and Homer;† and the importance which they attached to the beauties of literature, may be inferred from that work of Apollinarius, Bishop of Laodicea, who, when Julian published his decree, forbidding the Christians to be instructed in ancient learning, in order to supply the faithful with a specimen of every kind of composition, according to the design of St. Gregory Nazianzen, formed the writings of the Evangelists and those of the Apostles into dialogues in the style of Plato.

* De Doctrin. Christiana, Lib. II. cap. 18. 40.

† Mabillon de Studiis Monasticis. Pars II. c. 15.

Even St. Jerome had not omitted the study of the heathen writers, and in writing to Magnus, a Roman orator, he observes that the ecclesiastical writers who preceded him had always used this liberty. The passage in which he describes his ancient fondness for learning, is truly remarkable. "When I was young," saith he, "I was carried away by a wonderful ardor for learning, nor did I presume, like some others, to be my own teacher. I heard Apollinaris at Antioch, and worshipped him, yet I would never receive his contentious dogmas. When my hair became grey, and bespoke rather the master than the disciple, I went to Alexandria and heard Didymus. I was grateful to him, for I learned what I had not known before, and I did not lose from his teaching what I had before known. Men thought that I would make an end of learning, yet I proceeded again to Jerusalem and to Bethlehem. With what labor and cost had I Bar-aniam for my nocturnal preceptor! for he feared the Jews like Nicodemus. Of all these men I make frequent mention in my works. Certainly Apollinaris and Didymus differ on many points, so that I was borne to one side and the other, for I confessed both of them as my masters! I have read Origen. If there be a crime in reading, I must confess myself guilty. Yet I never admitted his errors: his genius would never have displeased me. Lactantius writes a detestable sentence in his Institutes, yet who would forbid me to read that powerful work because of that one sentence. In like manner I may apply to Origen without fearing his poison. Physicians say that great diseases, being incurable, should be left to nature, lest medicaments should aggravate the evil. I have never sought, therefore, to transfer these errors of Origen into the Latin tongue, and to publish them to the world. Non enim consuevi eorum insultare erroribus quorum miror ingenia. If Origen were alive again, he would be indignant at you his admirers, who have made known his errors; and he would say with Jacob, 'odiosum me fecistis in mundo.' Let us not imitate his vices whose virtues we cannot follow. But the books of Origen may be read with profit for their learning and useful matter, and they who object to this should remember, that if there be a woe against those who call evil good, there is also one against those who call good evil."* It is a modern discovery that the Christian literature of early ages is unworthy of the attention of scholars. Petrus Crinitus, the friend of Politian and Pius of Mirandula, says, "that he cannot express with what delight he studies the Greek and Latin fathers, for their writings seem to him to be treasures in which there is such a varied and multifarious learning and knowledge of all things, that they contain nearly all laws and sentences of philosophy, and nearly all antiquity."† The tragedy composed by St. Gregory Nazianzen, of which I have already spoken, shows how clearly it was the desire of the Christians to avail themselves of the beauties of heathen literature. We do not find them paying any attention to the medium through which they might have to pursue intellectual riches.

* Epist. LVI. XLI.

† De honesta Disciplina, Liv. VIII. 1.

The celebrated Gerbert, afterwards Pope Sylvester II. studied for three years at the Moorish university of Cordova, where the sciences of mathematics and medicine were cultivated with great success. It was this pope who introduced the use of the Arabic figures into Christian Europe. St. Augustin scrupled not to make use of the writings of Tichonius, a Donatist; and Mabillon, in his treatise on monastic studies, recommends the Prolegomena of Walton, and the proofs of Christianity by Grotius, and proves that it is consistent with the monastic duties to consult the writings of heretics, when they contain nothing contrary to truth.* Of the importance attached to learning in the estimation of men, during the ages of faith, we have evidence in almost all the ecclesiastical monuments which have come down to us. We find St. Augustine exposing the folly and criminality of certain enthusiasts, who were for dispensing with the trouble of learning languages, from expecting a particular inspiration, and even for despising all who did not pretend to it as deprived of the grace of the Holy Spirit. "Let us not tempt Him in whom we believe," says the holy Augustin, "lest being deceived by such craftiness of the enemy, we should become unwilling even to enter the churches to hear the Gospel, or to attend to any man reading or preaching, being inflamed with the hope of being carried up to the third heaven like the Apostle, there to hear ineffable words, and there to see our Lord Jesus Christ, and from him, rather than from men, to hear the Gospel. 'Caveamus tales tentationes superbissimas et periculosissimas.'"† St. Jerome, too, reproves certain persons who condemned him for his application to learning, and who esteemed themselves as saints because they knew nothing.‡ "Join yourself to a virtuous, tractable, and learned man," is the advice of an ascetic writer of the middle ages.§

The decay of learning, during the convulsions which attended the invasion of the barbarians, was regarded as a great calamity by the Christian clergy, whose affecting lamentations over the fall of letters, were a proof how highly they esteemed them. St. Gregory of Tours, in the preface of his history says, "the study of letters and of liberal sciences, perishing in the cities of Gaul, amidst the good and the bad actions which were there committed, while the barbarians were given up to ferocity, and their kings to fury, while the churches were alternately enriched by devout men and plundered by the infidels, there has appeared no grammarian, skillful in the art of dialectics to undertake the description of these things in prose or verse, so that many men lament, saying, Woe to us! the study of letters perishes among us, and there is no one who can record the facts of this time; seeing that, I have thought it right to preserve, although in an uncultivated language, the memory of past things, that future men may be made acquainted with them." The promotion of learning was a constant object of solicitude with the sovereign pontiffs. "We are bound," says Pope Alexander III. to Peter Abbot of St.

* Tractat de Studiis. Monast. Præfat Pars II. cap. 2. § 2. † De Doctrina Christiana Prolog.

‡ Epist. XXV.

§ Thom. de Kempnii Hortulus Rosarum, I.

Remé, "to provide with so much the more care for the convenience of learned and devout men, as the fruit and utility are great which result from their labors to the churches of God." And in a subsequent age we find that it was the Roman pontiffs who encouraged the learned scholars, who devoted themselves to searching for precious manuscripts, like Poggio, the successive secretary to eight popes. Nicholas V. promised five thousand ducats to him who should produce a manuscript of St. Mathew in Hebrew, and he made Rome an asylum for the learned men of the East, when they fled from the Mahometans, carrying with them their literary treasures.

It was the popes who assisted and supported the first printers, as the workmen of Faust and Schoeffer, on their removal to Rome. It is a pope, the great St. Gregory, so falsely accused of having burnt the library of Mount Palatine, which must have perished long before his time, who is the patron of scholars throughout the universal church. Of the wide diffusion of learning, during the middle ages, the generality of modern writers seem not to be aware, nor, on the other hand, of the very confined limits within which its influence extended before the rise and propagation of the Church. At the commencement of the Christian era, we find that books were so scarce, and the means of communicating them so scanty, that the greatest writers were often unknown to their contemporaries. Thus Strabo is not once quoted by Pliny or by any other contemporary naturalist, nor is Aretin by Galen. It is probable that they were not aware of each other's existence. Whereas in the middle ages, in the vast society of the Church, by means of communication with Rome, and the intercourse which was carried on between monasteries, learned and holy men, though separated at the greatest distances, were known to each other, and Europe became one immense republic of letters. Schlegel shows that from the time of Charlemagne manuscripts were multiplied in the West with more profusion than they had ever been in the most polished times of antiquity, so that the writings of Greece and Rome were now studied and commented upon in remote and desolate regions, to which, if it had not been for the ecclesiastical society, their fame would have never reached. We find the monk of Melrose, who wrote a chronicle of that abbey, quoting the fourth book of Aristotle de Animalibus, and eighth of Pliny's Natural History. In the fifth and sixth centuries, amidst the dreadful shock of the fall of the Roman empire and the desolation of Europe, by the barbarous hordes, Ireland, from its situation, as Baron Cuvier remarks, being at a distance from the ruin, became the asylum of learning, and monks from Ireland then proceeded to carry back the torch to the devastated regions of Gall and Germany. It is a mistake, however, to suppose that the ancient learning at any time wholly perished in any part of the empire. St. Augustin speaks of the wide diffusion of the Latin language as an event miraculous, and a result of the special providence of God to facilitate the work of evangelizing the nations. In the fourth and fifth centuries, the Latin was spoke in all the Galls to the Rhine, as well as in Spain and Italy. So late as the time of St. Bernard, the people generally understood Latin ; and Mabillon places it among his questions, whether the sermons of St. Bernard were originally composed in the Latin or in the Romance. There was in Europe, as a modern French critic observes, a kind of intellectual republic, which was styled “omnis Latinitas.” It is certain that St. Bernard sometimes preached in Latin, and his secretary says of him, that his eloquence and wisdom are celebrated “through all Latinity.” Yet he preached also in the Roman wallon, or language of the country. In the seventh and eighth centuries it was in Latin that even popular songs were composed. When Clotaire II. gained a victory in the north of France, his army celebrated it by a Latin song.

It appears from the Life of St. Eloy, by St. Ouen, that in the seventh century the upper classes of Rouen were familiar with Plato, Aristotle, Demosthenes, Herodotus, and Homer, with Cicero, Sallust, Livy, Virgil, Menander, Plautus, Horace, Solinus, Varro, and also with other authors, of whom we have now nothing but the catalogue of their writings.* St. Gregory of Tours relates that King Gontran, making his entry into Orleans, was received with greetings in Syriac and in Latin ; for in consequence of commercial relations, the oriental languages were then taught in the schools of Paris. The chronicles of these ages speak of many saints who were skilled in the Roman law. At the end of the seventh century, St. Bonet, Bishop of Clermont, was learned in the decrees of Theodosius, and St. Didier, Bishop of Cahors, from the year 629 to 654, applied himself to the study of the Roman law. The tenth century is that age of deplorable fame which is said to have been involved in extreme darkness,—insomuch, that the heretics have made it a ground to deny the perpetual and uncorrupt transmission of the doctrine of the Church.

Mabillon, aided by his unbounded learning, examines the history of this period, and comes to a result widely different from theirs : he even proves that the complaints of Cardinal Baronius† can only be justified by a regard exclusively directed to the state of Rome and Italy at that moment ; for that a view of the universal Church will demonstrate that, although there were then indeed many evils to be deplored, yet all things were not so deplorable but that there were some remains of ancient learning ; nay, it will show that there were then many men of the most eminent sanctity and of sound learning, who were able to transmit the uncorrupt doctrine of the Church to posterity. No age is void of moral darkness. The holy Fathers in primitive times lamented the reign of wickedness and ignorance : this we too lament, and this our posterity will lament also ; but never does the Church lose the savor of sanctity and of learning which she received from Christ.‡ Ignorance is the punishment of sin ; but they who say this, continues the master of the sentences, should consider diligently, that not every one who is ignorant of something, or who knows something less perfectly, is therefore in such ignorance or ought to be called ignorant; because that only should be called ignorance when what ought to be known is not known. Such ignorance is the punishment of sin when the mind is obscured with vice, so as not to be able to know the things which it ought to know.* This is a darkness which involved the race of men in no age of the Church's history; but the light of human learning in Italy was no doubt in the tenth century obscured,—though even then, as Henrion justly remarks, the object of studies was good, since it embraced doctrine and morals, the only things in reality of which the knowledge is essential.† In the eleventh it broke forth again in the various congregations of learned Benedictines, the success of whose labors are acknowledged by the moderns themselves; but even in the tenth century, other nations enjoyed greater learning: for it is a mistake of Villemain, when he affirms that Italy had uninterruptedly remained more civilized than every other part of Europe.‡ Spain, though oppressed under the yoke of the Arabians, beheld those great prelates, Gennadius of Asturia, Attilanus Zamorensis, Sisenand and Rudesind of Compostello; and the state of the Church with regard to learning, in Germany, France, England, and Ireland, was far happier. Bruno, brother of Otho the great, and Archbishop of Cologne in that age, is thus described in the chronicle of Madgeburg: “He was endowed with a great genius; he was great in learning, and in all virtue, and industry. Being appointed by King Otho to preside over the untameable Lotharian nation, he delivered the country from robbers, he instructed it with legal discipline, he loved the flock committed to him, he saved many from error,—some, by assiduous disputations, leading to better things, and others, by maturity of learning, inflaming with a holy desire:—mild in speech, humble in learning, a destroyer of evils, an asserter of truth, gentle to the subject, severe to the proud, and fulfilling in his own life what he taught to others.” Of Rotgerus, a German bishop in the tenth century, we read that he was versed in Greek and Latin, and that wherever he went he used to carry about with him his library, like an ark of the Lord.§

* See Recherches sur l'Hist. Relig. et Lit. de Rouen, 41.

‡ Ad An. 900.

† Præfat. in V. Sæcul. Benedict. § 1.

Modern critics have remarked, that the prodigious number of books published during the twelfth century, attests the existence of a multitude of readers. They admit, that in the city and feudal life of those times, a great number of persons, of all classes, employed themselves in reading, and in reasoning on the books they read.|| Even the Provencal poetry of the Troubadours, is not free from the influence of classical antiquity; for it contains some literal imitations from the Latin poets, and one Troubadour expressly cites Plato, Homer, and Virgil. That classical learning was at no time wholly neglected, might be inferred from the writings of many whom obscure fame hath concealed from ordinary readers;¶ but the com-

* Petr. Lombardi, Lib. II. distinct. XX.

† Hist. de la Papauté, Tom. III. 177.

‡ Tableaux de la Litterature au Moyen Age, I. 97. § Mabillon, Pref. in V, Sæcul. Ben. § 2.

|| Villemain, Tableaux de la Litterature au Moyen Age, I. 307.

¶ Vide Hæren. Geschichte des Studiums der Classischen Litteratur im mittelalter.

positions of distinguished men throughout the series of ages, place that point beyond question. To attempt to give an adequate idea of the learning of the clergy during the ages of faith, would be wholly inconsistent with the very narrow limits prescribed to this inquiry, and indeed it would be also on other grounds deserving of ridicule, since it would indicate great presumption in one who is himself without learning, to pretend to estimate that of others. It is not for a mere spy to feel ambitious to mount the horses of Achilles. Nevertheless, I fain would say something on this subject, not only because one feels as it were arrested irresistibly by the kind of solemn and romantic interest which is attached to it, but also in consideration of its extreme importance, independent of what is required to be shown in this place: for though many good men may be disposed to think lightly of such disquisitions, there is reason to believe that the strong hold of heresy in many heads, consists in the opinion, that during the middle ages, men were ignorant to such a degree as to be incapable of distinguishing truth from error, history from fable.

When Mabillon published his Treatise on Monastic Studies, in which he proved the antiquity, universality, and great importance of the study of learning in the religious orders, the celebrated Armand de Rancé sent forth a reply, in which he disproved the necessity for such studies in members of the monastic order, and proceeded even to criticise, with considerable severity, that part which related to the conduct of the religious in the cultivation of the sciences. The facts, however, he did not disprove: and although he might feel that no obligation resulted from the example of such numbers of holy monks who had applied to learning, to music, and even to poetry, he could hardly have expected that the judgment of many readers would acquiesce, in his suggestion, that these men must have forgotten death and judgment, because they had been anxious to procure a copy of Cicero's books, de Oratore, and the Institutions of Quintilian. At the same time it cannot be denied but that, independent of the object presented to us in this place, there would be more occasion for explaining on what grounds the elect children justified their cultivation of human learning,—though, to those who stand near the mountain, the answer is involved in no difficulty,—than for proving a fact which is so evident to every one conversant with the history of the middle age, that they did possess it in an eminent degree. It is, however, to illustrate the latter proposition that I am at present called upon. But to what order shall I first turn for examples? or what bright gems shall I select from the overflowing plenty in the intellectual treasury of the meek during the ages of faith?

Before I attempt to enter upon the subject, I would observe, that to a Catholic, not only the philosophical, as we shall see in another place, but also the literary history of the world, is prodigiously enlarged; objects change their relative position, and many are brought into resplendent light, which before were consigned to obscurity. While the moderns continue, age after age, to hear only of the Cæsars and the philosophers, and to exercise their ingenuity with tracing parallel characters among their contemporaries, the Catholic discovers that there lies, between the heathen civilization and the present, an entire world, illustrious with every kind of intellectual and moral greatness: the names which are first upon his tongue are no longer Cicero and Horace, but St. Augustin, St. Bernard, Aleuin, St. Thomas, St. Anselm: the places associated in his mind with the peace and dignity of learning, are no longer the Lyceum or the Academy, but Cîteaux, Cluny, Crowland, or the Oxford of the middle ages.

Perhaps I shall best discharge the office I have undertaken by abandoning all pretensions to an oratorical enumeration of illustrious titles, which need only be named to proclaim genius and wisdom in its utmost cultivation,—and by simply taking detached statements from the history and other writings of the middle ages, which will prove that, in whatever direction we look, we shall be sure to discover some eminent example of extensive and excellent erudition. Taking them then as they might occur to one who at hazard would open the ancient chronicles, how remarkable is this testimony of Bede, that Thobias, the Saxon Bishop of Rochester, could speak familiarly, not only the Latin, but also the Greek language? What an example is presented by the venerable Bede in his own learning! Barlaam, who first made the Italians acquainted with Homer, was a monk of St. Basil, who came from one of the seven convents which the religious of that order possessed at Rossano alone, where they cultivated the popular Greek dialect, which had remained in Calabria. What episcopal see, what holy monastery, during the middle ages, was not associated with the names of men most illustrious for their love of letters? Who has ever fathomed that sea of learning in Dominic and Aquinas,

“ Whence many rivulets have since been turn’d
Over the garden Catholic, to lead
Their living waters, and have fed its plants.”*

The fact of the existence of libraries in the early monasteries, even in the days of St. Pachomius, is adduced by Mabillon in proof of the great antiquity of monastic studies.† Celebrated were the libraries of Lerins of Tours, of Monte Cassino, of St. Germain-des-Près, where Dacherius was librarian when he compiled his Spicilegium, of Bobbio, which was so rich in ancient manuscripts, of Luxeuil, of Corby, of St. Remi at Rheims, of Fulda, of St. Gall, of St. Emmeranus, at Ratisbon, and of Einsiedeln; in the last of which I have seen curious manuscripts of Bede’s works.

In England, our libraries are but of modern date; for the pseudo-reformers did not spare even those which they found in the Universities: but in the libraries on the continent before the French revolution, were collected the accumulated stores of the learning of the middle ages. In the abbey of Jumièges, the writings of Annon, its learned abbot in the tenth century, might have been found as he had left them. There were no less than seventeen hundred manuscripts in the abbey of Peterborough. The libraries of the Grey Friars in London, that of the abbey of Leicester, and that of the priory at Dover, contained noble collections, as did also those of Crowland, Wells, and many others. To these all persons had access. At Crowland it was ordained that the greater books, of which there were more than three hundred volumes, were never to be taken for the use of remote schools without license of the abbot; but smaller books of which there were more than four hundred, such as Psalters, Catos, and Poets, might be lent to boys and acquaintances of the monks, but only for one day.* The magnificent library of the abbey of St. Victor at Paris, used to be open to the public during three days every week.† There were even public libraries attached to some parish churches. Baptist Goy, the first curate of the parish of St. Magdalen at Paris, left his libraries to the church, one for the use of the clergy of the parish, and the other for that of the poor parishioners.‡ The library of Marucelli, at Florence, was founded by a virtuous prelate, for the use of such men of learning as were poor, as the inscription testifies—"Publicæ et maxime pauperum utilitati." In the works of Petrus Crinitus,§ there is repeated mention of learned men,—Picus of Mirandula, Politian, and others,—meeting together in the Marcian library at Florence, to discuss questions of philosophy and literature. St. Louis, in the same manner, used to visit the public library, which he had founded at the holy chapel in Paris, for the purpose of conversing with learned men.

* Dante, Parad. XII.

† De Studiis Monasticis, Par. I. cap. 6.

There is a character of learning and sanctity belonging to the very rooms which contained the ancient collections, as may be witnessed in the library of Merton at Oxford, and in that of St. Michel-in-Bosco, at Bologna; in which latter, over each department of books, was a noble painting of the principal writer belonging to it. Thus over the scholastic philosophy was seen the angelic disputing with the subtle doctor on the "universal à parte rei." The student of Rome, when he finds himself in the libraries of St. Augustin and of the Minerva, waited upon by the men of those venerable orders, seems of necessity to imbibe somewhat of the grave and holy spirit of Christian antiquity. Bede mentions the multitude of books that used to be brought from Rome to England by holy Bishops on their return thence. St. Osmond, Bishop of Salisbury, who completed the building of that cathedral, collected thither men of learning from all parts, and retained as well as invited them by his liberality: he formed a library, and enriched it literally with the works of his own hands, transcribing books for it, and binding them himself. So again in the time of Pope St. Gregory VII. Herrand, Abbot of Ilsenburg, afterwards Bishop of Halberstadt, having founded a school at Ilsenburg, for all liberal arts, and collected many learned men, made there a noble library, which was particularly rich in old histories.* Of the abbot, William of Hirschau, we read, that he became when young most learned in all kinds of science, so as to surpass his preceptors, and that he mastered all the arts which are called liberal;† that he was skilled in philosophy, in dialectics, in music,—so that he wrote upon it,—in mathematics, arithmetic, and astronomy; that he procured copies of holy and profane books to be written out in beautiful letters, in which work twelve monks of the house sat daily employed. He used to send good men to govern other monasteries, many of which became celebrated in consequence, among which are reckoned that of St. Peter at Erfurt. There were above 260 men in his abbey, who all loved and revered him. Mabillon desires his reader to consider what was the immense manual labor exercised by the Cistercians and Carthusians in copying manuscripts and writing them out for the public, in revising, and correcting, and collating the works of the holy fathers, and to consider too how all this was done in a spirit of humility, and pious fervor, and penitence, for the good of the church and the greater glory of God. “Be not troubled at the labor through fatigue,” says Thomas à Kempis in addressing youth, “for God is the cause of every good work, who will render to every man his recompense according to his pious intention, in heaven. When you are dead, those persons who read the volumes that were formerly written beautifully by you, will then pray for you: and if he who giveth a cup of cold water, shall not lose his reward, much more, he who gives the living water of wisdom, shall not lose his recompense in heaven.”‡

* Ingulph. 105. † Lebeuf, Hist. du Diocese de Paris, Tom. II. 5. ‡ Lebeuf, II. c. 4.
§ De Honest. Discip.

The collection of the Latin Fathers on vellum, written in the most beautiful characters, and illuminated with exquisite paintings, which is in the Libreria Medicea in the cloister of St. Lorenzo at Florence, or the splendid choral books and Bible, in twenty-two volumes, of the Carthusian monastery of Ferrara, will give an idea of the labor and admirable skill of the monks in this art. Albert was a monk of Cluni, distinguished for the number of beautiful books which he wrote out and bound. The Bible was covered with beryl stones: he had read it through twice and corrected it twice, and at the end of his labor he fell at the feet of the seniors of Cluni, beseeching them to pray to God for him and for his father, that their sins might be forgiven them.§ Estates and legacies were often bequeathed for the support of the scriptorium of abbeys; at Montrouge, indulgences were given for the supply of books, and vestments, so that to that poor rustic church crowds of learned men and scholars used to come from Paris, to cast their little piece of silver or gold into the trunk appointed for the alms in behalf of learning. By the Pope's Bull, in the year 1246, which stated that the churches in Prussia and Livonia, being as yet infant, were unprovided with books, monks and other persons were invited to send them a supply of books out of their abundance, or to employ writers at their expense for furnishing them; and indulgences were extended on their complying.||

* Voigt's Hildebrand als Papst Greg. VII. und sein Zeitalter, 164.

† Chron. Hirsang. An. 1071.

‡ Doctrinale Juvenum, cap. 4.

§ Chronicon Cluniacensis, X.

|| Voigt. Geschichte Preuss. II. 491.

In the middle ages, books were generally bound by monks. Charlemagne, by charter, in 790 gave to the abbots and monks of Sithin, an unlimited right of hunting, in order that the skins of the deer should be used in making covers for their books. The prodigious number of volumes frequently composed by one writer in the middle ages, is constantly a subject of astonishment to those who visit libraries. The works of Albert the Great form twenty-two folio volumes ! But one might account for this in the same manner as that in which Cicero explains the wonderful dispatch with which Pompey accomplished his naval projects, when he says, "Whence had he this incredible celerity ? For he possessed no extraordinary power of impelling ships, no unheard-of art of navigation, no new winds ; but the things which generally delay others did not detain him: no avarice diverting his course for objects of plunder, no lust carried him away to pleasure, no love of ease to delights, no fear of labor to repose."* It is to be remembered also, that the chief of a convent had often as many as fifty young men who studied under him, and wrote out extracts for him. St. Peter the venerable abbot of Cluny, in the twelfth century, employed learned men to translate certain books from the Arabic. St. Raymond of Pennafort procured the Arabic and Hebrew tongues to be taught in several convents of his order ; in the abbey of Tavistock, of which so many of the abbots were learned men, a regular course of lectures on the Saxon tongue used to be given, which was continued until the dissolution by Henry VIII.

It has not been sufficiently remarked with what care the monastic philosophers endeavored to cultivate the barbarous idioms which arose upon the cessation of the Latin tongue. The only grammar of the Romance language was composed by Basil Maier of Baldegg, a monk of Einsiedeln.† During the conquests of the Teutonic order in the North, it is the bishops who were found insisting upon the importance of cultivating the national idiom, in order to instruct the people in the precepts of the orthodox faith.‡

In Italy, the professed champions of the vulgar tongue went so far as to condemn the study of Greek and Latin, as the dialogues of Speroni the Paduan, in the sixteenth century, can testify.§ But probably, while poets and fine writers were condemning the clergy for the importance which they attached to the ancient languages, they would have been found, under many circumstances, as in Ireland, perfectly willing that the national tongue of one country should be sacrificed to that of another, which, however, would have been not the less preserved without their co-operation, as it was there by bishops, priests, and friars. Mabillon observes, that we owe the histories of England and of many other kingdoms, almost solely to the Benedictine monks.|| Especial regard was paid by them to the studies connected with history. Matthew of Paris says, that in every royal monastery

* Pro Lege Manilia, 14.

† Tschudi Einsied. Chronic. 172.

‡ Vaigt Geschichte Preussens, III. 146.

§ Dialogo delle Lingue.

Studiis Monasticis, I. 16.

in England there was one learned and diligent scribe, who used to note down all the actions and events of each reign, and that on the death of the king, this account was referred to a general chapter, to be examined, and afterwards it was inserted in the chronicle, which was to transmit them to posterity. We should have been always children in our national history but for the writings of Bede, Ingulphus, William of Malmesbury, Matthew of Westminster, and Matthew of Paris. In the same manner we are indebted for the history of France to Odo of Vienne, William of Jumièges, Oderic Vitalis, and other monks; for that of Italy, to Paul the deacon, Erkempert, Leo Marsicanus, and Peter the deacon; and for that of Germany, to the abbot Reginonus, Wilichind, Lambert of Ascenburg, Dittmar, and Herman. "In our schools," says Mabillon, "were taught all branches of learning, but every other study was referred to that of the sacred Scriptures and of the holy Fathers." Whenever the atrocity of wars did not impose silence on the Muses, those ancient academies were schools of eloquence as well as of virtue. The profane authors were studied with the sole limitation of excluding what was immoral. Thus St. Anselm, writing to Maurice, prescribed to Arnulphus, that he should read Virgil and other authors, "exceptis his, in quibus aliqua turpitudine sonat." Celebrated was the learning of Gerbert at the time when he only taught in the cathedral school of Rheims, where he had for his pupils King Robert and the Emperor Otho III. and Fulbert, who became such a learned priest. Mabillon shows, that the joys and sweets of study might, without scruple, be possessed by monks, who, for the sake of recreation, might read voyages, elegant orations, or heroic poems. The books of Virgil were under the pillow of St. Hugo VI. Abbot of Cluny, though he had a dream which represented the fables of poets as a poison.* Yet his judgment probably outweighed it. St. Augustin makes use of a verse of Virgil to illustrate a mode of expression in the holy Scriptures.†

We find that no branch of learning was disdained by the monks. Among the fathers of Italian literature, Pignotti acknowledges many Tuscan monks of the Dominican order, from whose works he says, even at the present day, the students of the language imbibe the purest draughts of learning, such as Bartholomew of St. Concordio, Beato Giordano, a famous preacher, Dominico Cavalea, equally celebrated for his divine eloquence, and Jacob Passavanti, who, besides being a most admirable preacher, gave lectures upon philosophy and theology in various cities. It was this friar who directed the building of the church of Santa Maria Novella: but his sermons, his theology, and philosophy, have all disappeared, and his Mirror of true Penance alone remains,—an ornament of the language, being written first in Latin and afterwards translated by himself into the vulgar tongue. The works of these theologians enjoy the double advantage of teaching at once Christian truths and elegance of style. The precepts sweetly penetrate the heart with a soft unction: and such is the beauty of the language, that we seem to hear the most eloquent fathers of the Church.‡

* Bibliotheca Chuniacensis, 423. † Enchiridion, cap. 13. ‡ Hist. of Tuscany, II.

In the beginning of the ninth century, John Scotus, named Erigenus, from his country Erin, or Ireland, which was then renowned throughout the West for its learning, had travelled as far as Greece through his ardor for philosophic studies. "I did not fail," he says, "to visit every place or temple where the philosophers used to compose and deposit their secret works, and there is not one of the learned men, who had any knowledge of their philosophical writings, that I did not question."* He resided at the court of Charles-le-Chauve, who invited many learned men from Ireland and from the Anglo-Saxons, insomuch, that instead of saying, as before, "scholapalatii," men used then to say, "palatium scholæ." John Erigenus, as the chief of this school, used to lecture on Plato and Aristotle, the former of whom he called the greatest of the philosophers of the world, and the latter, the most subtle inquirer among the Greeks, as to the diversity of natural things.† He was profoundly versed in Greek, and probably in Hebrew, so that, at least, on the ground of his extensive learning, we may be allowed to mention him.

With the same reserve one may also allude to Abailard, though his blessed end may free his memory from every dark association. This extraordinary man was said by his contemporaries to have been ignorant of nothing in heaven or on earth, excepting himself. Peter of Cluny, who used to call him the Socrates of the Gauls, put these words upon his tomb: "Ille sciens, quicquid fuit ulli scibile." Heloisa had studied under him philosophy and theology, Latin, Greek, and Hebrew. Of Alcuin I shall speak shortly; but there are names less renowned that one ought not to pass over in silence. Leon, of Ostia, who wrote the voluminous Chronicles of Mount Cassino, by order of the Abbot Orderic, in the eleventh century, has merited the highest praise of Baronius and Dupin; Eginhard, the secretary of Charlemagne, Paul, the deacon of Aquileia, whose life was spared when convicted of a conspiracy against the emperor, on consideration of his learning, William, Archbishop of Tyre, and James of Vitri, are historians of whom the most cultivated age might be proud. A German monk, who lived in the middle of the eleventh century, Lambert von Affschenbourg, wrote an admirable history of the wars of Italy against the empire, in a style imitated from the great models of antiquity; he had studied in his convent Livy, Tacitus, and Sallust. At the end of the tenth century, amidst wars and disorders, the monk Gerbert, in the monasteries of Aurillac and of Bobbio, was studying the most precious manuscripts of Latin antiquity, and some even that we possess not; he was studying metaphysics, geometry, history, and literature; he was inventing works of ingenious mechanism, and exchanging them for manuscripts. "We do not send you the sphere," he writes to one of his friends, "it is not a thing that costs little labor amidst so many occupations. If, therefore, you are very earnest in these studies, send us the volume of the Achilleid of Stacius, carefully transcribed; with that present, you will be able to draw this sphere from me, which you can never procure gratis, on account of the difficulty of such a work." The zeal of Lupus, Abbot of Ferriers, in the ninth century, induced him to write to the pope, to request that he would send him a copy of Quintilian, and of a treatise of Cicero. His correspondence with other abbots respecting the loan of manuscripts is highly curious. One friend, having sent to borrow a manuscript, Lupus sends back the messenger without giving it to him, because, though a monk and trustworthy, he was travelling on foot. In the thirteenth century the Dominican and Franciscan orders produced men of most remarkable genius and learning. Baron Cuvier says that it is really astonishing to reflect upon what was written by Albertus Magnus, Vincent of Beauvais, though he was of Burgundy, who composed an immense Encyclopædia, St. Thomas Aquinas, that meek master of the sapient throng, and Roger Bacon; for though the latter composed but comparatively small treatises, they are full of genius, and evince a most extraordinary spirit of discovery. It may be well to compare this language of a great modern naturalist with that of some Catholic historians. The learning of the Franciscans was celebrated. Monteil says, that there was justice in the old proverb, "parler Latin devant les Cordeliers."* Dugdale says, that the Franciscan order has yielded so immense a number of men renowned for learning and piety, that it is impossible to mention them;† and he states, that in England many extraordinary men proceeded also from the schools of the Augustinians.‡

* Wood Hist. et Antiquit. Oxon. Lib. I. 15. † Jean, Erig. de Divisione Naturæ, I. c. 33. 16.

Notwithstanding the zeal which was evinced for manuscripts, the monks are accused of neglecting, and, in consequence of the scarceness of parchment, of cancelling them, though it is not probable that the latter was ever done with that reckless disregard for the intrinsic value or rarity of the original, which some modern writers suppose. It does not appear that the publisher of the manuscripts of the classics accused the monks of neglecting them. Petrarch only says to his brother, "If I am dear to you, charge some faithful and learned man to travel through Tuscany, and to search the shelves and chests of the monks, and other men of instruction, in hopes of producing something to allay my thirst." It is true they speak of dark corners and iron clasps, but it is only to give an air of greater importance to their own activity, and not to censure the monks who had them in their possession.

The description which Benvenuto da Imola gives of the visit of Boccaccio to Monte Cassino, in which he says that the library was left open, that the books were covered with dust, some of them torn and defaced, and that the grass was growing in the windows, besides that the sum of its testimony amounts to little, contains intrinsic evidence of having been written with a hostile mind. "Fast shut and with great care the library of sacred books is to be preserved," says a writer of the thirteenth century, "from all defilement of dust, from fire and from damp, from thieves and from the sound of clamor, from clay off the feet and the corro-

* Hist. des Français, Tom. III. 395. † Monast. Anglic. Vol. II. 6. ‡ Ib. Vol. II. 224.

sion of worms, from all stain and rent of leaves. He is not worthy to read a sacred book who knows not how to take care of it, and who neglects to put it back in its proper place. Thus must be preserved the treasury of the church, made and edited by holy doctors, written and collected by good writers, and provided by God for the consolations of many.”* That only one copy of Tacitus should have been found in an old chest in the monastery of St. Gall, is no proof that the ancient learning would soon have perished through culpable neglect, since manuscripts of that author were always scarce, and one instance of carelessness will not justify an universal charge, not to remark that the searchers for manuscript, like hunters, were no doubt often guilty of exaggerating their difficulties. Chateaubriand says he does not remember to have found in any catalogue of the ancient monasteries of France a single copy of Tacitus. The Benedictine monks of Corby possessed the five first books of his Annals.† The only manuscript of Phedrus that existed was in the library of the cathedral of Rheims. It appears even that the condition of the copies of manuscripts in one monastery would be known to monks living in another. Peter the venerable abbot of Cluny, writing to Guigo, prior of a Carthusian monastery, and sending him some books, assigns as his reason for not sending with them the tract of St. Hilary upon the Psalms, that he had found in his own copy the same corruptions as existed in that of the Carthusians.‡ In erasing Cicero’s book, De Republica, to write upon the parchment St. Augustin’s Commentary on the Psalms, it may be conceived how naturally they might conclude, that they were substituting a work of incomparably superior value, and they would hardly have supposed that the former would not come down to posterity, since so much of it was preserved even in the writings of Lactantius and other Fathers. On the invention of printing, the monks were the first to appreciate its value and importance. In the year 1474, a book was printed by the Augustin monks of a convent in the Rhingau. The first patrons of Caxton were Thomas Milling, Bishop of Hereford, and the Abbot of Westminster, in which abbey he established his printing-office. The first printing press in Italy was in the monastery of St. Scholastica at Subiaco, the productions of which are sought after with such avidity on account of their extraordinary beauty. It was the Bishop of Holun who enabled Mathison to introduce printing into Iceland. In the year 1480 a printing press was established in the Benedictine monastery of St. Alban, of which William Wallingford was the prior John Whethamstede, abbot of that house, was celebrated for his love of learning. Soon after the introduction of printing, another press was established in the abbey of Tavistock, where the printer was a monk, Thomas Ryeard. Along with this prodigious discovery for the propagation of learning, appeared that admirable society of fervent disciples of our Lord, who demonstrated the art of combining the interests of piety with those of learning, not only exercising, but even teaching it, as in the incomparable work of Father Jouveney, the Ratio discendi et docendi. Among the first fathers of the society, Salmeron, at the age of twenty-one, Laynez at twenty-four, and Bobadilla at twenty-six, had acquired such learning, that they were the admiration of the court of Paul III.; and Bellarmin, before the age of thirty, had composed seven learned controversial treatises. Tolet and Vasquez, at the age of twenty-five, began to be the oracles of the universities of Spain. But the services of the Jesuits in multiplying editions of excellent books have never been appreciated; though independent of all other benefits, that work alone gave them an unquestionable title to the gratitude of Christians in all future ages.

*Thom. de Kempis Doctrinale Juvenum. cap. 5.

† Mabil. Præfat. in III. Sæcul. Bened. § 4.

‡ S. Petri. ven. Epist. Lib. I. 24.

Of the love which men bore for learning during the middle ages, we have many curious and memorial instances. The Abbot Lupus, in a letter to Einard, says, "The love of letters is innate in me almost from the first days of boyhood." His love of learning induced him to travel into Germany to Fulda, not in order to learn the German language, but "that he might feed his soul with sacred study and erudition."* St. Lindger, when a child, used to make imitations of books with the bark of trees, and with them to form a little library. When a youth he travelled to many countries for the sake of attending the lectures of learned men; and on his return from York into Saxony he carried with him a quantity of books. John of Salisbury, in a letter to Count Henry, says, "that in his late interview with Peter, Abbot of St. Remy, that holy man had affirmed that nothing was sweeter to him in life than to converse with men of letters upon subjects of learning."† Richard of Bury, Bishop of Durham, in the thirteenth century, was celebrated for his love and encouragement of literature. Besides having libraries in all his palaces, it is related that the floor of his common apartment used to be covered with books, so that it was no easy matter to approach him. St. Bonaventura on account of his singular virtues and most admirable learning, having been offered the archbishopric of York and England, begged of the pope, Clement IV., to permit him to continue in his evangelical poverty to serve the holy church by his studies of holy Scripture and divinity. Let us be satisfied, without demanding further evidence, and confess that we have no reason to accuse the middle ages on the ground of their neglect of learning. Is it for the present race of men to boast of being the first to appreciate the value of books, when their type of a great sovereign exhibited one, who for a mere political and commercial trick exported from the coast of France the contents of some of the richest libraries in the world, consisting of superb Benedictine editions, and of vast treasures of ancient books, which had been plundered from the monasteries during the revolution, and then piled up in churches till they reached the very roof, for the express purpose of casting them into the sea, in order that the ship might take in coffee and sugar in their place?‡ Who now loves learning on its own account? May not this age, notwithstanding all its pretended freedom, supply posterity with matter for another treatise, like that of Lucian, on men of learning in pay of the great? what writer is not now, at least, in pay of the public? and when was learning more independent than during the middle ages? Of how many branches of learning might we not say, what one of the greatest natural philosophers of the present age affirmed of science, that "there are very few persons in England who pursue it with true dignity: it is followed as connected with objects of profit."* The writers of Catholic times were never drudges for vain man's applause, or for base lucre. Not for the world's sake, for which now they toil who send forth lying books, but for the real manna grew they mighty in learning. Letters are, indeed, professedly cultivated, and spoken of with admiration; but where are they seen to act upon minds with that real power which they exercised during the ages of faith? where is there now a student, like St. Edmund, or a master, like Bede, who used to be so excited by his reading and moved to compunction, that often while he was reading and teaching he used to burst into tears?

* Mabillon, Prefat. in IV. Sæcul. Benedict. § 8. † Joan. Saresberiensis, Epist. CLXXII.

‡ In the year 1809.

"Consider the happiness and content of a scholar's life," says the author of the meditations which were compiled for the English College at Lisbon; "The pleasure of learning is most pure and ethereal, most constant, gathering strength with her increase; finally most secure and honorable without any danger of foul wretchedness, blemish of fame, or breach of friendship; whereas all other pleasures are gross, tumultuous, and sordid. In point of dignity too scholars have the pre-eminence; for there is no man but laughs at a fool how rich soever, and in his heart respects a scholar though never so poor."† Thus wrote these holy men whose pathetic statement of the prospects which then awaited their students on their return to England where so many were martyred, cannot be read without the deepest emotion. "None," say they, "but those who have had the experience can truly conceive the conditions and difficulties of this state." But who in our days of comparative facility in the pursuit of letters is found to speak with the same reverence and love for learning?

Turn to whatever side we will, the utmost we can expect to hear is the language of Callicles. "I love to see a youth devoted to philosophy, but when a man continues to cultivate it, I deem him worthy of stripes; for however ingenuous he may be by nature, he becomes servile through study. For he flies from the centre of political affairs, and all the custom of forensic assemblies, hiding himself and whispering in some corner with three or four boys all his life; and never coming forward to sound forth any thing liberal or magnificent. Truly, O Socrates, I love you; and therefore I say to you that you are neglecting what you ought to meditate, and that you are moulding that generous excellence of your mind to a certain boyish form, and disqualifying yourself for all active and public affairs of life, and neglecting to exercise yourself in matters which would make you seem to be wise,

* Sir H. Davy's Consolations in Travel, 1830.

† Part IV. c. 3.

and procure you fame and riches, and many other good things.”* With what effect do we suppose such persuasions would have been addressed to the studious inhabitants of cloisters and colleges in the middle ages when it was known that a Divine blessing was on the man who had borne the yoke from his youth, who should sit solitary and hold his peace? But it will be said, these were all men separate to the Church. The laity during this time were in a state of deplorable ignorance. No greater error than to suppose that they were. The evidence which has been already adduced of the wide diffusion of learning, might be still further strengthened, if we were to visit the places where one might least expect to find it; for we should frequently discover even in the feudal castle, men of great erudition. It is said, that a single book often formed its library, which had the appearance of a piece of furniture, being enclosed within boards, locked up, and opened as a kind of sanctuary, from which during the long evenings of winter men used to read without ceasing: but one book then contained a great deal of matter, if we may judge from the compilations which have come down to us, and this is after all but an exaggerated picture of the little encouragement afforded to study by the habits of feudal life. Little favorable as they may have been to a constant fortuitous and desultory reading, which St. Bonaventura says, does not edify because it renders the mind still more rambling and unstable,† still there were some points in which they were more in accordance with the interests of real learning than those of the modern society; for as letters have in them something generous they inspire an aversion for exercises in which the mind does not participate; they render men, as Don Savedra says, solemn and melancholy, lovers of retirement, and averse to public employments, and such a disposition found many circumstances of feudal life as if peculiarly accommodated to its state. We are told, indeed, in the Lay of the last Minstrel, that Lord Cranstoun’s elfin page was surprised to find Michael Scot’s book on the person of the wounded Sir William of Deloraine.

“ Much he marvell’d a knight of pride,
Like a book-bosom’d priest should ride.”

But the fact is, that great numbers of nobles and princes in the middle ages were men of considerable learning, fond of books; and many who were themselves without it, respected and encouraged it in others, like Theodoric, who was so passionately fond of learned men, though he could not even write his own name. Gaston Phebus, that celebrated knight and feudal prince, was so attached to learning that he formed a collection of Greek, Latin, and Italian authors, and it is to the education which he received at his court, that historians ascribe the admirable beauty of the writings of Clotilde de Surville, which have been lately restored to light. De la Barre, the historian of Corbeil, says, “that Anthony Seigneur de Carnazet exalted the honor of his house by adding to the lustre of chivalry the glory of learning, and produced the fruits of his noble mind, in his dis-

* Plato Gorgias.

† S. Gohav. Speculum Novitiorum, cap. J

courses on morals to be the instruction of his children, having the courage to proclaim this truth, that science is more estimable than nobility, riches, strength, or valor." The Secretary of Anthony de Gingsins, President of Savoy under Duke Charles II., composed his Mirouer du Monde, while residing in the castle of that old nobleman in the country of Gex, at the foot of the Jura, where he found a library containing, as he says, many beautiful and exquisite books, such as Strabo, Ptolomy, l'Especcle Naturel of Vincent of Beauvais, Pliny, Albusasar, and others, from which he made extracts, and composed in the Gothic and French language this present book, entitled, Le Mirouer du Monde. * François de Malherbe, on his return to Caen, from his travels during which he had resided at Heidelberg and at Basle for the sake of attending the lectures of professors, delivered discourses in the public schools of the University of Caen, with his sword at his side, of which practice Huet gives other examples.

Nicholas Vauquelin sieur des Iveteaux, author of the poem on the Institution of a Prince, delivered discourses publicly in the same university in the dress of a cavalier.† Even a gentleman of Gastine, in Poitou, who had no other theme but hunting, and the recollections of his youth, became distinguished as a writer in prose and verse, as in the instances of Jacques de Fouilloux, whom Gouget inserts in his history of French authors.‡ Gaufridus Bellus, the fourteenth Count of Angers, is described as admirable for probity and justice, and though engaged in the profession of arms, excellently learned and most eloquent among the clergy and laity.§ Fulco the good, Count of Anjou, is said by the same historian to have been very learned, and a profound master of learning among brave soldiers. St. Odo, the second abbot of Cluny, relates that his father used to know by heart the histories of the ancients and the novels of Justinian, and that the evangelical words were constantly heard at his table.|| What learned nobles did England possess in Catholic times? how did the true sentiments of a Christian gentleman breathe in every line of the works of Antony Woodville, Earl of Rivers, as remarkable for goodness as for erudition! John Tiptoft, the learned and accomplished Earl of Worcester, was so great an orator, that at Rome he was said to have drawn tears from the eyes of Pope Pius II. On the flight of Edward IV. he was taken prisoner and beheaded. Caxton exclaims on this event, "O good blessed Lord God! what grete loss was it of that noble, virtuous, and well disposed Lord, and what worship had he at Rome in the presence of our holy fader the Pope, and so in all other places unto his deth; at which deth, every man that was there might lern to die and take his deth patiently." The learning of many of the Italians in the middle ages, has never been exceeded. Giannozzo Manetti, the Florentine, was one of the most learned men that Europe ever possessed: he spoke Latin, Greek, and Hebrew: he translated the whole of the Psalms from the original, and he wrote a book in confutation of Judaism, exposing their misinterpretations of the

* Gouget, Bibliothèque Française, Tom. IX. 226.

† Id. Tom. XVI. 111.

‡ Id. XVI. 34.

§ Dacher. Spicileg. Tom. X.

|| Bibliotheca Cluniacens. 15.

holy Scriptures. These sacred studies and the reading of the works of St. Augustin made him a theologian; he considered St. Augustin and Aristotle as the greatest men the world had ever seen: he had the whole work De Civitate Dei by heart, as also the ethics of Aristotle, and the Epistles of St. Paul; and he asserted that theology ought to be the principal science of mankind. Raphael Maffei was another learned Tuscan of the fifteenth century: he passed the latter part of his life as a hermit in a cell covered with boards, sleeping upon straw, feeding upon bread and water, and a few vegetables: he finally renounced all profane erudition, and wrote only the lives of saints. He founded and endowed a monastery of nuns, under the title of St. Lino, and was himself regarded as a saint. The convents could bear testimony to the love of learning which animated numbers of noble laymen. It was in the spirit of that age, when Cosmo de Medicis enriched with a library the magnificent Abbey of St. Bartholomew, near Fiesole, and presented another collection of books to the convent of St. Francesco, which was not far distant from his Caffaggiolo, situated in a picturesque wood in the pleasing valley of the Mugello, resembling those delightful groves which the poetic imagination has ascribed to Arcadia. In an early age, Cassiodorus, who was blessed, as Gibbon says, with thirty years of repose in the devout and studious solitude of Squillace, carried with him to the monastery of Monte Cassino, his own extensive library. An Italian author remarks, that flattery has had no share in the elegant representation which adorns the hall of the palace Pitti, from the pencil of John Mannozi, where the Muses are painted as exiled from Greece, and meeting a courteous reception from that house; for the government of Florence was distinguished by the hospitable reception which it gave to the illustrious fugitives. When Raymonde Sebonde came into France, from learned and philosophic Spain, with the intention of visiting the University of Paris, he was stopped on his way by the city of Toulouse; for such was the enthusiastic admiration excited there by his renown, that the inhabitants forced him to remain, and absolutely detained him against his will. In the middle ages, were seen many kings who were men of learning and ardent admirers of all wisdom. What an admirable instance is that of Charlemagne surrounded by the eminent scholars whom he had collected from all nations. What a zeal did he evince for learning! "O! I wish," he exclaimed one day while conversing with Alcuin, "that I had twelve clerks as learned and instructed in all wisdom as were Jerome and Augustin!" when Alcuin replied, "The Creator of heaven and earth had not any more like them, and you wish to have twelve?" Such was the esteem in which letters continued to be held at the imperial court under another monarch, that the present of a book was received as an equivalent for a tax due to the crown.

The abbot of Corby, in the year 847, wrote as follows to the king. "Instead of a present of gold or silver for this festival, I send a book on the Eucharist, which although small in bulk, is great in consideration of the subject. I composed it for my dear disciple the Abbot Placide de Varin." No sovereigns encouraged learning with greater zeal than Louis-le-Jeune and Philippe-Augustus. King John of France in that feudal age, evinced a great love for learning, and to his orders the French owed their first translation of Livy, Sallust, Lucan, and Caesar. Christine de Pisan, writing the life of King Charles V. in which she adheres most rigidly to truth, divides the work into three parts, which are entitled, on the Nobleness of Courage, of Chivalry, and of Wisdom, for learning entered then into the ideal of an excellent prince, and offered them titles which they valued more than those of their royal birth, as in the instance of Henry of England. By order of King Charles V. some of the finest treatises of St. Augustin, as well as the whole Bible, the greatest part of the works of Aristotle, Cicero, and many other authors, were translated into French: and this king gave immense pensions to the learned men who were employed in these labors. Speaking of John the brother of Charles V. then Duc de Berry, Christine says, “Se délicate et aime gens soubtilz, soyent clercs ou autres, beaulx livres des sciences morales et histoires notables, moult aime et volentiers en oit tous ouvragés soubtilment fais.”^{*} Of his brother, Lewis, Duc d’Anjou, she says, “il amoit les chevalereux et les sages clercs ;”[†] and of his fourth brother, Lewis, Duc de Bourbon, “aime et secuert les bons chevaliers et les clercs sages ‡ en toutes choses bonnes soubtilles et belles se délicate ; livres de moralitez, de la sainte Escripture et d’enseignement moult luy plaisent, et volentiers en ot, et luy mesmes par notables maistres in theologie en a fait translater de moult beaulx.” Of Louis, Duc d’Orleans, son of King Charles V. she says, “that often there used to be before him many disputations of great congregations of wise doctors and solemn clerks, when many cases would be proposed and put in terms of diverse things, and that the memory and eloquence he used to evince on these occasions were wonderful, as he replied to each of the arguments, not in a high and fierce style of language, but mildly and all in peace, so that it was beautiful to witness it.”[§]

King Charles V. was told on one occasion, that some persons had murmured against him for paying such honor to clerks, but he replied, “One cannot too greatly honor clerks who have wisdom : for so long as wisdom shall be honored in this kingdom, it will continue in prosperity, but if wisdom should be ever thrust out it will fall away.”^{||} The old writer, who collected the very joyous history of Bayart gives this testimony, that the Duke of Ferrara is a gentle and wise prince, “qui scet quasy tous les sept ars liberaulx et plusieurs autres choses mécaniques ;”[¶] and that the duchess is a most triumphant princess, being beautiful, good, sweet, and courteous to all kinds of people, and so learned that she speaks Spanish, Greek, Italian, French, and a little very good Latin, in all which languages she can compose.^{} The Duke of Nemours, he relates, passing through a little town named ^{*} Livre des Fais du Sage Roy Charles V. II. chap. xii.

[†] Id. II. 11.

[‡] Id. II. c. 14.

[§] Id. II. c. 16.

^{||} Id. Part III. c. 14.

[¶] Chap. XLII.

^{} Id. chap. XLV.

Carpy, remained there with his knights three days, and was very well received by the seigneur of the town, who was a man of great learning in Greek and Latin literature: he was cousin-german of Piens of Mirandula, and was styled Albertus Mirandula, Count of Carpy.* Piens of Mirandula at the age of twenty-three, maintained at Rome certain theses, containing nine hundred propositions, drawn from Latin, Greek, Hebrew, and Chaldaic authors. The emperor Ferdinand III. spoke a great number of languages and could answer every ambassador in his own tongue.† The learning of these high princes was indeed not always scholastic. It was sometimes acquired solely by intercourse with learned men. Thus the King Don Alonso of Naples used to retire after his repasts in the company of learned men, in order, as he used to say, to feed his mind after refreshing his body, and even Francis I. King of France, whose reign beheld a suspension of learning, without having studied in his youth, made himself, by means of similar conversation, qualified to speak on all subjects of importance. Christine de Pisan, mentions that King Charles V. did not neglect this method, for being circumspect in all things, as she says, in order to adorn his conscience, it pleased him often to hear at his collations masters in theology and divinity of all orders of the Church, having them around him and honoring them greatly, having in the utmost reverence every spiritual father or wise person, of just and salutary instruction.‡

It would be hazardous to affirm that the chivalrous lords of feudal towers, like the modern sons of nobility, could always boast of having possessed a Phenix for their governor, but unquestionably in Catholic times, the cloister supplied true sages, whose conversation was able to form great and good men to administer justice, and govern their dependants with benignity and firmness. It remains to speak of the character of the learning which was thus diffused and ardently pursued during the ages of faith.

A modern French writer, treating on the fifth century, says, that not only did literature become wholly religious, but being religious, it ceased to be what is generally styled literature. In the ancient times of Greece and Rome, men studied and wrote for the sole pleasure of studying, and of knowing how to procure for themselves and others intellectual enjoyment. Literature was devoted to the search of truth; and so, he might have added, it has again become, professedly, at least, in the modern societies in which men write and study, precisely as if no such fact as that of the Christian revelation had ever occurred; but during the ages of faith it was quite otherwise. Within the sphere of divinity and morals, men studied no more in order to search for truth, and acquire knowledge; they wrote no more for the sake of writing. Writings and studies assumed a practical character. Men only sought to convert and regulate the purely speculative character of philosophy; as, independent of religion, poetry, letters, and arts had disappeared. From not having well seized this character of the period, a false idea of

* Id. chap. XLVII.

† Savedra, Christian Prince, I. 51.

‡ Part. I. c. 15.

it has been generally formed, men have concluded that it was a time of apathy and moral sterility, without any development of intelligences. But it is an error to suppose, that there was then no intellectual activity. On the contrary, adds this writer, there was much; only it was under a different form, and tended to different results. It was an activity of application. One is astonished at regarding a world of writings which attest the ardor and fecundity of those ages, and which still constitute a real and rich literature.* The leaves of modern books are exactly like a Protestant country, or some barbarous region where the light of Christianity has never shone; where all is secularized, and every image of religion effaced, excepting what belongs to the idolizing of nature. The old books introduce us, as it were, into a Catholic country, where amidst beautiful woods and wild mountains, we find monasteries, and crosses, and holy images of saints, constantly reminding us of our heavenly country. Men talk of literature becoming religious, as if that was an indication of its decline; and yet without the sanctifying influence of religion, when has learning ever assumed an amiable or even a dignified character? "Postquam docti prodierunt, boni desinunt," said Seneca,† and Petrus Cellensis explains the invariable phenomenon connected with the manners of the learned, when he says, "Literatura sæcularis inflat, si illam caritas non reprimat."‡ But what a gracious tone did that charity impart to learning in the ages of faith? It is recorded of James, abbot of Villemoustier, in the eighth century, that if he ever heard one of his monks in reading place the accent on a wrong syllable, to spare the modesty of the reader, he never reprehended him at the time.§ But not merely the style, the whole object and motives of learning were changed. "Quid tota series literarum aliud indicat, quam te ea quæ sursum sunt sapere, non quæ super terram?" says Peter the venerable abbot of Cluny, writing to his dearest brother Odo.|| Mabillon shows that learning was to be cultivated with no other view but to render men more humble and charitable, more hidden to the eyes of men, and more sensible to the knowledge of God; more fervent to love him, and more diligent to serve him.¶ One was to study, but never in order to seem to be wiser or more learned than others. One was to write, but not for the sake of being always able to boast like Demosthenes, that he came forward in literature and science, in politics and theology, πρῶτος καὶ μόνος. It was often necessary to use much persuasion to induce men to publish their works. There is a letter from the Monk Petrus Pictaviensis to Peter the venerable abbot of Cluni, exhorting him to this effect.

"I know that I am very bold in daring thus to advise you, but I trust in your piety that it will pardon me. For beloved Father, I fear not a little lest from declining all vanity in study you should wish too much to remain concealed under

* Guizot, Cours d'Hist. Mod. Tom. II. † Epist. II.

‡ Petri Abb. Cellens. Epist. Lib. IX. 7.

§ Historia Monasterii Villariensis, Lib. I. cap. 12. apud Marten. Thesaur. Anecd. Tom. III.

|| Epist. Lib. I. 13. ¶ Tractat. de Studiis Monasticis Præfat.  De Imit. Lib. III. 53.

this intention. You ought to take care, most discreet man, lest by avoiding the praise of men with too much caution, you omit those things for which the faithful servant in the Gospel deserved to be praised by the good householder. Consider, I beseech you, that if the holy fathers had written nothing formerly, but had only passed a good life in silence, they would not have gained such a multitude of people to God, nor would they have left with us such a sweet and celebrated memory. The study of writing has always distinguished the abbots of Cluny, from ancient times, so that if they do not write they have reason to blush for themselves as being degenerate and unworthy of their predecessors.”* St. Anselm uses stronger language to encourage literary exertion. “There are some men,” he observes, “ignorant sinfully, who say, what use to retain this little? I shall never become wise from so small a thing. All who are not learned will not perish. There are enough of wise men in the world, enough of learned writers. There is no need for me to fatigue myself: thus he speaks to his mind, and does not perceive that the ancient enemy suggests these things to him, that he may never study to be useful, that he may live in torpor and negligence, and so perish.”† These men had but one object in their studies, “In doctrinis glorificate Dominum,”‡ the supremacy of which continued to be recognized till the last; for the first efforts of engraving and printing were employed to aid religion, of which we see examples in the Biblia Pauperum, and the Speculum Salutis, and the editions of the Latin Bible by Fust. All the learning, even of the laity, during the middle ages, partook of this sacred character. Fleury mentions that the young Emperor Theodosius had a good library of ecclesiastical books, and used to converse with bishops, almost as if he had been one of the order:§ and Christine de Pisan says that King Charles V. of France was really a philosopher, that is, a lover of wisdom. He was a true inquirer after high primary things, that is, of high theology, which is the term of wisdom, which is nothing else but the knowledge of God and of his high celestial virtues; he desired to be instructed in this by wise masters, and he caused many books of wise theologians to be translated, “et de théologie souvent vouloit oyr.”||

The modern sophists condemn such learning in a prince, and require on the contrary that he should be instructed in the sciences of natural philosophy, as if a knowledge of botany or mineralogy were more conducive to perfect the art of wise government, than that of ethics and divinity, which would teach the end of all good government, the true interests of mankind, and what belongs to the various relations of men on the stage of the present life. How should the natural sciences constitute the proper learning for rulers, or legislators, or magistrates? Society is not in a better or worse condition for their opinion on physics being true or false; there are always men whom they may consult on such questions, but

* Bibliotheca Cluniacensis, 620.

† S. Anselmi de Similitudinibus, cap. 54.

‡ Isa. xxiv. 19.

§ Mœurs des Chrest. 307.

|| Livre des Fais, &c. Part. III. c. 3.

their error in religion or morals may involve whole generations in incalculable evils. The example of King Don Alouzo is adduced by Savedra to prove the inutility of science in a prince, for he knew how to correct the disorders of the heavens, but not those in his state; he who, by the force of his genius, could ascend to the height of the celestial orbs, was not able to preserve a kingdom and an hereditary crown. The Sultan of Egypt, ravished at so glorious a renown, sent ambassadors to him loaded with presents, and almost all the cities of Castille, in the heart of his kingdom, refused to obey him. The religious studies of the middle ages taught men how to govern themselves, and therefore enabled them to rule over others. Men would not have deemed it possible during the ages of faith, that the fact of a religious direction having been given to the studies of the laity, could be adduced in subsequent times in evidence of their having been barbarians. They would have shrunk in contempt, as well as in displeasure, from any learning which was otherwise directed. Hæc et a pueritia legimus et discimus, they would have confidently replied to any objectors who should have proposed a different kind of learning. Hanc eruditionem liberalem et doctrinam putamus. This was the learning, not for the priest alone, but for all Christians in time past, who, while they occupy themselves with learning, "hanc amplissimam omnium artium benè vivendi disciplinam vitâ magis quam litteris persecuti sunt."* This was the learning of those masters of religion whom our ancestors revered, of whom we might justly say, in the words of the Roman orator, "that their wisdom seems to us so great, that those men are more than sufficiently prudent, who, we do not say follow their prudence, but who are able to perceive how great it was." Do men at present forget, that the reason, even of the ancient philosophers, would have dictated similar language? "Let us inquire what say the priests: for I confess that I am vehemently moved by the gravity of their answers, and by their one and constant voice. Neither am I that man who, if he should seem to be more than others versed in the study of letters would take delight in or make any use whatever of such letters as would tend to withdraw our minds from religion." This, you reply, is the language of some bigoted disciple, when education was the monopoly of the priesthood during the dark ages. Nay, most profound critic, they are the words of Cicero.†

But, even in a mere literary point of view, what was the character of the learning of the middle ages? Truly I do not see on what grounds the men of later times have reason to despise it. Philosophers enumerate three distempers of learning: the first fantastical learning, the second contentious learning, and the last delicate learning: vain imaginations, vain altercations, and vain affections. Now I would ask these disparagers of the Christian school, whether, if we exclude these three kinds of learning, will there be found remaining such prodigious stores for the moderns to boast of, as to warrant their contempt for past ages? It is in-

* Cicero. Tuscul. Liv. IV. 3.

† Orat. de Haruspicum Respons. 9.

finitely remarkable that Lord Bacon should have noticed this perversion of learning, as having been consequent upon what he calls the reformation : he admits that learning then became characterized by an affectionate study of eloquence : men began to hunt more after words than matter, and more after the choiceness of the phrase and the round and clean composition of the sentence, and the sweet falling of the clauses, and the varying and illustration of their works with tropes and figures, than after the weight of matter, worth of subject, soundness of argument, life of invention, or depth of judgment. Then grew the learning of the schoolmen to be despised as barbarous ; then were Cicero and Demosthenes almost deified, and young men allured unto that delicate and polished kind of learning, which induced Erasmus to make the scoffing echo, “Decem annos consumpsi in legendo Cicerone,” and the echo answered in Greek “οὐκ—ass.”^{} Now whatever may have been the faults of the ancient learning, it at least never evinced the spirit or the tricks of the sophist or the pedant. “A good reader or student,” says Vincent of Beauvais, “ought to be humble and mild, and ready to learn from all, and he never should presume on the ground of his knowledge, and he ought not to wish to seem to be wise before the time, pretending to be what he is not, and ashamed to appear what he is. He ought not to condemn instantly whatever he does not understand. This should be the discipline of readers.† There are some,” he continues, “who wish to read all things, but the number of books is infinite. Be not desirous of following where there is no end or rest, and therefore no peace ; and where there is no peace God cannot dwell. Philosophy rejects a fastidious stomach, and invites the cheerful guest to a simple supper of few but good meats. There is a great difference between seeing the thing itself, and only the books ; for books are only poor monuments of knowledge, and contain only the principles for inquiry, which are to be pursued afterwards, and for that very purpose books are to be laid aside.”‡ Mere book-learning distinguishes no great writer of the middle ages. “Some things which I have not found in books,” says John of Salisbury, “from daily use and experience of things, as if from a certain history of manners, I have gathered.”§ The learning of the middle ages was Homeric, indicating personal acquaintance with men and things. Many of their great writers were themselves wanderers. Trithemius mentions a certain priest of Ireland, named Sedulius, a disciple from childhood of the Archbishop Hildebert, who might be said to represent them all, for he was a man exercised in the divine Scriptures, and most learned in literature, excelling in verses and prose, who left Ireland, passed into France and Italy, thence into Asia, and lastly, after visiting the shores of Achaia, returned to Rome, where he shone in admirable learning.|| In the schools, indeed, were distinguished the superseminati, or those who were superficial, the pannosi, or those whose learning was all in ^{} Advancement of learning. † Speculum Doctrinale, Lib. I. cap. 28. ‡ Id. Lib. I. cap. 33.

§ De Nugis Curialium, Lib. VII. Prologo. || In Lib. II. de Scriptoribus Eccles.

scraps and collections of sentences, and the massati, or those who were solidly learned;* but even to the two former belonged the grace of humility, and the merit of a sound judgment, of which the proof may yet be witnessed in the collections made by them which have come down to us, as well as in works of their own composition. The admirable Phillipe de Comines confesses that he is a man "who has no literature, mais quelque peu d'expérience et sens naturel," which the Abbé Gouget justly remarks, is worth far more than learning. A certain tone of noble simplicity, not unconnected with those manners of the feudal hearth, to which I before alluded, was observable in the writings of such men. It is this which seems so admirable in Joinville and Froissart, and Olivier de la Marche, and a multitude of others, to whom the following distich of the poet Panormita, addressed to Leon Batista the Florentine, might with justice be applied by every judicious reader,

"Cum placeas cunctis, raris pro dotibus, idem Tu mihi pro verâ simplicitate places."

One is struck also in all their compositions with that characteristic, which a distinguished critic of our times praises in Dante, that lively and respectful faith, that laical docility which reigns amidst the magnificent inventions of his imagination, and the boldest flights of genius. In general, the learning and style of the middle ages had a certain deep mysterious tone, unobtrusive, symbolical, and at an infinite distance from the pert familiarity and vulgar display which is so characteristic of modern literature. "This is the silliest stuff that ever I heard," says Hippolita of the play, to whom Theseus replies in words that express the genuine spirit of all their beautiful and profound compositions:

"The best in this kind are but shadows:
And the worst are no worse, if imagination amend them."†

But what could imagination do for the popular literature of the present age? Men in these days would have disdained the domestic familiar muse of Euripides, who, it was said, never wrote any thing but what all the world could understand and perceive at the first instant, and from whose dramas men could learn better skill even in the commonest matters of household economy. The muse of the middle ages was that of Æschylus, and critics, like him described by Aristophanes, might object to their style, "that it was not sufficiently clear and continuous, but that its expressions were only seamandars or trenches, or the insignia of shields, and broken swords, which it were not easy to put together," like crosses and sepulchres, and hooded heads, shrines, vigils, dirges, nocturns, templars, and chivalry. The wise poet of antiquity, however, leaves the clear popular writer in the shades, and brings back the dark and solemn Æschylus, to save his country by the maxims of his wisdom.‡ With respect to books intended for general circulation, many historical works, of the most solid and practical philosophy, were composed in the middle ages, in a simple but condensed style, that united the brevity of Tacitus with the clearness of Livy. Such, for instance, was that history of the English schism, transferred to the Italian, with a truly Roman gravity, by Bernardo Davanzati, in the sixteenth century. That profound thinker and parsimonious speaker, who received from the academy of the Alterati the name of the Silent, was the first to show, in this curious history, that the language of Florence need yield to no other in brevity and weight. A most remarkable monument, though of a different kind, is the work which was composed by Paschasius Radbert, on the deeds of Wala, the Abbot of Corby, which, being written while the enemies of that holy man were alive, and during the reign of Charles the Bald, when it was dangerous to treat upon such a subject, fictitious names are employed, and the truth of history explained in the form of a dialogue, after the manner of Plato. Mabillon, who discovered this work, which he justly styles golden, in the library of St. Martin des Champs at Paris, inserted it in his Acts of the Benedictine Saints, where it stands an imperishable monument of the profound wisdom, the learning, the judgment, and the accurate knowledge of all human duties, combined with the deepest piety, which were possessed in the ninth century. Assuredly the author of this work stood in need of no useful knowledge that the men of our times could give him.

* Heuffel, Hist. Scholarum, 376. † Midsummer Night's Dream, V. I. ‡ Aristoph. Ranæ.

Indeed, of the literary excellence of many writers of the middle ages some modern critics have had the courage to speak with justice. Guizot, for instance, concludes his review of Alcuin's writings in these words: "I regret that I cannot enter more fully into the examination of these monuments of so active and distinguished a mind. I seem as if I had but taken a glance at them, and if they were made the subject of our profound study, we should reap, without doubt, pleasure and advantage. In fine, this appears to me to be the general character of Alcuin and his works. He is a theologian by profession; the atmosphere in which he lives, and the public to whom he addresses himself, are essentially theological; and yet the theological spirit does not alone reign in him: it is also towards philosophy and ancient literature that his thoughts and works are directed. These also he desires to study, to teach, and to revive. St. Jerome and St. Augustin are familiar to him, but Pythagoras, Aristotle, Aristippus, Diogenes, Plato, Homer, Virgil, Seneca and Pliny, are also in his memory. The greatest part of his writings is theological, but mathematics, astronomy, dialectics, and rhetoric occupy him habitually. It is a monk, a deacon, the light of the contemporary church, but at the same time it is a scholar, and a classical scholar. We see united in him an admiration, a taste, or rather a regret for the ancient literature, and the sincerity of Christian faith, the ardor to illustrate its mysteries and to defend its power." Of what learned and profound men might not the universities have boasted at their very commencement? What erudition appeared in the works of Gerson, John Raulin, Biel, Clavasiu, and of innumerable others at Paris? in other universities, what great Platonists were beheld in Marsilius Ficinus, Hermolaus

Barbarus, and Picus of Mirandula? What great astronomers in the Cardinal Cusa, George Purbach, Regio Montanus, and Walter? What Grecians and poets in Merula, the two Strozzas, the two Philelphe? What Latinists and poets in Maphæus Vegius, whom some compared to Virgil, Andrelinus, who composed such beautiful eclogues, Ugolinus, who celebrated the victories of Charlemagne, Ravisius Textor, the author of that fine dialogue between the Pilgrim and Death, Collatius, who sung the calamities of Jerusalem? What sacred orators in Maillard and Menot, the Franciscan friar, who declaimed in French against the scandals of their age? What profane orators in Jean Lefevre, who so eloquently defended an unfortunate prince? What historians in Paulus Emilius, the canon, who wrote a history of France in Latin, Robert Gaguin, who wrote a Latin history of the French monarchy, the two Chartiers, John and Alain, Froissart, and Monstrellet, Juvenal des Ursins, Mathieu Coucy, Le Bouvier, Nicole Gilles, Jehan de Troyes? What philologists in Annius, Urceus-Codrus, Angelo Politien Beroaldus Brant, Alexander Min, respecting whose birth-place noble cities disputed? What lexicographers in Ambrose Calepin and Stephens? What grammarians in Valla, Lully, Niger, Sulpitius Perotus, Tiphernes, Hermonius, Lascaris, Chrisoloras, Capnion, Andronicus, Dalmata, for whom kings and republics contended? What civilians in Aleiatus, Chopinus, Corvinus, Marculfus? In fine, what universal geniuses, of whom Alphonso Tostatus, the Spanish divine, was so eminent an example, that he merited the epitaph,— “Hic stupor est mundi. qui scibile, discutit omne.”

Examine the literature of these ages during any period, and take, for example, that which was produced in France alone from the fifth to the tenth century, and, as far as relates to the choice of subjects, it will be found more noble and philosophic, more conformable to the idea of literature, in the sense of Plato and Cicero, and of the ancients generally, than even that of the nineteenth, with its libraries of novels, memorials of robbers and of persons of profligate renown, and catechisms to teach children political economy and arithmetic. In the fifth century there flourished in France, Sulpicius Severus, who wrote the life of St. Martin of Tours, a sacred history, and dialogues respecting the monks of the East; Evargrus, who wrote disputations between Theophilus, a Christian, and Simon a Jew, and a dialogue between Zachæus, a Christian, and Apollonius, a philosopher; St. Paulin, Bishop of Nola, who wrote epistles and poems, and a discourse upon alms; Cassien, of Provence, who wrote a treatise upon monastic institutions, and conferences upon the monastic life; Palladius, of Poitiers, who wrote a poem upon agriculture; St. Prosper, of Aquitaine, who wrote a poem upon grace, and a chronicle of universal history; Mamert Claudien, of Vienne, who wrote a treatise on the nature of the soul, the hymn of the Passion, Pange lingua; Salvien, who wrote a treatise against avarice, and another on the government of God; Sidonius Apollinaris, Bishop of Clermont, who wrote poems and epistles; Faustus, who wrote a treatise on grace and letters on points of philosophy and theology ; Gennade, of Provence, who wrote a catalogue of illustrious men, and a treatise on ecclesiastical doctrines ; Pomœrius, of Arles, who wrote a treatise on the contemplative life, and a treatise on the nature of the soul ; St. Ennodius, of Arles, who wrote a panegyric of Theodoric, King of the Ostrogoths, a life of St. Epiphanius, letters, poems, and theological tracts ; St. Avitus, Archbishop of Vienne, who composed two sublime religious poems, besides epistles and sermons ; St. Cæsarius, of Arles, who wrote a treatise on grace and free-will, and sermons ; St. Cyprian, of Arles, who wrote the life of St. Cæsarius ; St. Gregory, Bishop of Tours, who wrote the ecclesiastical history of the Franks, on the glory of the martyrs, on the glory of confessors, lives of the fathers, and many theological works ; Marius of Autun, who wrote a chronicle ; Josephus, of Touraine, who wrote a history of the Jews ; St. Fortunatus, Bishop of Poitiers, who composed sacred and profane poems, and lives of the saints ; St. Columban, Abbot of Luxeuil, who composed poems, homilies, letters, and theological tracts ; Marculfus, who wrote a collection of formula or models of public acts ; Fredegair, of Burgundy, who wrote a chronicle ; Jonas, Abbot of St. Amand, who wrote the life of St. Columban ; St. Ouen, Archbishop of Rouen, who wrote the life of St. Eloi ; St. Boniface, Archbishop of Mayence, who wrote theological works, sermons, and letters ; Alcuin, Abbot of St. Martin of Tours, who wrote commentaries upon the Scriptures, philosophical and literary works, poems, and letters ; Angilbert, Abbot of St. Riquier, who composed poems, and a history of his monastery ; Leidrade, Archbishop of Lyons, who wrote theological works and letters ; Smaragdus, Abbot of St. Michael, who wrote treatises on morals, commentaries on the New Testament, and a great grammar ; St. Benet, Abbot of Aniane, who wrote the code of monastic rules, and theological works ; Theodulph, Bishop of Orleans, who wrote instructions on the schools, poems, and theological tracts ; Adalhard, who wrote the Statutes of Corbie, letters, and a treatise, De ordine Palatii ; Dungal, of Ireland, a recluse of St. Denis and a poet, who wrote upon Eclipses ; Halitgaire, who wrote a penitential, and a treatise on the life and duties of priests ; Ansegisus, Abbot of Fontenelle, who collected the capitularies of Charlemagne and Louis-le-Debonnaire, in four books ; Friedgres, Abbot of St. Martin of Tours, who wrote a philosophic treatise upon nothingness and darkness, and poems ; Ermold the Black, Abbot of Aniane, who wrote a poem on the life and deeds of Louis-le-Debonnaire ; Amalaire, of Metz, who wrote a rule for canons, and a treatise on ecclesiastical offices ; Eginhard, who wrote the life of Charlemagne, annals, and letters ; Agobard, Archbishop of Lyons, who wrote poems and theological treatises ; Hilduin, Abbot of St. Denis, who wrote upon the patron of that abbey ; Doane, Duchess of Septimania, who wrote a manual of counsels to her son ; Jonas, Bishop of Orleans, who wrote a treatise on the institution of Laïcs, and on the institution of a king ; St. Ardon Smaragdus, who wrote the life of St. Benet ; Theganus, of Treves, who wrote the life of Louis-le-Debonnaire ; Walfried Strabo, Abbot of Reichenau, who wrote a commentary on the whole Bible, the life of St. Gall, poems, one of which was descriptive, entitled, Hortulus, and several theological treatises; Freulfus, Bishop of Lisieux, who wrote a history of the world; Angelome, monk of Luxeuil, who wrote commentaries on the Bible; Raban-Maur, Archbishop of Mayence, who wrote fifty-one works of theology, philosophy, philology, chronology, and letters; Nithard, Duke of Maratime France, and monk of St. Riquier, who wrote the history of the dissensions of the sons of Louis-le-Debonnaire; Florus, of Lyons, who wrote theological treatises on grace, poems, and a complaint on the dismemberment of the empire after Louis-le-Debonnaire; St. Prudentius, Bishop of Troyes, who wrote on grace; Loup, Abbot of Ferriers, who wrote on the same, and also a history of the emperors; Paschasius Radbert, Abbot of Corbie, who wrote upon the Eucharist, and composed the lives of Wala and Adalhard; Ratramnus, who wrote on the Eucharist and on grace; Gottschalk, who wrote on grace; Otfried, monk at Weisembourg, who wrote a paraphrase on the Gospels in verse; Milon, monk at St. Armand, who wrote poems, one upon sobriety, and a pastoral entitled, the Combat of Winter and Spring; John Scot Erigenus, who wrote upon philosophy and upon grace, and the division of nature; Usuard, monk of St. Germain-des-Pres, who wrote a martyrology; St. Remi, Archbishop of Lyons, who wrote upon grace and free-will; St. Adon, Archbishop of Vienne, who wrote upon religion, and a universal history; Isaac, Bishop of Langres, who made a collection of canons; Hery, who wrote the life of St. Germain of Auxerre, in verse; Hincmar, Archbishop of Rheims, who wrote theological treatises, and political works; the Monk of St. Gall, who wrote the life of Charlemagne; Remi, monk of St. Germain of Auxerre, who wrote a commentary on the Bible, and commentaries on the ancient grammarians and orators; Abbon, monk of St. Germain-des-Pres, who composed a poem on the siege of Paris by the Normans in 885; Huebald, monk of St. Amand, who wrote poems and lives of the saints; St. Odon, Abbot of Cluny, who wrote theological treatises, poems, and a life of St. Gregory of Tours; Frodoard, who wrote poems, and a history of the church of Rheims; Helperic, who wrote a treatise on the computation of time in relation to the ecclesiastical calendar; John, Abbot of St. Arnoul at Metz, who wrote lives of saints, and the history of John of Verdrière, Abbot of Gorze, in which he relates his embassy into Spain to Abderam, Caliph of Cordova; Adson, Abbot of Montier-en-Der, who wrote the treatise on Anti-Christ, which was so celebrated; Arnoul, Bishop of Orleans, who wrote De Cartilagine, being an essay on anatomical studies; Gerbert, Pope Sylvester II. who wrote works on mathematics and philosophy, on theology, poems, and epistles, which showed that the activity of men of learning was not abated by the prevailing opinion that the world was then about to perish, as the tenth century drew to its close.

Literature has been said to be the expression of society; that of the ages of faith was thus holy and historical. Has it, on moral and philosophical grounds, any reason to fear a comparison with our own? Men may have wanted the critical sagacity that could always detect imposture, and disengage the real facts of a narrative from what credulity and exaggeration had superinduced; but insincerity can never be laid to their charge. They wrote, in regard to truth, like Fleury, of whom Chateaubriand says, he would rather die than be guilty of a falsehood. What Montaigne says of himself, applies perhaps to every author,—that he does not more make his book than his book makes him: and on this principle, an acquaintance with the books of the middle ages would lead us to conclude, that those who wrote them were amongst the holiest and the wisest men that ever lived in the tide of times. Besides these original works, the collections which were made during the middle ages, and the choice of authors, which we find invariably to have been formed with the soundest judgment, and in which the men of greatest science in our days have nothing to change, prove them to have possessed judicious and solid, as well as extensive learning. Such were those vast compilations of which the Margarita Philosophica, by an anonymous author, and the Speculum Naturale and Historiale of Vincent of Beauvais, are examples, forming an abridgment of all the branches of human knowledge. The compilation of moral and theological sentences, like those of the Abbot Eugippius and Louis of Blois, indicate prodigious research, and a true perception of literary beauty. That spiritual and affecting book, which was published at one time as the manual of St. Augustin, and at another as that of St. Anselm, or of Hugues de Saint-Victor, was, in fact, composed by some writer of the middle ages, whose name is unknown. The same is true respecting the book entitled the Soliloquies of St. Augustin, which was written subsequent to the year 1198, as is inferred from the author having inserted in it sentences from the first chapter of the fourth Council of Lateran, held in that year. We have seen in a former place that the ascetical writers of the middle age wrote only to edify the faithful, and had no ambition to win the glory of writing well. “The rumor prevalent here,” says Louis of Blois, “that the number of the heretics is daily increasing, compelled me to treat on these matters more at length. Henceforth I have determined on writing and publishing nothing, since I have to prepare myself for a salutary death: the world is already full of books.”* Concealing their names as well as their lives, they made no scruple of availing themselves of what others had said before them, when they judged that it was better than what they could themselves say, seeking in every thing only the greater glory of God. The author of the Manuel, indeed, in his Preface declares, that it is only a collection of remarkable sentences from the holy Fathers.

Even on scientific subjects, men made a right choice of ancient authors, and had the no small merit of being able to distinguish what writers possessed the greatest merit. In the middle ages, Dioscorides and Pliny were the only authors consulted for botany and the composition of medicines, and Galen was the great authority and guide of physicians, inasmuch that Cardan advises his pupil, when asked any irrelevant question by a patient, to reply, that Galen forbids him to answer that question,—as if the weight of his name was quite sufficient to put any one to silence. Now Baron Cuvier says, that Galen is the only natural philosopher of antiquity who deserves to be placed at the side of Aristotle. In ages of faith it was not overlooked, that the anatomical and physiological writings of this great man are composed in a spirit of profound piety, that he begins by invoking the Creator, and never loses an occasion of leading his reader to consider the final Cause in the wonderful construction of the human frame. What penetration did men evince in revering Plato for having taught that the soul was an emanation from the divinity! How little reason have the moderns to ridicule them for so admiring Aristotle, that they would always lift their cap when he was named! Baron Cuvier declares, that he never reads the Natural History of that philosopher without being filled with astonishment at his genius and observation. The first complete Latin translation of Aristotle was given in the thirteenth century by Michael Scot, who had studied in Spain with the Arabs. It is not to be denied, however, but that of the phantastic learning there were unhappily some examples, in the very ages when it was most clearly denounced, and therefore, when it ought to have been regarded with the greatest aversion. Who has not read somewhat of those strange retired old men, who thought that in Nature's infinite book of secrecy a little they could read,—who, in subterraneous vaults, worked incessantly at what was called the great work, those blowers and alchemists,—among whom poor Nicolas Flamel was unjustly reckoned by posterity,—and who, notwithstanding all their follies, used to be supported by the alms of some devout though weak persons? or of those mysterious inhabitants of the cloister, like that clerk of fame who had studied in Padua, far beyond the sea, regarded on his return with such dubious reverence,—

* Ludovic Blosius, Epist. ad Florentium.

“As when in studious mood he paced
St. Andrew's cloistered hall?”

Gillebert, Abbot of St. Bertin's at St. Omer, was accused, by a proud disobedient prior whom he had deposed, of being an alchemist. John of Ypres, who wrote the chronicle of that abbey, says, that he has been present when the Abbot Alelmus proved the metal, of which certain candelabras and vases were composed that had been made and given by Abbot Gillebert, and that they were found to be of alchemic silver. Gillebert used to be called the golden abbot, from the splendor of his works. “And since I have alluded to alchemy,” says John of Ypres, “I entreat all and each one never to apply their mind to this art. For this art promises beautiful things, and gives few: it strongly attracts and fascinates men, and many are deceived by it. Trust one who has experience,—for I who write this was deceived by it, and I have seen many similarly deceived. Nor have I ever see any one who has attained to the true work which is of itself probable, for the principles of this art do not agree with the principles of nature. Also, its end is plainly defective, nor does a metal become good by it : witness Albert, in his book entitled Semita Recta, which he composed on this art, in which he says, ‘By this mode gold is made better than all that which is extracted from the mines of the earth, in weight, and color, and fusibility, ductability, and malleability ; excepting that, as alchemic iron is not attracted by the loadstone, so alchemic gold does not cure the leprosy, nor by means of it is the heart of man made glad, and the wound which it makes swells, because it is not the gold of God.’ These are the words of Albert.”* Christine de Pisan mentions, that “the wise King Charles, who singularly delighted in all men of science, heard that, towards Avignon, there was a speculative clerk who led a life of philosophy, and worked with great subtilty in the art of alchemie, in which it was said he had already attained to many fine and notable points. The said clerk had been a disciple of Master Arnault de Villeneuve, who was a very solemn man in science, and who, it was said by some, had attained to the philosopher’s stone. The king, who desired to see all subtile things, wrote to him that he wished him to come to him, and that he would reward him well. The clerk in his letters, written in very fine Latin, thanked the king humbly for the honor which he paid to him unworthy ; but in sooth, as he was a solitary man, speculative, and of strange manners, he was not fit to appear at court : he had no flattering accents on his tongue ; he was too much at ease in repose, in leading a poor life, eating roots and leaves, and speculating in philosophy : as he was not covetous of other’s riches, there was no delight or wealth which could induce him to lose the repose and pleasure of speculation. The king sent him a message to say, that he did not wish to deprive him of his repose, but to increase it if he could ; and that, although God had given to him the charge of the office of temporal rule, his inclination and his desires were not bent upon hearing lying flatteries which are thus offered to princes, but to search into the points of truth and virtue. The clerk, seeing the benignity of the king, came to Paris, where the king received him with great honors, and heard him speak. He remained a short time, and then returned with many fine gifts.”†

Modern science is indebted for the knowledge of many important facts to these indefatigable and mysterious inquirers of the middle age. Though employed in occult, and therefore in sinful occupations, they were not without some influence, from the devout spirit of their times. “The chemical philosopher,” says Sir Humphrey Davy, “should resemble the modern geometricians in the greatness of his views and the profoundness of his researches, and the ancient alchemists in industry and piety, in keeping his mind awake to devotional feelings that in becoming wiser, he may become better.” If I did not fear to tire and offend the reader, I could relate some strange discoveries or professed inventions connected with these forbidden studies. Cornelius Agrippa, Paracelsus, Petrus Loyerus, Renodeus, Gregorius Tholosanus, Cardan, Capocchio, and many others, who thought that men might ape creative nature by a subtle art, recall sad examples of misdirected study. But it sufficeth to name them: we shall have occasion in a future place to speak of the superstitions of those ages, when there will be more excuse for citing Arbatell. For the present, let us follow the example of the Lady of Branksome, and send back the book to Michael's grave.

* Chronicon S. Bertini, cap. 49, Pars X. apud Marten. Thesaur. Anecd. Tom. III.

† Livre des Fais, &c. III. c. 22.

It must be admitted that the sciences formed not the most favorite branch of study during the middle ages. As with the Spartans of old, the teacher who won most admiration, was not one who lectured upon the stars and the movements of the heavens, upon geometry, or the science of numbers, upon the power of letters and syllables, rythms and harmony of accent,—but it was one fond of antiquity like Virgil, who spake of the generation of heroes and men, of the founding of colonies, and of the first establishment of cities, and in general, as Plato adds, πάσης τῆς ἀρχαιολογίας.* Religion gave to history and to moral philosophy a charm and an importance which the natural sciences could never possess; and that is one reason why Catholic studies are generally so much more occupied with the former than with the latter, while those who pursue their opposite, having comparatively no interest in Christian history, which they are incapable of understanding in consequence of their false position, and finding but little encouragement from the ancient philosophers of the Socratic or Pythagorean school, who, with the original traditions of mankind, are all against them, naturally direct their genius to the pursuit of the exact sciences, in which they find nothing contrary to the state of mind in which it is convenient for them to continue. The mind of man, as Aristotle says, is naturally formed to embrace truth;† so that when that which is more immediately divine as theological, is denied or rendered unattainable, it endeavors to supply the deficiency by scientific truth, by research into the causes and nature of material things. The heretics and schismatics in early ages, were known to apply with diligence to the natural sciences, as was witnessed in the Nestorians, who first propagated the science of the Greeks among the Persians, and other oriental nations. In later ages they have not been wanting in similar application to the study of the sciences; and in cultivating the Greek and Roman literature their efforts have been unwearied. The Church, from the first ages, has been accustomed to see genius and learning in the ranks opposed to her. Even after Christianity had acquired a complete victory, among the Greeks at least, the heathen party was still distinguished by the most commanding talents: it could boast of men worthy of very high admiration, whether we regard the extent of their learning or the elegance of their compositions. With respect to the witnesses, whose profession would lead us to suppose that they now, as formerly, came forward to accuse the wisdom of the ages of faith, I would not involve all in one similar sentence. There are in that number many learned and humane men, who would shrink from such charges, and gladly suppose themselves Catholics without the supposed humiliation of a Palinode, many impudent, illiterate, light men, who come forward as in the days of Luther and the Puritans, to sustain them. But this I do say of all kinds of protestors,—I ascribe science and classical learning to them : I concede the discipline of many arts : I do not deny them elegance of language, the sentiments that belong to noble birth, penetration of genius, and abundant eloquence. Finally, if they claim many other merits, I do not object ;—but the learning of Christian antiquity, and the humility which casts down all high thoughts, and brings them in captivity to faith,—that race never cultivated. They cannot have the same encouragement to pursue Christian learning ; for their labors must be intended to serve a party, or at the most, some one nation, whose theologico-political system they defend : whereas, the Catholic student had the infinite satisfaction of being able to consider himself one of an immense army spread over the entire earth, consisting of men who, without having ever seen each other, were all directing their respective abilities to serve, not any particular sect, or government, or nation, or rank of society, but the sacred cause of the universal Church. Moreover, learning in them would only serve to develop more strikingly the inconsistency of their system ; for they could not but admire the writings of the men with whom it would make them acquainted ; and how painful would it be to imitate the inconsistency of those who eulogize Thomas à Kempis, and Fenelon, and St. Bernard, and others, without withdrawing the charge against the Church to which they belonged ! Unhappily, some of their number have been tempted to claim possession of such men with consistency, by means of altering or diminishing the truths which they deliver, publishing St. Francis de Sales' Introduction to a Devout Life, corrected, as they say, from the errors of the Popish edition,—as if he had been originally one of their authors,—and cutting off the fourth book, of the Imitation of Christ, not perceiving that without that last part the three former are, in a theological, and even philosophic sense, inexplicable.

* Hippias Major.

† Arist. Metaphysic. Lib. I. cap. I.

Famous in the annals of literary deceit was the crime of Hiobus, a Lutheran, who, in the year 1528, published an edition of the book of Paschasius, Abbot of Corby, on the Eucharist, not only omitting whole chapters, but also adding and foisting in words and sentences of his own, in order to make that holy writer appear to speak his sentiments ; but his perfidy was exposed by Nicolas Mameranus, who published, in 1550, at Cologne, an edition of the real work.* “They who contrive how to propagate heresy under another name,” says Vincent of Lerins, “choose generally the writings of some ancient man, more obscurely set forth, which, by the very obscurity of its doctrine, may seem to agree with their own, so that whatever they propound, it may appear as if they were neither the first nor

* Mabillon, Præfat. in IV. Sæcul. Benedict. Pars II.

the only persons who think so; whose wickedness I deem worthy of double hatred, both because they do not fear to give the heretical poison to others to drink, and also because they fan, with a profane hand, as it were, the quiet ashes of some holy man, defaming his memory, and perpetuating, by revived publicity, what ought to be buried in silence.”* In some instances indeed, this conduct may have arisen merely from a weakness which attaches itself to human nature, such as led the Turks formerly to maintain that Orlando was a Turk, from his renown having passed into Colchus, where it is more known than that of Jason and the Argonauts.† But this mode of appropriating intellectual riches, is foreign from the inheritance of the meek, and can have no security; while on the other hand, imperfect or ambiguous sentences were not a sufficient ground for them to abandon their claims to great writers as having been in error, but, according to the advice of Facundus, they were warranted in interpreting, in a better sense, the writings of all learned men who were gone before in the peace of the Church.‡

Even without literary fraud, the learning of these proud choosers was often employed in self-deception and in misleading others; for “he only reads with profit,” says St. Hilary, “who expects the sense of the things said from the words, and does not impose it upon them,—who does not force that to seem to be contained in the words, which before reading he had presumed was to be understood.”§ In attempting to explain what was the doctrine of the Church, they worked at hazard, and without any judgment: respecting the Trinity, they would as soon have consulted the writers who had opposed Pelagius as they would have studied St. Athanasius, St. Gregory Nazianzen, St. Augustin, and St. Fulgentius, for the doctrine of grace, forgetting that, although the anti-Nicene or the Greek Fathers did not think differently from the Catholic Church, still, not being obliged by circumstances to treat upon these questions, they only allude to them in passing, and with less precision. In describing the doctrines and customs of Catholics, these modern historians wrote with as much knowledge as Tacitus evinced respecting those of the Jews, which he designates as sordid, detestible, and absurd.|| They were betrayed into the most palpable inconsistencies, so as to speak in admiration of the solid piety of the founders of their ancient colleges in times of what they termed Popish superstition. Wondrous is the force of truth, cries Petrus Cellensis, which takes captive the adversaries unwilling and unaware, and drives them on to the snares of an unavoidable conclusion, when they are taken and entangled in their own words, speaking truth unintentionally, and expressing with their lips what they do not feel in their heart.¶ Indeed, their endless concessions and panegyrics, in the same breath with the most unjust and horrible imputations, seem so like a total loss of intellectual conscience, that one ought to be less shocked at the old catalogue of epithets in use with the illiterate, or with the raving Burtons of old,

* Vincent. Lerinens. Com. cap. 40.

† Huet, de l'Origine des Romains. 37.

‡ Facundus Hermianensis. Lib. IX. de tribus Capitulis 5.

§ S. Hilar. Lib. I. de Trinitate.

|| Hist. Lib. V.

¶ Epist. Lib. VI. 24.

than at these eulogiums. Meanwhile, the more noble adversaries of the Church, who scorn all dishonorable methods of appropriating intellectual glories, feeling such a sense of their poverty in respect to theological studies, are induced to substitute opinions and speculations for a study of tradition.

Truly, in their histories of the Church, it is curious to see how soon they find themselves painfully struggling amidst rocks and sands, and with what signs of pleasure they escape to the passes where a heathen's discourse would flow as smoothly as their own. These modern philosophic historians of the Church insensibly fall into a style as ridiculous as that of the pedant in Molière, who says, "You ought not to say I beg your advice, but I seem to beg it." With them there is never any thing, but, it would seem, as if all their confidence were reserved for repeating the detected falsifications of a Robertson.* Even those who have a tone of sincerity, dwell only on the reasons for doubt, and conceal all the proof of truth, and thus reconcile themselves to clear and certain falsehood. Lord Bacon himself remarked, that "when a doubt is once received, men labor rather how to keep it a doubt still than how to solve it, and accordingly bend their wits. But that use of wit and knowledge is to be allowed which laboreth to make doubtful things certain, and not those which labor to make certain things doubtful."† To combat these wilful doubters is the task prescribed to Bellerophon, to destroy Χίμαιραν ἀμυμακέρην.‡ There is more of unfolding the sails of an oration with them than of laboring at the cars of dialectics. Even the sententious Tacitus becomes loquacious when an occasion offers of calumniating the Christians. They will always have the last word, and charity need not render the meek anxious to deprive them of this melancholy privilege. It belongs to the nature of man's reasoning faculty, that he should be able to protract disputation without end, and this ability is unopposed when there are no fixed principles, or when those which have been produced as fixed may be changed and dissolved in a moment, as the success of those who produced them may require. In general, the learning of the adversaries only furnishes them with negations. Do they seem at length to take up a position? On your advance, they involve it in a mist of unintelligible phraseology, and you will hear them singing the psalm of victory. Methinks, like the old symbolical knight, who encounters the magical adversaries, the Catholic should only make the sign of the cross and pass on. Nor is it even necessary to have learning to remain unmoved at their bold propositions. They may appear to have an exact knowledge of an infinite number of minute facts, so as to know the shepherd better than if they were of the fold, for men in ignorance always affect to be very particular, like the traveller in Plautus, who, while pretending to come from Asia, where he had never been, replies to one who asked whether Arabia is in Pontus,—

* Library of Useful Knowledge. Hist. of the Church.

† Advancement of Learning.

‡ Hom. II. VI. 179.

“ Est : non illæc, ubi thus gignitur,
Sed ubi absinthium fit, atque cunila Gallinacea.”*

These graphic triflers light upon a false date, or a hasty and ambiguous word, and instantly rejoice like a hungry lion, who stumbles upon some great carcase of a stag or goat, and he will fasten upon it although the swift dogs and keen hunters are close to him : and so does the sectarian critic rejoice when he sees with his eyes something that will satisfy his appetite for censure and for doubt. This discovery, he thinks, will justify the schism of his ancestors ; this inference will prove that the Church has fallen. “Quis illas conclusiunculas non rideat, quibus literat homines se simul et alios fatigant ?” As Tertullian says of the demon in pagan times, who employed against Christians, both truth and falsehood, “Omnia adversus veritatem de ipsa veritate constructa sunt.”† These polemic and historic compositions resemble those which Glaucus describes, being formed of sentences exactly balanced and symmetrical, in harmony with each other, and having the same tone, according to the art of the sophists in accumulating genitive and other accordant sounds.‡ Plausible books men may compose from ancient writings by committing faults against the letter and sense of the text, by the addition, suppression, and change of words, by the change of punctuation, by suppression of phrases in the text, such as conceal what is necessary for understanding the author, which leave only a part known, suppression of explanations, limitations, and essential exceptions, by extracts which make an author say what he never said, but the contrary to what he said by extracts which unite what ought to be separate, and which separate what ought to be united, by unfaithful statements, essential omissions in the recital of facts, by assertions which are false, or hazarded without proof, by acts given falsely as authentic, by extracts which have no relation to the title, by translations in violation of grammar, by alterations of sense in words, by addition, omission, transposition, and change, by treacherous expressions, contradictory to sense, redundant, deficient, inapplicable, malignant. By these and other kinds of falsification they may maintain the system of the moderns, and so still repeating their despicable song, condemn and vilify Catholic writers, but as Louis of Blois observes, in his mild and penetrating style, “though they may say a great deal, and persuade many with specious words and vain eloquence, yet those who are truly humble, that is, who are humble, in heart, they cannot seduce.”§ Meanwhile, there is nothing in the success of such labors to be compared to the pure and tranquil recompense of the meek ; there is nothing to conciliate esteem for the writer, even from the gentler spirits of his own party ; he may have evinced sagacity, quickness, and diligence, but the muse of every clime rejects him ; he is not an enemy, like Pandarus, to whom Apollo himself gave his bow.|| Those on his side may feel often tempted to entreat him, in the words which Bacchus addresses to the frogs, of whose monotonous chorus he is weary, confined and fettered at every step in the career of letters, he is deprived of the enjoyment of books that are most venerable and admirable, and compelled to resign to the meek the rich inheritance of the ancient Christian literature. At the same time, he may not be ignorant of any event in ecclesiastical history, for the most insensible and destitute may have read every thing. King Assuerus, having ordered Mardochæus to be fixed to the cross, and being unable to sleep that night, ordered that histories and the annals of former times should be read to him.† What history or book of annals have not the modern adversaries of the Catholic church read, while crucifying the Son of God afresh?

* Trinum. IV. 2. † Apolog. ‡ Plato de Repub. VI. § Epist. ad Florentium. || Il. II.27.

“ἀλλ', ὧ φιλῶδόν γένος, παύσασθε.”*

Let it be remarked too, that an acquaintance with the literary productions of the adversaries is unquestionably far from being essential to a learned Catholic, but that the converse does not hold with regard to their interest in Catholic literature. Mihi quidem, I might reasonably say, in the words of Cicero, “nulli satis eruditi videntur, quibus nostra ignota sunt;”‡ or, as he remarks of Plato and other Socratic philosophers, that they are read by all persons, even by those who do not assent to them, whereas no one ever takes in his hands Epicurus and Metrodorus, unless it be one of their immediate disciples,§ we also may appeal to the fact that all persons read the Catholic philosophers, while no one ever hears of Taylor or Jewell, unless it be within the immediate circle of their sect. I omit to speak of the ignoble crew, whose learning consists in the ridicule of holy things, in holding them up to eyes of flesh, and concealing their relation to faith and to a supernatural existence. Ah, that noble spirits should be joined to such a rout! Where license of that description is permitted, there is nothing so easy as to write books that will seem to indicate imagination, sagacity, and genius; and the temptation is too strong for modern authors, to whom therefore the chronicles of the ages of faith are a mine of inestimable value, which they are incessantly working, with a diligence commensurate with their vanity or their avarice. To refrain from examining such productions is no real diminution of the inheritance of the meek, and certainly they should refrain. “It seems to me,” says St. Augustin, “that studious and ingenuous youths, fearing God and seeking the happy life, should never dare to approach and follow confidently any doctrines which are exercised without the church of Christ, but should learn to judge them soberly and diligently, and that they should reject utterly and detest some things through suspicion of those who are in error, and that they should keep their studies separate, at a distance from the superfluous and luxurious institutions of men.”|| Who is ignorant that a new and most dangerous crew of writers has arisen in those professed historians and antiquarians of the French school, who have succeeded to the Ducan-

* Aristoph. Ran. 240. † Liv. Esther, cap. VI. ‡ De Finibus, l. § Tuscul. Lib. II. 3.

|| De Doctrina Christiana, Lib. II. 39.

ges, Mabillons, and Martenes, men who are Catholics in name and heretics in spirit, solemn libertines, followers of Epicurus, who with the body make the spirit die, of those writings there is not a page that would not have served to Plato as a specimen of the sophist's style, so far poetical that it would entitle them to use the language which Hesiod ascribes to the muses.

“ ἴδμεν ψευδεὲς πολλὰ λέγειν ἐτύμοισιν ὁμοῖα ”

though not perhaps to complete the sentence,

“ ἴδμεν δ' εὖτ' ἐθέλωμεν, ἀληθέα μνησθῆσθαι, ” *

The superficial and frivolous nature of these compositions is illustrative of the justice of Aristotle's sentence, that “it is the breast which makes men learned ;” but the effects, which are produced continually by their diffusion, might make men sigh for the comparative security from imposition which readers formerly possessed, when even the wisest and most learned men, like Mabillon, would not have presumed to publish any writing without the consent of superiors, and when other means were placed at every one's disposal of knowing the real value of particular works besides what might be inferred from the authority of a company of traders, whose sole estimation of the excellence of a book depended on the supply of money which it would bring them. Books formerly, as well as persons, were canonized, that is, were admitted into the class of approved and authentic works. This usage of the word seems more ancient with the Greeks, for we find in St. Athanasius and others, the expression τὰ κανωνιζόμενα βιβλία. In the year 1308, the pope replied to the Friar Minors who desired a change in their rule, “that the rule of St. Francis was canonized, and that he did not wish to violate it.” Infamous books were burned by the Apostles. It would be strange if they who were not to receive into their houses any one who brought not apostolic doctrine,† were allowed by the same law to accept their serpent books. St. Isidore says, “that to read impious books is the same thing as to offer incense to the demon ; and theologians demonstrate from history that the holy Church in every age has exercised jurisdiction in prohibiting their perusal.”‡ Hence the books of the Arians, Manichæans, Priscillians, Pelagians, and Albigenses are no longer to be found, because they did not contain those doubtful things which men were to prove by inquiry. The liberty of St. Jerome was compatible with his own maxim, “that it was better to be ignorant of some things than to learn with danger ;”§ and where the error and danger were self-evident, Muratori says that it was due to the republic to pronounce sentence against books intrepidly, without further hearing.|| But to return to the learning of the avowed and less dangerous adversaries of the Church.

* Theogon.

† 1 Joan. I. 10.

‡ Ligorio Theolog. append. III. de prohibitione libror. Joan. Devoti Instit. Canon. Lib. IV. 7.

§ S. Hier. Reg. Monach.

|| De Ingen, Moder. Lib. II. c. 5.

Having substituted speculation for the knowledge of facts, there is no longer occasion for the erudition which would be employed in explaining the latter. They are sufficiently skilful to be able to invent explanations for most difficulties, that would be only rendered more embarrassing by a greater portion of learning. When the Catholics appeal to history and to tradition for the truth of faith, the objector may feel for a moment at a loss, but he soon recovers himself, without the aid of learning, and replies in words, like those of the sophist of old to Socrates, "It is not difficult to find the solution of what you demand. I know very well, that if I were to be alone for a short time, and to look into myself, I could explain this to you, I could speak on this point to you clearer than all clearness." "I am convinced, indeed," replies Socrates, "that you will find this easily when you are alone." "It is just so: not at this present moment, but as I have said, when I shall have considered the point, I know well that I shall find the proper answer."* A question, however, more important would be, will it seem satisfactory to him when on death-bed laid? for that is the moment which gives a value to all learning and to all pains. Will it be found a judicious reply when called upon to answer, not in a school of men, but before God's tribunal, before him who gave so clear a command, and who vouchsafed so infallible a guide to truth? At present, who does not mark that even worldly interests enter to increase his difficulties, and Demosthenes says, "In deliberations when money is added to either side, as if placed in one scale of a balance, it sinks that down, and drags reason along with it: and he who does this is then capable of reasoning soundly and justly upon any question."† Hereafter we must all, for one great day at least, become good logicians.

But we have wandered too far upon the domains of this modern literature, and mine art with warning bridle checks me. We have been drawn on to behold the nakedness of that desolated region, and we may well weep on leaving it. Yet, not in order wantonly to offend and afflict those among whom are many a spirit allied to innocence and joy, did we pass beyond the stretch of promise; for some of these whom we have now, perhaps, with weak words grieved, are gentle and humane writers, whose instinctive reverence, and I know not what kind of poetic affection, for all that pertains to the holy Catholic church, which they view from a distance only, should render them, even without reference to diviner motives, the object of our tenderest sympathy, and sincerest love; but if honor be due to their genius, and affection to their noble capacities, truth and sincerity are no less a sacred debt which we should render to them, heedless of the loss and injury, and multiplied sorrow, which may result too surely to ourselves.

Returning now to the learning of the middle ages, we may observe that, in every sense of the term, this was Catholic, for it comprised all branches of human knowledge, although the divisions were few. The first mention of the division of the seven liberal arts into the trivium and the quadrivium, the three of grammar, and the four of physics, the knowledge of which formed the qualification for the degree of master of arts, occurs in the work of Martianus Capella, an African, who lived before the time of Justinian. The monastic studies embraced the study of the holy Scriptures, of the holy Fathers, that of the councils, of the canon and civil law, of positive and scholastic theology, and moral theology, that of sacred and profane history, that of philosophy, that of what is termed humanities, including the study of manuscripts, inscriptions, and coins. Notwithstanding the predominance of theological and moral studies, we must not suppose that in every other men were mere children, and incapable of distinguishing popular errors, as some would conclude, from the city of Lucerne having mistaken some huge fossil bones for those of a giant, which it caused to be borne on its shield as such.

* Plato, Hippias Major.

† Orat. pro pace.

The Carmelite friar Nicholas, who describes his pilgrimage to Jerusalem in the year 1486, was shown, when at Jaffa, one of the ribs of the giant Andromadus, which measured 40 feet in length ; “ but I am of opinion,” he adds, “ that it is the rib of a whale.” * The map of the world, by Father Mauro of Camaldoli, in the convent of St. Michael in Murano, drawn in the year 1460, had anticipated, or at least predicted, the discoveries of the moderns in the old world. Assuredly, even in a scientific point of view, the learning of the middle ages is most remarkable. The great doctors of the school appear also in the capacity of naturalists. We observe in the writings of Albert the Great, all the subtilty of the Arabic philosophers. In his books on physics, he gives all the hypotheses that are still produced to account for the formation of the stones which fall from the sky : he has a work, which Cuvier esteemed interesting, in twenty-six books, on animals, written in the scholastic style, first considering them in general, then descending to particular species, and describing their anatomical and physiological and historical character. In this he enlarges on Aristotle’s work, and gives many new descriptions. His catalogue of animals is taken from Aristotle, Pliny, the Arabic authors, and his own observation. By means of the commerce of furs, he had seen many northern animals. Here occurs the first notice of the fish of the north seas, whales and herrings ; he describes the shoals of herrings, so that it is an error to suppose that these shoals first began in the fourteenth century, for in the thirteenth he describes them. He speaks of birds also, and of falconry. Besides this great work, he composed a number of little treatises on anatomy and medicine, chiefly extracted from Aristotle. He has one in five books, on minerals, in which are many things relative to alchemy. St. Thomas Aquinas, the principle disciple of Albert, having studied with him at Padua, and in the same Dominican convent, appears also in the capacity of a naturalist. He wrote a commentary on the physics of Aristotle, in which alchemy plays a great part. He speaks of mercury as that which gave metallic qualities to metal, just as sulphur was considered the principle of combustibility in bodies. In philosophy he had an antagonist in Dun Scotus, a Franciscan, who was a realist. Each order continued to maintain the favorite theory of their great respective doctors. Vincent de Beauvais, the Dominican, wrote Speculum Magis, or great mirror, in four parts, the first was Speculum Naturale, the second Speculum Doctrinale, the third Speculum Morale, and the fourth Speculum Historiale, in which last are found many curious facts of considerable importance in the study of history. The whole is a vast collection in four enormous folios that would form twelve such folios as the men of our days make, composed of extracts from all sources, and containing many translations from the Greek. The first part is a universal treatise on natural philosophy, in the order of the six days of the creation, like the hexameron of St. Ambrose. It treats on animals, quadrupeds, birds, fishes, insects, on geography, on agriculture, on mining, on alchemy, on precious stones, which were then in great request for churches, where as we have already shown, are still preserved the most rare and valuable specimens. The details and the style of this great work are richer than in the work of Albert the Great: he treats also on dreams, on prophecy, —in short, it shows that he embraced all parts of visible nature, and that he viewed them with penetration and judgment. Roger Bacon was a Franciscan, a native of Somersetshire. From Oxford he removed to Paris, where he met Grossetête, with whom he returned to England. He was the first to teach experimental philosophy, in the pursuit of which, by means of the liberality of his pupils and others, he expended two thousand pounds. His books, however, contained expressions that gave offence, and he was persecuted by the general of his order, but Pope Clement IV., hearing of his merit, ordered him to be delivered, and desired to see his books. On the death of this pope, the general renewed his attacks, but being raised to the popedom, he finally restored Bacon to full liberty, and bestowed on him the title of Doctor Mirabilis. Bacon in his writings treats on reading glasses, on the microscope, on the telescope, on concave and convex mirrors: he called for the reformation of the calendar, which was afterwards made by Pope Gregory, and he showed the proper method, which was afterwards pursued in effecting it. He understood the steam engine and steam vessels. His alchemy was learned from the Arabians, and he professed, like all the other alchemists of the thirteenth century, the theory which has of late been supported by Stahl. He speaks also of gunpowder. It appears that in his time children used it commonly for their amusements by means of different little instruments. It was employed in the mines of Germany as early as in the twelfth century. In the beginning of the thirteenth, in the third crusade, it was first employed for the purposes of war, against the castles of Thiers. Friar Bacon was one of the many religious men who, amidst the pursuit of science, retained all the spirit of his blessed order.

Another example was seen in Father Alexander Spina, who was one of the first to develop the discovery of convex glasses to assist the sight. In the very ancient chronicle of St. Catherine of Pisa, he is called "a humble and good man, who used to write down whatever he saw or heard, and who was the first to make known the use of glasses for the eyes." In another chronicle of the same convent, it is said that he learned to make them without having any teacher. Some of the great mathematicians of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries were friars. Such was Friar Lucas Pacioli of Borgo, a St. Sepolcro, of the order of the Minors, who had no rival in his age. It was he who was the author of the first book of Algebra known to Europe. William Becchi, an Augustin and Bishop of Fiesole, and Friar Leonard, a Dominican, were illustrious in the fifteenth century, both in astronomy and mathematics. But in the science of these men we still trace the holy monk. If they cultivate the physical sciences, the master was to attend more to the utility than to the curiosity of the matter. "Denique mente teneat id semper nobis præferendum esse quo prodesse possimus rurestri populo, cujus curæ et ministerio constitui solemus," say the statutes of the order of Præmonstré.* If Roger Bacon studies astronomy, it is in order that the calendar may be well arranged, to determine the festivals of the Church; if he treat on the magnifying glass, it is to rejoice in the consolation and assistance which will result to aged priests for reading the books of their holy office. In like manner the old author of the poem entitled the Mirouer du Monde, which is a mixture of cosmography and natural history, as also a history of the inventions of arts, says that Ptolomy the astronomer was of great service to monks, in furnishing them with the means of assembling together at the exact hour to repeat the office of matins. "Let not the study of natural philosophy," says Dionysius the Carthusian, "delight you more than that of theology: quid enim prodest cognitio creaturarum sine dilectione ac debita veneratione Creatoris?"† To the ancient philosophers such views would not have appeared unworthy or ridiculous. The advantage which Plato ascribes to the study of astronomy is that it induces the soul to look upwards to the Primal Being and to what is invisible.‡ No one conversant with his writings need be told of the care which he takes to show that learning or study should not be pursued for any object of commerce or traffic, but in order to strengthen the soul and to convert it from things that are born to that which has existence in itself, for this, with him, is the great object of all learning and all science.

Proceeding now to the sacred studies of the middle ages, there is much that demands our attention; but I can only glance at their order. Positive theology consisted in the study of the holy Scriptures, of councils, and tradition, but scholastic theology embraced a wider field, and admitted the illustrations of philosophy and other learning. Tayon, a priest of Sarragozza, was the first who composed a sum of theology: he lived in the middle of the seventh century. In the first book of this compilation, which has never been printed, he treats on God and his attributes ; in the second on the incarnation, the evangelic preaching, the pastors of the Church and their flock ; in the third on the various orders of the Church, on virtues and vices ; in the fourth on the judgments of God, on temptations and sins ; in the fifth on the reprobate, on the general judgment, and on the resurrection of the dead. St. John Damascenus was the first among the Greeks who published a sum of theology, which is entitled on the orthodox faith. St. Anselm was the first among the Latins who treated theological questions in a scholastic manner, and Mabillon admits that his writings, with the four books of Peter Lombard, can never be studied without deriving considerable advantage. A clear description and an admirable defence of the scholastic theology is given by Melchior Canus.* It consists, he says, in reasoning learnedly concerning God and divine things, from the sacred writings and institutions. The proud subtilties, and contentious disputations, morose and tedious, of some doctors, are to be ascribed to the manners of evil men, not to the school, for it is a calumny to affirm that the majority were guilty of such childish trifling. The heretics, though they always affected to despise the school, rose up in arms against the scholastic theology. But they naturally regarded it with displeasure, because it restrained their license in disputation. It was the office of scholastics to illustrate and also to confirm, as far as possible, from human studies, the doctrine of the Church of Christ, to spoil the Egyptians, to take the weapon from the hands of the enemy, and to smite off with his own sword the head of the proud Goliath, having an example of learning in St. Paul, and of wisdom in Moses and Daniel.

* Statuta ord. Præmonstratis, cap. 9. art. 4.

† De Arcu Via Sal. I.

‡ De Repub. Lib. VII.

A theologian, says an ancient writer, professes science from God, but whatever he meets with in reading or observing relative to jurisprudence and medicine, and especially such things as have an affinity with theology, he gladly learns. For it is with wisdom as with virtues, all are branches of one stock, according to the concordant sentiments of all noble theologians.† “I confess,” says the blessed Dionysius the Carthusian, “that as far as I am able to discern after self-examination, I am not conscious of having undertaken these works through any vanity or for any vile end, for the sake of fame, or of temporal advantage; but I engaged in them in order that by occupying myself daily in the Scriptures, I might become able to live according to them, acquiring true humility, meekness, and patience, which I greatly need. From my heart I return thanks to God that I entered religion so young, in about my twenty-first year, since which I have now during forty-six years applied myself to study. I have read St. Thomas, Albert, Alexander de Hales, Bonaventure, Peter of Tarentum, Egidius, Richard de Media Villa, Durandus, St. Jerome, Augustin, Ambrose, Gregory, Dionysius, Origen, Gregory Nazianzen, Cyrill, Basil, Chrysostom, Damascen, Boetius, Anselm, Bernard Bede,

* De auctoritate Doctorum Scholasticorum.

† Instructio Novitiorum, cap. 22. auct. P. Joan. à Jesu Maria.

Hugo, Gerson, William of Paris, besides all the vulgar sums and chronicles, all the canon and civil law, many commentaries on both Testaments, and as many of the natural philosophers as I could obtain, Plato, Proclus, Aristotle, Avicen, Algasen, Anaxagoras, Averroes, Alexander, Aphorabius, Abubather, Evenpote, Theophrastus, Themistius, and others; and, although the Scripture is clearly and copiously expounded by great doctors, and holy fathers, yet as St. Jerome saith, in the house of the Lord every one should bring what he can.”* The scholastic theology embraced the three ends of all true theology, the knowledge of God, the knowledge of celestial things, the prudence and the use of human things; and so far was it from retarding the study of the holy Scriptures that it invited and excited men to prosecute that study.† But I shall have occasion to return to this learning in a future place, when it will be necessary to speak of the philosophy of the middle ages. At present, let us return to matters more immediately connected with literature, though we have not been wandering far from the subject; for we must remember that after all it was Dante the scholastic theologian, who became the monarch of poets. And in fact the scholastic divines, in consequence of their sublime apprehensions of truth, frequently furnish lines that would be worthy of his highest song, of which circumstances poets were well aware. We find Tasso complaining to his friend Aldus, that he had not sent him the sum of theology of St. Thomas, and asking for the works of St. Gregory Nyssen; and in a letter to Vincenzo Malpiglio, expressing his intention to commence the correction of his Jerusalem Delivered in the spring, he says, “I want a treatise of Pope St. Gregory, on the Hierarchy of the Angels,‡ which I have not yet read, and a commentary on the Epistles of St. Paul, respecting the armor of light, for I hope to render my whole relation more solemn and venerable by means of allegory.”§ To speak with contempt of the style and language of the ancient Christian writers, who give us in such abundance, the sweet food of sweetly uttered knowledge, has been a favorite artifice of modern writers who endeavored to win the renown of a more liberal erudition; but persons of solid instruction may naturally feel the necessity for much caution in admitting the justice of their charges. It is not always so easy to determine respecting style. Origen maintained that a certain chapter was in the highest and most excellent style of Daniel, and Julian Africanus denied that it was worthy of him.

Men complain that some historians of the middle ages should have written in the style of bards, such as the monk of St. Gall and Ermold the black, who wrote a work on chivalry, and a poem on Louis the Pius; but Aristotle says, that the style of the first prose writers of Greece was entirely poetical, as that of the noblest authors in all ages has been in a great degree. It is true the priest of the Teutonic order Nicholas Jeroschin in the fourteenth century, found no subject fitter for a poem than the contents of the old chronicle of the order by Peter Dusburg which he accordingly versified ; but modern critics are compelled to admire the spirit in which that work is composed. "With what diligent circumspection," says Dusburg, "the ancients and holy fathers committed to writing the wonderful works of our Lord Jesus Christ which were wrought by them or by their ministers is known to all ; for they attended to the words of Tobias, 'quod opera Dei revelare honorificum est,' whose footsteps I follow, lest like the useless servant who hid his Lord's talent, I should be cast into outward darkness ; therefore, I have written the wars which have been carried on by the knights of the Teutonic order." Voigt remarks, that this passage, as also the very title of another work, Gesta Dei per Francos, indicates that constant regard to Providence, which gave such a unity to their historical narratives, which are nothing but a wonderful relation of the combat between the good and the evil principle. Dusburg traces all enmities and seditions to the malice of the ancient serpent, the enemy of the human race, who envies the growing prosperity of a Christian community, and incessantly labors to interrupt the peace of the Church ; so that his whole history is the combat between God and the enemy of light and truth.* The natural flow of their narrative often indicates the simple means which had been employed in collecting it. In the life of St. Liudger by Altfried, there is mention of an old blind man named Bernlef, who was greatly loved by the whole country because he was affable and knew how to sing the acts and contests of the ancient kings.† And Adam of Bremen, one of the old historians of Prussia, says, that the Danish king Sweno, had retained in memory all the deeds of the barbarians, as if he had them in writing, and that he used to relate them to him when he was compiling his annals.

* B. Dionysii Carthusiani de Arcta Via Salutis. Protest. ad Superiorem.

† Melchior Canus, c. 1, 2. ‡ Homil. Lib. II. 34. § Prosatori dal Sec. XVI. p. 468.

Wernbert, the celebrated abbot of St. Gall, the son of Adalbert, who had followed his lord to the war against the Huns, used to be forced when a little boy to sit and listen to the tales of his father, and it was the conversation of this Adalbert, which afterwards supplied the monk of St. Gall with the materials for his history. These old humble chronicles of days gone by, need not have been so despised by the pretenders to classical propriety, who nevertheless committed an error in their title page, and wrote histories of their own times.‡ With respect to the great learned works of the monastic and other Catholic writers, it may be remarked, that one is never shocked by the breaking out of personal vanity adding weight to trifles, and of secret private spite, suggesting malignant observations, and that while they analyze ancient traditions, they do not employ imagination to destroy former opinions, nor do they insult the reader with a tone of wanton defiance drawn from the pride of scholarship. They never wound the pious ear by a profane application of the most sacred words of Christ and his apostles to their own subject. That detestable abuse introduced by heretics which has passed into an example with modern authors, whose hearts are little alive to the holy delicacy of the faith, was absolutely condemned by the fathers of the Council of Trent. They never offer for literature personal contests like those fierce academic squabbles of an Annibal Caro and a Castelvetro, who, as Varro would say, "volsellis non gladiis pugnant." They have not the air of being in love with their own works, as if they could not survive the loss of them, like Terence, who is said to have died of grief because some of his translations from Menander perished at sea, when he was returning from Greece; nor can one find in them any trace of that jealousy which Petrus Crinitus detects in Plato and Xenophon, who never make mention of each other in their writings, though both disciples of Socrates.* Their style may have been unpolished, but it was not like that of a literature which seems made by machinery. It was living, and often endued with a force that astonishes, as when the fathers describe the last moments of Julian, and say, "he died in the disgrace of God and men." In all their writings they evince that modesty and reverence which appears so remarkably in Dionysius, who though an antiquarian, and writing a most learned work on the antiquities of history, yet refused to enrich his work with information which religion forbade him to disclose, saying, it is not proper that I should write down those things which it is not permitted every one to see or hear of from those who have seen them.† Not that the same motives could have existed with Christians, but still there were many things which they would never expose to the common gaze of inquisitive men through respect for religion and humanity, through regard to private friendship, to the rights of hospitality, and to the initiations of their course in the schools.

* Geschichte Preussens, III. 613.

† Mabillon, Acta S. Ord. Bened. Sæc. IV. P. I.

‡ Historia est res gesta sed ab ætatis nostræ memoria remota. Cicero ad Heren. Lib. I. 8.

On the other hand, as was before remarked, they insert as well as omit some things on account of their writings being intended for the eye of friends alone, on whose particular genius or experience they may have depended, for the needful application or correction. "Remember," says St. Avitus, in sending his poem of consolation to his sister, "that this little book is only to be trusted to the reading of those who are bound to us by the ties of relationship or of religious vow. Scarcely, though constrained by orders, do I commit it even into your hands; when or how should I wish it to pass into those of strangers?"‡ Another contrast which their writings present to those of later ages, consists in the absence of all anxiety to draw at every step political reflections from history. Mabillon cites the words of a learned author, who says, there is no more visible effect of that wicked glory with which men are enamored, than the vanity which they derive from the knowledge of politics. This disposition of mind which betrays their secret admiration for grandeur of rank, is one of the greatest obstacles to true wisdom: it perverts the understanding, and makes the mind irrational. They wish to know princes before they know men; whereas they must first know men before they can understand

* De Honesta Disciplina, Lib. I. c. 7.

† Antiq. Roman. Lib. I. cap. 68.

‡ In Libellum de Consolatoria Castitatis Laude Præfat.

princes.* How injurious to their own intellectual character is the neglect of this maxim by those great modern writers with whom political opinions are the highest test of virtue, in whose eyes Plato is a bad citizen, and Demosthenes a saint? In another respect also their idea of learning was well conceived: for it did not consist like that of many modern solitary writers, in knowing the titles of innumerable books and in quoting from them at random, without having ever heard their history or known what were the author's life and actions, his particular genius, his object in writing, and the circumstances of the time in which he wrote.† This is the erudition of our young contributors to the libraries that are gradually to eradicate Catholicism and impart pure light to men, although to a scholar of the ancient learning, it is all but mere drawing-room display. "Circulatorie vere jactationis est." Unquestionably the great critics of antiquity might have found matter to censure and ridicule in some of the monastic compositions; but it does not appear exactly reasonable in the moderns to affect their right of judgment, considering the little correspondence between the greater part of their own literature, and the models by which they would attempt to try them. The praise which Caxton bestows upon Chancer might be extended to many authors of the middle ages; for in fact he only evinced a characteristic feature of their whole literature in "comprehending his matter in short, quick, and high sentences, eschewing perplexity; casting away the chaff of superfluity, and showing the picked grain of sentence, uttered by crafty and sugared eloquence, in writing no void words, but having all his matter full of high and quick sentence." But it will be asked, was not the language of these old writers barbarous and their Latinity execrable? Many distinctions are necessary before we ought to subscribe to such an opinion. On the rise of Christianity some innovations in language were unavoidable; much indifference to its refinement was natural, and almost of necessary consequence. The Pagan rhetoricians complained that the Christian religion was effecting a revolution in grammar, and introducing many alterations into the Latin tongue. St. Augustin, who studied Cicero and Virgil with such care, though he showed the insignificance of their objections, was anxious to preserve the purity of the Latin language; but Aronobius altogether disdained the scruples of the grammarians, and confessed that in fact Christianity ought to introduce changes into the language, since it had changed the sentiments and views of men. Yet assuredly many writers of the middle ages, like St. Leo the Great, and St. Bernard, attained to an admirable grace and harmony of style. There were still men who could write treatises which have been mistaken for the composition of St. Augustin, and beauty of style was not excluded by that impressive unction which belonged to the ascetical writers, whose sweet honied sentences disarm the severity of high crested thoughts.

Nicholas of Clairvaux imitated the style of St. Bernard, so that it was almost impossible to distinguish it. Schlegel even asserts that the Latin language was written with the same elegance in the eleventh century, as in the golden age of Augustus. The school-men, indeed, may have used new words in treating of new things or rather of things new to the Latin tongue; but the Roman authors themselves had taken similar liberties. Cicero used the words Appiitatem and Lentulitatem. The mania for substituting classical Latinity in place of the terms consecrated by Christian usage characterized the learning of the period immediately previous to the pseudo reformation, when new versions were published of the Psalms, and even of some ascetical works, as the Imitation of Christ. Some wished to change Salvator into Servator, because the former does not occur in the writings of the heathens. This was an old idea, and St. Augustin had made the just reply, "Let the grammarians bark what they will about Salvator not being a Latin word: to Christians it is sufficiently Latin, provided it express rightly the truth of that article which they believe. I admit that the words Salvare and Salvator were not Latin before the Saviour came, but when he came to the Latins he made them Latin."* With respect to the Latin which was known in secular society, there is no reason to conclude that it was wholly void of classical grace. The judgments at which presided the Viscountess of Béziers, and which were collected under a famous title, are said to have been pronounced in very good Latin. We have already seen on what grounds the holy fathers without hesitation made use of the heathen writings to explain or illustrate to the Gentiles the true religion, but we have not sufficiently shown what an influence this Catholic view of learning which allowed men to claim as their own every intellectual good, continued to produce upon the literature of the ages of faith.

* De Studiis Monasticis, P. II. c. 8. † Mabillon de Studiis Monast. Pars. II. c. 111. § 3.

When it was argued by some that the fathers had only quoted pagan authors in consequence of their living among pagans, but that in subsequent ages Christians had no occasion to consult them, the objection was refuted by showing that the faithful still lived among men who extolled reason, and that on that account an acquaintance with the writings of the pagans continued to be of the greatest importance.† The observation of Minucius Felix on this point was equally just in all times, when speaking of men who being aware of what they deserve, wish rather than believe that every thing will perish with their bodies, being hardened in their error by remarking the liberty which they enjoy in this life, and the incomparable patience of God, he adds, "and yet nevertheless, they cannot open the books of any distinguished man, they cannot even read the poets, without finding salutary warnings on this head; so profoundly graven is this thought in the heart of all men, that a day will come when the different disorders which at present reign will be repaired, and when Divine justice will reward every man according to his works."‡ St. Clemens of Alexandria recognized the fundamental principle of Christianity that the testimony of God is the basis of faith, in that passage of the Timæus of Plato, where he says, that there is one only way to understand truth fully, which is, by being instructed by God himself, or by those who are born of God.* “O man, magnificently humble and exalted by humility,” cries Petrarch, speaking of St. Augustin, “who adorned with the plumes of others, dost not insult over them, but while guiding the vessel of the Christian religion amidst the rocks of heresy, conscious to himself without arrogance of his own greatness, commemorates the rudiments of his youth, and though so great a doctor of the church, yet does not blush to have been led by the man of Arpinum who was tending to another end.”† St. Jerome, indeed, alluding to the day of judgment, says, in a rhetorical style, “foolish Plato with his disciples,”‡ but he admits the principle on which the ancient learning was still studied, in citing some verses from the Æneid, adding, “these things we take from a Gentile poet, that he who does not keep the peace of Christ may learn peace at least from a heathen.”§ It was only when alluding to some strange conceits of Abailard respecting the procession of the holy Spirit, which he spoke of as being the soul of the world, that St. Bernard used that famous expression, that endeavoring to make Plato a Christian, he proved himself a heathen,|| which will not justify our concluding that St. Bernard generally was insensible to the sublimity of Plato, or to the advantage of studying his writings; in fact, the passages adduced by Abailard from his works are the last that would give an idea of the excellence of his philosophy.

* S. Augustini Sermon. 299.

† Jamin, Traité de la Lecture Chrétienne.

‡ Cap. 35.

Petavius says, in his book on the Trinity, that if we examine the more ancient heresies of which there is mention in Epiphanius, Philastrius, and others, we shall find that of almost all the doctrines which were contrary to the Catholic faith, but especially those concerning the Trinity, the foundation and author was Plato;¶ but, perhaps, it would have been more correct to trace them to the men who abused Plato by endeavoring to prove that he had anticipated Christianity. Fleury, in his manners of the Christians, makes the distinction between Plato with the old academicians and the Platonists of the age of Julian, who had little in common with the disciple of Socrates but the name; and he observes that when Christianity arose there were some true philosophers who faithfully sought to discover truth and to practise virtue. In the ages of faith, before men had experience of an attempt to revive the heathen philosophy within the Church, we find them speaking with greater respect of the ancient sages, and inheriting with greater abundance and security the intellectual treasures of ancient times. “This we ought to do,” says Raban Maur, and his authority is decisive as to the opinion of these ages, “when we read the Gentile poets, or when the books of secular wisdom come into our hands, if we find any thing useful in them we should convert it to our doctrine; but if there be any thing superfluous, concerning idols or love, or the care of temporal things, that we should pass over.” When Jerome Savonerola warned

* Stromat. VI.† Epist. Famil. Lib. II. 69.‡ Epist. V.§ Epist. XV.|| Epist. CXC.¶ De Trinitate, cap. 6. Rabani Mauri de Institutione Clericorum, Lib. III. cap. 18.

some learned men sitting in the Marcian academy at Florence, from the study of the ancient philosophers, saying that Plato tended to inspire insolence of mind and Aristotle impiety, Petrus Crinitus relates that Picius of Mirandula smiled, and said in reply that his own studies convinced him that the Mosaic writings, and the Christian religion, in a great measure agreed with the ancient philosophy as contained in the works of Pythagoras, Mercurius, Zoroastre, and Solon.* After the sixteenth century, the insane arrogance of pedants and the errors of heretics naturally inspired the faithful with greater timidity and induced them to abandon many associations which they had formerly cherished with innocence and enjoyed with meekness. A tone of gloom and severity which belonged rather to the porch of the stoics than to the meek and joyous family of the Church, infused itself even into the privileged fold, insomuch that Villani the historian complains that the taste for graver studies which occupied his age made the productions of their most celebrated poets appear frivolous. Before that era faith was too firm to fear any concession which did not compromise its principles, and men never supposed it possible that truth could be confounded with exploded errors or endangered by recognizing the voice of primary traditions in the monuments of ancient learning. They enjoyed and honored genius and every testimony to truth, so that if a poet like that Athenian of old, had described them visiting the shades, he would have shown them like Sophocles approaching and kissing Æschylus and Plato, and giving them in their capacity of poets and sincere lovers of truth, the first place, and never questioning their right to it, but that same poet would represent the moderns like Euripides, who began to cry out and contend for it, appealing to the judgment of the vile majority, of the rabble shades.† With what noble affection does St. Jerome speak of the great Origen, extolling the beauty of his immortal genius, and the depth of his researches, and at the same time acknowledging, though in a style that might move one to tears, that there were so many points on which he had erred.‡ The learning of antiquity harmonizes far more with that of the middle ages than with our own. When a youth at present leaves the schools where he has been familiarized with the sentiments of Socrates and Cicero, and the older sages, and on entering the world finds himself in the midst of what is called society, he perceives an abrupt transition which fills him with astonishment. His studies of heathen literature had not prepared him for this insolent contempt for all that is holy, this audacious mockery of goodness, this undisguised egotism: he finds in literature itself, a total contrast to every thing in the writings of the sages of antiquity, high and mysterious, generous and inspiring, to all that refined intellectual beauty which had so often exalted his imagination to rapture in solitude, and shed such a grace and sweetness upon those evening walks with early friends to which he looks back with such affection: he finds himself

* De Honesta Disciplina, Lib. III.

† Aristoph. Ranæ, 788.

‡ Epist. XXXVI. et Catalog. Scriptor. Eccles.

now among impious, ignorant triflers, centaaurically vociferating, men whose philosopher is Voltaire, whose temple is the exchange or the tribune, whose festivals are a horse race or a review of the civic guard, whose reading is confined to journals, and whose highest boast is to be one of the majority.

But to return to the learning of the middle ages. "All things," says John of Salisbury, "offer themselves for the use of the wise man, who finds matter for exercising virtue in whatever is said or done: nam et otia ejus negotia sunt:" he proceeds rightly in his own actions, and he philosophizes upon the vanities of other men.* His own work, a monument of the wisdom and learning of the eleventh century, is an example of this in its vast and curious erudition, and in the excellent judgment with which classical passages are quoted; for besides all the known classics it contains extracts from a multitude of other books. More than one hundred and twenty ancient authors are there cited. Peter of Blois, Archdeacon of Bath, in the twelfth century, cites passages from Aristotle, Boethius, Cato, Cicero, Tacitus, Frontinus, Galen, Gellius, Hippocrates, Horace, Justin, Juvenal, Lucan, Macrobius, Martial, Ovid, Persius, Plato, Plautus, Curtius, Quintilian, Sallust, Seneca, Statius, Suetonius, Terence, Theophrastus, Livy, Valerius Maximus, Virgil, and Vegetius. He had become a priest only in his old age. Christine de Pisan had read Homer, Plato, Aristotle, Hippocrates, Galen, and all the Greek and Latin poets, though her chief study had been the writings of St. John Chrysostom, St. Augustin, St. Jerome, and St. Ambrose. In the ninth century, Paschasius Radbert, who wrote the life of St. Adalhard, Abbot of Corby, applies a passage from the republic of Plato to his own subject, and makes with exquisite taste many quotations from the classical authors.† "Though the Gentiles without Christ," says John of Salisbury, "had not laid hold of the fruit of beatitude, yet we see in them the shadows of virtues, as in the diligence of Themistocles, the gravity of Fronto, the continence of Soerates, the fidelity of Fabricius, the innocence of Numa, the modesty of Scipio, the patience of Ulysses, the abstemiousness of Cato, the piety of Titus.‡ He shows that even the ancient poets convey lessons of salutary wisdom. Homer, he observes, chooses that his hero Ulysses should never be Minerva, who signified prudence. Therefore, he underwent all horrible things without perishing; for he entered the cave of the Cyclops and escaped from it; he beheld the oxen of the sun and abstained; he passed into the infernal regions, and ascended from them; he sailed by Scylla, and was not seized; he touched Charybdis and was not retained, he drank the cup of Circe, and was not transformed; he visited the Lothophagi, and was not confined; he came to the Sirens and passed on his way.§

If I am not deceived, it will be interesting to a scholar to take, in this manner, an occasional glance at the great writers of classical antiquity, as if from the

* De Nugis Curialium, Lib. II. † Mabillon, Acta S. Ordinis Bened. Sæcul. IV. P. I.

‡ De Nugis Cur. Lib. III. cap. 9.

§ Id. VI. cap. 28.

cloisters of the middle age. The monks and holy men who wrote books in those times, are very fond of applying the beautiful sentences of Cicero and Plato to their own subject ; but then they contrive to give them a tone essentially Christian, so as to be homogeneous with their whole composition, and they effect this by connecting or completing them with sentences out of the holy Scriptures, so that the entire page is made to express the simple unadulterated faith of Christ. In this way the classical student learned to associate the brightest gems of the ancient learning with the wisdom of Christians. If their lustre did not confer additional beauty on the thoughts, the practice will at least show with what innocence and piety the classical learning was cultivated in these ages of faith. An instance of this kind occurs in the old Life of Lietbertus, Bishop of Cambray, where the author describes the last discourse of that holy man in language taken from the Treatise de Senectute, by Cicero, and from the Apology of Plato : but he does not allow his reader to depart without hearing still higher wisdom, for the concluding words are these—"Unde ne censeas lugendam mortem quam immortalitas consequitur : si enim credimus quod Jesus mortuus est et resurrexit, ita et Deus eos qui dormierunt per Jesum adducet cum eo." * In this respect, the influence of classical learning upon literature, was widely different from that which it exercised in a subsequent age, when men lost sight of the Christian character in their admiration of the writings of antiquity. In many writers of the sixteenth century there are two characters—the Christian and the Philosopher. Led away by enthusiasm, for classical learning, they sometimes wrote like heathens and at others like devout Christians. In the same chapter and page of Montaigne, this separation is perceptible. Let antiquity appear, and he revives all its errors ; let Christianity show itself, and he falls upon his knees.

Cardan is another writer of this kind, yet in heart so Catholic, that he refused the offer of great advantages rather than reside in a Protestant country. This accounts too for the contradictory opinions which have been held respecting them. Generally, through Heaven's mercy, grace was given to these men, enabling them to die penitent and Catholically, like Cardan, Polydore Virgil, and Montaigne. But they were not examples of the evil in its greatest extent. By degrees the classical spirit predominated to such a degree as to form the very character of men, and to impart that uniform odor of Paganism which is so perceptible in the modern literature. During the ages of faith, men did not cultivate classical learning with an indifference to its errors. Julian said that the Christians might persist in teaching the books of Homer, Hesiod, Herodotus, Thucydides, and others, if they would persuade their disciples that there was nothing of impiety in these authors, and that they should imitate their worship,—an indulgence which was only regarded as the addition of insult to injustice. But no exercise of ingenuity was more agreeable to them than the art with which they made use of the beauties of classical learning, without ever confounding its errors with the simplicity of Christian truth. Chateaubriand in his Martyrs, has shown himself in this respect a true Christian poet ; for though he employs Pagan Mythology, and all that is most severe and holy, in the true religion, yet he never mixes them, or speaks of the former otherwise than as a Christian : yet his work was harshly criticized, on the ground of its combining irreconcilable elements, because his contemporaries were ignorant of the legitimate use of heathen erudition. Had that work appeared in the middle ages, it would have been received with enthusiasm, because men were then accustomed to use heathen and Christian learning without confounding either. In fact, to the inheritance of the earth was attached much that was gracious and innocent in the manners as well as in the learning of the ancients. Christianity sanctioned no superstitious separations or distinction. The names of adults were not even changed in baptism, so that many saints retained the titles which came from false gods, as Denis, Martin, Demetrius ; and on the sepulchres of the martyrs may be seen traced the ancient symbol of the heart. A holy Franciscan, Father John of Bordeaux, in his book entitled the Christian Epictetus, speaks of weak persons who, not comprehending how grace corrects the faults of nature, blame the alliance which he seems to make in that book between the maxims of a philosopher and those of the Son of God. Knowing that heaven is not farther removed from the earth than human philosophy from evangelical wisdom, they cannot persuade themselves that there may be a union between these two sciences. "They are deceived," continues the wise friar. "That is not impossible : for holy souls in Christianity have an admirable secret to unite them, which is the miracle of charity." The Church, in her solemn offices, reads from the works of one whom she names not in consequence of his fall. The books of Wisdom are for her use, and she reads from them ; but she is not authorized to claim their author, and therefore she declines pronouncing his name.* "All things are to be read," says John of Salisbury, "in order that some, when read, may be neglected, some reprobated, some seen in transitu, and others to be more studied, as those which relate to political life, or to jurisprudence, or to ethics, or which conduce to the health of the body or soul. Nothing," he continues, "should arrest the mind which does not tend to make man better. Even those things of which the use is necessary, if pursued immoderately, become most pernicious. Who doubts that poets, historians, orators, and mathematicians should be read, since without them men are ignorant and illiterate ; yet when they claim possession of the mind as of right, although they promise the knowledge of things, they withdraw men from virtue and from devotion. Witness the vanity of Cicero ! What darkness covers minds that are lifted up like his by praise ! What fear comes upon them, what cupidity inflames them ! These palliate adulteries, teach injustice, and propose examples of evil to the multitude.

* Vita Lietberti, Episcop. Cameracens. cap. 63, apud Dachet. Spicileg. Tom. IX.

* Durandi Rationalis, Lib. VI. 1.

What fires from heaven, or inundation from the sea, or opening of the earth, cause such destruction of people as these occasion of manners ! For reading alone, without the co-operation of grace, can never make man wise.* But with grace assisting him, all things are food to him, because, in all creatures, the Lord speaks to him the words of his salvation. All edification of manners is from the Lord, and all instruction of safety is, in a certain manner, the Word of God ; and from whatever part truth is offered, it should be accepted, because it is always incorrupt and incorruptible. Therefore all things may be read if vice be avoided. What is even the odor of death to some may be profitable to life in others : all are more or less useful ; and hardly can any writing be found, from which, if not from the sense or words, there may not still be drawn something by a prudent reader.

The Catholic books are read with more safety, but it is still very useful to be acquainted also with those of the Gentiles. Wisdom is a certain fountain, from which all the rivers flow that water the whole earth, which not only form the garden of delights of the divine page, but also pass to the nations, and enrich those flowery regions with beauty and fragrance.”† In this admirable passage the danger of such studies to some minds is admitted, to which we find allusion also in many other works ; for the scholar of the middle ages sometimes found by experience, that the reading of the heathen poets was injurious to the purity of his soul. Such an instance is related in the chronicle of Centulensis, and the young man is said to have renounced secular learning ever afterwards, and to have devoted himself wholly to what was divine.‡

It remains only to notice briefly the character of learning, during these ages, in its application to secular objects.

In early times, medicine was studied by monks. Those of Monte Cassino employed the time that remained to them after their devout prayers, in the relief of afflicted humanity. In the beginning of the twelfth century, Faricio, a monk of Arezzo, was illustrious in medicine. Passing into Scotland, he became abbot of the monastery of Aberdeen, and was held in great repute for his medical knowledge by the monarchs of that kingdom. We have already remarked the excellent judgment which was shown in the choice of Galen for the chief authority. Cardan says, that there had been in ancient times a distinction between herbalists and physicians.§ It was chiefly in the former capacity that the monks practised. Their motive was wholly religious, and the influence of piety, appeared in this as in all their other sciences. An example occurs in the chronicle of Sens, of which the author speaks as follows :—“When I was in Argentine following the schools, there was a certain Master Henry with St. Thomas who was imbued with the art of medicine. He being made prior at Trouthenhouze, related to me, that a certain soldier named

* De Nugis Curialium, cap. 9.

† De Nugis Curialium, cap. 10.

‡ Chronicon Centulensis, Lib. IV. cap. 13.

§ Prudent. Civ. c. 92.

Rambald being attacked with a grievous sickness, sent to invite the prior to come to prescribe for him. On his arrival he found the soldier dangerously ill ; so the prior said to him, 'My Lord, if you believeme, you will first confess your sins, and receive the body of Christ, before I attempt to cure you, because that will be a more important remedy for you.'"* However, as the study of medicine was found to interfere with more important duties, a decree of the Council of Rheims, in the year 1131, prohibited monks and canons from pursuing it ; and in that of Tours, in the year 1163, Pope Alexander III. declared, that those who left their cloister to learn the art of healing or to pursue the study of law, would incur excommunication.

Many of the most learned laymen, in the thirteenth century, were physicians. They studied with the Arabs, to which education may perhaps be ascribed the errors of Arnold de Villeneuve in matters of faith. He too had studied with the Moors in Spain, from whom he learned the art of making brandy, which they regarded as a medicine, being prevented by their law from using it for any other purpose, and which he was the first to introduce into Europe. His heretical tenets on points of faith caused his books to be burnt, and it was with difficulty that the Pope succeeded in saving those which had only relation to medical science. In the same age flourished Raymund Lulle, a man of noble race, seneschal of the King of Arragon. He was a warrior, a poet, an alchemist, and a theologian : he passed into Africa to convert the Mahometans, and was rescued when about to suffer martyrdom. He was supposed to have succeeded as an alchemist in his labors to accomplish the great work. Even the muse of Tasso, like that of Pindar, does not disclaim to mention such men "as the heroes who repelled all kinds of diseases ;"† for after treating how Godfrey was wounded at the first assault of Jerusalem, we are told,

"Erotimus, born on the banks of Po,
Was he that undertook to cure the knight
All what green herbs or waters pure could do :
He knew their power, their virtue, and their might
A noble poet was the man also ;
But in this science he had more delight ;
He could restore to health death-wounded men,
And make their names immortal with his pen."‡

Bartholomew de Granville was another learned and noble layman of that age, who composed a work from the writings of Albert the Great and Vincent de Beauvais, which was entitled De Rerum Proprietate. Symphorien Champier, in later times, was another example of an excellent theologian and philosopher, a renowned poet, and an experienced physician, versed in all kinds of learning. We find the two-fold character of these men generally recognized on their tombs, as in

* Chronic. Senoniensis, Lib. IV. cap. 34. apud Dacher. Spicilieg. Tom. III.

† Pyth. Od. III.

‡ XI. 70.

the inscription on that of Neri, in the Neri chapel at the convent of St. Mary Magdalen de Pazzi, at Florence, in which the terms "medico ac philosopho" are applied to him.—Celebrated in the middle ages were Fracastor, a physician, astronomer, and great poet, and also Speroni of Padua, a physician and philosopher, who was so loved by St. Charles Borromeo as to be admitted to his Notti Vaticane. In later times, the influence of piety ceased to distinguish the learning of the physicians, so that a striking contrast to the meek spirit of the theological and monastic disputants was seen in the writings of these lay cultivators of medical science of the sixteenth century, who resembled the classical critics of modern times in making the margin of books their field of battle. The furious and ignoble combats of the anatomists arose when Veselius, from the schools of Padua and Bologna, sent forth a book to prove that Galen had described the anatomy of animals alone, and not of men, and Sylvius replied to him in terms of such outrage and insult. Veselius, the celebrated anatomist, physician of the Emperor Charles V. was known when at Madrid to have opened the body of a gentleman whose heart was found to palpitate, he having probably been only in a trance. The horror inspired by this event was so great, that it was generally believed he had been guilty of dissecting a living man. He was condemned to make a pilgrimage to Palestine, and he died at Zante while on his return.

The study of law was in an early age cultivated by the clergy. In the twelfth century, that of the Roman law, at Bologna, was instrumental to the diffusion of learning. Gratian, who made the celebrated compilation, was a Benedictine monk, who lived there in the middle of that century. Many clerks studied the civil law. St. Philogonus, who succeeded Vital in the See of Antioch, in the year 318, had been an eminent lawyer, celebrated for his eloquence and learning, as well as for the holiness of his life. However, in the beginning of the fourteenth century, masters of law were not desired in the University of Padua. Innocent IV. found it necessary to issue decrees to check the ardor for this study, lest the Church should suffer injury, and he prohibited any professor of laws to be admitted to an ecclesiastical dignity. Matthew Paris, writing in the year 1254, laments the prevalence of such studies, and says, "Almost all scholars now, forsaking grammarians and philosophers, turn to laws; quas constat non esse de numero artium liberalium: artes enim liberales propter se appetuntur, leges autem ut salaria acquirantur," an opinion very conformable with what was said in a later age of lawyers by the chancellor D'Aguesau, that with them to make one's fortune and to do one's duty, meant the same thing. Hugues de Bercy, a poet who lived in the days of Philippe-Augustus, is still more severe against lawyers, and says, "Les loix apprennent tromperie." The Church commemorates the action of St. Andrew Avellino, who when a young man at Naples studying jurisprudence, and engaged in pleading for private clients, finding himself in a moment of excitement guilty of uttering some trivial falsehood, and soon after coming by chance to the words of the sacred Scripture, "Os quod mentitur occidit animam," was seized with such compunction, that immediately from that hour he renounced all such engagements, and gave himself up wholly to the divine service. In consequence of the prescript of Honorius III. there were no professors of law in the University of Paris. In the Complutensian, Ximenes the founder took care, by a severe enactment, that there should be no place for such professors in after times. The same prohibition was maintained in Heidelberg, Prague, and other ancient academies of Germany.

Without taking any side in this question, one may observe that, in all countries where the modern philosophy prevails, the importance with which this profession is invested, is certainly not a little remarkable. At the same time it would be unjust to overlook the noble character which judicial learning and manners assumed in the ages of faith. History records of Anthony Roselli, that learned and eloquent lawyer of Arezzo, that he was never induced to defend a cause which even appeared to him unjust. In the chronicles of the middle age, lawyers sometimes appear invested with almost a saintly character. They are even assisted by visions. William Lydyngton being employed by the monks of Crowland to support some cause of theirs which was pending, saw in a vision by night, as he lay restless and concerned in reflecting upon the case, a certain reverend hero, clad in the garb of an anchorite, who desired him to take the refreshment of sleep, and added, that he would succeed in course of time. He concluded that it was St. Guthlake who had appeared to him, the patron of that abbey, who having been a great soldier, renounced the world and lived as a hermit in the fens.* It is impossible to regard, without awe and reverence, the solemn figure of Gothardus, rector of the law students, as he is represented on his tomb in the cloisters of the University of Pavia. Ramlphus, Bishop of Durham, in the days of the Conqueror, wrote a book entitled De Legibus Angliæ, which constitutes him the father of English lawyers. The clergy read in their office a sentence from St. Basil, that "fasting makes wise legislators.†" We have seen, that in the time of Charlemagne it was imposed upon those who administered the law. When the Catholic archbishops and bishops, and mitred abbots, sat in parliament, men like Chancellor Morton, who had studied the canon law and the law of God, who were spiritually wise, and when the nobles who assisted them,—some of whom, perhaps, could only set their cross for their signature,—legislated for England in conformity to their principles, there were acts of parliament passed and laws enacted, which have stood, and will for ever stand to all posterity, as models of legislative wisdom. The men of our age imagine that it would be well to change them: they attempt it, fall into pitiable mistakes, involve things in confusion, and become justly objects of public derision for their pains.

Such is the general idea of the learning of the ages of faith which will result from a reference to their works. In the next chapter, the constitution and man-

* Hist. Croylandensis in Rer. Anglic. Scriptor. Tom. I. 502.

† Homil. I. de Jejun.

ners of schools, and the history of the rise of Universities, will still further develop it, and can hardly fail to prove interesting and instructive.

CHAPTER VI.

THE institution of schools supported by public authority, in places secured and set apart for instruction, was unknown to the ancient Greeks; and with the Romans, military glory for many ages excluded all study of the liberal arts, so that it was not till the end of the first century of the Christian era that public schools began to be maintained in Rome at the expense of the state. The school of Alexandria, in Egypt, was indeed of great antiquity. From the time of the Ptolemies it had been a seat of learning, boasting of that renowned museum founded by Ptolemy Philadelphus, which contained an ambulatory, a place for disputation, and a house in which the sophists and grammarians were lodged. Among the primitive Christians, it had become very celebrated. St. Jerome says, that from the time of St. Mark the Evangelist it had possessed ecclesiastical doctors. There the mathematics were also studied by the Christians, in order to assist the Church in the computation of the festivals. The Pagans themselves were induced to attend the lectures in the Christian school at Rome, near the baths of Titus. It was to a school of this description that the stoic Pantenus was indebted for his knowledge of the Christian religion, and afterwards he was placed at the head of the very school that had instructed him. St. Clemens of Alexandria used to boast that he had been a disciple of St. Pantenus, which he deemed a greater honor than to be a master himself. In the school of Alexandria flourished Origen, Heraclas, Dionysius, John φιλόπορος, and other learned Christian doctors. This celebrated school was destroyed about the end of the fifth century by the invasion of the Mahometans.

The school of Cæsarea-Palestina was also celebrated among the Christians. St. Gregory Thaumaturgus, St. Basil the Great, and St. Gregory Nazianzen, who studied and taught there, rendered it illustrious: but of its duration we have no certain evidence. St. Basil, departing from Cæsarea to Constantinople, the school of the second Rome, soon became renowned, and here it is supposed was founded by Constantine a seat of letters, furnishing the first instance of a public academy endowed and instituted by authority. That of Rome was equally celebrated as was also that of Berytus, which three cities had the exclusive privilege of having lectures upon the Roman law. The college of Bangor in Britain was established by monks before the time of Constantine. Shortly after the death of Justinian, Berytus was overthrown by an earthquake, and a fire destroyed what had been saved from that ruin. The school of Constantinople lasted till the beginning of the eighth century, when it was extinguished by Leo the Isaurian. The school of Carthage also was spoken of by St. Augustin as the rival of that of Rome. That of Milan is celebrated for its library, and from St. Augustin having gone to it to teach rhetoric. In the fourth century a number of schools were founded in Gaul by the edict of Valens and Gratian. That in the town of Cleves was eminent, which it appears had existed in the third century, where an Athenian had taught. Marseilles retained its academy, which was so grandly described by Strabo and Cicero. The schools of Bourdeaux, Tholouse, Narbonne, and Treves, are expressly mentioned from the epoch of the fourth century ; but the professors were only grammarians, both Greek and Latin, and rhetoricians, for no philosophers or professors of law were yet in Gaul.

Of ecclesiastical schools, the earliest that are mentioned are those of Rome, Alexandria, and Nisibe. Such schools were either public or conventual. In the beginning of the sixth century, Cassiodorus, who from a Roman senator had become a monk, lamented the deficiency of these, compared with the secular schools,* and ascribed it to the wars, which raged in Italy. Edessa was soon after celebrated for its ecclesiastical school. The conventual schools were episcopal and monastic. Of these the first instance is that of Hippo, founded by St. Augustin for the education of young clerics, as a seminary to supply priests to the Church. Muratori describes the desolation of Italy, in consequence of the ravages of the barbarous Goths and Longebards, who nearly destroyed all learning, excepting at Rome and Pavia. As a remedy for this evil, the parochial schools by the clergy became general throughout Italy in the fifth century, which institutions thence passed into Gall. Thus a council in Narbonese Gall, in 443, decreed as follows : "It pleases us that all priests, constituted over parishes, according to the custom which is so beneficially established in Italy, should have junior readers unmarried in their houses, whom they shall spiritually nourish, instructing them in the psalms and divine lessons, and in the law of God, that they may provide worthy successors for themselves, and receive from the Lord an eternal recompense."† In Spain first arose the schools of cathedral churches. This was in the beginning of the sixth century. Children offered by their parents were here to be instructed under the eye of the bishop,‡ and to dwell under one roof.§ Yet the first Christian schools were always adjoining the cathedral, where was also the hospital for the sick and

* Prefat. ad lib. divinæ et humanæ lection.

‡ Concil. Toletano. II. Can. I.

† I Can. Concil. Vasionensis, II.

§ Id. IV.

for pilgrims, and there science and mercy met together. justice and peace kissed each other.

The first schools of Paris were opposite Notre Dame, and adjoining the church of St. Germain l'Auxerrois. In the time of King Robert, the Palatine schools, so called from their being near the palace of Thermes, were on the ascent of the hill of St. Geneviève. The schools of Rheims, under Hincmar, in the ninth century, were celebrated. Young men flocked there from all parts. These schools produced great bishops, abbots, and chancellors of France. His successor Foulques excited emulation by his example, for he did not disdain to study with the youngest clerks.* In the year 970, the famous monk of Aurillac in Auvergne, Gerbert, was placed at the head of these schools, and king Robert, son of Hugues Capet, was sent to study under him by his mother Adelaide. Under Guy de Chatillon the youth of the city were also instructed, by the masters of the cathedral school, in the holy scriptures and in the ecclesiastical computation. At Lyons I saw, adjoining the cathedral, a very ancient building, called the manécanterie. It was the cathedral school, erected by Leydrade the archbishop in the eighth century. The name is derived from mane cantare, to sing matins, for it was here that boys were instructed in the chant. In the eleventh century we find St. Maiolus, a young ecclesiastical student, repairing to Lyons as to the most eminent school, the mother and nurse of philosophy, as St. Odilo calls it.† It was king Ina who founded the English school at Rome. We read in the Saxon chronicle, that in the year 816 the school of the English nation at Rome, was destroyed by fire. Alfred was a great benefactor to it. The title of one of the great hospitals at Rome is derived from its proximity to this school of the Saxons. In the time of St. Bernard it was usual for some, even of monastic students, to be sent to Rome. St. Peter, the venerable abbot of Cluni in the twelfth century, sent some of his disciples to Pope Lucius, to whom he wrote in these remarkable terms: "According to the will and command of your eminence, we direct from the bosom of Cluny's cloister these beloved brethren and sons to the common father, yea to our and their especial father; we commend them to apostolic piety. For the cause of God and by virtue of obedience they leave their native soil, repair to a foreign land, and seek not to fly from death itself, which the Roman air is accustomed to inflict so quickly upon our countrymen; so that like lambs they go to the sacrifice."‡

In the sixth century also arose the schools of the new family of the Benedictines, which spread themselves over the whole western church. Of these the school of the monastery in the island of Lerins became first most celebrated. This was founded by St. Honoratus, and it produced Maximus, Faustus, Hilary, Caesarius, Vincent, Eucherius, Salvius, and many others. The school of

* Anquetil, Hist. de Rheims, I. 152.

† Bibliothec. Cluniac. 282.

‡ S. Petri ven. Epist. Lib. IV. 24.

Seville in Spain was also renowned for having produced the great St. Isidore. Of this school Mariana says, "that as if from a citadel of wisdom many came forth illustrious both for probity of manners, and for learning."* Isidore gave this precept for all similar schools in Spain: "Cura nutriendorum parvulorum pertinebit ad virum, quem elegerit pater, sanctum sapientemque atque ætate gravem, informantem parvulos non solum studiis, litterarum sed etiam documentis magisterioque virtutum." Until the time to Charlemagne letters found an asylum in England, and especially in Ireland in the monasteries. Henry of Auxerre, in the life of St. Germain, which he dedicated to Charles the Bald, says, that the Anglo-Saxons used to resort unto the monks of Ireland, for the sake of learning, and that they received from them the manner of forming their letters; and Bede is a witness that in the year 664 "many of the noble and middle classes of England left their country and passed into Ireland, for the sake of divine reading, or of a more continent life, and some within the monasteries, others going about from cell to cell, delighted in receiving instruction from masters, all whom the Irish liberally received, giving them daily food without price, as also books and instructors gratuitously."† Then returning home, they enriched their own country with learning. Renowned schools and colleges were in the abbeys of Louth, of St. Ibar in the island of Beg Eri, on the coast of Wexford, in the fifth century, in the abbey of Clonard in Eastmeath, and of Rathene, in those of Lismore, Ross, and Bangor, of St. Mary at Clonfert, and in that of St. Ninnidius in the island of Dam-Inis in the Lake of Erne, and in the abbey of the isle of Inmay on the coast of Galway.‡

At this time Theodorus, a Roman monk, sent by Pope Vitalianus came to Canterbury, where he was made archbishop, having for companion the abbot Adrian. These were both learned in the Greek and Latin. When Aleuin presided in the school of York, a crowd of scholars resorted thither from France and even from the farthest parts of Germany. St. Liudger was sent from Saxony to York to study under him, and remained there three years and six months. Tanner admits that the English monasteries, till the moment of their destruction, were schools of learning and education, and that all the neighbors who desired it might have their children taught grammar and Church music without any expense to them.§ In the abbey of Jumièges, where our Edward the Confessor was educated, there were many schools for the monks and for seculars, in which rich and poor were alike received, and the poor could send their children, because they were nourished at the expense of the monastery.|| In the monastery of St. Benedict on the Loire, there were at one time five thousand scholars. Two descriptions of colleges flourished within all the Benedictine monasteries, of which one was for lay youths.¶ The Scholasticus was the master of the school, who not only excelled in the science

* Lib. VI. Rer. Hispan. cap. 7.

† Monast. Hibernic. 410.

‡ Hist. de Jumièges par Deshayes.

† Hist. Anglie. Lib. III. cap. 27.

§ Notitia Monastica, Pref.

¶ Mabillon de Studiis Monast. I. cap. 11.

of the divine scriptures, but also in secular learning, in mathematics, astronomy, arithmetic, geometry, music, rhetoric, and poetry. Trithemius adds, that whenever an abbot found no monk in his abbey competent to discharge this office, it was no subject of shame to apply to some other monastery for a monk to fill it.* No colleges in these ages were more celebrated than that of Fulda, of which Raban was preceptor. Even bishops did not disdain to study in the schools of learned abbots. Thus we read of Burchard, Bishop of Worms, who followed the instructions of Olbert, Abbot of Jumiègue, "a noble and powerful bishop did not disdain to submit himself to the form of a disciple: and a humble and foreign monk did not fear to assume the part of a master over such a man."† In the Benedictine monasteries were always two divisions of boys for learning, forming the interior or claustral and the exterior or canonical schools; the former for those that were dedicated to religion, the latter for seculars. The care which was expended upon all these boys is described by Udalricus, in the third book of his customs of Cluny, where he concludes that it would be difficult for any son of a king to be nourished with greater diligence in a palace than was the least boy of the lowest rank in Cluny. Many sons of kings were educated with the children of the poor in monasteries of Benedictines. Lothaire, son of Charles the Bald, was educated in the abbey of St. Germain L'Auxerrois, Theodoric III. at Kala, Louis VI., Pepin, parent of the great Charles, and Robert, the second king of the third race, in the abbey of St. Denis. Even the exterior schools were under strong monastic discipline. Ekkehard the younger says, in the sixth chapter of his book on the monastery of St. Gall, that there were places of strict discipline, not only in the cloisteral but also in the external schools, from which, besides clerks, who were often there nourished, there came out many illustrious bishops. Joachim Vadianus though an adversary, bears testimony that in the masters of these schools were required piety and erudition, the former being estimated by innocence of life and love of the divine worship, the latter by the judgment and excellence of the learning which was possessed. Preceptors were often chosen from the monasteries for the episcopal schools. "And in all these offices," says Mabillon, "if they ever received any thing as a gift from the munificence of their disciples, they used to spend it in pious uses." Thus we read of Sigebert, that he applied many things to the use and ornament of the church of Jumièges, which he had received as voluntary presents from the liberality of those whom he instructed.—With Charlemagne arose the Palatine school, which was held in the palace, of which the scholars were in the court. This was so far ambulatory, that wherever the emperor went to reside it established itself in the imperial palace. Louis-le-Debonnaire and Charles the Bald continued to maintain the school in their palaces, in which had always presided from the time of Charlemagne the most learned monks, Aleuin, Peter of Pisa, Clemens, Claudius a Spaniard, Amalarius, the Deacon, Angelomus the Monk

* Withem. in Chron. Hirsan. ad an. 890.

† Mabillon, Præfat. in V. Sæcul. Bened. § 3.

of Luxeuil, and Scotus, who gave lessons on the holy scriptures, on tradition, and on the liberal arts.* The zeal of Charlemagne for learning is finely evinced in his admirable letter to Baugolf, Abbot of Fulda, and to other abbots. By means of Alcuin, it was said, that a new Athens had arisen in France. It is not denied that there had been as we have shown schools in Gaul before his time; for Bede speaks of Sigebercht, King of the East Saxons, having fled to France, and says, that when he returned to his kingdom, he instituted a school in imitation of what he had seen in France, in which boys were instructed in letters, Bishop Felix himself assisting.† But the wars and troubles of the eighth century were a great obstacle to the progress of learning.

The Council of Valence in the year 855, recommends the erection of schools for divine and human sciences, and the ecclesiastical chant, because from the long interruption of studies, ignorance of the faith, and the want of all science have invaded many of the churches of God. The exertions of the great Alcuin and other British monks under Charlemagne and his son Lewis, led to the extension and improvement of schools. Alcuin, amidst all his labors of composition, gave public lessons in the monastery of St. Martin at Tours, "I your Flaccus," he says in a letter to Charlemagne, "according to your exhortations and good desire, apply myself to minister to some under the roof of St. Martin the honey of the holy Scriptures. Others I endeavor to inebriate with the old wine of ancient learning, others I begin to nourish with the apples of grammatic subtilty. Some I try to illuminate in the science of the stars, as if of the painted canopy of some great house; I am made many things to many persons that I may edify as many as possible to the advantage of the holy church of God, and to the honor of your imperial kingdom."

In 813, a celebrated synod at Mayence ordered the clergy to admonish the people that parents should send their sons to the school whether in monasteries or in the houses of the parochial clergy, that they might learn there in the vernacular tongue, the symbol and the "our Father," and whatever was necessary for instruction in the Catholic faith.‡ There were parochial catechetical schools which were also gratuitous, and in another synod in 800, it was ordered that the parochial priests should have schools in towns and villages, that the little children of all the faithful might learn letters from them; "let them receive and teach these with the utmost charity, that they themselves may shine as the stars for ever. Let them receive no remuneration from their scholars unless what the parents through charity may voluntarily offer."§ Indeed, so early as in the fifth century, the clergy had not only cathedral schools, but also others in the country villages.

In the year 529, the Council of Vaison strongly recommends the building of

* Mabillon, Præf. in IV. Sæcul. Ben. §8.

† Hist. Eccles. Lib. III. c. 18.

‡ Concil. Moguntini Can. XLV.

§ Synod. Aurelianensis, anno 800, Can. XX.

these country schools. Yet a late writer of the life of Caxton asserts that parochial grammar schools in villages were first established in the fifteenth century ! In the monasteries there were the major and the minor schools. In the latter boys were taught the symbol, the "our Father," the Psalms, chant, arithmetic, and grammar. In the major schools the various branches of learning were cultivated, sacred letters, mathematics, music, poetry, the oriental languages, Hebrew, Greek, and Arabic. The most celebrated were in the monasteries of Fulda, St. Gall, Hirsfeld, St. Alban of Mayence, Bec, Corby, Milan, St. Deny at Paris, St. Maximus at Treves, at Rheims, Autun, Tours, Strasburg : but there were many others, a list of which is given by Launoi, in his book De Scholis celebribus a Carolo Magno in Occidente instauratis. Of Fulda, in the ninth century, Trithemius writes as follows : "There flourished there a most learned body of monks, under the abbot, Raban Maur. Their fame and memory were in great price with emperors, kings, and princes, not only on account of the sanctity of their lives, but also of their incomparable learning." Not only abbots sent their monks to this school, but also from all parts of Germany and Gaul, noblemen used to send their sons to be instructed by Raban Maur ; and as he was most mild, he received them all with great care, and instructed them according to the age and disposition of each. The necessity for episcopal schools was inculcated in the celebrated Council at Metz, under Chrodogang, shortly before the time of Charlemagne. The school was to be attached to the cathedral, where the clergy were to live in community under the bishop. The fathers of the sixth Council of Paris in 829, petitioned the Emperor Louis to found three public schools in some three proper places of his empire, that the labor of his father may not by their neglect come to be in vain, that the holy Church of God may gain honor, and the emperor an eternal memory." What was the result is unknown. In 859, another council invokes pious princes and all bishops to provide for the support of schools of the holy Scriptures, and also of human literature, "that on all sides, public schools may be constituted for both kinds of erudition, divine and human."*

The writer of the life of Bishop Meinwerens, describes the episcopal school of Paderborn as "flourishing in both divine and human science." Multiplied exercises of study occupied youths of good disposition and boys, all under claustral discipline. There were the trivium and quadrivium, music, dialectics, rhetoric, grammar, mathematics, astronomy, and geometry. There flourished Homer and the great Virgil, Crispus, Sallust, and Statius. It was a play there to make verses, and sentences, and sweet songs ; and of the beauty of writing and painting executed by these students, we see proofs to this day. A Council at Rome in 826, under Eugene II. ordained that there should be three kinds of schools established throughout Christendom, episcopal, parochial, in towns and villages, and others wherever there could be found place and opportunity. In 823, Lothaire I.

* Concil. Saponar. Can. X.

promulgated a decree, to establish eight public schools in some of the principal cities of Italy "in order that opportunity may be given to all, and that there may be no excuse drawn from poverty and the difficulty of repairing to remote places." Among these were Pavia, Cremona, Florence, Verona, and Vicenza. In the tenth century, St. Gerard, Bishop of Toul, drew into his diocese several learned monks from Greece and from Ireland, who opened schools which produced some eminent men. At the same time, the fame of the school of Magdeburg, under Otheric, was spread through all Germany. It was here that St. Adelbert, the apostle of Prussia, was educated, a beautiful account of whose holy youth, and of the affectionate diligence of his masters, is given in the ancient chronicles of that city. The Teutonic knights in Prussia used to send boys of talent into Germany, and especially to that school, to be educated in Christian learning, and alms for their support used to be collected in Germany.† Van Espen supposes that, from the eleventh century till the Council of Trent, the episcopal schools had fallen into decay.‡ Alexander III. by various constitutions, had endeavored to obviate this evil. The third Council of Lateran, in 1179, says, "Since the Church of God, as a pious mother, is bound to provide that opportunity for learning should not be withdrawn from the poor, who are without help from patrimonial riches, be it ordained, that in every cathedral there should be a master to teach both clerks and poor scholars gratis."§ This decree was enlarged and again enforced by Innocent III. in the year 1215. Hence, in all colleges of canons, one bore the title of the scholastic canon. Pope Innocent III. who with Honorius III. was most zealous for the increase of schools, extended the law to other churches besides cathedrals, that there might be a master to teach gratis.

The formal establishment of the universities, dates from the thirteenth century ; but celebrated schools had existed long before, in the place where they were instituted. Joffridus, Abbot of Crowland, who succeeded Ingulphus, sent monks to his manor of Cotenham, near Cambridge, who used to walk to Cambridge every day to give lectures in a barn, and in a short time they collected a crowd of disciples, so that soon the studies were regularly pursued as follows : Brother Odo, early in the morning, taught grammar to the younger boys : at prime, brother Terrius delivered to youths the logic of Aristotle, with the commentaries of Porphyry and Averoes : at tierce, brother William read the rhetoric of Tully and Quinctilian : master Gislebertus, on every Sunday and Saint's day, preached the word of God to the people, and on all week days he expounded before sext the text of the sacred page to learned men and priests.|| Similar details might be discovered relative to the commencement of studies in other great universities of Naples, Bologna, Paris, and Oxford, which were all established about the same time ; for Europe then forming almost but one country, institutions and manners followed every where the same

* Voigt. Geschichte Preussens. I. B. 4. c.

† Id. II. 293.

‡ De Jure Eccles. Part. ii. Tit. XI. § 6.

§ Cap. I. X.

|| Petri Blesensis Continuatio ad Hist. Ingulphi in Rer. Anglic. Scriptor. Tom. I.

impulses contemporaneously. However, the universities of Padua and Perugia did not arise till a century later. In Spain, the three greater universities were those of Salamanca, which was founded by Alphonzo el Sabio and afterwards favored by the especial patronage of Queen Isabella, of Alcalá, which was instituted by Cardinal Cisnero, and of Valladolid, which, through the patronage of the Austrian dynasty, rose to great eminence. The most distinguished of the other twenty-four lesser universities of Spain, were at Saragossa, Valencia, Seville, Granada, Itruria, Cervet, Toledo, and Santiago. The word Universitas, signified corporation, and did not necessarily imply universality of the subjects of study. At Montpellier and Salerno, there were universities of medicine solely. The beginning of the fourteenth century was distinguished by the multitude of colleges which were founded. There were forty-two in the university of Paris alone. The schools of Dominicans and Franciscans were now found every where. At Paris, the ancient episcopal school in the Island adjoining the cathedral, was transferred to the Mountain of St. Geneviève.

The universities were rendered illustrious by the lectures of the great monastic doctors, most of whom were of noble and even of royal blood. Albert the Great studied successively at Padua in his father's house, and at Paris, where he gave public lectures on Aristotle in the year 1219. The Place Maubert, is so called from this Magister Albert; for he was obliged to lecture in the open air, there being no hall large enough to contain his audience. In one of the courts of Magdalen College, in Oxford, may be seen the stone pulpit projecting from the wall, from which lectures or sermons were delivered in the open air. At Paris, a street in the quarter of the university mentioned by Dante, is still called the Rue du Fouarre, where the hay or straw used to be distributed to the scholars to furnish seats. Albert then retired to Cologne, as general of the Dominican order, and afterwards became master of the Sacred Palace at Rome; he also assisted at the Council of Lyons; wearied with his labors he returned to his convent at Cologne, where he died in the year 1280. The number of scholars at these universities was prodigious. Nearly ten thousand foreigners of every nation, and many of them very illustrious, were at the University of Bologna in an early age. St. Thomas of Canterbury and Peter of Blois, were students there. Pope Alexander III. was the Professor of Sacred Scripture, when exalted to the Pontificate. The masters and students at the university of Paris were so numerous, that when they went in procession to St. Denis, the first ranks were entering into the church of the abbey when the last were leaving the church of the Mathurins in Paris. The university on one occasion promised to send twenty-five thousand scholars to increase the pomp of a funeral.

It was usual to study at more than one university. The great Pope Innocent III. had studied at Rome, Bologna, and Paris; and Alexander V. shone both at Paris and Oxford. Men were students till the age of thirty or forty. Guillaume de Champeaux after having taught philosophy at Paris with great applause where Hugues and Richard de Saint-Victor were his disciples, became himself, at an advanced age, the disciple of Anselm of Laon, in order to study theology under him, after which he returned to Paris, where he was the first to establish a double school of theology, one in Paris itself, and the other in the abbey of St. Victor which he founded. On those ancient tombs of doctors in the cloisters of Pavia, the master, like Nazario, is represented instructing scholars who are themselves bearded men; and at the college of the Jesuits at Rome, shortly after its foundation, Dr. Martin Gregory says, that prelates and bishops, and other honorable personages used to sit out of the press at lattice windows looking into the school, hearing and writing down the lessons of divinity. The church commemorates a trait in the life of St. Camillus de Lellis, that in his thirty-second year, feeling the advantage that learning would yield him in consoling the sick and dying, to which work of charity he devoted himself, he was not ashamed to enter into the first class of grammar with little boys and thence proceeded to study for the priesthood. The same is related of St. Ignatius Loyola. Sometimes the whole life even of a poet was cloistral through his anxiety to benefit men by his writings, as was said of "gentle Champier."

Tout ton vivant tu n'as fait aultre chose Que ta personne tenir tousjours enclose,
 Pour profiter quelque chose aux humains
 Tant que des livres tu as composé maints,
 Tu as parlé des saintes et des saints;
 Et au dernier, comment pour estre crains
 Et bien aimé de leurs nobles vassaulx
 Les princes doivent vivre soir et mains,
 Et supporter bonnement leur villains,
 De tout ceey tu as moult bien parlé
 Car le peuple ne doit estre foulé.*

The jurisdiction enjoyed by these new academies throughout Europe was drawn from the constitution of Frederick I. Barbarossa. By decree of Pope Clement V. in the Council of Vienne in 1312, the profession of Oriental languages was added to the ancient faculties for the purpose of providing missionaries to the east. At Rome, Paris, Oxford, Bologna, and Salamanca, the Hebrew, Arabic, and Chaldaic, began to be generally taught. Then arose the schools of the Jesuits, and after the Council of Trent, the episcopal seminaries were multiplied, in which it was expressly provided that the students should assist at mass daily. Some councils, chiefly Belgian, prescribed schools on Sundays and festivals after mid-day, that the poor children may be instructed in the rudiments of the faith.†

The favor and indulgence shown by rulers to schools of learning may be traced to the immunity from gifts granted by the Caesars Augustus, Vespasian, and Adrian to the professors of the liberal arts. Domitian seems to have withdrawn this

* Gouget, X.

† Espen in Jur. Eccles. P. II. tit. II. cap. 5.

dispensation, which when restored was restricted to Asia by Antoninus Pius.* Constantine the Great confirmed and increased all the privileges of learning, of whom three constitutions in favor of schools are in the thirteenth book of the Theodosian code. This emperor was not the first to appoint salaries for the professors, since Vespasian, Adrian, and Antoninus Pius, are recorded to have set the example, confining their patronage to the four sects of the Stoics, Platonists, Peripatetics, and Epicureans.† To the multitude of students, who flocked from all parts to Rome in the fourth century, Valentinian, Valens, and Gratian, gave rules and privileges which may be seen in the code of Theodosius. By this law, the students were forbidden to frequent theatres or taverns, and all whose lives did not correspond to the dignity of liberal things were to be beaten publicly and expelled. No student was to remain after the age of twenty, which prescription Keuffel justly regards as an instance of imperial jealousy most injurious to learning. The discipline and privileges of the academy of Constantinople were similar. Theodosius raised professors of learning to the dignity of counts of the first order, a title invented by Constantine, and divided into three degrees of honor. For Constantine thought, that all who partook in the labors of governing in a civil or military situation should be styled his companions. They were also raised to the dignity of the spectabiles which placed them next to the first, who enjoyed the chief honors in the empire.

Julian decreed that the Christians should neither teach the liberal arts nor be received for instruction in them by pagan professors, with the exception of one whose name was mentioned, but this persecution did not last long. Justinian was illiterate, and no lover of learning; but such was his zeal for building magnificent temples, that he took for that purpose the stipends which had been granted by former kings to the masters of liberal sciences. The Emperor Frederic I. in his famous constitution which is the base of university jurisdiction, gave several privileges to students and professors. At this time the dangers to which solitary students were exposed, travelling, and passing into strange countries, were so great, that by this decree it was made a peculiar crime to touch or wound any student or scholar travelling, or remaining in a foreign land for the sake of learning. All such persons are placed under the especial protection of the emperor, who is most anxious to defend and favor with peculiar love those by whose science the whole world is enlightened and reduced to obedience towards God and to rulers who are his ministers, who make themselves exiles, for the sake of science, and poor from being rich. On occasion of a great sedition at Paris, between the town and the students respecting the price of wine, which led to a great interruption of scholastic exercises, Henry III. of England addressed an invitation signed with his own hand to the masters, and to all the scholars of Paris, in which he says, "Humbly compassionating the straits and tribulation which you suffer at Paris from an unjust law, and wishing piously to assist you in reverence for God, and his holy church; we wish to signify to you, that if it pleased you to pass into our kingdom of England, we will assign for your use whatever city, borough, or town you may choose, and secure you all liberty and tranquillity." More than a thousand in consequence removed to Oxford, and by order of the king the rate of lodging was not to exceed a certain sum. Some French authors suspect that the king of England excited the sedition in order to profit by it in gaining possession of those learned men.

* Keuffel, Hist. Originis ac Progress Scholarum inter Christianos, 33.

† Vide Heineccii Antiquit. Rom. Lib. I. tit. 25.

To the twelfth century may be traced the origin of theological degrees, but it was not till the year 1562, that the Council of Trent authoritatively established for the whole church degrees in theology and canon law. The degrees of universities were conferred by giving the chair, the book, the cap, the gown, the gold ring, and the kiss, and the profession of faith. The first signified the faculty of teaching others. The book was presented open to signify that the candidate must study with diligence, and then it was given into his hands closed, to signify, that it was not only in books but in the mind that wisdom was to be retained. The cap belonged to the clerical office. The ring given to doctors signified the mystic marriage to science. The kiss was to denote the fellowship which should exist among the learned. The profession of faith was prescribed by Pius IV.* Great honor and pompous ceremonies belonged to universities. Foreign kings would assist as spectators before an assembly of five thousand graduates, which was the number at Paris when there were twenty-five thousand scholars. The grandeur of the purple yielded to the scholastic dignity. In the year 1476, the University of Paris refused to give the degree of doctor to a man for whom the kings of France and of Spain had requested it.† The zeal for these foundations continued in Catholic countries unabated. Lorenzo de Medicis, to facilitate the instruction of youth, opened a college at Pisa, where he assembled the most excellent masters of Italy. There were at least eight universities founded in France during the fifteenth century, while nothing but the work of dissolution proceeded in England, though it had been immediately preceded by Wolsey's foundation at Ipswich. The last instance of the establishment of a university was in the year 1547, when Charles of Lorraine, Archbishop of Rheims, uncle of Mary, queen of Scots, solicited and obtained from Rome the establishment of a university at Rheims, on the model of that at Paris. It became distinguished for the piety as well as the learning of its masters and scholars. But the schools of the Jesuits were now combining the advantages of a university without its danger. "Hast thou seen in Oxford, written over the school doors, Metaphysica, Astronomia, Dialectica, and so forth? So is it here within one college," says Dr. Martin Gregory, speaking of that at Rome, shortly after its foundation by St. Ignatius.

* Keuffel, Historia Scholarum.

† Historia Universit. Parisiensis a Bulæo.

The literary meetings held in the convent of the Santo Spirito at Florence, were the first embryo of academies in Europe; and the first academy was Platonic. The present Latin translation of Plato, and of the whole works of Aristotle, though defective, evinced the zeal of Cardinal Bessarion its founder for the study of the ancient philosophers. In this convent the monks used to discourse in Greek and even in Hebrew. These meetings originated with the learned friar Louis Marsigli, around whom men of letters used to assemble and enter into disputations.

Such then were the ancient institutions of education for the propagation of learning; for of others which belong to the history of modern foundations I find no trace excepting among the Turks, who were the first to have military colleges, as was natural under a religion which was to be propagated by the sword. The Christian princes had not followed their example even so late as in the age when Savedra wrote.* It would be in vain to look back to ages of charity divine, and honor high, for any institution resembling those schools from which the offices of religion were to be excluded as a doubtful thing, and which men were equally to fill with faith and heretic declension, sanctioning in the eyes of artless and unguarded youth by their intellectual ministry, and perpetuating by the associations of early life arising from it, error as well as truth. No mention here need be made of these, in favor of which philosophy hath no arguments though civil powers may think fit to legislate. At present, I return to the ancient schools and universities, of which we have now seen the rise and progress during ages when the object of education was to render souls innocent, to stand once more beautiful in their Maker's sight. Many interesting characteristics of the former demand our attention: for, in the first place, the situation in monasteries removed from the dissipation that may occasionally at least prevail in great cities,—yielding the healthful air of the country and the beautiful aspect of woods or mountains, where the scholar, in the sweet and silent studies of his youth, learned to associate lessons of piety and devout exercises with the love of nature, was peculiarly favorable for the purpose of education. The evening walk of the students of the Cistercian abbey of St. Urban, is a happy spectacle. The being able to feel at home in its vast halls, and galleries, and peaceful cloisters, and then to range through the noble woods which surround it, might seem almost of itself an education. The importance of these first impressions is quite incalculable, and the wisdom of the middle ages recognized the necessity of attending to them. "Colleges ought to be placed in the country," says Bonald, "that there may be no external pensioners to introduce the corruption of the town within its walls, who might receive instruction but who could not receive education like those lodged within the college. Salubrity of air, innocence of manners, and habits of a country life, are advantages for which no city could offer compensation. Such were the ancient monasteries for the education of youth."†

* Christian Prince, II. 406.

† Legislat. Primit. Liv. III. 63.

Lord Bacon remarks the need of places for learning, all tending to quietness and privateness of life, and discharge of cares and troubles. What is termed a character, may indeed be formed in the boisterous stream of the world, but a genius is fostered amidst the stillness and peace which enable the soul to hear the sweet voice of Nature. It was the general opinion of the learned in the middle ages, as of the ancients,* that education could best be administered in a foreign country. John of Salisbury cites the words of an old man of Chartres, describing the keys of learning to unfold truth to philosophers, “Mens humilis, studium querendi, vita quieta,

Scrutinium tacitum, paupertas, terra aliena,
Hæc reserare solent multis obscura legendo.”

And he supplies this comment, “For to the humble God gives illuminating grace, enabling them to understand truth, and they despise not the person of the teacher nor the doctrine, unless opposed to religion; and without this, all capacity of genius, tenacity of memory, and diligence of study, will only serve to lead men into greater error, as the swift horse sooner carries his rider from the way. Simplicity and anxious study to find the sense, attend humility: that a quiet life is necessary to wisdom, even the heathen sages taught; and this cannot be found without the necessities of life, and on the other hand, without the absence of luxurious delights,—for the abundance of things extinguishes the light of prayer, and therefore joyful poverty is an excellent thing to assist studies, as many of the ancients also found. Philosophy requires a foreign land, and sometimes makes one’s own country a foreign one, because it engrosses a man wholly, and prevents him from being engaged in domestic concerns.”† And to the same effect speaks Vincent of Beauvais, who says, “A foreign land is one of the helps to learning and philosophy, because it does not suppose the mind to grow forgetful of its end, and it is the first of virtues to learn gradually to withdraw the mind from these visible and transitory things, that afterwards one may be able to relinquish them freely.”‡ To the young scholar in a foreign land, solitude is the mother of tears and piety. Savedra, from the judgment of his chivalrous lore, goes so far as to say, “that youth hardly ever succeeds in its own country: friends and relations render it too insolent; but in foreign lands the case is otherwise, for necessity renders it there more circumspect, and obliges it to form its manners to gentleness, to conciliate favor. In his own country a young man feels more free and more assured of receiving pardon; but where he is unknown he fears the rigor of strangers: besides, it is in foreign countries that he loses insensibly that rudeness of manner, that retired humor, that ridiculous vanity, which prevail among those who have not frequented various nations.”§ Methinks now I hear some voice repeat the poet’s invitation, and say, * Jamblich. de Pythagoric. Vita cap. V.

† Speculum Doctrinale, Lib. I. cap. 29.

* De Nugis Curialium, Lib. VII. cap. 13.

§ Christian Prince, Lib. II. 208.

“Revele to me the sacred nursery
Of virtue, which with you doth there remaine,
Where it in silver bowre does hidden ly
From view of men and wicked world's disdaine.”*

Where, like that happy race of which an older poet sings, “the children of heaven, nourished with illustrious wisdom, with the fruit of that holy country where it is said celestial Harmony gave birth to the chaste Muses, enjoy for a time that bright pure air, and those sweetly-blowing winds, which refresh the unviolated land, where dwells that Love which was seated by the side of Wisdom, the handmaid of every virtue.”† Who, in fact, would not wish to behold the interior of these Catholic colleges, which have left such a sweet and holy memory! “We had loved it with fondness like our native home,” says one whose early years were spent in the English college at Douay. “Domestic harmony and mutual confidence had indeed at all times made a college life a happy life; and I will affirm, that many now living in different classes of society, as many before us have done, look back with complacency to Douay, and call the happiest period of their life the years of youth spent there in preparatory studies, with companions and friends who were dear to them.”‡ It is not thus, we may observe, that the sophists look back to the days of youth, and to the place of their instruction. But the schools of holy Church were not their mother.

Far from the tumult of cities, the young Levites who are destined to bear the holy ark of the new alliance, and those also who are to serve God in the walks of secular occupations, are assembled to enjoy the sweets of solitude, and to animate each other with the love of study and of wisdom, having before their eyes great examples, which always constitute the most perfect school of life. Here they apply to a course of profound learning, which often occupies them till an advanced age. Their religious exercises commence and close each day. The solemn wind of night still sighs in the towers, but the bell has sounded, and every one rises from sleep. The dawn has not yet streaked the sky, but the long corridors give echoes to the passing steps of the student. In the chapel is already collected that throng of devout youths and venerable masters, whom Christ in his own garden chooses to be his helpmates, some of whose devoted lives, perchance, shall be hereafter sung deservedly in heights empyreal. Let England no more boast of those roses of the divided houses which dyed her fields in the blood of her children. Let her remember rather that band of innocents which she sent forth to Liege and Lisbon, to Douay and to Rome, who returned to her bosom each year as the flowers of the martyrs, among which, as the venerable Bede would say, neither roses nor lilies were wanting; for many of them were worthy to receive crowns composed of both,—white for angelic purity, or purple for the passion. In their cells and common halls simplicity is every where seen, and the humblest offices are imposed upon all in succession, to temper the grandeur of their vocation or the dignity of their state. On the evening of two days every week they walk abroad, either through some magnificent park, under the shade of a darksome wood, or to the summit of some rocks, or in a delicious valley watered by a stream, which winds among its flowery meadows.* These are their pure enjoyments. Far from spending their days in sensuality, under the shade of the altar, a frugal and even austere nourishment, prepares their bodies for a mild and spiritualized, for a long and healthful life. Their minds are tuned to every gracious harmony, are imbued with every grand and solemn truth. Music is the language of their thoughts; while sacramental lore and saintly science form them to wisdom. From time immemorial in these Catholic schools, all over the world, it was the custom to open the classes with a mass to the Holy Ghost,—with the hymn, “Veni Creator Spiritus, mentes tuorum visita,”—that is, they implored the Divine grace to visit their minds, in order that, whilst they partook of the salutary fruit of the tree of knowledge, they might be strengthened against the enemy of mankind, who might tempt them to pluck the poisonous fruit, which that tree also bears. They sought not glory in their devoted labors; they provided surer means for sweet tranquillity during the rest of life than the reward of superior ability, which the poet vainly boasted could secure it:—

* Spencer. VI. 1.

† Eurip. Medea, 822.

‡ Narrative of the Seizure of Douay College.—Catholic Magazine.

ὁ νικῶν δέ, λοιπὸν ἀμφὶ βίον ἔχει μελιττόεσσαν εὐδίαν λέγων γ' ἔνεκεν——.*

The triumph of a youth in the schools of holy Church did never sound as a note of mourning to his unsuccessful companions: unlike the conqueror in the ancient games, he did not by his victory occasion to others,

Νόστον ἔχθιστον, καὶ ἐτιμωτέραν
Γλαῖσσαν, καὶ ἐπικρυφον οἶμον,

a detested and shameful return home, a mournful silence, and a desire of darkness to cover them.† He did not rob them of a mild welcome, nor of the sweet smile of their mother as they came to her arms; they returned not as through streets full of enemies, fallen from on high, and oppressed with calamity.‡

These were the cruel victories of heathens, barbarous and delusive,—but the crowning of the Christian conqueror was a common joy, and he alone felt humbled. Religion even had in store her own sweet balms, to administer, with kind and cunning hand, to the sorrows of young students, who were depressed with a sense of their own inability to serve and honor the masters of their education; for she taught them, that the inferiority of their talents took nothing from them in the eyes of God, and rendered them no less dear and precious to their common mother: she taught them, that failure and disappointment might be more conducive to their future happiness than the most brilliant success : she always said, "Give me but your will, and I engage to make you wise and happy : I ask not genius, I ask not strength, health, success, crowns, applause,—I ask but your heart."* True, the discipline of her colleges was strict and watchful ; but how small a part of education is the attainment of knowledge, in which vain sophists now say it all consists! The human character is beheld in the greatest deformity in a man without education, and possessed of immense general knowledge,—who knows much, but every thing knows ill.—

* Pindar, Olymp. X. 1.

† Olymp. VIII. 5.

‡ Pyth. VIII.

πόλλ' ἡπίστατο ἔργα, κακῶς δ' ἡπίστατο πάντα.†

Religion did not sanction that system against nature, which takes the infant from its mother's breast, and leaves the youth to lament in the words of the Forsaken Ion,— ——— χρόνον γὰρ, ὅν μ' ἐχρῆν ἐν ἀγκάλας μητρὸς τρυφῆσαι, καὶ τερφῆναι βίου ἀπεστέρησεν φιλτάτης μητρὸς τροφῆς.‡

Not the planet-like order of her temples, which is to glorify Heaven's mercy, but the unhallowed mechanism of the factory, which is to enrich commercial tyrants, demands that sacrifice. All that she required of the child was, that on first coming to the use of reason, he should make an act of the love of God, because, if that were omitted, he would be guilty, as St. Thomas Aquinas held, "of mortal sin." But though she imposed no exercises beyond their strength, she knew that they are blessed who have borne the yoke from their youth ; she knew that the source and the root of all goodness and of all honor, is the having been from youth well instructed. The Spaniards ascribed even the cruelty and savage temper of Don Pedro to the negligence or ignorance of his governor, Don Alonzo Albuquerque, who, say they, might have tamed him when young.§ What a train of evils did the ancient philosopher discern as attendant upon false discipline,—ψευδο-παιδείαν,—ignorance and error, sadness and weeping, avarice and incontinence!|| Discipline, therefore, with her, assumed a decided and inflexible organization ; but with what love was it imagined ? with what benignity was it maintained ? "Sinite parvulos venire ad me," said our heavenly master in the school of God. "O sweet Master," continues Thomas de Kempis, "in how few words dost thou enable all men to learn humility ! These holy worde console the humble and the poor, comfort the simple and the innocent, teach us all to become like children, without malice or guile, that we may be beloved by God and men."¶ Jesus in the Heart of Youth, a Dialogue between Jesus and a Boy,—such are the titles of works composed by the most learned men,—a Bartolommeo dal Monte, a Dionysius, surnam-

* Le Petit Manuel du Pieux Ecolier : Paris, 1828.

† Margites.

‡ Eurip. Ion. 1390.

§ Savedra, Christian Prince, l. 16.

|| Cebetis Tabula.

¶ Manuale Parvulorum, l.

ed, through admiration at the depth of his philosophy, the extatic Doctor. "We wish," says the holy Benedict, "to institute a school for the service of the Lord, and we hope that we have not placed any thing sharp or painful in this institution; but if, after the council of equity, there should be found, for the correction of vice and the maintenance of charity, any thing a little too rude, let no one, through fear of that, fly from the way of safety: at the commencement it is always narrow, but by a progress in faith and in a regular life, the heart expands, and we learn to run with an ineffable sweetness in the way of the commandments of God." These are the last lines of the Preface to his Rule, which was for the strongest aspirants to perfection. Less severity was shown to the weak. The master of the monastic schools was not to be hard, clamorous, and reproachful; but putting on the bowels of a mother, he was to be gentle and affectionate, so that whatever the scholars had at heart, they might securely and sincerely trust to him.* The masters and professors were expressly charged to converse often with the scholars, to take part in their exercises and plays, that no occasion might be lost of useful admonition, and of winning their hearts, by evincing love and benevolence.†

"What obedience, and humility, and brotherly love," cries Dr. Martin Gregory, describing the college of the Jesuits at Rome, "when, but for order sake, there is no superior in heart and mind, when the greatest divines in the world, highest in place and dignity, will ask permission that they may serve the youngest students at the table! when the good fathers of our English college wash the feet also of our scholars when they arrive first at Rome! When, in fine, all are fathers and brethren and sons in respect of each other!" Affectionate solieitude was constantly proposed as their duty.‡ "The master must be full of gentleness and humanity, for his disciples," says St. Bonaventura, "whom he should regard as his children, so as to evince towards them the tenderness of a mother with a father's firmness."§ "The master," says brother John, a barefooted Carmelite, "should always begin with some prayer like the following: 'Humillime Rex cordium Jesu Christe, per viscera misericordie tue, in quibus visitasti nos oriens ex alto, obsecro te, creare digneris in me cor humile et purum, cupidissimum secrete eruditionis tue: ut in schola humilium discipulorum tuorum fiam dono tuo sapiens ad regendam sine deceptione novellam prolem, dulcissime genitricis tue.'" Like Moses, the meekest of men, like David, the most humble and gentle, like the holy father Benedict, who could not be angry even against those who wished to poison him, the master must be a pattern of the tenderest humanity, showing always a cheerful and mild countenance, to win the hearts of his disciples, never irritated at their faults or moved at their weakness, bearing with the rudeness of some, unconquered by the difficulty of others, so that no one of them may ever

* Statuta Ordinis Præmonstratensis, cap. 18.

† Statuta Ordinis Præmonstratensis, cap. ix. art. 2.

‡ Instructio Magistri Novitiorum, Auct. Joan. à Jesu.

§ S. Bonaventura, Speculum Novitiorum, cap. 13.

fear to approach him by day or by night. This sweetness and affection will render the way of Christian perfection still more delightful to them. This will soften hearts of stone, and give them hearts of flesh. Every day he must remember to offer for his scholars the most holy sacrifice of the altar, imitating the example of him who said, "Lest perchance my sons may have sinned." But if at any time, through their faults, he should feel his love for them to grow cold, he should with great effort and earnestness of prayer, endeavor to banish that temptation: he should throw his eyes upon the celestial Master, our most sweet Redeemer, who never despised his poor, rude, abject apostles, obnoxious to so many passions, but loved them, bore with them, and instructed them with the sweetest love. On the other hand, he must not evince a partiality for some over the rest, on account of their more eminent sanctity or other graces; but must endear himself to all by studying the good of all. In reproofing faults, let him never use harsh words, but as the Apostle says, if any one be tempted so as to commit a fault, we must instruct him in the spirit of gentleness; it is not said he must reproach or insult, or adopt any such mode, but that he must instruct him; he must be ready also to excuse them, and to come forward himself in their behalf, urging their inconsiderate youth; and when it is absolutely necessary to punish the fault, he must show that he separates the person from what he punishes, and he must speak soothingly and affectionately to him, as to something most amiable, and far removed from the turpitude of vice; he must avoid also the words of magisterial authority, and, like one of the disciples, as if he had not himself attained to perfection, he must associate himself with their labors; thus in words and also in deeds, he must be kind and loving towards them.

For his books, he should have the Holy Gospel and the Epistles of St. Paul, the Ascetics and Rule of St. Basil, the Morals and Pastoral Care of St. Gregory, the Confessions and Meditations of St. Augustin, the Opusculum of St. Bernard and of St. Bonaventura, the works of Cassien, Hugo de Saint Victor de Claustro Animæ, Ricardus de Saint Victor, Humbertus de Eruditione Religiosorum, Climacus, Innocent and Gerson, Thomas à Kempis, the treatise of blessed Vincent, de Vita Spirituali, the works of Blosius and of Denis the Carthusian, the Institutions of Tauleris, Albertus Magnus de Virtutibus and Landulphus de Vita Christi. In vulgar tongues he should have the works of P. Lewis of Grenada, Avila, Diego Perez, Arias and St. Theresa, and others. And for history he should have St. Gregory of Tours, Eusebius, Theodoret, and the Lives of the Saints. The master should take care to employ his talents well. Spiritual men, to whom education is entrusted, should remember that they perform their duty to God when they commit to memory the fruit of their erudition, along with pleasant and delightful histories; that in walking or sitting with the novices they may be able to exhilarate and entertain them, for their labors must be refreshed with joys. Therefore he should relate histories to them, and order others who have the ability to charm their companions with relations, and he may vary his conversation by a thousand innocent modes of diversion, which may excite a laugh without breach of modesty, instituting little contests to determine who can imagine the most perfect instance of the love of God or of hope, and allowing little plays to be represented on the sacred history, and to this he should add singing of hymns and psalms, to raise their souls to heaven. As for extraordinary recreations he must provide that all games be consistent with modesty and mutual love, conducive to the delight of the mind and the refreshment of the body. He should vary also his mode of instruction, and make use of pictures and emblems, to administer delight, and keep them ever impressed with a sense of true perfection, that they may perform all their actions for the love of God, or on account of God. He must explain to them what they are to hold respecting the mysteries of faith, and he must explain the commands of the Decalogue. Youth being impatient of rest, he must avail himself of that love of acclamation which Plato remarks in them, and give them occasion to make formal acts to inflame their hearts with the love of holiness and the horror of vice. He will therefore cry, "Vivat Jesus Christus Dei altissimi filius," and they will all answer, "Vivat."—"Vivat serenissima Regina celorum," and they will answer, "Vivat."—"Convertantur universi homines ad fidem et charitatem Dei ac Domini nostri Jesu Christi," and they will answer, "Convertantur;" and then they may pronounce an anathema against forgetfulness of God, ingratitude, despair, disobedience, luxury, and pride; and this exercise of acclamation and of malediction will conduce to fervor and piety.*

This ideal of discipline passed also to the mind of persons in the world. Christine de Pisan speaks of the poor human fragility in the days of youth, on which every well-ordered sense should have compassion, as on a thing subject to passions, to diverse desires, and natural assaults; and she says that masters ought to correct and form it to good manners by good examples: rather, "que par verberacions ou bateures maistriseuses."† St. Gregory of Tours says, that all the ecclesiastical colleges in his time were expressly formed to secure that innocence of life which is the distinctive characteristic of the clerical office. A scholastic class was governed so far like the Church itself, that the ultimate object therein was to save souls redeemed by the blood of Jesus Christ.‡ Well then may we exclaim with the poet, who lived at the moment of transition, when the education of faith was giving place to that of a new philosophy,—

"Let none then blame them, if in discipline
Of vertue and of civill uses lore
They did not form them to the common line
Of present dayes, which are corrupted sore;
But to the antique use which was of yore
When good was only for itself desyred,

* Instructio Magistri Novitiorum, Colon. 1613, cap. 2.

† Livre des Fais &c. chap. II.

‡ P. Juddle, Œuvres Spirit. Tom. III. 354.

When simple truth did rayne and was of all admyred ;
 For that which all men then did vertue call
 Is now call'd vice, and that which vice was hight,
 Is now hight vertue, and so used of all."*

The young were taught to live in a house with little noise. There were to be no commands, troubles, incessant wants, insolence, impatience, or meddling with other people's affairs further than to assist them. The ordinary food of scholars was plain, and generally of one kind.† The dress, as may be still traced in some of the old Catholic foundations in England, was modest, and at the same time manly, requiring a hardy exposure of the limbs. Plainness and simplicity marked every object around them. Who does not love to find himself in one of those antique halls, lighted through small high grated windows, pierced in the walls of vast solidity, furnished with hard benches, notched and worn and stained with the ink of centuries, where every thing seems in the same state as in the time of St. Edmund or William of Paris? With what delight does one escape from Turkish Ottomans and the luxurious sickly atmosphere of gaudy dissipation, to collect one's thoughts, and to recover the recollections of sweet and holy study, within the plain unvarnished walls of a monastic college! How do they bring before one's eyes the men of better days! We seem to behold united the bright school: there sit the race who slow their eyes around

"Majestically move, and in their port
 Bear eminent authority; they speak
 Seldom, but all their words are tuneful sweet."

There seems to rise Richard of St. Victor, Richard more than man, as he is styled by Dante, there to stand,

"One, whose spirit, on high musings bent Rebuk'd the lingering tardiness of death."

He whom Dante beheld in Paradise, as the eternal light of Sigebert,

"Who 'scap'd not envy, when of truth he argued,
 Reading in the straw-litter'd street.‡

Here would our saintly countryman, Edmund of Abingdon, read lessons upon theology, where many and illustrious men used to be assembled to hear him, and it is related that during these readings, they used often to close their books, not being able to refrain from tears.§ Here one is reminded that the labor of education was undertaken solely for the honor of God, and in virtue of holy obedience,

* Spencer, V. I. † In France and England the scholar's fare was mutton. ‡ Parad. X.
 § Vita ejus apud Martene Thesaur. Anecd. Tom. III.

without the least inducement, or indeed thought, of remuneration, and here one feels how great was the dignity which the Catholic religion imparted to every stage of the scholastic learning.

But let us return to the studious disciples, the pious sons of the holy Nicholas and Gregory, who are all animated with the innocent ardor to excel in wisdom, and whose conversation is angelic as their looks; whom the ancient poet would have commemorated as walking in the law of their fathers, and reviving their ancestral goodness, collecting riches for their minds, shunning injustice and arrogant youth, and cultivating wisdom in the quiet retreats of the muses, σοφίαν δ' ἐν μυχοῖσι Πιερίδων.* What a goodly sight is it, cries Dr. Gregory Martin in his description of the college of the Jesuits at Rome, to see in the streets long trains of students, two and two; within the college a whole swarm coming out of divine schools into one court together, while new companies succeed them in new lessons and other readers! Beautiful are the portraits of the Christian student which we discover in the writings of the middle ages. Such as represent the young Meinrad, in the ninth century, receiving his education in the celebrated abbey of Reichenau, on the island in the Lake of Constance,† and Bruno, who afterwards became one of the apostles of Prussia, of whom a friend, who had known him from boyhood, says, "Every morning when going to school, before he left his lodging, he used to be at his prayers, while we were playing."‡

Lothaire, the son of King Charles the Bald, was committed to the care of Hiericus, abbot of St. Germain at Auxerre. The abbot speaks of his disciple as follows, in a letter to his father: "In years a boy, in mind a philosopher, I confess to you that in natural disposition and in genius he is estimable beyond others of his age." The language of parents and of guardians was not then directed to undo the work of education, and to counteract that of the instructors of youth. Eginhard wrote to his son, who was then at the schools of Fulda, and his letter was to this effect: "My son, study to imitate good manners, and take care that you never offend him whom I wish you always to follow; but be mindful of your profession, be diligent to obey the commands of him to whom you have wholly committed yourself. Learned in these things, and familiar to their labors, you will want the advantage of no vital science. As I advised you while present to exercise yourself in the study of oratory, so I again exhort you to leave nothing untouched of that noble science which you may acquire from the genius of the great and most abundant orator; but above all, remember to imitate those good manners in which he excels; for grammar and rhetoric, and all other studies of liberal arts, are vain, and greatly injurious to the servants of God, unless by the Divine grace they know how to be subject to virtue; for science puffeth up, but charity edifies. Melius mihi quidem est ut te mortuum videre contingat, quam inflatum et scatentem vitiis." The preceptor whom this pious parent, the secretary and historian of

* Pind. Pyth. VI.

† Tschudi Einsiedliche Chronik. 2.

‡ Ditmar Annalista Saxo.

Charlemagne, desired his son to imitate, was the celebrated Raban Maur.* Let us take another example, "Anselm archbishop, to Anselm, his nephew in the flesh, and in love his dearest son, salutation and the benediction of God. Since I love you especially amongst all my rich relations, I desire that you may advance well before God and before all men. Therefore I admonish and exhort you, as my dearest son, that you study diligently to further that for which I have sent you into England, and that you suffer no time to pass in idleness ! Apply assiduously to grammar, and exercise yourself more in prose than in verses. But above all things, guard your manners and actions before men, and your heart before God, that when I shall see you, by the favor of God, I may rejoice in your progress, and that you may rejoice in my joy. Farewell, I commend to God your body and soul."†

Boleslaus, Duke of Poland, when a boy was sent to Paris to study, and the chronicle of Cluny testifies that he led a most innocent and diligent life, devoting himself with all his heart and affection to love and serve his Creator. It is related also of St. Philip Benitius, a noble Florentine, that when a youth studying at Paris, he united his scholastic application with such piety, that he inflamed many with a desire of the celestial country. The memory of such students made the recollections of a Catholic college like a book of holy instruction, to teach men how to live and die well. Those of St. Acheul, as the little book so entitled demonstrates, were associated with many sweet and affecting examples, both in life and death, of the holiness of youth. St. Joseph Calasanctius, of a noble house of Arragon, gave indications in his tender years of the especial charity which he was to exercise towards poor boys ; for while himself a little scholar, he used to assemble them, and give them lessons in the mysteries of faith and sacred prayers. It was he who afterwards, on coming to Rome, being divinely admonished that he was destined to train the minds of the young poor to knowledge and piety, founded the order of poor regular clerks of the Mother of God for that purpose, which was approved of by Pope Clement VIII. and Paul V. : though he afterwards applied himself to the assistance of every class, yet his principal instructions were always afforded to poor boys, whose schools he used to superintend, and he would accompany them to their homes, for he beheld in each of them the child Jesus. It is on the day of his office that the church repeats the words of St. John Chrysostom, "What is greater than to train the manners of the young? certainly I esteem as more excellent than any painter or sculptor, or any other artist whatever, the man who knows how to mould the youthful mind." In her office on the 12th of June, she relates of St. John of Sahagun, in Spain, that when a scholar boy he used to lead a most holy life, and that he used often to place himself upon some raised spot, and make a discourse to other boys, exhorting them to virtue and to the worship of God, and that he used to compose all differences among them. In the year 1590, God inspired a young scholar at the university of Douay, with the resolution to found a Carthusian monastery in his own country ; this was John Vasson, Seigneur de Rabadingue. The resolution grew with his years and studies, and in the end he fulfilled it at Labouillerie.* St. Edmund, who was born of poor parents at Abingdon, was sent to Paris to study ; such was the ardor and the facility for learning in those ages. His mother gave him a hair shirt, which he was to wear twice or thrice a week. When he used to go out into the fields with other boys, he would withdraw himself, and walk alone to meditate, and every night on going to bed, he used to write the name of Jesus with his finger on his forehead. And the writer of his life says, that he used to be advised by him to do the same. The origin of this practice was thus related : “One day, having as usual left his companions in order to walk alone through the meadows to meditate, he met a beautiful boy, who looked like an angel from heaven. This stranger saluted him familiarly, and when Edmund expressed surprise, he said, ‘I wonder that I should be unknown to you, since I always sit by your side in school, and am constantly in your company, and follow you wherever you go.’ Edmund perceived him to be our Lord, and he was then told by him to write his name, Jesus Nazareus, every night upon his forehead, diligently and deliberately, for that this would be a defence to him against sudden death ;† and St. Edmund accordingly charged his friend to adopt that exercise.” While at college he had a Psalter with a gloss, a book of the twelve Prophets, also glossed, and the decretal Epistles ; all which books he sold, and full of compassion gave the price to poor scholars. One scholar having an infirmity in the hand, Edmund gave a large sum of money to a physician to cure him.

* Mabillon Præfat. in III. Sæcul. Benedict. § 8.

† S. Anselmi, Lib. IV. Epist. 31.

The ardor for studies among the saintly disciples, is often mentioned in the annals of monastic schools. The father of Abundus, we read, did not wish that his son should continue as a student. He was a pious youth, and had a face like an angel ; his mother privately gave him the habit which scholars wear in the churches, and sent him to another school ; and the innocent boy was thus enabled by his mother’s affection and firmness to pursue the life which he loved in the church and in the schools.‡ Guibert de Nogent furnishes another instance, but more remarkable, as he labored under all the disadvantages of a private education, which from his statement appear to have been grievous. “My mother,” he says, “reared me with the most tender care ; hardly had I learned the first elements of letters, when she entrusted me to a master of grammar. This master had learned grammar late in life, and therefore he made less proficiency in the art ; but what he

* Hist. des Saints de Lille et Douai, 660.

† A writer in the Quarterly Review, No. LXVIII., translates the words of the vision, “A practice that would secure any person from sudden death,” as if there was no distinction between the soul being guarded in the event of sudden death, and the body being secured from death.

‡ Hist. Monasterii Villariensis, Lib. II. cap. 10. apud Martene Thesaur. Anecd. Tom. III.

wanted in knowledge he made up in virtue. From the moment in which I was placed under his direction, he formed me to such purity, he kept me at such a distance from all the vices which often accompany early life, that I was preserved from the usual dangers. However, notwithstanding all my application, I made but little progress under him ; though he used to give me a shower of blows, he yet evinced such friendship for me, he occupied himself so much about me, he watched with such assiduity for my safety, that so far from experiencing the fear which is usual in that age, I used to forget all his severity, and I obeyed him with a certain feeling of love. On one occasion, my mother discovered that I had been ill-treated, complained bitterly of my master and said, 'I no longer wish you to become a clerk, if in order to learn letters you must suffer such treatment,' but as for me, when I heard her words, looking at her with all the anger that I was capable of showing, I said, 'though it would be necessary for me to die, I would not cease on that account to learn letters, and to wish to become a clerk.' Victor Hugo paints the ideal of a student of this kind, amidst the more dangerous companions of the university, "the scholar Frollo," he says, "was early taught Latin, and he grew in stature over the Lexicon. Silent, peaceable, and modest, he was never implicated in any of the mutinies of scholars, nor was he ever engaged in quarrels, nor for the cry, 'dare alapas et capillos laniare,' but to make amends, he was assiduous at the greater and lesser schools of the rue Saint-Jean de Beauvais. The first scholar whom the abbot of St. Pierre-de-Val, the moment he began his lecture of canon law, used to perceive, always glued, opposite his chair, to a pillar of the school of Saint-Vendregesile, armed with his ink-horn, chewing his pen, scribbling on his worn knees, and in winter blowing on his fingers, was Claude Frollo. The first auditor whom Messire Miles d'Islien, doctor in decretals, saw arrive every Monday morning, quite out of breath, at the gate of the school of the Chef-Saint-Denis, was Claude Frollo. Hence at sixteen, the young clerk could have made head in mystical theology with a doctor of the church, in canon law with a father of the councils, scholastic theology with a doctor of Sorbonne."

The young Archduke Leopold of Austria maintained a thesis of philosophy and theology against some fathers of the society of Jesus, in presence of the Emperor Ferdinand II., his father, and the whole council. Where there was not this virtue and zeal for learning in youth, we sometimes find in the writers of the middle ages the reflections of after-life, expressed in language of the most affecting piety. Such an instance occurs in the Testament of Lydgate, the monk of Bury, in which he speaks of his youth at the age of fifteen years as follows :

"Voyde of reason, gyven to wylfulnessse,
 Frowarde to virtue, of Christ gave lytell hede,
 Lothe to lerne, loved no vertuous besynesse,
 Save play or myrth, straung to spell or rede,
 Folowyng all appetytes longyng to chyldehede,
 Lightly tournyng ; wylde and selde sadde,
 Wepying for nought, and a none after gladde.

For lytell worth to stryve with my felawe,
 As my passyons dyd my bridell lede,
 Of the yarde stode I soumtyme in awe
 To be scoured, that was all my drede,
 Loth towarde scole, lost my tyme in dede,
 Lyke a yong colt that ranne without bridell,
 Made my frendes gyve good to speade in ydell.

I had in custome to come to scole late,
 Not for to lerne, but for a countenaunce
 With my felowes redy to debate,
 To jangle and jape, was set all my plesaunce,
 Whereof rebuked, this was my chevynaunce
 To forge a lesyng, and there upon to muse,
 When I trespassed, myself to excuse.

To my better dyd no reverence,
 Of my soveraynes gave no force at all,
 Were obstynate by inobedyence,
 Ranne into gardeyns, appels there Istoll,
 To gather fruites spared hedge nor wall,
 To plucke grapes on other menues vyues,
 Was more redy than for to say mattynes.

Lothe to ryse, lother to bedde at eve,
 With unwasshe handes redy to dynere,
 My pater noster, my crede, or my beleve
 Cast to the cocke ; lo this was my manere,
 Waved with eche wynde, as dothe a rede spere,
 Snobbed of my frendes such tatches ta mende,
 Made deffe eare, lyst not to them attende.

My port, my pase, my fote alway unstable,
 My loke, myne eyen, unsure and vacabounde,
 In all my workes sodenly chaungeable,
 To all good thengs contrary I was founde ;
 Nowe oversad, now mournyng ; nowe jocounde.
 Wylfull, reckeles, madde ; startyng as an hare
 To folowe my lust, for nothyng wolde I spare.

Entryng this tyme into relygion,
 Unto the ploughe I put forthe my hande,
 A yere complete made my professyon,
 Consydering lytell change of thylke bande,
 Of perfectyon, full good example I founde,
 The techyng good, in me was all the lacke,
 With Lottes wyfe, I loked oft a backe.

Taught of my maisters, by virtuous dyscipline,
 My loke restrayne, and kepe close my syght,
 Of blessed Benet to folowe the doctryne,
 And bere me lowly to every mener wyght,

By th' advertence of myne inwarde syght,
 Cast to God warde of holy affectyon,
 To folowe th' emprises of my professyon."

This disposition, even in the most negligent, to recognize the virtue of the masters of their youth, is characteristic of these ages of faith, when religion secured for all persons in authority that filial reverence to which length of days is promised. Even Quintilian admonishes the disciples that they should love their preceptors, no less than the studies themselves, and believe them to be the fathers, not indeed of their bodies but of their minds, and he adds, that this piety conduces much to study.* Dante says, that so long as life endures his tongue shall speak how he did prize the lessons of Brunetto, and when he meets that benign paternal image of his ancient master he says, "I dared not tread on equal ground with him, but held my head bent down, as one who walks in reverent guise." Octavian de Saint-Gelais, who wrote the Séjour d'honneur, in the reign of Charles VIII., describes in an affecting manner, how he met the shade of his old master Magister Martin, when traversing the forest of adventures, whom he styles, Mon feu patron et tres honoré maistre.

"Interpréteur de la sainte pagine
 Aigle d'honneur, philosophe tres-digne,
 Ha que moult fut mon mal pesant et grief,
 De voir mon maistre et personne honorée
 Hors du siècle.—
 A Paris fut jadis mon directeur,
 A Sainte Barbe, en son noble collège
 Régent fut-il de mes frères et moy,
 Puy son sçavoir le logea chez le roy,
 Ou il vivant en honneur transitoire,
 Fut convaincu par mortelle victoire." †

In the time of St. Thomas Aquinas, the manner of teaching was according to the practice that still prevails in the public schools of Rome and Padua, and of other places. The master delivered his explanation like an harangue; the scholars retained what they could, and often took down short notes to help their memory. "The act of instruction, viva voce," says Vincent of Beauvais, "has I know not what hidden energy, and sounds more forcibly in the ears of a disciple transfused from the mouth of a master." ‡ Quintilian had made the same remark, proving the superior advantage of oral instruction over every other; and he says, that youths should never be permitted to testify their approbation in a noisy manner, but that they should hang on the judgment of the teacher, and should believe that to be well said which is approved of by him; as for that indecorous, and theatrical, and most vicious custom, of giving applause to each other, it should be never permitted, being contrary to scholastic institution, and the most pernicious enemy of studies ; but they should attend to the masters modestly and intensely, and the master ought not to attend to the judgment of the disciples, but the disciples to that of the master. Who would not now suppose that this was written by some scholastic monk of the middle ages ? and yet they are the words of Quintilian ;* so much farther removed are we than our Catholic forefathers from the wisdom of the ancient civilization. A correct idea of the mode of instruction in monastic schools may be formed from examining the four ancient tombs of doctors, which are in the cloisters of the convent of St. Dominic at Bologna, where each doctor is represented sitting in the midst with a book open before him, which he explains, as is indicated by his hand stretched out, while around or in front is seated a crowd of students in a religious habit, who are placed before desks, on which they are writing down as if from his lecture, or turning round to consult each other. These groups have, indeed, an air of antiquity, which denotes that they refer to days gone by ; but yet the venerable aspect of our college halls during an academic discourse, can often revive within one a sense of the ancient dignity of learning and inspire that noble confidence which the Roman orator desired to feel before his judges ; for as every where else truth has but little support and little strength, so in these places one feels that false envious prejudice is weak, that while it may prevail in popular assemblies, here it must be prostrate ; its force is in the opinions of the unlearned, but it is far from the understanding of the prudent : its sudden and vehement impulses giving place, after a while, to senile lamentations,† can never enter within the walls which hear of universal tradition, Catholic authority, and immutable eternal truth.

* Instit. Orat. Lib. II. 10.

† Gouget, Tom. X.

‡ Speculum Doctrinale, Lib. I. c. 37.

It is with a feeling of devotion that one enters the school-rooms in the monasteries of Rome and Bologna, in which there is always an image or portrait of our blessed Lady. The world and all its miserable interests, all its fears and commotions, its rumors, and its policies, seem excluded ; here youth was placed beyond the hearing of the horrors of political debate ; while cities are in a ferment, and chambers of assembly resound to the sanguine declamation of inflammatory orators, the meek and cheerful scholar consorts with his Virgil or his Thomas à Kempis, and enjoys bright and saintly visions. If the rumor of discord should penetrate to their quiet halls, the young will still never put on the visage of the times, and be, like them, to gentle spirits troublesome. Better they would esteem it to be at once compromised, like the children of Mycale, who fell under the murderous sword of Thracians, though that was an event which of all others in the Peloponnesian war, Thucydides thought the most worthy of being lamented and compassionated.‡ When the English college at Donai was invaded by the agents of the revolution, by spies and guards, it might have been presupposed that no one could then venture to retain his cheerfulness, οὐδὲ μάλ' ἥβων. But there was only occasion given to show, as a venerable priest observes, “ what college boys can do in the way of generous self-devotion and dauntless enterprise ; for every one then was intent upon devising and practising some ingenious plan to rescue various articles of value from the grasp of the plunderers. To carry off a lamp or a sacred vestment some would ascend the funnels of chimneys, and others would descend the external walls by ropes to enter windows of forbidden rooms. Strange as it may appear," continues the narrator, "never do I remember a more cheerful flow of spirits than what was manifested during the whole time. We sang God save the King and Dulce Domum. Such a behavior astonished every one, friends and enemies wondered alike how we could sing in such circumstances, and sometimes heaved a sigh of concern to tell us we did not know what we had still to expect. Our classical and devotional exercises went on as usual, and continued till the 9th of August, when the message came on Saturday night, which ordered us to leave the college for a prison. The clock had struck eight, and we were waiting for the summons to night prayers. We were soon ready, for we had little to carry away. Some went to take their last farewell of the church, by a short prayer before the altars, which, alas ! were soon to be no more." Thus closed the oldest seminary of English Catholics, the mother and nurse of so many martyrs, the bulwark of faith, as Baronius calls it, created by God to protect the Catholics of this land against the blasts of heresy. It was overthrown by French atheists in the frenzy of revolutionary zeal ; but it was reserved for the statesmen in our age of that people which of all the world boasts to be the most generous, in the cool deliberation of their cabinet, under the cloak of a zeal for God's unpolluted worship, by a judicial sentence, pronounced in all the solemn forms of equity, to legalize and consummate its ruin.

* Instit. Orat. Lib. II. 2.

† Pro A. Cluentio.

‡ Lib. VII. 29.

It will now be necessary to retrace our steps in order to allude to the rise of the universities, which was preparing a new æra in scholastic history, and there were circumstances attendant on this transition which must be noticed. Nothing is more certain than that the purest and noblest motives, and the most enlarged charity, gave birth to these great institutions. At all times it was considered a meritorious application of alms to support poor scholars in the academies of learning, and to contribute to their education. Origen from the age of eighteen exercised himself in the work of instruction, and refused every present that his friends offered him, although he was obliged to sell his books of grammar for four obols, which a man promised to pay him per day for his nourishment.

In the tenth century, we read that Wolfgang, afterwards Bishop of Ratisbon, would receive no honors or emoluments from his intimate friend, Otho of Treves, but at length he yielded so far, that scholastic boys and youths should be committed to his care without any remuneration ; this was before he had retired to the monastery of Einsiedeln, whence he was raised to the see of Ratisbon. The same charitable zeal for the education of youth distinguished the Belgian prelates, of one of whom it has been said, such was his solicitude in educating boys, and in instituting scholastic discipline, that even when he went on a journey, whether long or short, he led his young scholars with him, for whom we had also a preceptor and a quantity of books, with the other utensils of scholars.* In the will of Charles de Balzac, Bishop of Noyon, it was ordained that Montlhery, and three other places, should each furnish a boy to be presented by the curate to the Celestines of Marcoucis, from whom he was to receive, during three years, the sum of one hundred livres, to enable him to study at college, while the same sum was to be paid, as a marriage portion, to a maiden of each place.† In many places, as at Rome, education was wholly gratuitous. The Archduke Leopold of Austria, besides repairing deserted or ruined churches, and enriching many episcopal sees, founded for the augmentation of the Catholic faith, numerous classes for young scholars; he established colleges and seminaries, building them in a style of magnificence, and giving the government of them to learned monks. François de la Béraudiere, Bishop of Périgueux, founded a seminary in that city, and placed a versified inscription upon it, stating, that in quitting the world he left to posterity his book, his church rebuilt, second to no other, and a seminary founded at his expense for the nourishment of poor scholars. "May gracious heaven grant," it added, "that posterity may receive great utility, and may God vouchsafe pardon for my past sins."‡ Sometimes these poor scholars were supported by casual charities. In the year 1246, there was established at Rheims the scholastic society of the Good Children, which imposed a rigorous rule of religion, having obtained it from Archbishop Ivelle. These poor scholars were directed occasionally to go out two by two to beg alms for the community.§ Sometimes they were indebted for their education to the charity of individuals. Monteil speaks of a note by Pierre Pispier, a monk of the Augustinian monastery of Tours, respecting an alms of fifty sols tournoys, which the king had given him to support him during his studies in the university of Angiers.|| Pope St. Urban V. supported more than a thousand scholars at different academies, and supplied them with books.

Unquestionably, the zeal for learning was fervent at the time when the universities arose: yet it would be a great mistake to imagine that they owed their origin to a mere human ambition for promoting science and literature. It was simply faith and charity which originally led to their foundation; for the will and power of kings would not have sufficed to establish them if religion had not inflamed many of their subjects with a desire to impart to the poor the inestimable advantages of sacred learning. The colleges of the university of Paris were founded by devout persons for poor scholars. That of Navarre was founded by Jeanne de Navarre, wife of Philippe-le-Bel, in the year 1304. This was for seventy poor scholars, twenty children students in grammar, thirty students in logic and philosophy, and twenty in theology. The grammarians were to receive four sols per week, the philosophers six, and the theologians eight. The college of Thirty-three, on the mountain of St. Geneviève, was founded by a poor priest for poor students of theology, to the number indicated in the name, corresponding with the years of our Saviour's life. The college of Boncourt was founded in 1357, for eight poor students, who were to have each four sols per week; the celebrated Scotch college, founded in 1223, by David, Bishop of Murray, in Scotland, was also for poor Scotch students. Mary Stuart made them legacies at her death.* The college of Cornouaille, in Paris, was founded in 1317, by a clerk of Brittany, for poor scholars of the diocese of Cornouaille. The college of the Lombards was founded in 1333, for Italian scholars who should not have more than twenty livres of rent: it was called the House of Poor Italian Scholars of the charity of the Blessed Mary. The college of Montaignu was founded in 1314 for eighty-four poor scholars, in honor of the twelve apostles and the seventy-two disciples. The Sorbonne itself, according to the plan of Robert de Sorbonne, was for the poor: it was a community of poor masters, "pauperes magistri," who were to give lessons gratis. The college of Boissi was for scholars who resembled its humble founder, Etienne Vidé who declared that they must be poor and of low origin, "qui non sint nobiles, sed de humili plebe, et pauperes, sicut nos et prædecessores nostri fuimus." The college of Harcour was founded in 1280, by Raoul de Harcour, a canon of Paris, of an illustrious house of Normandy, for poor scholars of that province.

* Mabillon, Præfat. in V. Sæcul. Benedict. 3.

† Lebenf, Hist. du Diocese de Paris, X. 184.

‡ Gouget, XVI. 13. § Anquetil, Hist. de Rheims, Liv. III. || Hist. des Français. IV. 412.

The same spirit gave rise to all the similar foundations in England, Spain, Germany, and Italy. At Pavia there are gratuitous colleges of a magnificent order, founded and still supported by noble families, the Caccian and Borromeon, the last of which supports thirty-two students. Some colleges were appropriated to particular nations or orders. Such were at Bologna the magnificent college for Spaniards and that of the Belgians, founded by a silversmith of Brussels for youths of that city, who were to be chosen there by the company of silversmiths. But generally, poverty alone had privileges in these places of learning; and if the rich did repair to them, they were admitted only on condition of conforming to the discipline of the poor. In the university of Pisa the scholars were obliged to be dressed in a kind of uniform of a given color. The cloth was of inferior quality and of a low price, and even the greatest and wealthiest signor, who was inscribed on the roll of scholars, was forbidden to put on a more noble cloth.† In some colleges at Paris the students could only expend one sous per day for their nourishment. The offices each day were terminated with prayer for the souls of the charitable founders.‡ Not even a state of utter destitution excluded youth from the advantages of a university education. The class of Spanish students who live upon the alms dispensed at the gates of convents, who have no other property than their class-book and their gown, and some of them no other lodging

* De St. Victor, Tableau de Paris, Tom. III. 603. † Statuta Studii Pisani et Flor. ann. 1479.

‡ Monteil, Tom. IV

but the peristyle of some church, may be seen at the present day regularly attending the classes, receiving degrees, and not unfrequently carrying off academical and ecclesiastical honors by their sheer merit, without having any other recommendation. At the end of the annual course they quit the town, and wander about all the summer in bands of four or six, provided with guitars, singing student songs, and begging alms. Many students, who belong to rich and noble families, consider it a refinement of gentility to join these bands, whose manners have created a certain simple and romantic character, that is now almost peculiar to the Spanish student.

In consequence of the advantages afforded to learning in the universities, it became a desirable object for the monks, who inhabited the provinces, to have houses there for the reception of a certain number of their students, who might still dwell in cloisters, so as not to acquire the spirit of the world,* and accordingly other colleges were built for that purpose. So early as in the eighth century the monasteries of Clairvaux and Villemoustiers, and others, had houses for students in Paris,† but in the thirteenth century the custom became general. The college of Cluni, in Paris, was for students, of that order, who should be sent to Paris to pursue their studies. It was founded in the year 1269. In the time of our Henry IV. the monks of Crowland speak of their scholars studying at Cambridge.‡ John Wysbech, abbot of Crowland, in Edward IV's time, built chambers in the college of the monks of Buckingham at Cambridge, for the use of the scholars of Crowland who might be sent there to prosecute their studies.§ The Benedictines of Canterbury, Durham, and Gloucester, had separate colleges under those names for their youth at Oxford. Each convent in Paris had scholars from convents of its order in the distant provinces, and even from those in England and Germany. There was a college there for the students of the abbey of St. Denis.|| And this was the case at all the other universities of Europe. The provincial Council of Cologne in the year 1536, recommended that some of the junior monks of each monastery should be sent to Catholic universities. Nevertheless, there were evils attending this arrangement which made devout men in those ages lament the preference given to the system of universities over that of the ancient monastic schools, and some will be of opinion, that the experience of centuries has only confirmed the justice of their apprehensions.¶

We shall see in another place that the abbots were alarmed at sending their students to inhabit cities, and that the young men were themselves unwilling to go. The congregation of the Scholar's Valley arose in the year 1201. Four professors of the university of Paris, preferring solitude to the world, and the life of contemplation to the glory of the schools, retired into a desert valley of Champagne, in

* Mabillon de Stud. Monast. XII.

† Hist. Monasterii Villariensis, I. cap. 8, apud Marten. Thesaur. Anecd. Tom. III.

‡ Hist. Croylandensis, Rer. Anglic. Scriptor. Tom. I. § Id. 560.

|| Lebeuf, Hist. du Diocese de Paris, III. ¶ Joan. Devoti Instit. Canonic. Lib. II. tit. 11.

the diocese of Langres, where the bishop allowed them to build cells. Some young scholars of the university followed them to this solitude, and this re-union of young disciples constituted the congregation or order of the Vale of Scholars.* The most exact discipline was indeed maintained in the monastic colleges in the universities. The rules for the students of Cluni, when pursuing their studies at Paris, were very strict: they were never to go into the city excepting with leave of the superior, and attended by masters. The utmost sanctity was to reign in the college.† But still, amidst such a multitude of scholars from all nations, it was impossible to obviate every evil. St. Augustin removed from Carthage to Rome in consequence of the boisterous manners of the students in the former school. "The chief cause of my going to Rome," he says, "was my hearing that young men studied there more quietly, and that they were kept in order by a better discipline: that they might not break insolently into the school of a master whom they did not follow. At Carthage, the license of the scholars is odious and intemperate: they burst in furiously, and commit so many injuries with wonderful stupidity; for which laws should punish them unless custom were a patron. They think they do all this with impunity, when in fact they are punished by that very blindness, and suffer incomparably worse things than they inflict upon others. So I resolved to remove where such manners were not to prevail."‡ Jacobus Vitriacus, in his Historia Occidentale, gives a dark, but no doubt exaggerated picture, of the disputes and jealousies among the scholars of different nations in the university of Paris. The French were styled proud and effeminate, the Teutonic nations furious, the English were taxed with being drinkers: though it is to be remarked, that Fuller speaks of drinking and swearing among the lower classes as having begun to grow frequent in his own time, subsequent to the pseudo-reformation,§ when Milton, fallen on evil days, had to beseech his Muse to drive far off the barbarous dissonance of Bacchus and his revellers;|| to which epoch also must be traced the testimony of Poggio, where, in a letter to Nicholas Niccoli, he says, that the English were more occupied with eating and drinking than with letters. The Normans were styled vain-glorious, the Burgundians senseless and gross, the Britons light and inconstant, to whom the death of Arthur used frequently to be objected, the Lombards were said to be avaricious, the Romans seditious, the Sicilians cruel and tyrannic, the Flenings prodigal and gluttonous. One can detect, however, in this the fertile invention of a satirist, magnifying the peculiarity of national character; neither is it fair to confound the scholars who were receiving their education at the university, with those external pensioners who used to be called Martinets, because not belonging to any college, they flew like swallows from one to another, and staid only at that which suited them the best. After all, though the innocence of monastic students might fear the

* De St. Victor, Tableau de Paris, II. 1214.

† Henrici I. Abb. Clun. 29, Statuta Bibliothec. Cluniac.

‡ Confess. Lib. V.

§ Fuller's Thoughts, 53.

|| VII.

dissipation of a university, it is probable that the influence of the general manners which they beheld there would be felt in later ages as the inspirations of a better world. The zeal for learning, which imparted somewhat of a wandering and Homeric character to the life of scholars as well as professors, was not unaccompanied with a tender piety. Andrien du Hequet speaks of his studies at Paris, at Cologne, and at Louvaine, in these terms,— “Lettres j'apprins (car homme indocte est vain)

En toi Paris, en Coulogne et Louvain,
Où le tout soit à la gloire de Christ.
Le cueur, le corps, toute l'ame et l'esprit.”*

These studies were associated with many sweet recollections of a friendship that was almost angelical; where names were not even mutually known, but only countenances, and what was common between all, the love of learning and the reverence for holy Church; for these friends saw each other only in the schools and before the divine altars. In some places, indeed, a less secluded discipline was established in union with certain forms of a poetic life, as in the universities of Spain, where the students are allowed to go into society, or to perform a serenade, to as late an hour as nine in the evening on Sundays and the fifth feria, but at other times a student is not allowed to appear in public with his guitar, although it is an instrument almost inseparable from him. The scholars in the colleges of Paris used to visit Gentilly and two other villages in their customary walks, which used to be called Ire ad Campos.† The leave to play or for the promenade, were themes which the old poets of France did not disdain to choose. One of our ancient writers says, “Before this time there was an old custome for the scholars of London to meet at the priory of St. Bartholomew, to dispute in logic and grammar, upon a bank under a tree.” A joyful festival was that of St. Catharine to the students of Padua; it was denominated the Feast of Hope. Sometimes the mirth of public rejoicings was allowed to penetrate within universities. A contemporary writer relates that, during those which took place after the battle of Bouvines, in the reign of Philip-Augustus, the scholars of the university of Paris, not content with the joy of one day, protracted their triumph during seven days, dancing and singing continually. Aristotle was silent all that time; Plato proposed no questions; all books were laid aside; but the κῶμος, which Pindar condescends to notice as the contumacious diversion of boys, throwing all things into confusion, was not required for their enjoyment; neither did their discipline permit the rougher exercises of boxing and the paneration to form athletic champions, which were both prohibited by the Spartan discipline; and yet Aristotle says, that even that tended to make youth too brutal, θηριώδεις.‡ Tiberius, to render his son Drusus odious for the character of cruelty, permitted him to be present at the combat of gladia-

* Gouget, Biblioth. Française, Tom. XII.

† Lebeuf, X. 13.

‡ Polit. VIII. 3.

tors.* In reading Mabillon's account of the foundation of the Benedictine public schools in Germany, we might imagine that it was a passage from the writings of Plato, to explain the ideal end of a perfect education ; for he says that these schools were instituted, in which an uncultivated and savage race by degrees might be taught to lay aside their hard rough manners, and being exercised in a mild and holy discipline, might be rendered gentle and humane.†

The innocent and simple recreations of a country life belonged to students even while attending the monastic schools, where they would have felt less fear than Ulysses at the prospect of spending a night upon a lake or river, lest they should suffer from the cold air which springs up before the dawn.‡ For swimming there was even provision made where rivers were not near. With the ancients, baths for swimming were provided with porticoes, gardens, libraries, and places where philosophers might discourse and poets recite their verses. Agrippa was the first to establish one of these baths at Rome. Here were places for all exercises of the body and amusement of the mind. The famous Ulpian Library was in the baths of Diocletian. In the middle ages the predominance of the swimmer's sport may be learned from those paintings in the palace of Tau at Mantua, which represent the diversions of the different seasons. Places for swimming were provided by Charlemagne in the neighborhood of his schools, and we discover frequently in the monastic chronicles allusion to the healthful and manly recreations which were permitted to their scholars. But whatever license in this respect might prevail in universities, learning continued to be grave, and solid, and religious, and had not then yielded place to the modern philosophic system of education, in which students are chiefly employed in constant little manipulations, and are taught, like the boy in Goetz Von Berlichingen, not to know their own father from their learning, or rather, as Bonald says, because they pin butterflies, glue plants, or arrange little morsels of mineral substances: natural philosophy was not an essential part of studies, but the primary and indispensable object was to train the young to love what ought to be loved, and to hate what ought to be hated, and according to Plato, that is the true end of all education.§

The studies of seculars in the courts of nobility were such as were useful as well as interesting to youth ; for the scholastic doctors do not seem to have been in ignorance of what was the proper learning for noblemen. The book of instruction entitled L'Esperon de Discipline, by Antoine du Saix, which was composed for Charles, Duke of Savoy, contains a view of all virtues and vices, and an abridgment of all branches of knowledge, and of every thing that belongs to the education of youth, both relating to the mind and body. The Abbé Gouget admits that the author shows a profound knowledge of human nature, and that his idea of education was admirable.|| For the clergy and for the priests of letters, the universities

* Tacit. Ann. I.

† Præfat. in III. Sæcul. Benedict. § 4.

‡ Od. V. 469.

§ De Legibus, Liv. II.

|| Tom. XI. 376.

provided, no doubt, higher studies. The chairs of theology, founded in the Sorbonne, were seven in number, consisting of that of reader, that of contemplative theology, that of positive theology, that of the interpretation of the holy Scriptures, that of casuistry, that of controversial divinity, and the seventh was consecrated to the interpretation of the Hebrew text of Scripture. Who can doubt but that in these schools Raphael would have found subjects more adapted to his genius than that which was furnished to him by the school of Athens, which he revived in his immortal painting on the walls of the Vatican, when one observes the success which crowned his sublime enterprise to represent the dispute on the mystery of the blessed sacrament? And remark too what a contrast would be found if one were to assist with the eyes of an artist or of a poet at the polemical discussions which have succeeded in some places to the scholastic disputations of the ages of faith! But give the reins to imagination, and try to conceive a scene of the highest intellectual and even poetic interest: your mind's creation will fall short of the reality which Catholic schools have witnessed! In the year 1304, a crowd of clerks, monks, and laymen, were assembled in the great hall of the university of Paris to hear a thesis which was to be sustained de quolibet. There were fourteen scholastic champions, and it was a young stranger of lofty and thoughtful countenance who was to sustain their attack. This stranger was Dante, who, being then in exile, had travelled into France for his instruction.

“Theologus Dantes, nullius dogmatis expertus,” was the verse first inscribed at Ravenna upon his tomb.

But it is time to break off, though one would stand charmed and for ever unwearied in the holy and peaceful retreats of Catholic learning. Let us still speak of them as we move away. Pliny, in setting forth the praise of Isacus the rhetorician, contrasts the school with the forum, and says he has passed his sixtieth year, and still he is only a scholastic,—than which kind of men there is nothing simpler, or purer, or better. The forum inspires the best men with some degree of malice: the school being concerned with fictitious causes, is a peaceful and innocent thing, neither is it less happy, especially to old men; for what can be happier in old age than that which is most sweet in youth? * “Nam quid in senectute felicius quam quod dulcissimum est in juventa?” The Catholic schools provided that safety for the philosophic nature which was sought for with such anxiety by Plato, though he seems to have considered its attainment as impracticable. “Where can we find safety for it?” he asks, “and where are there means existing to enable it to arrive at its end? We have seen that to such a nature belong, of necessity, the talent of learning with ease, and memory, and courage, and magnanimity: therefore, from early youth, such a person will be first among all πρῶτος ἔσται ἐν ἅπασιν, especially if he should have, in addition, a body corresponding to these dispositions of soul : therefore I think that his relations and fellow-citizens will desire to have him in their interests when he grows up ; they will consequently fawn upon him and give him many salutations, flattering his future power. Living, then, surrounded by them, what will such a man do ? particularly if he be a native of a great city, and rich, and noble of race, and besides, handsome and tall ? Will he not be filled with a hope which nothing can subdue, thinking himself competent to conduct the affairs of both Greeks and Barbarians ? Will he not adopt a high pompous manner, full of specious and dramatic action, being swollen with vain and senseless pride ?”*

* Epist. Lib. II. 3.

Now in these Catholic schools, which we may leave with regret, that philosophic nature was sanctified and preserved ; there were no flatterers, and no temptations opposed to the manners of an innocent angelic life : there was not the knowledge of evil. The cares of the worldly race were so excluded, that it became scholars’ fashion to take no trouble about the things of life, as if all necessities would wait upon us at the instant we want them. Pride was kept down, for there were no inquiries there instituted as to nobility of birth or prospects of future power. There was not found the proud disdain or supercilious neglect of those, who with themselves at war, forgot the shows of love to other men. Courtesy to strangers was expressly required as a criterion of proficiency. The meek were there the favorites, and the wisest and the greatest were the most humble. In a word, every thing estimable and precious was comprised within the school. There were devout exercises, the resources of piety, the delights of music, the solemn choir, the poetry of the groves and streams, the communications of study, the exhilaration of play, the sanctifying influence of example, the sweets of friendship, of which the poet is obliged to return here for the purest example.—

——— “O ! and is all forgot ?

All school-days’ friendship, childhood, innocence ?”

A brief review of the character of friendship during the ages of faith, will form the conclusion of this third Book.

* Plat. de Repub. Liv. VI.

CHAPTER VII.

RIENDSHIP, that sweet engaging word, which awakens so many pure affections, so many grateful recollections, that word so familiar to the tongue of youth, which was shouted in play, and looked in study, and whispered every morning at the altar of God, friendship, that musical, poetic, religious word, to exhilarate the joyful, to encourage the diligent, to console the wretched, is associated most intimately with the manners of the ages of faith, with the days of scholastic education, and with every conception that we can form of the present and eternal beatitude of the meek. It is not possible, says an ancient sage, either that a wicked man should be a friend to a wicked man, or that a good man should not be a friend to a good man :* profound and piercing words that may lead many to meditate on the vanity of their own hopes, and not a few perchance to see evidence that their own piety, notwithstanding the zeal which seems to animate them for God's honor, is hypocritical and false. Cardan inserts it among his maxims of civil prudence that there can be no such thing as friendship, excepting between the wise, who may be called philosophers.† Understanding, he says, that our religion is the only true philosophy, for that not even conformity of studies, of literary or scientific principles can yield it, is shown by Aristotle, who observes, that the common bonds which give rise to friendship, do not consist in thinking alike with respect to the heavenly bodies, for there is no ground of love in unanimity on such matters ; but that it must be of a more general description, and therefore goodness is requisite, for it is not possible, he adds, that evil men should think alike excepting within very confined limits.‡ Friendship is clearly a treasure unattainable to the proud, who can endure nothing that is contrary to their own caprice and customs, unattainable to scorers, who despise the things which are excellent, because the good will fly from such men, unattainable to the vain and dissipated, who can only receive words for words, tokens of an acquaintance, which is itself an unhappiness, unattainable to all men whose manners are not formed to meekness, unless, indeed, we dignify with the name of friendship such a passion as that of the barbarous Huns, who are described as so capricious and choleric, that they would separate from their companions without any cause of anger, and return to them without any reason for reconciliation in one and the same day : for the refinement of more

* Plato, Phædrus.

† Prudent. Civ. cap. VI.

: Ethic. Lib IX 3.

civilized society cannot of itself present any higher claims to it, since that only tends to destroy the simplicity and truth which the ancients, as John of Salisbury remarks,* deemed so essential to friendship, that they used always to represent the Graces naked. That only tends to make men hold their friends as Plautus says, enclosed within their teeth, having not confidence enough even to pronounce their name;† that only tends to make them suspect each other, though they speak together as if friends; through its influence they are taught to receive the words of those who perhaps truly love them, as those of an enemy, and are thus deceived by their own dread of deception. What is this, cries St. Odo in his collations, but the wretchedness of human life?‡ The truth is, and to express it in the words of St. Augustin, men can never love one another with true love unless they love God. But he who loves God will love his neighbor as himself.§ Hence the friendship of the meek is immutable. “I have read in your letters,” says Petrus Cellensis writing to Bernardo, “that you have lost old friends without having found new. But true friendship in virgin purity and constancy of fervor, can never be adulterated or cooled. It never dies, but with a daily renovation, like the sun is always in vigor. Therefore if you ever had friends you have them still, not old, which denoted what was imperfect, but renewed which is the work of God.”||

The Catholic religion in many ways conduced to the formation as well as to the solidity of friendship; the multiplication of those innocent and useful relations which sweeten and adorn the life of men followed of necessity from that principle of association which we have seen emanated from the church, and gave a new form to society. In all common pursuits ἐν ἀπάσῃ κοινωνίᾳ, there is friendship, says Aristotle. In all companionship there is love. In sailing together, or laboring together, or reading together, and similarly in all other common sufferings or performing, in proportion as their is fellowship their is friendship.¶ Now we have already seen how the Catholic religion extended these common bonds, and associated men together in a thousand forms of connection, who otherwise would have been isolated and separate, and therefore it furnished a soil most favorable to this sweetest flower of friendship. Another way in which the religion of the meek promoted its growth, consisted in its removing the artificial barriers into which pride divides the world. “By the law of friendship,” says the blessed Ælred, abbot of Rievaulx, “the superior is on a level with the inferior, for it frequently happens that some of an inferior rank, or order, or science, are taken into friendship by others of more pre-eminence, who must then despise and esteem as nothing all the things which are not of nature; they must have constant regard to the beauty of friendship, which is not adorned by silks or gems, nor dilated by possessions, nor flattered by delights, nor exalted by honors and dignities; and thus recurring

* De Nugis Curial. III. 7.

† S. Odonis Collation. Lib. I. Bibliothec. Cluniac.

|| Petri Abb. Cellensis Epist. Lib. IX. 2.

† Plautus Trinummus IV. 2.

§ Tractat. 87 in Joan.

¶ Ethic. Lib. VIII. c. 9.

to the principle of its origin, they must acutely attend to the equality which nature gave, and not to the appendages which cupidity has superinduced. Therefore, in friendship which is the best gift both of nature and of grace, the sublime descend, the humble ascend, the rich want, the poor are enriched, so that each communicating his condition to the other, the equality spoken of is maintained.* Friendship belonged to the meek because they were weaned from the love of riches, for as Ariosto sings,

In poor abode, mid paltry walls and bare,
Amid discomforts and calamities,
Often in friendship, hearts united are,
Better than under roof of lordly guise,
Or in some royal court, beset with snare,
Mid envious wealth, and ease, and luxuries ;
Where charity is spent on every side,
Nor friendship unless counterfeit is spied.†

Besides this, meekness of itself fitted men for friendship. Cardan says, that the conversation of any common unlearned person from among the people, is more agreeable than that of a sophistical and learned man, because there is nothing so offensive as the pride and affectation of the wisdom of the world; but as the Catholic religion extirpated the roots of pedantry and arrogance, and made men, however learned or accomplished, speak and comport themselves like others, according to the natural sweetness of humanity, which is recognized equally in all classes, it made them also estimable and entitled to be the objects of friendship. In fact, as the Greek poet says of generosity, the Catholic religion made men young again.‡ Catholic conversation is cheerful and popular, as it were youthful; that of the modern schools is gloomy, suspicious, pedantic, and senile. In the latter, we find a false and pretentious urbanity, refined and pompous, but ill concealing insensibility and egotism; in the former a simplicity which perhaps at first offends, but by degrees, a disposition also along with it of a subdued and smiling tone, which soothes, charms, and ravishes by its goodness. And sooth we shall the more appreciate this privilege of meekness conducing to friendship by considering what is the wretchedness of those who forfeit it; for those learned men who otherwise have the least chance of securing a friend, are precisely those to whom friendship is most necessary. Cicero remarks this in speaking of Dionysius, for he says, "What a misery must it have been to such a man to want friends and familiar conversation, one who like him was learned from a boy and skilled in ingenuous arts.§" Moreover, by inducing habits of meditation and retirement and a temper of mind essentially opposed to the spirit of Thersites, a temper devout and joyous, though softened and subdued like the bright tints in a landscape by a cer-

* De Spirit. Amicitia, Lib. III.

† Eurip. Heraclid. 698.

‡ Canto XLIV. Rose's transl.

§ Tuscul. V. 22.

tain tone of sweet melancholy, that religion assisted and regulated the development of those qualities which men of acute philosophic observation like Cardan have found to be conducive to friendship ; for he says, that in choosing friends, those persons ought to be selected who are by nature constant and melancholy, and who are not easily withdrawn from affections, whom we find from boyhood to have been always content with one or two companions, with whom they assiduously conversed.*

He might have added too, that men who reject mysteries are not made for friendship, which Hesiod shows in saying that night was its mother. Nor is this all, for who does not perceive how greatly friendship was promoted and secured when religion taught the meek, as the blessed Francis said, to love their brother when they are far from him in the same manner as when they are with him, and never to say any thing in his absence which they could not say with charity to his face? † When it taught them to place in their daily memento those friends who had departed to the other world, that by prayers of faith their bliss might be advanced, or to draw consolation from that conviction of their felicity at which the remembrance of their manners enabled them to arrive? Where the principles of the Catholic religion did not exist, the most acute and reflecting men in surveying the disorders which sin and death have entailed upon humanity, have been obliged to speak of friendship in terms that are calculated to wound and shock the heart which feels that it is formed for the sweets of infinite and eternal love. They speak of it as a dangerous thing to which reason must place limits lest it should prove a source of bitterness when the hour of separation arrives, and they even teach that the heart must never venture to trust itself to perfect friendship. "Length of years hath taught me many things," says the poet, "for mortals should cherish only a moderate friendship for one another, and not an affection from the deepest marrow of the soul:

καὶ μὴ πρὸς ἄκρον μυελὸν ψυχᾶς.

but only a love which can be easily loosened without tearing and overpowering the soul with affliction, for an extreme friendship is too great a weight; and nothing is good when it exceeds the bounds of moderation." ‡ What a contrast was here to the sentiments of the meek who love their friends in God ; who by the mystic privileges accorded from the Mount are enabled to inherit friendship, that sweetest plant of earth, if it be not rather of heaven in all its strength and perfection, in all its beauteous and everlasting bloom ! How strange sound to them the words separation and dissevering of the soul as connected with the death of friends ! What mortal ever loved with more profound and intense affection than the tender Augustin, and yet he commits his sainted mother to the grave, that mother who had wept so many years for him, who was doubly his mother, having brought him forth both to the world and to heaven, reconciling him to Jesus Christ, and he feels that in regard to her he has henceforth only a higher duty to fulfil. A prudent companion is in no respect as Homer says inferior to a brother.* Such a friend did he see quietly inurned, not with the sentiments of uninstructed humanity giving vent to sorrow in the bitter cry of desolation, but with those of the renovated race in the sweet ecstasy of quiet thought meditating on everlasting gladness. "Nebrides is living in the bosom of Abraham. Yes, whatever may be intended by that bosom of Abraham, Nebrides, my dear friend is there; for where else could be a soul so beautiful and so Christian? He is in that place of glory and repose about which he has so often questioned me. His ear is no longer attached to my lips, but his lips are attached to that source of living water which is nothing else but thee, O my God ! ibi Nebridius meus vivit, et bibit quantum potest sapientiam pro aviditate suâ sine fine felix." What an extension of the sweets of friendship followed from the assurance that there is communion between the living and the dead, that there were those who already arrived at expiatory or even at supremely blessed shore might be addressing us in such words as Dante heard from the spirit of Casella.

* Prudent, Civilis, cap. xlii. † S. Francisci Opuscul. De la Bigne Bibliothec. Patrum IV.
‡ Eurip. Hippolyt. 253.

———Thee as in my mortal frame
I lov'd, so loos'd from it I love thee still.†

William of Malmesbury relates a wondrous example which would have greatly moved the stoics of the manifestation of this ghostly friendship made after the death of the body. Robert of Lotharingia, he says, was the intimate friend of the most holy Wlstan, Bishop of Worcester. It happened that when Wlstan was sick at Worcester, and near his blessed end, Robert was at court employed about the king's affairs, when lo ! Wlstan appeared to him in a vision saying, "If you wish to behold me alive hasten to Worcester." Moved by this vision, Robert obtained leave from the king to depart immediately, and he never rested night or day, till he reached that city; for he feared greatly lest he should not arrive in time to find him alive, for the journey was very long. However, on arriving at the last stage, he was overcome with sleep, and Wlstan appeared to him again, saying, "You have done all that pious love demanded, but you are disappointed in your hopes, for I have departed. But dear companion, provide for your own safety, because you will not remain long after me; and to convince you that you are not deceived by a fantastic vision, this shall be a sign to you. To-morrow after you have committed my body to the earth, a gift will be presented to you in my name." Robert awoke and proceeded on his way. On arriving at Worcester, he found the procession already marshalled to escort the saint's body to the tomb ; he joined it, and then condoled with the monks of whose funeral meats he partook

* Od. VIII. 585.

† Purg. II.

in silence. Already mounted on his horse, he was taking leave of the holy brethren, when lo! the prior stepped forward from the throng, and kneeling down reverently presented him a gift, saying, "My lord, accept I pray you this cap of your ancient friend made of lambskin, which he was accustomed to wear when he rode on horseback, and it will bear witness to your long friendship with our holy lord." Hearing these words and recognizing the gift, the other turned pale, and a cold shuddering ran through his bones; he dismounted and waved to his attendants in sign that he suspended his departure: demanding an audience of the monks, they assembled with looks of consternation and amaze in the chapter-house, where with tears he related the circumstances of his vision, and then having commended himself heartily to the prayers of all their society, he resumed his state and departed. It was in the middle of January when Wlstan died, and Robert did not survive the succeeding June.* Of the friendship which was found to prevail during the middle ages, even in the scenes of secular dissipation, history and also the fables of chivalry, which are true representations of real manners, furnish many engaging and memorable examples. Witness the deliverance of Bou-teiller and Dufresnoy, from the hands of Louis of Spain, by Sir Walter Mauny and his troop of heroic companions, one of the most noble and affecting adventures of which friendship, honor, and chivalry can boast.

The old writer of the life of Bayart says, that the Duke of Nemours had so won the hearts of his companions, that they would all have died for him; and he bears the same testimony to the Seigneur de Molart, of whom he says, "tous ses gens se feussent faits mourir pour luy," and of Bayart himself, he affirms that while lieutenant of the king in Dauphiny, he so gained the affections of both nobles and peasants, that they would all have died for him. Indeed, the annals of the middle ages abound with portraits of the purest and noblest friendship, and even the φιλία of the Greeks, invested too with an interest that the muse of Euripides had never conceived, was a character familiar to them. The friendship of Basanio and Anthonio, which in our age would be deemed unreasonable, and opposed to the degrees of domestic philosophy, was drawn by Shakespeare from the life as seen in the middle ages. We have been so imbued in other works with illustrations of this theme, that I shall be content at present with offering the instance of the friendship which is ascribed in the history of Gyron le Courtoys to Hector le Brun and Abdalon le Beau, of whom we read, "en telle maniere lung ayma lautre par telle guise et par telle amour comme se ils eussent este freres charnels. Ne oncques puis pour advanture quilz trouvassent discorde ne peut venir entre deux, ne lung neut envie de l'autre en nulle maniere. Oncques ne se departerent lung de lautre, mais tousjours chevaucherent ensemble en se entre aymant. De si grant amour que lung ne pavoit vivre sans lautre."† The confidence which men reposed in their friends is nobly expressed in the same history, where Gyron replies through the iron bars of his prison to one who spoke of his calamity. "My friends will hear of my adventure. Il ny a en ceste part montaigne qui puisse tenir mes amys quilz ne viennent jusques a moy par fine force."* The literature which corresponds with these compositions, and which has superseded them in the courts of nobility, may pretend to greater refinement of language, and claim a place in a more philosophic order of study, but assuredly it does not furnish examples in equal abundance of the same virtue to exalt and adorn the human character : but I hasten to consider the friendship which belonged more especially to the meek during these ages, and which is sought for, not so much in fables of chivalry, though they are not without some sweet remembrance of it, as in saintly histories, and in the sentiments which have been delivered by the wise and holy.

* Will. Malmesbur. de gestis Pontif Anglorum. Lib. IV. † Gyron le Courtois, f. XXXVL.

Doubtless if with clear view the intellect be fixed upon the ordinary proofs of friendship comprised within the world's annals, there will be ground rather for sadness than for joy, for it cannot be deceived by hearing the Capulets and Montagues speak of friendship when it must witness also their rivalries and wrath. "Whoever hates one man cannot love another truly and spiritually, nor yet himself, nor God, since he is in mortal sin," as Denis the Carthusian says.† All was false and worthless that wore the semblance of love in men that to Christ's school were dead ; but after rejecting every suspicious claim we are not left unprovided with bright examples that are proof against the test possessed by saints. Celebrated was the friendship of St. Paul and St. Thecla, of St. Ambrose and St. Monica, of St. Jerome and Paulina, Eustochia, Blesile and Ruffina, of Saints Marcella, Albina, Asele, and Leta, of St. Francis of Assissi and St. Clare and Jacquolina, of St. Anthony of Padua and a devout person of Limoges. At an infinite distance from every thing allied to inhumanity, from all indications of a selfish, contracted, and unfeeling nature, was the self-renouncement and mortification of the saints. They were precisely the most feeling, liberal and generous of men. We find some of them acknowledging that it was for the love of a friend, after God, that they were induced to renounce the world, following him like the champions of St. Bernard to his cloister.‡ Gaudentius had been the playfellow of the young Count of Woycech, his fellow student in the cloistral school of Magdeburg, and when under the name of Adalbert, he retired into the monastery of St. Alexius, on Mount Aventine, that faithful brother alone followed him, though still in the flower of youth. Ever constant to friendship, he left that peaceful retreat when the blessed man directed his steps to preach the Gospel to the heathen people of Prussia, accompanied him through all his dangers, and never left him till he had seen him receive the martyr's crown.§

Passionate fervent souls, quick to conceive hopes of inexpressive joy, would

* Id. f. CCCVI.

† De Arceta Via Sal. VI.

‡ Vita V. Walæ Abb. Corbiens. IV. Lib. I. 467 apud Mabillon Acta S. Ordin. Benedict. Secul. IV. P. I.

§ Voigt. Geschichte Preussens I. B. 4. c.

you near of a friendship suddenly formed, and yet precious as the ruddy drops that warm the feeling heart, lasting as eternity? you will find an instance in the lives of the anchorites of the desert. "Ah, Paul, why hast thou left me cried the holy Anthony. "Why depart without wishing me adieu! Tam tarde notus, tam cito recedis?"* Men of chivalrous honor, who profess to feel such admiration at the spectacle of moral greatness, would you behold constancy of love in death? Friendship was on the tongue of the martyrs in their passion. Then drawing from his finger a ring, he steeped it in his blood, and giving it to Pudens. "Receive it," said he to him, "as a pledge of our friendship, and let the blood which stains it remind you of that which I have shed this day for Jesus Christ."† And in fact, who than sainted fathers of the holy church have ever recognized with greater clearness the value and excellence of friendship? "The consolation of this life consists in possessing a faithful friend who may rejoice with you in prosperity, condole with you in sorrow, and exhort you in persecution." It is St. Ambrose who speaks thus. Who does not know that the express rules of holy societies prescribe companionship, and point out like the ethic page the comparative helplessness and inefficiency of man in an isolated state? Priests and religious persons of different sacred orders were not to go forth alone for Σὺν τε δὴ ἐρχομένῳ men are more powerful both to think and to perform,‡ a maxim which experience and the Homeric wisdom had taught to Diomede.

——— ἄλλ' εἴ τις μοι ἀνὴρ ᾧμ' ἔποιτο καὶ ἄλλος
Μᾶλλον θαλπωρὴ καὶ θαρσάλεωτέρον ἔσται.§

The great Homer has the wisdom and piety to make Agamemnon declare, in reference to Achilles, that a man who is loved by God is equivalent to a multitude of people.|| And religion found nothing in the sentence which was unworthy of the discipline of truth, that recognized a principle most dear to an heroic nature, that friends and companions are from God. Jacob, being asked by his brother concerning those that were with him, replied "Parvuli sunt quos donavit mihi Deus servo tuo."¶

The respect which was shown to friendship, and the earnestness with which its demands were urged, form a characteristic of the ages of faith, from which these latter ages of the world have sadly declined. Cicero says that friendship ought to be preferred to every thing excepting virtue, but many at present seem to esteem it a mark of superior ability and of honorable diligence, nay even of a more manly and philosophic nature to prefer the most trifling object of domestic or professional care to its advances, however earnest, as if, forsooth, it were evidence of wisdom and perfectness of life to be insensible. We find no trace of this severity, which, in truth, however men may talk of philosophic discipline, savors more of the count-

* S. Hieronym. Vita S. Pauli Eremit.

† Acta martyr. in S. Perpetua.

‡ Aristot. Ethic. Lib. VIII. I. § II. X. 222.

|| II. IX. 116. ¶ Gen. XXXIII.

ing-house than of the cloister, in the manners of the middle ages. Their spirit was expressed by Bayart, when he said to his noble hostess at Brescia, "Toute ma vie ay plus aymé beaucoup les gens que les escus."* It seems also as if men were loved more than books, more than the dearest and most familiar pursuits, for humanity was always uppermost in the affections of those who held that only the love of Jesus Christ is durable.† Petrarch, describing his reception in the Carthusian monastery of Montrieu, says in his letter to those holy men, "the activity, the ardor with which you rendered me all sorts of services, the agreeable conversation I had with you in general and in partieuar, made me fear I should interrupt the course of your devout exercises." When St. Adalhard, abbot of Corby, was recalled from exile and restored to honor by the emperor Lewis, who had been persuaded by his enemies to banish him to the island of Heri off the coast of Aquitaine, on the day of his departure all the brethren of the abbey, in which he had spent an angelic life in close confinement for the space of seven years, were moved to tears at losing him, though they could not but rejoice that he was to be restored to his own. Ragnardus, who was afterwards abbot, being of a fervent spirit, was above all overwhelmed with affliction. So that when the holy servant of God was about to depart, and all the brethren were kissing his feet and his footsteps, watering them with their tears and wishing him farewell, he alone remained shut up in his cell, in order that he might not see the man depart who was dearer to him than his own life : but when the other had long inquired for him, he was at length discovered in the obscurity weeping and lamenting : being called to come forth and wish the old man farewell, he entreated the messenger to leave him to weep alone. The holy man, on hearing this, left the ship, on which he was already embarked, and returned, that he might not depart without a kiss from that brother whom he knew was holy. So he found him weeping, and they embraced and then separated. The brethren then accompanied him back to the ship. The sails were soon raised, and as long as she remained visible they stood on the shore looking after him ; for the spirit of love constrained them and they could not resist it.‡

The greatest saints, refreshed with heavenly visions, did not pretend that the being deprived of friends and the being left solitary on earth made no sorrowful impression upon their souls. "What is the reason, my brother," writes St. Hilda to one of her correspondents, "that you have been so long absent, and that you delay to come to me ? Why do you not consider that I am alone in this land, that no other brother visits me ; that not any one of my relations comes to me ? And if you hold back because hitherto I have been prevented from executing what you desired, you ought, on the ground of charity and relationship, to forget this, and without requiring any persuasion to change your mind. O my brother, my

*Chap. LI.

† De Avilla, Epist. Spirit X.

‡ Vita Adalhardi, Mabil. Acta S. Ordinis. Bened. Sæcul. IV. l. § 1.

dear brother, how can you afflict the mind of my littleness with constant sorrow, with weeping and sadness day and night? Do you not know for a certainty, that of all living persons I prefer no one to your love? Behold, I cannot explain all things to you by letters. Now I am assured that you feel no concern about poor and humble me.”* Among the epistles of St. Boniface, there is one addressed to Baldhard, in which is an affecting complaint: “The presents which were brought to me by your faithful messenger Aldræd I have embraced with fervent charity; and now, by God’s assistance, I would fulfil all that you require of me if it might be your pleasure to come to me; for I cannot in any manner stop a fountain of tears when I see and hear of others who are going to their friends. Then I recollect how I was forsaken by my parents in my youth, and how I have remained here alone, and yet I was not forsaken by God, but I return thanks to God for his immense goodness in preserving me. And now, my brother, I ask and implore you to take away sadness from my soul, because this greatly injures me. For I say although it were to be but for the space of one day, and that then you would depart by the will of God, yet that would be sufficient to make this sorrow pass from my mind and this sadness from my heart, but if it should displease you to grant my petition, I call God to witness that it is not I who have forgotten our love.”†

St. Boniface writes many letters in the same spirit, and similar may be found in the correspondence of St. Anselm. Mark how deeply these men felt any omission in exchange of letters. Petrus Cellensis writes as follows, to remonstrate with his friend for not having written to him: “Charity, which is patient, strange to say, only drives me to impatience. How is this? Have you no such things as charts, or is your love shortened? What is the cause of such a long silence? Is there a failing of hearts as well as bread in Britain? Of the one indeed I had heard, but I never believed that the other would succeed it. A bishop may be excused, on account of his incessant labors and the solicitude for all the churches, and his care of the afflicted and his reconciliations of enemies, but what forbids a clerk to write letters to his friend? It remains to condemn your negligence. Quia igitur oleum non misistis, aculeum sumitis.”‡ And again to another friend he writes, “Am I to believe you a different man? or that I am changed? Friendship cannot dissemble, cannot flatter. O my dearest friend, am I to ascribe it to oblivion or to negligence that you have abstained so long from coming to salute your friend? Is it that you are occupied? But it is not gracious to be always occupied.”§

On the other hand, the earnest affectionate excuses made by monks for not having written answers to the letters addressed to them by friends in distant monasteries, leave nothing incomplete in this contrast to the cold

* S. Bonif. Mart. et Archiep. Epist. LVI.

† Petri Cellensis, Lib. I. Epist. XV.

‡ Id. Epist. LXIV.

§ Id. Lib. I. Epist. XIX.

formality and proud indifference of later manners. It is not however, to be inferred from these passages that the sincere piety and fervent spirituality of the ages of faith would have countenanced the selfish and unreasonable exaction of those triflers who imagine that their conversation ought to be always of paramount interest, so that every occupation, however holy and important, should give place to it. St. Peter, the venerable abbot of Cluny, wrote to St. Bernard, testifying how he loved and revered him, though he had never been in his presence, and saying how he had long desired to converse with him, but that his many employments and sufferings had prevented him,* and in a letter to the abbot Suger he laments, in most feeling terms, that while he is often obliged to see persons whom he has no desire to see, and to be engaged with secular applicants whom he would rather fly from, he can scarcely ever behold his beloved friend the abbot of St. Denis, Suger, who has never been at Cluny but once.† Holy priests in those ages, dearly as they prized friendship, and profoundly as they admired genius and sanctity, could not sometimes find leisure for the company of a Suger or a St. Bernard, and every door-knocking trifler in our times would call in question the charity of learned and laborious men, if they were not always prompt to listen to them. It is not the justice of such complaints that should be advocated, but there does seem occasion to look back with complacency to the manners of those ages which were characterized by the fervor as well as by the prudent and reasonable regulation of friendship. Friends are great thieves of time, but as Petrarch says no time ought to seem less stolen, less squandered than that which, after God, is expended upon friends.‡ It is not every vile circumstance or interest of money that should take precedence of them. Tyndarus enabled his poor fellow captive, whom he had known a boy when himself a boy, and whom he had ever loved from that time, to escape, and when his furious master demanded of him where was his fidelity, he quietly and wittily replied, "What, do you require that I, who have been your slave since one day and night, should be more attentive to your interests than to his with whom I have passed my life from boyhood?"§ But most men are now the captives of masters who would answer instantly that they do require them to show that preference, and who would find no great difficulty in making themselves obeyed, and men, whose employments are all about money or the objects of political ambition, receive their inexperienced friend with such looks as if they presumed that he must have read the inscription of the elder Aldus over their door. But how engaging, how holy are the expressions of affection which we meet with in the writings of the ages of faith! Witness the following letter, addressed to Lullus the bishop: "I entreat you, O beloved brother, forget not, but always cherish in memory, that ancient friendship which we entertained for each other when living in the city of Maldubia,

* S. Petri Ven. Epist. Lib. I. 28.

† Petrarch. Epist. ad Vir. illust.

‡ Epist. Lib. IV. 15.

§ Plautus Captevei, III. 4

where the abbot Eaba nourished us in amiable charity, when he used to call you by the name of Irtel, by which now the abbot Hereca salutes you in holy salutation, as well as the whole congregation which dwells in your monastery. He that shall persevere in peace unto the end, the same shall be saved. Farewell then my beloved, and forever fare thee well. My beloved, chosen of God, because charity has no price. This is the sign of the abbot Hereca.”* That disposition to make little presents, which is found so prevalent in Spain and Italy, has come down from the primitive ages of Christianity, when the pagans used to say, See how they love one another. In the latter country I seldom departed from a monastery or from a casual visit to a holy man, without some book or devout print, which was forced into my hands. You cannot open any volume of correspondence which dates from the ages of faith, without finding some allusion to the interchange of modest gifts, as tokens, not of vanity, but of love. Ælred, abbot of Riveaux in Yorkshire in the twelfth century, has left a beautiful book on spiritual friendship, to shew the vanity of all friendship which is not spiritual, and sanctified by a devout reference to the eternal love of Christ. “Some men,” he says, “are irrationally moved and inclined in mind towards a person by discovering his vices. For many can draw the minds of others to themselves, on account of a vain philosophy or some foolish boldness in military affairs; and what is worse still, many because they are prodigal, luxurious, betrayers of modesty, favorers and followers of base men or vainly fond of silly spectacles, entice others to be inclined towards them.”† To these allude the words of St. Augustine, “Si male amaveris tunc odisti, si bene oderis tunc amasti.” Here occurs a reflection on the vanity of a friendship which is not according to God, in which the maxims of a heartless and selfish philosophy, under the name of liberality, tend constantly to engage men. Even a heathen had the piety to say, You are my friend, but I cannot think with you, or wink at your error.

Συβόωφρονεῖν γὰρ οὐχὶ συννοθεῖν ἔφυν.

St. Bernard said in his letter to Master Guido de Castello, the disciple of Peter Abailard, “I should do you an injury if I were to suppose that you so loved any man as to love his errors with himself. Whoever thus loves any one does not know yet how he ought to love. Such love is earthly, animal, diabolic, equally hurtful to the person loving and to him who is loved.”‡ This wisdom passed even to the friendship of chivalry in the middle ages. Of Bayart the old writer of his life says, “oneques ne fut veu qu’il ait voulu soustenir le plus grant amy qu’il enst an monde contre la raison.”§ But to return to the treatise of our Ælred. “You say,” he continues, “what greater peace than to love and to be loved? If indeed in God and for God, I do not deny this; nay, I approve of it: but if according to the flesh or the world, see what envyings, what suspicions,

* S. Bonif. Epist. LXXXVIII.

† Id. III. 12.

‡ Epist. CXCH.

§ P. 597.

what flames of an ardent spirit exclude rest of mind. And if none of those should occur, death, which all must endure, destroys this unity, bearing grief to the survivor and punishment to him who passes.”* “While I was still a boy in the school, and delighted with the society of my companions, my whole mind gave itself to affection and devoted itself to love. So that I thought there was nothing sweeter or more useful than to be loved and to love. So fluctuating between diverse loves and friendships, my mind was borne hither and thither, and not knowing the law of true friendship, was often deceived by its similitude. At length there came into my hands the book of Tully de Amicitia, and I congratulated myself on having found a certain formula of friendship. I was delighted with the gravity of the sentences, and with the sweetness of the style; but afterwards, when it pleased my good Lord to correct the devious, raise the fallen, and cleanse the leper, renouncing worldly hope, I entered the monastery, and devoted myself to the study of the holy scriptures, and in a short time I found this so sweet, that all worldly science became, in my eyes, comparatively vile. Then when that book De Amicitia came back to my mind, I wondered why it did not any longer give me the same pleasure as before, for now nothing could excite the whole of my affections which was not seasoned with the salt of the holy scriptures. Wishing then to strengthen these remarks on friendship by the authority of scripture, and to spiritualize them, I undertook to compose this little work on spiritual friendship :” and where he represents his pupil alluding to the book of Cicero, he repeats this testimony in reply : “I am not unacquainted with that book, which used at one time to delight me, but from the days that I became sensible of the sweetness of the holy scriptures, and that the mellifluous name of Christ claimed all my affection, nothing that I ever read or hear seems sweet or lucid to me, however subtilly arranged, which has not the salt of the heavenly letters, and the seasoning of that sweetest name.”†

We must not, however, suppose from the gravity of these sentences, that the joys of friendship were included among those things which became to him weary, flat, stale, and unprofitable. Hear how he speaks of the society of Rivaulx. “Three days ago, as I went round the cloisters of the monastery, when I had seated myself in the midst of a beloved crowd of brethren, I fell to admiring the leaves of each tree, the fruits and flowers, which bloomed as if in a paradise of pleasure. Finding no one in all that crowd whom I did not love, and by whom I did not believe that I was loved, I experienced such joy that it surpassed all the delights of this world. For I felt as if my spirit was transfused into all, and the affection of all infused into me, so that I might say with the prophet, ‘Eecce quam bonum et quam jucundum habitare fratres in unum.’” Then, after alluding to two persons, who were more especially joined to him in intimate affection, his friends from early youth, who had continued with him through all the stages of his religious life, he proceeds as follows: “What then? was it not a certain portion of beatitude thus to

* 1d. Speculum Charitatis, Lib. I. cap. 25.

† Ælred. Abb. Rievallensis de Spirit. Amicitia Prolog.

love and to be loved? Thus to assist and to be assisted? And thus, from the sweetness of fraternal affection, to fly aloft to the more sublime splendor of divine love on the ladder of charity, at one time ascending to the embraces of Christ himself, and at another descending to rest softly on the earth, in the love of one's neighbor?"* Thus did he enjoy friendship, with all the sweetness of humanity and all the unction of a spiritualized and illuminated heart. "Ecce ego et tu," he writes to his young friend, "et spero quod tertius inter nos Christus sit."

But this third course has already exceeded all just proportion, and I must hastily bring it to an end. Enough has been produced to show how richly the pleasures of friendship were included in the inheritance of the meek, who in sooth could hardly have been said to possess the earth, if the grant had not comprised them. "Homer did well," says Plutarch, "in making Telemachus reckon among his calamities that he had no brother."† And just was the remark of Pindar, that all kinds of advantage are derived from friendly men.

— — — — — χρεῖται δὲ παντοῦ-αὶ φιλῶν ἄνδρῶν.‡

And though the Christian philosophy would contradict the poet's sentence, that honor departeth from him who is deprived of friends,§ (for few mortal men, he himself admits, are faithful in times of misfortune, so as to be partakers of suffering; and how can the infidelity of hypocrites be charged upon their victim,) yet it would sanction the opinion that friendship supplies, to spirits perfect and already chosen, a bliss which might constrain meekness itself to cry, "Behold the earth is mine."

Such, then, are the observations suggested by a view of history relative to the meek in ages of faith, and to their enjoyment of that possession which was promised to them from the Mount. With hearts only bent upon the attainment of heaven, the earth was in abundance given to them, while the proud and foolishly deliberate race, of which were those who cried, "What shall we do? If we let him go, all men will believe in him, and the Romans will come and take away our place and nation," feared to lose temporal things and thought not of eternal life, and thus, as St. Augustin remarks, lost both.||

Mild in all the manners that secured the order and the harmony of social intercourse, imbued with the principle of obedience, meekly submissive to the Church, to the rulers of the state, to the laws which they either received or administered, meek amidst power and riches and nobility, meek in the humbler ranks of the common family, they inherited the earth and derived from it all that could sweeten or dignify the existence of men. Degree was maintained in their Christian warfare. Therefore, conformable to the wise distinction of St. Augustin, the rich were not humbled to piety, so as to exalt the poor to pride; for in no manner

* De Spirit. Amicit. Lib. III. in Bibliothec. Patrum, Tom. XXIII.

† De Amicit. frat.

‡ Nem. Od. VIII.

§ Nem. X.

|| Tract. 49. in Joan.

would it have been right that in that life, where senators were laborious, there workmen should have been idle, that rustics should have been delicate where came, abandoning their delights, those who were of the Lord's vineyard.* Stability was infused into the political as well as into the ecclesiastical order, for the rule of truth and the knowledge of the end of good and evil, put an end for ever to the uncertainties and vicissitudes of speculation, respecting both the one and the other : it was not supposed that a society, which no heresy or impure superstition had ever disorganized, required from age to age a succession of changes and reformatiions, the occasions and the plan of which were to be determined by the caprice of sophists, to whose judgment each generation was to submit, in concluding when and how it was to revolutionize the whole frame of its constitution ; as if there was nothing fixed or eternal in the principles or end of a Christian government, and as if manners alone were exempt from the necessity of constant vigilance, as if they alone could never perish or require change.

As in time of sterility or excess of rain, and the other evils of nature, so men were patient under the luxury or avarice of rulers ; for they knew, as the wise historian of Rome observes, that there will be vices as long as there will be men, that neither are these continual, but that they are compensated by the intervention of better things.† Delivered from the anxieties and enmities which would attend continual alterations in the form of that government, whose object, as Seneca explains, was to secure to every man leisure, not labor, recreation and not toilsome pain, the earth to them yielded its choicest treasures, both of material and intellectual good. Innumerable objects of almost infinite variety ministered to their pleasures and necessities ; cities rose in the desert, and the beauty of divine temples formed a paradise of pleasure in every spot to which the providence of God might conduct their steps. Nature sanctified by religion, and restored to harmony by faith, for them was delivered from its ancient malediction. The intellectual world was granted to them as a boundless and inalienable domain. To them poetry offered its sweetest incense, and learning gave up all its accumulated stores. Spirituality threw a resplendent light on every object around them, and developed for their advantage the riches of a mysterious and unfathomable creation. Mind and body were associated to produce the concord of an universal order, and friendship gave them a foretaste of that everlasting communion, for which they were destined in the regions of supernal joy. Blessed in the hope of heaven, blessed in the possession of the earth, these generations of the poor in spirit and of the meek, fulfilled their appointed course, and passed on from time and things finite to that destination which exceeds all human thought, and all utterance but what is merely negative, to announce with trembling awe and adoring love, what they cannot be,—eternity and God.

† S. August. Num. 33.

* Tacitus, Hist. IV. 74.

MORES CATHOLICI;

OR,

AGES OF FAITH.

BOOK IV.

MORES CATHOLICI;

OR,

AGES OF FAITH.

THE FOURTH BOOK.

CHAPTER I.

O more discourse of earth and all its fair possessions, promised from the mountain, which heard the heavenly voice disclosing the way of happiness to men. I now must change the notes to tragic ; for such are those which tell of mourners, though they were in mourning blessed. Solemn task ! yet argument, not less concerned with beatitude than that which described the lives of those who secured, by meekness and poverty of spirit, both earth and heaven's eternal kingdom. Deep, mysterious theme ! more than speech can tell, attractive, announced as it was in tone so soft and mild, as one might have thought never before met the ear on mortal strand, sounding as if from the voice of some angelic marshal, fanning us with swan-like wings, while the gates of lucid mansions opened to the music of this unearthly strain, which affirms that those who mourn are blessed, for that comfort shall be theirs.

All generations of men have mourned ; but how vain would be the search into ancient history, in hopes of discovering that they were therefore blessed ! Here is however a new voice, and sweet, indeed, in mortal ears, which consoleth those who mourn with the assurance that they shall be comforted ; and since this is the voice of Him, whose knowledge is the law of nature and of grace, we may be sure that henceforth the study of history will bring new results, and present a very different phenomena from any thing that philosophers had ever before observed. It seemed no less strange to affirm, that the poor in spirit and the meek were blessed ; and yet, what striking illustrations and evidence of that fact have we discovered in the history of the ages of faith ? Let us feel emboldened then by this experience, and resume our study, giving it this new direction, investigating the annals of these ages of the world in especial reference to the tenor of man's woe, whether proceeding from the incidents to which he is obnoxious by nature, or from the influence of supernatural causes, which are the consequence of the light and life of faith.

But ere we proceed it may be well to remove the objection which some might advance against our intended course in general, from supposing that it obtruded upon them melancholy themes. Such persons must be reminded, that it is not religion's voice, transmitted in the writings of the middle ages, which first makes men acquainted with mourning, and that they will not be the less constrained to remember woe by attempting to banish the principles and associations of faith. To say nothing as yet in proof that it is faith which alone affords a remedy for the wounds of life, but leaving them to think as gloomily as they will of the influence which it sheds upon history, they must, notwithstanding, admit at once that, by nature, as men, independent of all tradition and revelation, they are, sooner or later, compelled, either by the experience of present sorrows, or by the fear and anticipation of future evils, to fall into the ranks of those who mourn—or, rather, as Cicero says, of the miserable. Do what they will, depart as far as they please from the philosophy of the middle ages, there is no avoiding this. As reasonably might they hope to be dispensed from death, as to pass through life, short as it is, exempt from the experience and the thoughts of woe. If they look at the world which surrounds them, and mark the countenances that front them on every side, they will find the greatest and most heroic men, visibly written mourners in their looks, like Spencer's gentle knight, who was armed, indeed, with glorious panoply—

“But of his cheere did seme too solemne sad.” *

Melancholy is ascribed as an heroic quality to Hercules, Lysander, Ajax, Alcæon, Bellerophon, Socrates, and Plato. There is no escaping it by taking refuge in boldness and absolute war against goodness. Cain was melancholy, as St. Augustine says;† and who is not? It is propagated from Adam.

Mourning, then, by itself, formed no distinguishing characteristic of the ages of faith—

“ From time's first records the diviner's voice Gives the sad heart a sense of misery.” ‡

Æschylus delivers this testimony; and what a solemn melancholy breathes in the chorus of the Œdipus Coloneus, which sings the mourning of the human course! Never to have been born is best of all; but after having appeared, to descend again, as soon as possible, to the lower regions, while young, is next in degree of good.

“The happiness of man lasts not long,” says Pindar.§ Would you hear the fa-

* Faery Quene.

† Epist. 105.

‡ Æschyl. Agam.

§ Pyth. Od. III.

ther of heroic poetry himself announcing his own conviction in the solemn words of his ideal hero. "O, Amphinomus ! truly you seem to me to be wise, being the son of so great a father, whose fame is so widely spread ; and they say that you are his son, and you resemble him ; therefore, to you, I say, but do you hearken and consider it in your mind, that the earth produces nothing, not one animal breathing and moving upon it, more wretched than man."* You have here the affecting testimony of the human race to the misery of its condition, before it had beheld the light of Christ.

In whatever direction we turn through the world we shall hear mourning's voice, whether it sound of sharp anguish, or breathe in sighs. Orosius, the historian, whom Alfred translated, and made so well known to our ancestors, diffused a tone of great melancholy over his history, which he had intended first to entitle, "De Miseria Hominum"—a title which, Bonarsius says, might be given to all history.† Hesiod says, that a thousand woes wander amidst men, that the earth is full of evils, the sea full of them.‡ Profound was the sense entertained by the ancients of the vanity of all human prosperity and joy ; amidst their delights, they always felt as if, to use their own expression, there was something cruel that would strangle them—

———τρία μὲν
ἔργα ποδάρκης ἡμέρα
Θῆκε καλλίστ' ἀμφὶ κόμαις.

Remark what an instance is here furnished by Pindar in celebrating the glories of Xenophon of Corinth—"That one single day which passes so quickly ! placed around his head these three illustrious deeds, or the crown, which was the reward of his victory in the Stadium, the Dialium, and the armed course."§ And, again, the same expression occurs the day ταχυτάς ποδῶν ἐρίζεται ;|| so that even when commemorating the glory of a conqueror, he deemed it right to remind him of the shortness of the day which procured it, and consequently of that in which he could enjoy it. Indeed, the Pæan, as a song of rejoicing for victory, always bore a mournful sense in reference to the battle, as well as a joyous sense in reference to the victory. Dionysius, after relating the combat of the Horatii and Curatii, and the joyful triumph of the victor, adds, "but it was necessary that, as a man, he should not be happy throughout, but should excite the envy of the demon ; who, when he had exalted him, contrary to the expectation of all, and, in a moment, even to the highest pinnacle of glory and happiness, cast him down the very same day into the miserable calamity of killing his own sister."¶ Cicero, in his oration for the Manilian law, furnishes a similar example of the scrupulous timidity and extreme caution with which it was deemed right to speak of the happiness of the prosperous, so fearfully uncertain was its stability, and so necessary did they feel

* Od. XVIII. 125.

† In Præfat. ad gesta Dei per Francos.

‡ Op. et Dies.

§ Olymp. XIII.

|| Olymp. 1.

¶ Antiquit. Roman. Lib. III. cap. 21.

it to be always prepared against what they termed the stroke of envious fate. This, too, is what the lofty grave tragedians taught—

*ὦ βρότεια πράγματα· εὐτυχοῦντα μὲν ὁκιά τις ἄν τρέψειεν· εἰ δὲ δυστυχεῖ, οἰαῖς ὑγρώσων σπόγγος ὤλεσεν γραφὴν.
καὶ ταῦτ' ἐκείνων μάλλον οἰκτείρω πολὺ.

Let no one, then, ascribe melancholy to the history of the renovated race. Bitter and profound has been the mourning of men in all ages, who enjoyed not the consolations of faith, as antiquity will avow, and even our own times bear witness; for many of the modern writers have raised again the desolating voice of the heathen lamentations, if not with that Philoctetæan clamor which old philosophy deemed unbecoming, yet often in a strain of even still more wild despair. What is the tone of modern literature and modern poetry? Does it indicate smiling hearts, elate with peacefulness and joy? Truly it expresses only that sadness of the world which, in the language of the Holy Spirit, worketh death.† Only those suggestions which proceed from anguish of the mind and humors black, that mingle with the fancy, distempered discontented thoughts, inordinate desires, like those which moved Dicæopolis to exclaim, “How many things devour my heart! very few things delight me; truly not more than four. What torment me are as numerous as the sands of the sea shore.”‡ In fact, without the Catholic piety, the Catholic type and hope to support one, life must necessarily grow every day, in the estimation of the heart, more flat, stale, and unprofitable; for there is constantly something dropping off, something dying, something happening for the last time, so that every man will have the sad experience of the troubadour and warrior, Bertram de Born, who complains of this constant and rapid decay, saying, “Tous les jours vous verrez qu’aujourd’hui vaut moins qu’hier.” Age itself, disables the mind from supporting the calamities of life, as is confessed by Dante in an affecting allusion to his own power of enduring the misfortunes which befell his country—

——“That chance
Were in good time, if it befell thee now.
Would so it were, since it must needs befall!
For, as time wears me, I shall grieve the more.” §

The dismal lucubrations of modern philosophers and poets can only inspire the idea of a gloomy consistory, composed of persons who, in their disdain of the holy discipline, sit, like Michol, full of scorn and sorrow,|| disfigured, more than can befall spirit of happy sort.

Alas! if men in ages of faith could, in a dream, have been brought in presence of this present intellectual world, after searching with fixed ken, to know what place it was wherein they stood, they might have supposed themselves for certain

* Æsch. agam. 1327.

§ Hell, XXVI.

† Epist. ad Corinth. II. 7.

|| Dante, Purg. X.

‡ Aristoph. Acharnensis.

on the brink of the lamentable vale—the dread abyss, that joins a thundrous sound of plaints innumerable. Dark, and deep, and thick with clouds o’erspread, their eyes might in vain have sought to explore its bottom, but would have discerned nought. What bitterness is expressed in that exclamation—

“There are words of deeper sorrow
Than the wail above the dead !”

What approximation to despair in that avowal of hope being subject to contingency, when it is said—

“Circumstance, that unspiritual god
And miscreator, makes and helps along
Our coming evils with a crutch-like rod,
Whose touch turns hope to dust, the dust we all have trod.” *

What a contrast to the bright visions which cheer the way of those on earth who afterwards are blessed, when the poet says—

———“Standing thus by thee
Other days come back on me
With recollected music, though the tone
Is changed and solemn, like the cloudy groan
Of dying thunder on the distant wind.”

Such is the revelation which the modern poet and modern philosopher continually makes of the state of his own heart ; and is it for such men to shrink from consulting the history of the ages of faith through fear of its inspiring them with melancholy ? Alas ! what deeper gloom can come upon this poor soul than that which already encompasses it ?

“Dost thou not hear how pitiful his moan,
Nor mark the death which, in the torrent flood,
Swoln mightier than a sea, him struggling holds.” †

Thus do these tender and elevated souls move along, thirsty, wandering, like those shades deprived of sepulture, and condemned to an eternal restlessness. They can find no place of repose or refreshment in the sterile desert of the world ; they sigh, without ceasing, for some, I know not what, mysterious power, which they call liberty or progress, humanity or reason, a kind of liberating divinity, who they think must eventually prevail, and it is with this vain hope that they seek to console themselves.

The Catholic poet, in ages of faith, trained to communion with the holy, assiduous at the early sacrifice, and accustomed to walk unnoticed amidst the evening crowd of faithful which surrounds the divine altars to receive a benediction, hoped hereafter, in a future world, to consort for ever with the saintly

* Maufred, IV.

† Hell, II.

spirits he had seen on earth, and to join the choir which keeps eternal festival in heaven : the genius of his song was that of one who is happy—who has no morbid peculiarities of thought or temper. The modern poet, nursed only amidst the wild and lonely scenes of nature, and familiar rather with the howl of winds, and the fall of mountain torrents, than with the hymn of saintly fervor, whose soul hath only known the sublime but sad delight of gazing on pathless glen and mountain high—

“Listing where from the cliffs the torrents thrown, Mingle their echo with the eagle’s cry ;”

though, having often felt how that sad loneliness loaded his heart, and how that barren desert tired his eye, when he would have wished to trace something that showed of life, though low and mean, yet, for the future, has no brighter hope, while gazing upon the ocean flood, but that it will be a pleasant thing to die—

“To be resolved into the elemental wave,
Or take his portion with the winds that rave.”

Such was the spirit of the chorus of Æschylus—

“Oh ! that I could as smoke arise
That rolls its black wreaths thro’ the air,
Mix with the clouds, that o’er their skies
Show their bright forms, and disappear ;
Or, like the dust, be tost
By ev’ry sportive wind, till all be lost.”*

And such is the spirit of the king of modern poets, in that most inhuman aspiration :

—————“I can see
Nothing to loathe in nature, save to be
A link reluctant in a fleshy chain,
Class’d among creatures, when the soul can flee,
And with the sky, the peak, the heaving plain,
Of ocean or the stars mingle, and not in vain.”†

The testimony of Palinurus, indeed, who had experience of this kind of dissolution, might have sufficed to show them how delusive were such anticipations.

“Nunc me fluctus habet, versantque in littore venti, Eripe me his, invicte, malis——.”‡

The genius of melancholy must not be confounded with the melancholy of genius ; but to the latter it is only the ages of faith that can lay claim. The former, the burden of Babylon, has been the lot of humanity in every period of the world’s

* Supplices.

† Childe Harold, III.

‡ Æneid. VI. 362.

history, from the time when sin with vanity had filled the works of men. To this fact, there is express testimony in all ages; although, without doubt, many of these mourners from the effect of anticipations, having a certain infinite evil in life, might, like Niobe, have been imagined turned to stone on account of eternal silence in affliction—voiceless because so profound, of whom the Book of God affirmeth that he had stricken them but they had not sorrowed, that is, had not confessed their sorrow, yet had he brought down their heart through heaviness; for to walk sorrowful all the day long is the state of sin.

William Schlegel observes, that the conduct of the greatest portion of mankind who live confined within the monotonous circle of little insignificant occupations, can only be accounted for by the necessity which they feel for endeavoring to escape from that secret discontent which presses them down, as soon as the passions of their youth which made their life run like a rapid torrent, have become weak and motionless. Therefore these means of distraction are employed, which are all designed to put in motion their slumbering faculties, by offering to them light difficulties. O Christ! how deep and bitter is the mourning of these men when they say with Montaigne, I have seen the verdure, and the flowers, and the fruit of life, and now I behold the withering, the sear and yellow leaf: or, with Philo-laches in the old play, "my heart bleeds when I consider what I am and what I was; that formerly no youth excelled more in gymnastic art, in throwing the quoit, the spear, and the ball, in the course, in the field, and that now I am nothing."* This mourning sounds like the lugubrious cry of the birds of night, not the sighs of the dove which represent the blessed mourning, and than which nothing is more calculated to inspire peace, recollection, and internal joy. The world's children professedly indeed pursue a life of pleasure and festivity, but if we can credit one who knew them well, their "mirth has less of play than bitterness."

"For many a stoic eye and aspect stern,
Mark hearts where grief hath nought to learn,
And many a withering thought lies hid, not lost,
In smiles that least befit who wear them most."†

Truly when there is a penetrating eye this reflection will be often suggested. The laugh of pleasure's children may remind one of that inhuman saying of the heathen Demænetus, "may all that wish me evil laugh so!"

Such mourning was a thing impossible to mix with blessedness. Nay, with spirits under its influence, as Shakespeare says in Hamlet, the devil is very potent, making use of those phantoms and images of memory, which, according to Aristotle,‡ melancholy persons are most apt to discern, in order to abuse and damn them. These are they who do violence to themselves and to their own blessings, wasting their talents in reckless lavishness and sorrowing there, where they should dwell in joy;§ wearing their days in wilful woe, and despising the grace of their Creator, sitting like the Harpies in the Hell of Dante, and wailing o'er the drear mystic wood ; whose melancholy springs from no other source, as ancient writers well have shown, but the passions which they have not learned in their youth to master.* This is the mourning which mixes with the inextinguishable laughter of the suitors of Penelope, of whom Homer says, that while revelling with great triumph on the eve of their destruction, though shouts of merriment resounded through the hall, yet at intervals their eyes were filled with tears and their minds with sorrow :

* Plautus Mostellaria, 1. 2. † Byron. ‡ Περὶ αἰσθησέως. § Dante Hell, XI.

————— ὅσσε δ' ἄρα σφέων
δακρυόφιν πίμπλαντο γόον δ' ᾤετο θυμός.

Theoclymenus regards this as an omen, and predicts their destruction. Thus all mourning, all poetic melancholy, is not the presage of a blessed end.

Beati qui lugent. But not those who mourn with the world, or who weep through vanity at feigned misery. St. Augustin knocked his breast for having wept on reading the death of Dido in Virgil, who slew herself on being abandoned by her lover Æneas ; because he knew well that such tears were without any emotion of charity, and consequently that they were not in any degree agreeable to God, who demands from us only tears of love, in confirmation of which judgment the world itself can be adduced in evidence, for its poets affirm that the wretched are malevolent and envious.

“ Est miserorum, ut malevolentes sint atque invideant bonis.”† far, indeed, then is such mourning from the blessing promised. It is the sorrow which dwells forever upon the cursed strand that every man must pass who fears not God. Let us move onward, for faith has no entrance here.

* Christine de Pisan, Livre des fais et bonnes meurs du sage Roy Charles V. chap. x.

† Plautus Bapteivei, III. 4.

CHAPTER II.

OW we are arrived at the point where our inquiries must return to the domain of history in order to ascertain what was the character of mourning during the ages of faith, and how far the woe of the human heart was affected by the supernatural condition of man's life in relation to the knowledge conveyed in the mysteries of religion. In the first place then a retrospect of Christian history will prove, that the mourning commended from the mountain was understood to be something very different from the spirit which we have been observing—the mourning of animal men, the mourning of Babylon, without charity and without peace. Sooth, to hear the admonitions of those whose writings influence mankind during the ages of faith, and to mark their countenances as described so graphically in ancient books, one might at first suppose that the blessing had not been pronounced in their estimation upon the state of mourners ; but upon that of those who always rejoiced, and who, like the followers of old Pythagoras, considered sadness a vice and a disgrace to be hidden from the eyes of men, for if it ever came upon a Pythagorean, he was to withdraw himself from all observation, and set about removing it by using the remedies prescribed by his discipline, remedies which indeed could hardly have been efficacious, but the recourse to which proves the just abhorrence in which melancholy was held. What was the character of mourning during the ages of faith ? Truly one may feel at a loss how to answer this question ; for the first impressions consequent upon a study of their history, as far as it is comprised in the thoughts, and doctrines, and manners of men, would lead us to conclude, that the race of mourners had disappeared ; and that within the promised land, nothing was ever found but smiles and joy. Where shall we look for mourners ? We may conceive at once that the task is difficult ; for how can there be melancholy where the Catholic religion sways, which ever invigorates men with hope that leads to blissful end ? How great is that hope, and how it doth flourish in them, even its adversaries admit ; for the only question with them, they say, is to account for the exemption of Catholics from despair and trouble of mind !* Hope excludes sadness, and the church militant hath in every age armed all her sons with hope. Let us however, investigate more narrowly.

Burton, who wrote a professed treatise upon melancholy, would direct us to

* Burton Anat. of Mel. III. 4.

the abodes of monks and friars, as being men whom he affirms to be continually under its dreadful influence. But lo! the fact is so contrary to his representation, that cheerfulness appears as one of the first results from entering the pleasant cloister's pale. "Do you see these novices?" asks St. Bernard, "they are but just come, but just converted. What appears in them is only a flower, for the season of fruit is not yet arrived. This new conversation is a flower. They assume a face of discipline and a good composition of their whole body. I grant that what appears is pleasing—that greater negligence of exterior dress—fewer words—a more joyful countenance—a more bashful look; yet these are but flowers, and rather the promise of fruit, than fruit itself."* Does length of time, think you, and a progress in that course of perfect life, produce a change in this respect? Hear what instructions and doctrines belonged to the monastic discipline. "The Holy Ghost cannot suffer the odious sadness of the children of the world to remain in the soul of his servants." He who thus speaks is the monk who wrote that discourse to a nun which is commonly ascribed to St. Bernard. "Let a spiritual joy remain always within you as a testimony that you are at peace with God. This innocent and tranquil joy is an assured mark of virtue and an earnest of sanctity. If it were not so, David would not have said, rejoice ye just in the Lord and leap for joy."—"There is even a joy natural but innocent, which is a gift of heaven; a precious fruit of peace with God," says the holy Capuchin friar Lombez, in his treatise on the joy of the soul. "You destroy the divine image in your soul by sadness," he continues, "God is joy.† 'Servite Domino in lætitia.' All nature rejoices in its Creator, and would you remain in a sad silence? The saints are always full of joy and cheerfulness; in the midst of vast deserts and solitudes, under persecution and suffering, joy is on their countenances. It is joy which makes the heart fear God. 'Lætetur cor meum, ut timeat nomen tuum.'‡"

John, the monk of Cluni, in his life of St. Odo, the second abbot of that house, says, "His words were always full of rejoicing; insomuch that he used to constrain us, through excess of joy, to laugh, which mirth he would moderate with admonitions; but his spiritual cheerfulness diffused internal joy through our hearts. Not being allowed to testify our feelings openly, we used secretly to kiss his vestments."§ But this is an investigation which may be terminated without waiting to consult history; for, if in the present age, the manners and countenance of the religious in monasteries bespeak invariably the sweet influence of constant internal rejoicing; and no other inference is possible, after observing them, there can be no danger of error in concluding that it was the same in the ages of greatest faith; for then the world was more frequently opposed by forms of attraction, and consequently there were fewer obstacles to the peace and joy which religion can impart to men.

* S. Bernardi super Cantica Serm. LXIII.

† Ps. 85.

‡ Traité de la joie de l'ame, 2. 4.

§ Bibliotheca Cluniacensis, 33.

Will the moderns look for sadness in the air of those pilgrims, who are the objects of so much of their pity? Let them refer to the portrait of one who was a saint, a model and example of all pilgrims. St. Wilfrid, afterwards Bishop of York, made a pilgrimage to Rome, and it is expressly related, that on the way he was to all men affable, and that he never contracted a sad countenance.”* * *

If they repair to the solitary hermit's dwelling in the woods and caves of the rocks, they will not have better success. Sebastian Francus Von Word, in the third part of his Chronicle, expressly testifies of the holy hermit Nicolas Von der Flue, that he was never melancholy, but always joyous. But surely it will be said, we cannot be at a loss for examples of sadness, if we turn to the solemn Doctors and Holy Fathers of the Church, who spent their lives in the defence and illustration of the Christian faith? The very aspect of their volumes denotes men abandoned to the gloom of interminable toil. Truly the difficulty remains the same as before. St. Gregory reckons sadness among the seven capital sins.†

St. Chrysostom's chief object in writing to Olympias, the deaconess, is to extirpate the melancholy to which she had been unhappily a prey. “Not only do I wish to deliver you from sadness, but also to fill your soul with a pure and never-ending joy;” it is thus he writes to her. “Sadness,” he continues, “is the most intolerable torment of the soul,—a grief beyond all expression,—a punishment more cruel than all punishments. It is like a worm, which gnaws not only our body, but whatever is most intimate within us. It is a night never ending, a horrible tempest, a fever which consumes secretly. To those seized with it, the sun, the air, however pure, the most beautiful azure of the sky, become a burden, and the day becomes night; which made the prophet say, ‘The sun shall set for them at mid-day.’‡ No, the deep shades of night are not deeper than those of sadness, horrible night, insupportable night, night sinistrous and threatening, refusing to yield to those who would dispel it, but attaching itself to the soul which it has once seized upon, and never letting go its hold until this soul chooses to make use of its wisdom to escape from its power.” You have heard how they speak. Nor is the result different if we refer to those ecclesiastical canons, which, from their title at least, might lead one to think that they had relation unto mourning. In the ancient Penitential of Angers, which happens to present itself first to my view, I find reckoned among the capital crimes “the sadness of the world, worldly sorrow.” Not even the ascetic discipline will yield us any different result; for universally it rested upon the principle of that sacred text—“Piety will fill the heart with a joyous spirit and with gladness.”§ “Sadness proceedeth from self-love; and joy from the love of God.” So we read in the Meditations for the English College at Lisbon: “The fruit is like the tree; that is, the joy is like the

* Mabillon, Acta S. Ordinis Bened. Sæc. IV. Pars I.

† Amos viii. 9.

‡ C. XXXI. Lib. XXXI. in Exod.

§ Eccles. i. 18.

love whence it proceedeth : true love is like to the thing loved ; that is, like to God : and hence true joy must be like to God ; that is, immortal, most copious, most beauteous, and most sweet.”* The Church herself, in her solemn offices, prays to be delivered from present sadness, and to be conducted to the possession of eternal joy. That faithful spouse of Jesus Christ never mourns long without returning to the expressions of transport. Thus, in the middle of Lent, she changes the penitential tones to sing Lætare Jerusalem ; and, in a similar manner, she interrupts the solemn chants of Advent to sing Gaudete. What is very remarkable too, the world itself, if considered in reference to the scenes of chivalrous life, seems, during these ages, to have ceased to favor the melancholy which is its natural companion ; so that its maxims were directed to the same end as those of the spiritual society, and its ways delivered from all horrid exhibitions of desperate woe. If you will hear fable, which, at that epoch, peculiarly borrowed its language from living manners, you will find King Pharamond, in Gyron le Courtois, reproving Messire du Lac, for indulging in a sorrow which was unbecoming. “Se Dieu me sault si bon chevalier comme vous estes ne deveroit mye trop penser pour nulle avanture de ce monde. Et certes vous pensez orendroit plus que a preudhomme ne convient.”—“Sire (replied Messire du Lac), mon cuer si est seigneur de moy, mais je ne suis mye seigneur de luy.”† You will hear the hermit Peter reproving the vain grief of Tancred on the death of Clorinda, as offending against the spirit of his order :

“His vanity with grave advice reproved,
And told what mourning Christian knights behoved.
O Tancred, Tancred! how far different
From thy beginnings good these follies be!
Thou dost refuse of Heav’n the proffer’d grace,
And ’gainst it still rebel with sinful ire;
O wretch! O whither doth thy rage thee chase?
Refrain thy grief, bridle thy fond desire;
At hell’s wide gate vain sorrow doth thee place.
Sorrow, misfortune’s son, despair’s foul sire:
O see thine ill, thy plaint and woe refrain,
The guides to death to hell, and endless pain.”‡

During the middle ages, rare was the crime of Piero delle Vigne, who, when his glad honors changed to bitter woes, with soul disdainful and disgusted, sought refuge in death from scorn, and became, just as he was, unjust towards himself. It was so rare, that men considered it in the light of a prodigy. Peter Damien mentions that Hugo, abbot of Cluny, used to relate to him a strange example of a certain stranger, who destroyed himself through the impulse of the demon. “There was a Bishop,” he says, “travelling, who came to the banks of a river, where he halted to repose for a short time. As he was resting there, he thought he heard

* Part. IV. c. 2.

† F. LXXXVIII.

‡ Jerus. Deliv. XII. 36

a voice, proceeding as if from the flood, which said, 'Hora venit, homo non venit.' The Bishop shortly after observed a man on horseback, who came galloping to the brink, as if resolved to make his horse plunge into the stream. By the Bishop's directions the attendants, who rushed forwards, succeeded in preventing him, though he persisted in crying out, 'Let me go—I must hasten on the king's errand; an inevitable necessity bids me proceed.' The holy Bishop constrained him to take up his abode with him that night. When every one was sunk in sleep, the stranger plunged his head into a vessel of water which stood in the chamber, and suffocated himself."*

The epoch of the great apostasy of the sixteenth century was distinguished by the frequency of this fearful crime. Petrus Crinitus mentions that in France certain women had lately committed suicide, throwing themselves into rivers, which gave occasion to several learned men to investigate the cause of such a phenomenon, which could only be ascribed to the power of the stars, and to some influence of the air impelling men to madness, and he is obliged to recur to the ancients for similar instances. He mentions, indeed, that a philosopher at Florence, Peter Leonio, and another scholar, deeply versed in Aristotle and Hippocrates, had lately drowned themselves, but it was through an access of madness, in which they ought to have been bound with chains.†

What, then, becomes of our project, to illustrate the manners of the blessed race from the history and learning of the ages of faith, if on the one hand we are told, by the voice of unerring wisdom, that they who mourn are blessed; and on the other, if we can find no trace or sanction of mourning in the ages when we suppose faith to have principally flourished? Softly, my gentle comrade; all is not yet seen: we have as yet been confronted only with the mourning of the world: and how should it be wonderful, or a source of inquietude, that we should have met with no trace of such a spirit in the manners or discipline of those who had renounced the world, during ages of faith? It has not been demonstrated, that the third blessed sentence from the Mount fell a powerless sound upon the ear of the humble and the meek, or that it found nothing in their character or existence to which it was applicable. They were cheerful and full of joyful peace: but it does not follow that they were deprived of the third beatitude: they did not mourn with the world; but we must not infer that they rejoiced with it. Neither earthly sorrow nor earthly joy, in the perverted sense of that expression, belonged to them, but the mourning of holy exiles, resting in this Inn of grief, the sighs of the innocent dove, longing after its home and country, were no less characteristic of their whole existence than were the peace and joy of renovated and spiritualized creatures restored to the favor of their Creator, and destined to dwell hereafter in everlasting gladness. It is not to be imagined for an instant that their cheerfulness bore any resemblance to the disposition of those persons whose lips seem always moved to laughter, or to provoking it in others. Though totally free from that Jansenian gloom, which pervades the thoughts of a celebrated philosopher of later times, there was nothing vulgar or ignoble in their sweet and joyous serenity: it would lead no one to conceive that they could ever inwardly breathe a prayer like that of the parasite of Plautus: "Grant me riches, praise, profit, play, mirth, festivity, feasting, pomp, pleasure, revelling, satiety, joy:"* but it might remind one of the tone of those solemn quires described by Dante,— ———"and lo !

* Bibliothec. Cluniacens. 438.

† De Honesta Disciplina, Lib. III. c. 9.

A sound of weeping and a song : 'My lips,
O Lord !' and these so mingled, it gave birth
To pleasure and to pain."†

Even the ancient sages, who, like the Pythagoreans, declared open war against melancholy, would not have approved of the former temper: they indeed pretended to possess divine remedies against the wounds of sadness!‡ and Aristoxenus affirmed that they used to refrain from all lamentations and tears; but as a general and pervading tone, they would have rejected utterly and with scorn the pert and nimble spirit of mirth, at least as it appears in the common laughter. Soerates, showing that at the last the souls of men will correspond in appearance to their character in life, says that Thersites will be seen in the form of an ape.§ "It may be well," says the Athenian in Plato, "to make one's self acquainted with things ridiculous, in order that one may the better learn what is opposed to them; but it is not possible to practise both, and partake in the least degree of virtue."||

Plato would not allow the inextinguishable laughter of the Homeric gods even among the men of his republic. Ἀλλὰ μὴν οἱ δὲ φιλογέλῳ τὰς γε δεῖ εἶναι. οὔτε ἄρα ἀνθρώπους ἀξίους λόγον κρατούμενους ὑπὸ γέλωτος ἄν τις ποιῇ ἀποδεκτέον.¶ While on earth, heroes of his type bore that countenance which Dante ascribes to those four mighty spirits which he beheld within the awful porch, which were of semblance neither sorrowful nor glad. The sweet countenance of blessed spirits, bespoke, no doubt, an abundant felicity; but still, it indicated the constant exercise of mystic joy, tempering the sweet with bitter. "The joy of the just," says Drexelius, "is not that of the gay and frivolous, occupied with Saturnalian festivities and Bacchanalian orgies." "Placidum et occultum illud gaudium est, et cum gravitate, imo severitate conjunctum."†† Thus St. Jerome describes that perfect priest, Nepotianus—"Gravitatem morum hilaritate frontis temperabat."‡‡ In the restored and sanctified nature was discernible, to the more instructed and penetrating eye, a mourning that may be termed natural, inasmuch as, although nature was repaired and assisted in them, it was not un-

* Captevei, IV. 1. † Purg. XXIII. ‡ Jamblich. de Pythagoric. vita, cap. 15, 16, 31.

§ De Repub. Lib. X.

|| De Legibus, Lib. VII.

¶ De Repub. Liv. III.

 Hell. IV. †† De Conformit. Voluntat. Hum. cum Div. Lib. III. 2. ‡‡ Epist. xxxv.

made or condemned utterly in any of its principles as false and vicious. There was discernible also the mourning of wisdom, the mourning of love, the mourning of piety, the mourning of penitents, the mourning of exiles, who had to meet death before they could reach their country. On each of these points, with history and the learning of the ages of faith for our guide, let us briefly dwell. And first, what is to be said respecting this natural mourning, distinct from the mourning of mere animals of earth, and yet which, in some respects, was of it, since it grew out of the relations and circumstances of the present existence? It would be difficult to find words more exact and beautiful to describe it than those which the Church uses, in that sublime prayer of preparation offered by the priest, when he confesses his unworthiness to discharge so holy an office, and beseeches God that his sins may not be the means of rendering the great sacrifice unprofitable to others: "for, O Lord," he adds, "I bear if thou vouchsafest to behold favorably, the tribulations of the people, the perils of nations, the groans of captives, the miseries of orphans, the necessities of those that travel, the wants of the weak, the despair of the languid, the defects of old men, the sighs of youths, the vows of virgins, the lamentations of widows."

Such is the view of the state of humanity which the Church presents to her minister when she supposes him about to celebrate her consoling mysteries; and it does not appear that philosophers or poets, during the middle ages, were inclined to take a different, even in their lightest compositions. Gouget remarks of the celebrated poet, Alain Chartier, that he alludes to the calamities of life, even in those pieces which he seemed at first intending to consecrate to joy alone. Thus one of them concludes:—

"Adieu chansons que volentiers chantoye
Et joyeux dictz où je me delectoye
Tel rit joyeux, qui après dolent pleure
Rien ne m'est bon, n' autre bien n' assaveure
Fors seulement l' attente que je meure;
Et me tarde que briefment viengne l'heure
Qu' après ma mort en Paradis la voye." *

"Grief" prompted him, as he says, to write his most considerable work in prose, which is entitled "Hope, or the consolations of the three virtues, Faith, Hope, and Charity."

— "Par douleur ay commencé ce livre
Je souloye ma jeunesse acquitter
A joyeuses escriptures dieter.
Or me convient antre chose tissir,
De cuer dolent ne pouroit joye yssir. "

Under a joyous title, we are often presented with serious meditations, as in the work entitled Le Passetems de tout homme et de toute femme, composed by Brother Guillaume Alexis, commonly called the good monk of Lire, an abbey in Normandy. The pastime alluded to proves to be nothing else but the miseries belonging to the human condition. The author follows man from his cradle to his death-bed, and shows, that, in every stage of his course, he is called to suffer.* Such strains used to echo under the chivalrous halls of our ancestors, even at the festal hour : for perfectly in character with them was that simple lay of Albert Graeme in Branksome Tower, when he sung of the English lady bright, that would marry the knight of Scotland.—

“ Blithely they saw the rising sun
When he shown fair on Carlisle wall ;
But they were sad ere day was done,
Though love was still the lord of all.

Do you mark how they correspond with the religious view of life ?

“ They touch the chords of joy, but low
And mournful answer notes of woe. ’

Indeed, this view of man’s condition corresponds with Nature in her noblest estate ; for they whose spirits seem most elastic, cheerful, and buoyant, by a certain apparent contradiction in their structure, are always fond of what is solemn, and of lingering amidst the tombs. And hence, to such minds, the charm of the Catholic religion, which is at one time joyous as the lark singing at heaven’s gates beneath the morning cloud ; and at another, solemn as the sound of the distant bell, or of the waving grove under the wind of night : while Protestantism is always sad or always dissipated. The spirit of Catholicism is in harmony with that of a genuine drama, which is tragic and yet infinitely mild,—a mixture of joy and sorrow. What means the Church in bidding the priest to bear in mind the sighs of youth ? It is that she has deeply observed nature ; for youth the most joyous season in life,—is that in which men are enamored with seeing sad pageants of men’s miseries, with tales of woe,—and when they take more delight in weeping than in words ; when, according to Shakespeare, they are sad as night, only from wantonness. As if they who were most capable of enjoying the rich banquet of life, found a pleasure all the while in knowing that, even on such an earth as this, they were in a world of woe. As poor Dunean says, “Their plenteous joys, wanton in fullness, seek to hide themselves in drops of sorrow.” The poet’s child is one who has, like Wilfred,

“A heart too soft, from early life,
To hold with Fortune needful strife ;
Hour after hour who loved to pore
On Shakspeare’s rich and varied lore,
But turn’d from martial scenes and light,

*Massieu, Hist. de la Poesie Française, 305.

From Falstaff's feast and Percy's flight,
 To ponder Jacques' moral strain,
 And muse with Hamlet, wise in vain;
 And weep himself to soft repose
 O'er gentle Desdemona's woes," *

It is one who might say of himself to Ossian, in the words of Delamartine, "My heart is yet warm with the fire of youth ; I have not thy years, but I have already : thy sadness." In fact, all passions to which youth is subject, end like a tragedy as Novalis says, "All defective things to which nature introduces them, end with death. So the philosophy of sensation, of fancy, and of ideas. All poesy, which is to them so dear, has a tragic tenor. All genuine jest for which they have so true a perception, has a serious foundation."† "In the primitive time of fancy," says Frederick Schlegel, "we find that the elegiac was the predominant tone of poesy, as if a melancholy remembrance of the past godly world, and heroic age, or as a sorrowful echo of the lost paradisiacal innocence and heavenly state ; or in a still higher and more general sense, as the forlorn lamentation over the blessed childhood of the whole creation, before the spiritual world had been torn asunder by divisions,—before the beginning of all evil, and the consequent calamities of nature."‡

A similar tone may be traced in the poetic compositions which were most passionately loved during the middle ages. Many of those wild and tender chants, were sad as the song of Linus, or the melancholy Carian strain on Phrygian flute—sad as the song of Hylas sung at fountains in the Mysian land, or the song of the beautiful Bormus, whose watery death was deplored by the husbandmen of Mariandyne on the flute in the middle of summer. The thoughts of men were then but little occupied with the present in comparison with the past and future ; and in this respect, the spirit of the Catholic religion would subject every one to the sneers of such writers as Athenæus, who laughs at Plato, calling him "memory's friend," ὁ τῆς μνημοσύνης φίλος. Religion, indeed, expressly recommended the mourning which springs from memory, and, in the beautiful words of St. Augustin, distinguished it from the sadness of the world. "Let us sit and weep, remembering Sion. For many weep with Babylonian tears, who also rejoice with a Babylonian joy. They rejoice in gain, and they weep for losses ; and both are of Babylon. We ought to weep but from remembering Sion. The waters of Babylon flow and pass. Let us weep by them, but beware how we enter them, lest we should be borne away and swallowed up in them. Let us sit by them and weep ; and we shall weep if we remember Sion. O that peace which we shall see with God ! O that peace and holy equality of angels ! O that beautiful spectacle, that transcendant vision !" §

Music, poetry, and painting, during the ages of faith, seem only the expression of desire, of longing ; and if any should adopt the opinion of Winkelman respect-

* Rokeby.

† Novalis Schriften, II. 233.

‡ Philosophie der Sprache, 123.

§ S. Augustini Tractat. in Psalm cxxxvi.

ing the effects of such melancholy which he ascribes to the Etrurians, and by which he attempts to account for their not having surpassed mediocrity in the fine arts, and should, on the same grounds, deny that our ancestors could have possessed the soft emotion which renders the spirit perfectly susceptible of the beautiful, I would refer him to the reply which is made by Pignotti, in his "History of Tuscany," where he observes, "That the acute and deep sensations which Winkelman acknowledges belong to the melancholy disposition, are so far from being, as he pretends, incompatible, that they are, on the contrary, inseparably connected with a lively imagination, the first origin of the fine arts, and that melancholy and religious compassion characterize the greatest masterpieces which enrich the Vatican. To the deep humanity of the Catholic religion belonged necessarily the melancholy of compassion for the natural calamities of man. That sorrow, to which kings would bow, was a worthy cause for defiling the serenest eye. Every cloister and every castle had its tale, that had made mourn both wise and simple; for, however calamitous, all events were to be related, that none of the gifts of Heaven might be concealed from men. And now, if I were to select examples from the chronicles of the middle ages, "Methinks," as Homer says, "the light of the sun would set upon our weeping." Lionel Woodville, Bishop of Salisbury, died through sorrow and pity for the fate of others. This member of an illustrious and unhappy family, was brother to Edward the Fourth's queen, the most unfortunate in English history. His own fortunes, being a Churchman, were not overthrown in the wreck of that family; but when Buckingham, who had married one of his sisters, was beheaded in the market-place of Salisbury, the Bishop did not long survive the grief of this last affliction. Life was full of lamentations, which found an echo in hearts, which only had more concern for others, from having renounced self-love. Who knows not these things?—who has not pity?—would be the language of those who might "feel themselves," as Dante says, "on all sides well squared to fortune's blows."

"Non obtusa adeo gestamus pectora."

We shall see, in a future place, that this was not a sterile compassion; but it will serve, at present, to explain why, even from natural causes, the noblest spirits, during the ages of faith, appeared in the character of mourners; and that they did so, we have the express attestation of history. "He was of a melancholy turn of mind," says Fontenelle, of the great Pierre Corneille; and, speaking of John de Medicis, Machiavel says, "Though there was a little melancholy in his disposition, he knew how to please in conversation."* "Rarò quidem lætus," says Petrarch, describing the state of his own mind during the course of his correspondence with Socrates, "mœstus sæpe."† Le Banni de Liesse was the title assumed by John Meschinot sieur de Mortieres, a French poet, contemporary of Chastellain, to express his affliction for the misfortunes of the dukes of Bretagne.* Antonio Fulgoso, that noble poet of Genoa, was surnamed Fileremo, on account of his fondness for seclusion; and Hugues Salel, in the reign of Francis I., in his poem "On the Misery and Inconstancy of Human Life," lays it down as a maxim, that we should often choose mournful subjects for contemplation, because long continued joy becomes wearisome.† It is questionable, whether Shakespeare meant to convey a censure when he speaks of one "so full of unmannerly sadness in his youth." Triste et pensif, was the device adopted by Michael Marot; and the same tone of melancholy which Charles Duke of Orleans ascribes to himself, in that affecting poem, which begins—

* Hist. of Florence, liv. iv.

† Præf. in Epist. Pam.

"Laissez moy penser à mon aise; Helas! donnez m'en le loisir—" and which seemed so constant and attendant on pre-eminence, that every man in high honor seemed, in his very countenance, to proclaim the justice of S. Bonaventure's exclamation, "Quis in honore sine dolore esse poterit?" That tone is spoken of by Fenelon, in describing James III. of England, as something full of dignity and meekness: he terms it, "Son sérieux doux et complaisant."‡ Dante had no need to paint from his imagination in that affecting description of one spirit that he meets in purgatory—

"Behold that lofty shade, who this way tends,
And seems too woe-begone to drop a tear,
How yet the regal aspect he retains."§

If these few instances are not sufficient to show the general character of noble minds, in this respect, during the middle ages, it will be easy for any one to multiply them, by referring to our ancient literature, which supplies similar portraits at almost every page. This melancholy of Catholics during the ages of faith, whether considered as the melancholy of genius, of honor, of compassion, of love, or of piety, had a distinctive character, which totally separated it from the gloom of heathen or modern times. It was the melancholy recommended by the Apostle, "quasi tristes, semper autem gaudentes:" it was without malice, rancour, pusillanimity, despair, tepidity, or wandering of mind; and, therefore, it was not involved in the condemnation passed by holy men, like the Abbot Raban Maur, though that were directed against melancholy.|| The necessity for human suffering, so obvious to reason, that the Pythagoreans used to say, "Men ought to welcome punishment, since they came into the world only in order to be punished,"¶ is involved in the mystery of the fall; and during ages of faith, the light affliction

* Gouget Bibliotheque Française, IX. 404.

† Gouget Bibliotheque Française, Tom. XII. 8.

‡ Epitres de Fenelon, 103.

§ Purg. XVIII.

|| Rabani Mauri de Institutione Clericorum, lib. iii. cap. 38.

¶ Jamblich. de Pythagoric. vita, cap. 18.

which arose from it, for a moment, was received by mourners with pious resignation. Let us hear them speak of it, that we may understand what a deep sense they entertained of this mystery. The master of the Sentences, in laying down a threefold liberty, observes, that the last which he terms the liberty from misery can only be obtained in the future beatitude.* Hugo de St. Victor wrote a treatise, entitled, "Cur flet qui gaudet," alluding to the joy of the Church, which, in this valley of tears, is never without weeping; and the holy Fathers teach, that the perfect prayer is mixed with joy and sadness. "The sweetness of honey," says St. Jerome, "was to be tempered by art before it could be offered in sacrifice to God, for nothing voluptuous pleases God—nothing which has not in it something of austere truth. The paschal of Christ was to be eaten with bitter herbs."† Nay, even in relation to the mere temporal felicity of man, mark how mysterious a thing is woe.

Cardan could attest the fact, which furnishes an axiom in the science of the saints; for, he says, "sine malorum experientia nihil esse dulce homini."‡ The poet goes further still, where he shows how soon men begin to loathe the taste of sweetness, whereof "a little more than a little is by much too much." Unheeding such refined considerations, men, in the middle ages, were at all times ready to welcome sorrow as a blessed thing: either receiving it in the spirit, and, with the words of S. Lupe, when he saluted Attila, exclaiming, "Salve, flagellum Dei,"—or in reference only to the future compensation which would follow it. If they pretended not to be able to walk erect on the waves of the tribulation of this life, as our Lord walked on the sea, yet, at least, they felt that they could (as St. Augustin says) be borne over them on the wood of the cross, and on the model of Christ crucified. "Scientia sanctorum est," says St. Bernard, "hic temporaliter cruciari, et delectari in æternum."§ "Lazarus, merely because he bore sadness and affliction with courage, obtained the same abode as the great patriarch, whose life had been one series of the most brilliant actions. I will add to this," continues St. Chrysostom, "one consideration which, from being new and perhaps foreign from the common manner of thinking, is no less true; it is this, that even when we should have accomplished some eminent deed of virtue, if labor, if danger, if misfortune, be not, in some measure, mixed with it, the recompense will not be great. The Scripture does not say, that each one will be recompensed in proportion to his virtuous actions; but rather in proportion to the quantum of adversity which he will have supported. Thus, St. Paul enumerating the subjects of his glorying, gloried chiefly in his having suffered so much; for, after saying, 'Are they ministers of Jesus Christ? I dare to say it, I am more;' and to prove that he is really superior to them, he does not say, I preached the word of God to so many millions of men; but, keeping silence as to his virtues and his other

* Petri Lombardi. lib. xi. Distinct. 25.

‡ Prudentia Civilis, cap. 4.

† S. Hieronymi Epist. XXIII.

§ Serm. 21 de divers.

merits, he gives a picture of all the calamities he has endured :—"I have lived in the midst of labors, in prisons, and the rest.' Do you see what sufferings were here, and how many occasions of glorifying. Presently, he adds to these the acts of virtue, and, in enumerating them, he makes us see that still sufferings are to him a more solid title than all the rest, for it is always in the same sense. 'Which of you is sick, and I am not also ;' he does not say, and I do not endeavor to heal him ; but, and I am not also. 'Which of you is scandalized, and I am not consumed interiorly ;' he does not say, and I do not deliver him from the scandal : but, and I do not take share in his pains, and in his sorrow."*

"There is no motive," says St. Gregory Nazianzen, in his letter to Thecla, "more proper to make us courageously endure calamities, and to raise us above the generality of men in affliction, than the remembrance of the promises which we made to God, and the hopes which we conceived when we first embraced the true philosophy. Was it, then, our object to live in abundance and in riches, to taste the vain joys and the insane delights of the world, to strew our path with flowers ; or rather, on the contrary, did we not expect tribulations, pains, anguish, and to endure all things in hopes of future good ? Ah ! it is this last lot, not the former, which we were taught to reckon upon. Let us take care, then, how we violate the covenant that we made with God, by wishing to possess, at the same time, the advantages and the goods of this world, and to preserve the hope of the future. Let us leave our conventions standing, and let us support all the woes of life, in hope of the joys of eternity." Although the whole subject of human suffering was involved in mystery, yet the advantages resulting from it were most clearly discernible with the light of faith. "One single 'thanks be to God !' and 'blessed be God !' uttered in adversity, is of more avail," says Father Avila, "than a thousand thanksgivings in the day of prosperity ;" and, therefore, as St. Aloysius Gonzaga used to say, "There is no more evident mark of a man's being a saint, and of the number of the elect, than to behold him of a devout life, and, at the same time, exercised with desolations, sufferings, and tribulations." Ah ! how much wiser Job in calamity than Adam in Paradise ! The one says, Sicut Domino placuit ita factum est ! the other, "Vocem tuam audiavi et abscondi me !"† But as this will appear still more clearly when we have proceeded further, let it be observed here, that the advantages of suffering were not altogether concealed from the ancients, who could only judge by the light of reason. Would you hear the heroic chant of the poet, whose lofty muse was to inspire conquerors ? O, Son of Philanor ! you would have led an obscure life, and have never won a glorious renown wasting your strength in ignoble contests in your domestic circle, like the cock that conquers in its familiar court, unless banishment, consequent on an insurrection, had driven you from your country—

* St. Chrysostom, Epist. to Olympias Deaconess.

† Drexelius de Conformitate Human. Voluntatis cum Divin. lib. iv. 2.

*Εἰ μὴ σταδίῳ ἀντιάνειρα
κνωβίᾳς ἄμερβε πάτρα*

Now you are a glorious victor in the Olympic contest, as well as having received twice the Pythic, and once the Isthmian crown.* Without labors, no one was ever illustrious nor ever shall be.† If there be any happiness with men, it does not appear without labor;‡ but a life void of danger was granted neither to Peleus Æacides, nor to the divine Cadmus, yet they are both said to have obtained the highest felicity of mortals; who both heard the Muses singing in the mountains, and within the seven-gated Thebes; who both entertained the gods with hospitable rites; who both beheld the kingly sons of Saturn on their golden seats, and received from them nuptial gifts.§ The lessons of the ancient sage were to the same effect. Socrates speaks of banishment and bad health, as among the few causes which can enable men to pursue philosophy with a true spirit. "There remains, then," saith he, "but a very small number of men consorting with philosophy in a worthy manner; either men who have been punished with exile, of generous manners, and well educated, through a want of the causes which corrupt, so that the philosophic nature remains in them, or else men whom the bridle of our dear friend Theages is able to restrain; for Theages is surrounded, and furnished on all sides with things sufficient to make him fall from philosophy," such as riches, friends, honors, &c.; "but the continual suffering of his body from bad health, restrains him from political affairs and corruptions."|| Poets might have found examples in their own walk to justify a similar conclusion respecting what the child of the muses ought to desire. The ancients had instances before them, like that of Dante, who finished his sublime work while in exile. wandering and unhappy, through the different states of Italy.

The disputants in Plato's VIIth Book on Laws, agree in the opinion that the right and most happy life takes a middle course between pleasure and grief, neither pursuing the former nor avoiding the latter, but desiring the medium; and that all men should fly from the life of unmingled pleasure, as well as that of pain. Aristotle admits, that in sufferings the beautiful may shine forth, when any one bears great calamities with cheerfulness, not through insensibility, but through greatness of mind.¶ And Plutarch lays it down as a criterion to determine what progress we make in virtue, to see whether we prefer mourning to festivity; or, to use his own words, whether we incline to excess in the Dorian harmony, which is grave and devout, or in the Lydian, which is gay and joyous. With respect to the ideas of the heroic world, if, on the one hand, the Homeric heroes speak of the gods having giving them evils and having ordained such things wishing them evil; on the other, the hero of Sophocles, Polynices, recognizes in his misfortunes the hand of an avenging deity; and Archidamus, the Spartan king, proclaims adversity

* Pindar, Olymp. XII.

† Id. Pyth. Ode V.

‡ Id. Pyth. Od. XII.

§ Id. Pyth. Od. III. || Plato de Repub. Lib. VI. ¶ Ethic. Nic. I. 10.  Æd. Col. 1299.

to be the school of virtue. "Let us not suppose," said he, "that there is any great difference between one man and another ; but that he is the best who has been brought up in the greatest necessities."*

Finally, let those who object to the Catholic view of suffering and penance, hear the remarkable words of Plato, explaining in what manner it may be often for the eternal advantage of men to choose mortification. "A person," saith he, "acting unjustly and escaping punishment and all suffering on account of his injustice, and congratulating himself upon such exemption, would be more miserable and deluded than a sick person who should rejoice in not undergoing the operation which alone could effect the cure of his body. In fine, the not receiving punishment for evil is the first and greatest of all calamities ; so that if rhetoric be of any use to one who is unjust, it can only be by enabling him to expose fully and manfully his own injustice, in order that it may receive the proper punishment, whether of chains, or banishment, or death ; that so his soul may be healed in the same manner as he would offer his limb to the knife or fire of the surgeon, in order to have it restored to soundness. Therefore each person should be his own accuser, and should beware of concealing his wickedness, and should employ all his rhetoric to this end, that he may be loosed from the greatest evil of injustice."†

But to return to the phenomena presented in the Christian life, we have observed, that in the restored and sanctified nature, during ages of faith, was discernible, not only this natural mourning from a sense of the sufferings of humanity ; but also a mourning which may be termed of wisdom, as if belonging, of necessity, to all peculiar depth and penetration of mind. St. Thomas says, that the third beatitude, or that of tears, answers to the gift of science ; implying, that wisdom and philosophy prepare us for sorrow. "The gift of science," says St. Augustin, "brings the third beatitude, beati qui lugent ; for it enables men to learn the evils to which they are bound."‡

Many philosophers have remarked with Rhasis, that the finest wits and most generous spirits are before others obnoxious to melancholy : "qui sunt subtilis ingenii et multæ perspicacitatis de facile incidunt in melancholiam;" and one ancient author affirms that melancholy advanceth men's conceits more than any humor whatsoever.

The love of wisdom, indeed, is said in the unerring text, to dispel sadness like wine and music ;§ but yet we read in the same, that the heart of the wise is where is sadness. In fact, as St. Anselm remarks, "quamvis delectabiles et dulces sint sapientia et dilectio, tamen in hujus vitæ lubrico generant dolorem et amaritudinem aliquando : quæ quanto veriores et majores sunt, tanto hoc faciunt rarius, et tanto gravius."|| Albert Durer's celebrated design representing melancholy personified, shows a woman surrounded with the instruments of science, and occupied with its problems. Such was that sage of whom the poet says,

* Thucyd. Lib. I. c. 84.

† Plato Gorgias.

‡ De Serm. Dom. in monte.

§ Eccles. XL. 20.

|| Anselmi Epist. lib. XI. 50.

———“ His aspirations
 Have been beyond the dwellers of the earth,
 And they have only taught him what we know,
 That knowledge is not happiness, and science
 But an exchange of ignorance for that Which is another kind of ignorance.”*

Yet, to the discerning and attentive eye, nature herself seemed to indicate mourning in characters that the wise could read. In some flowers, like that of the bean, Varro says, lugubrious letters are visible, and some suppose that it was on account of them the bean was forbidden food to the Pythagoreans. “Whither goest thou, grief?” say the Spaniards, “where I am wont;” and again they say, “when born I wept, and every day shows why.”

“In the nations of the south,” says Don Savedra, who could judge from long observation, “the men are melancholy and profound in penetrating the secrets of nature.”† But so it is with man; and his noble nature, undaunted by the prospect of sorrow, impels him no less to contemplate; and as the poet says, “while the same honor ceases to belong to the flowers of the spring, and the moon shines not with one unchanging countenance, he fatigues his lesser mind with eternal councils.”‡ Hence, the rapid course of life afflicts the wise man more than others, “for who knows most, him loss of time most grieves.” In the middle ages, the term sad was generally applied to every one who made profession of learning; for it was remembered then by all, that wisdom is not found in the land of those who live a sweet life.§ Without any indication of a troubled mind, a student might expect to have been often designated as was Hamlet by his mother: “But look, where sadly the poor wretch comes reading.” Painters would represent him making of one hand for his cheek a couch, with frequent sighs. Reading in the middle ages was not pursued as a light desultory amusement; it was the food of those thoughts that wander through eternity.

A French writer of great eminence has made the remark, that when nature bestows sublimity of genius, she accompanies it with that condition, “Be a great but an unhappy man.” Religion herself held out no other prospect. “False prophets,” says St. Jerome, “always promise sweet things, and please for a time. Truth is bitter, and they who preach it are filled with bitterness. In the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth, the Pasch of the Lord is celebrated, and it is eaten with bitterness and sorrow.”|| Hence the shallow and ignoble sentence that “it is better sometimes to rejoice in error than always to grieve on account of truth.” There was observable also, it has been said, the mourning of love; which, as St. Anselm says, “like wisdom not unfrequently generates in the present life bitterness and sorrow.” Plato said, that love and melancholy are near relations.¶ If one might venture to illustrate this theme, renewing the memory or custom of

* Manfred II.

§ Job,

† Christian Prince II. 380.

|| Advers. Jovin. Lib. II.

‡ Hor. Carm. lib. II. 11.

¶ De Repub. Lib. IX.

love-tuned song, I know indeed that full many piteous stories do remain from the period of these extraordinary ages when every aspiration of the human heart was often sanctified and pure. But it would be long and out of place to speak of those who, like Tancredie, had no other fault but love ; which, by unadvised sight, had been “ Bred in the dangers of adventurous arms,

And nurs'd with griefs, with sorrows, woes, and harms.”

Since, of such love, it is not fitting here to speak, let us turn to a more fruitful source of mourning during the ages of faith, which will enable us to penetrate far deeper than we have hitherto done into their spirit and genius ; for as yet we have but merely touched, as it were, upon the surface, and seen nought but what the history of men at all times might be found to supply.

CHAPTER III.

 THOU Almighty Father ! As angels of their will tender unto thee meet sacrifice, circling thy throne with loud hosannas ; so may the offering of theirs be duly made to thee by saintly men on earth ;” such was the prayer that rose incessantly to heaven wherever the Catholic Church had children, and these few words are sufficient to show with what spirit and conduct they regarded and received sorrow. The mourning of piety is a new and abundant theme, which to philosophers themselves, might be presented as one full of interest, and abounding in matter for observation and profound thought. Faith taught men the necessity for mourning, as a means of spiritual purification and of ascent to God. To the eye of faith the state of mourning was therefore a privileged and blessed state ; and hence the priest, when about to celebrate the sacred mysteries, on taking the manipule uses this prayer : “ Merear, Domine, portare manipulum fletus et doloris, ut cum exultatione recipiam mercedem laboris.”

All writers of the spiritual life have shown, that those who are to be united to God must suffer many afflictions, internal as well as external, spiritual as well as sensible, in order that both parts may be perfectly purified ; for, without such suffering and crosses, there cannot be the complete union and joy of the blessed.* “The perfect,” says St. John of the Cross, “have to pass through the night of the senses, the night of the spirit, the night of the memory, and the night of the will, which four nights represent the four kinds of mortification which they must en-

* St. John of the Cross. The Ascent of Mount Carmel, the obscure night of the soul.

ture. Because they are accepted of God—temptation must prove them.” How wondrously conformable to the dictates of Divine wisdom was that maxim of Pythagoras,* where he said that “conquerors and those on whom leaves are thrown are polluted.” Hence, no doubt the phenomenon which has so often elicited the remark which is found in even the ancient poet, that “the wicked are sometimes more fortunate than the good.”†

What examples were beheld in the calamities which befell St. Louis, René of Anjou, Count Elzear de Sabran, St. Elizabeth, Henry VI. of England, many of the popes and other saintly personages during the middle ages. Those arms of the Braschi family, Boreas blowing on the rose, symbolical of the life of the holy Pope Pius VI., might be adopted as a general emblem of the lot of goodness in this perverse world. The history of St. Francis Xavier furnishes a memorable instance. “The king of Japan, who was converted by the preaching of the saint, had enjoyed the utmost prosperity while an idolater. No sooner did he renounce idolatry, and embrace the Christian faith, than it pleased God to visit him with all kinds of calamities. Two months after his baptism, his subjects rose against him and drove him from his throne. When the Gentiles reproached him with having changed his religion, and said that this was the cause of his misfortunes, he made a vow at the foot of the altar to live and die a Christian; adding, “that if all Japan and all Europe, if the fathers of the society and the Pope himself were to renounce Jesus Christ that he would confess him to the last hour of his life; and that he would be always ready to shed his blood in testimony to his faith.”‡ Still more remarkable is the answer which St. Theresa made to a devout merchant from whom she had received an alms, and the events which followed in that man's life. “I have recommended you in my prayers as you desired,” said she to him, “and it has been revealed to me, that your name is written in the book of life, and as a sign of the truth of what I say, you will never prosper again in your worldly affairs.” So it turned out: his ships were successively wrecked and sunk; becoming unable to pay his debts, he was delivered from prison only through the esteem which his creditors entertained for his piety; and being thus stript of all worldly goods, but contented with the grace of God alone, he closed his days in the odor of sanctity; thus disproving too the testimony of the Greek poet when he said, that “the soul of the man who was once prosperous, when he falls into calamity, wanders over the past pleasures.”§ To facts of this kind, however, the holy fathers allude in words that denote how easy it was for men to misunderstand the phenomena. “The winds,” say they, “rise upon this ocean; you behold the evil prospering and the good in distress. There is a temptation, there is a flood, and your soul saith, ‘O God, God, is this thy justice that the wicked should prosper and that the good should be in distress?’ And God will reply to you, ‘Is

* Porphyrius de Vita Pythagoræ XXXI.

† Bouhours, Vie de St. F. Xavier II. 230.

‡ Eurip. Helen. 1213.

§ Eurip. Troades, 640.

this your faith? Is this what I promised to you, or is it for this that you are a Christian, that you should prosper in this world?"

"Be not astonished," says Louis of Blois, "and murmur not against God. Refer to the scriptures; there you will see how the devil was heard, and the apostle not heard? In what manner were the demons heard? They sought leave to enter the swine, and leave was granted to them. The devil sought leave to tempt Job, and he received it. In what manner was the apostle not heard? Thrice he besought the Lord that the cause of his suffering might be taken from him; and his answer was, 'Sufficit tibi gratia mea, nam virtus in infirmitate perficitur.' He heard him whom he intended to condemn, and he heard not him whom he wished to save."*

As far as respects external calamities, reason itself can discern their utility. Heaven has many ways of conferring happiness, and adversity is one of them. This, no doubt, Pindar saw when he sung,

———— Πολλὰ δ' ὁδοί
Σὺν θεοῖς εὐπραγία.†

"It is the nature of things," says De Haller, "and all history attests it, that a too long enjoyment of the highest fortune contains in itself the seeds of destruction, that by the softness, the luxury, and the indifference which are its usual results, it ends in enervating the most vigorous races, and in extinguishing that force of soul, along with which all other goods of the earth are lost." If this was often true in reference even to the interests of the present life, much more frequently was it so with regard to the more important concern of the soul's health and condition for eternity. The deep sense which men entertained of this fact during the ages of faith, has given rise to a tone in their whole literature, which has often struck the modern readers, who are constrained to admire the imperturbable resignation with which the most unforeseen and dreadful calamities were endured. The page of history is often suddenly illuminated with bright examples of this kind, which seldom fail to charm even the most insensible: and certainly the contrast which is presented in this respect by our annals to the whole of heathen literature, must excite a surprise not unminged with the highest pleasure. The ancient poets seem never to have conceived the idea of a spirit of resignation and sacrifice, which would soften and sanctify calamity. Hecuba becomes impious in her misfortune, and says, that to call upon the gods is to invoke evil allies, though it may have a certain form of propriety to appeal to them in misfortune.‡ In the poet's mind it was impossible that any feeling but that of the utmost horror could be excited in the breast of one who, having been the mother of Hector, might now in her misfortunes and subjection, be doomed to guard the keys of the gate, or to prepare food.§ It is easy to see what an advantage the poet of the middle ages would have had here in following the common inspiration of religion. In fact, there is nothing more remarkable in their whole history and literature, than the astonishing change which Christianity had wrought in the hearts and understanding of men with regard to the contemplation or experience of misfortune. "When Fouquet's mother heard of the arrest of her son, she threw herself on her knees," says the Abbé de Choisy, "and raised up her hands to heaven. 'I thank you, O my God,' she cried, 'I have always prayed to you for his salvation, and lo, here is the way opened!'" Catharine, queen of England, used to say, that she would rather have adverse than prosperous fortune, for that the former never wanted consolation; whereas, in the latter, both mind and judgment were often wanting.

* Ludovic. Bloisii Tractat. in Ps. lxxxv. † Olymp. VIII. ‡ Eurip. Troades. 473. § Ibid. 494.

When the venerable Mother de Chantal came to Moulins, she had much conversation with the Duchess de Montmorency, who was there residing in the convent of the Visitation. The holy woman expressed her joy that the duchess should have made such good use of her misfortunes. "My misfortunes," replied Madame de Montmorency, "have not been the sole cause of my retreat: I have always felt an indifference for the world, even when I was at the court. My misfortunes found me in this disposition, and I have received them as means granted by God, to enable me to fulfil the wish of my early youth, to live in retreat, unknown, and without other care, but that of my salvation. I have endeavored to place myself in this state, and I have lived now for many years as you see me in this house, hoping that Heaven will have pity upon me."*

The chief of modern bards who, in tales of prose, without a rival stands, has chosen for matter of his song, the wisdom and peace of a blessed mourner contrasted with the sadness of one who judged with the world's mind, where he describes the meeting of Bruce and his royal sister, the Abbess Isabel, in her Convent of St. Bride:

"The Bruce survey'd the humble cell,
And this is thine, poor Isabel!
That pallet-conch, and naked wall,
For room of state, and bed of pall;
For costly robes and jewels rare,
A string of beads and zone of hair;
And for the trumpet's sprightly call
To sport or banquet, grove or hall,
The bell's grim voice divides thy care,
'Twixt hours of penitence and prayer!"

The noble abbess consoles him respecting his past misfortunes, adding,

"And grieve not that on Pleasure's stream,
No more I drive in giddy dream,
For Heaven the erring pilot knew,
And from the gulph the vessel drew.
Tried me with judgments, stern and great,

* Marsollier, Vie de M^{de}. Chantal II. 1810.

My house's ruin, thy defeat,
 Poor Nigel's death ; till, tamed, I own
 My hopes are fixed on heaven alone ;
 Nor e'er shall earthly prospects win
 My heart to this vain world of sin."

Finally, she sends her reply to Lord Ronald, who knew not of her having taken the veil—

"This answer be to Ronald given :
 The heart he asks is fix'd on heaven.
 My love was like a summer-flower,
 That withered in the wintry hour ;
 Born but of vanity and pride,
 And with these sunny visions died.
 Brother, for little space, farewell !
 To other duties warns the bell."

Then follows the lament of the worldly heart—

"Lost to the world, King Robert said,
 When he had left the royal maid—
 Lost to the world, by lot severe—
 Oh ! what a gem lies buried here ;
 Nipp'd by misfortune's cruel frost,
 The buds of fair affection lost."*

Would you observe the same resignation in the mourning of heroes ? When the master of Santiago beheld his forces overwhelmed by the Moors on the mountains of Malaga, his cry was, "O, Lord of Hosts ! from thy wrath do I fly, not from these infidels ; they are but instruments in thy hands, to chastise us for our sins !" "This defeat," says one of the devout historians of Spain, "was to teach them, that the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong, but that God alone giveth the victory ;" and Father Antonio Agapida asserts it to be a punishment for the avarice of the Spanish warriors, who were intent upon spoil. It is the same spirit in the Saxon Chronicle, where it describes the dreadful pestilence and famine which desolated England in the year 1087, concluding with this reflection. "Alas ! how wretched and how rueful a time was there ! Who is so hard-hearted as not to weep at such misfortunes ? Yet such things happen for men's sins,—that they will not love God and justice." While recording the temper and views with which sufferings were borne by St. Louis, by Alfred, and by many other heroic and saintly kings of the middle ages, history is constrained to assume a tone of sanctity which is strangely at variance with its generally profane character. Sometimes the details are very attractive : as those relating to that affecting scene which was presented at the Council of Rheims, in which Pope Innocent presided, and before which St. Bernard preached. Philip, the eldest son of King Louis-le-Gros, had lately met with a tragic death by an accident; and the King was now proceeding to Rheims to have his second son crowned, but the loss of the former had overwhelmed him with affliction. The King, Queen, and young Prince, attended by the Abbot Suger, and by the whole court, arrived in that city on the 23rd of October. The next day, the King came to the Council, followed by a crowd of nobles, and leaning on the shoulder of Raoul, Count de Vermandois, Grand Seneschal of France, like a man oppressed with sadness; he mounted into the Pope's tribune, and after kissing his feet, sat down in a chair, which was a little lower than that of his Holiness. He spoke of the death of his son in a few words, which drew tears from the eyes of all present; at every word he spake his tears flowed fast, and all the bitterness of his heart appeared in his countenance. The Pope replied before the Council—"Great King, you must raise your mind and all your thoughts to the King of kings, to adore his judgments, and receive with perfect submission the events of his Divine Providence. It is he who has placed the Crown of France upon your head; it is by his will that you command this noble and generous nation; but he requires you to believe that every thing occurs by his permission, for it is not a blind divinity which can be ignorant of any thing that passes here below; and though there are often great injustices, these events are always just on his part, and the effects either of his justice or of his mercy. You know, great Prince, that prosperity and adversity are the ordinary means which he employs in conducting his children; and this alternative, which he sheds on the whole course of our life, is an effect of his highest wisdom, in order that man may not attach himself to the figure of this world which passes away, lest, if he were always prosperous, he might forget that this is a place of exile, and that all our vows and desires should tend to the celestial Jerusalem. We have no secure dwelling in this world: we are only like travellers, who pass on, and who proceed to their country, which is Heaven. Then, all who have lived according to the spirit, and who have mortified their passions, will reign with God, in the possession of eternal happiness. Your son has been taken, while he was yet in simplicity and innocence; and the kingdom of heaven is particularly destined for those whom the corruption of the world had not infected. Consider how David ceased to mourn as soon as his son was dead, and how he wisely submitted to the ordinance of Heaven. I conjure you, then, to moderate this excessive grief, and to banish this overwhelming sadness, which appears on your countenance, and which arises only from an affliction which is a little too human. Remember that Heaven has left you other sons. It is for you to console us strangers, driven from our country, and become, as it were, wanderers from land to land. You have already done so, in a manner worthy of your piety. You are the first of the Christian Princes to whom we are indebted for hospitality. May Heaven recompense you as you deserve, and crown you with an everlasting happiness, and a happy life, which will be no more subject to death, and a holy joy, which no sorrow shall ever more disturb."

* Lord of the Isles, IV.

With these words, the Pope arose, and absolved the soul of the deceased Prince ; and then the Council was adjourned till the next day. The King appeared consoled. The discourse of the Holy Father had made an impression on his understanding and on his heart. He retired, in great peace, to the Abbey of St. Remy, where he had taken up his lodging.

The sages of the cloister kept men mindful of the end for which all human felicity is chequered with sorrow. I remember once, while spending some days in a certain monastery, where I was received with wondrous benignity, that one venerable Father, of great age, used to come to my chamber every evening, when he would converse with me for a short time. "Our sovereign," he said to me one night, "who is beloved by all his subjects as a pious, just, and amiable prince, has no son. Ah! see how the condition of man, in his best estate, has always some dark side, in order to remind him that his true country is not in this world. Again, with respect to ourselves, what a happy land is our beloved country—what an industrious innocent people ! During thirty-seven years that I have lived in this forest, no deed of violence has ever been committed. What a combination of blessings do we enjoy ? A wise, humane government ; no national debt ; no want of freedom ; a delicious climate ; a fertile soil ! Such is our state to-day ; but when our sovereign dies,—dies without an heir,—what is to be our fate ? This only we know for certain, that bliss may not remain long with mortals, that here we have no abiding home, that there is nothing secure—nothing durable." To cite instances of misfortune having been the means of conferring great spiritual good, would be an unnecessary task : but yet there is one example in the history of France so remarkable, so associated with themes that should be dear and precious, that I cannot pass on without first attending to it. Pélisson, confined in a dungeon in the Bastille, applied himself to the study of the Holy Scriptures and the Fathers, and became convinced of the truth of the Catholic religion. He, and La Fontaine, who was wholly depending upon patronage, were the two young men who came forward to defend Fouquet, the moment he was thrown into prison and proscribed, when all his creatures and all the courtiers abandoned him. Pélisson, from the Bastille, sent forth Discourses in his favor, which have been compared with those of Cicero: he left nothing untried to help his friend—"le premier entre les généreux." Poetry, eloquence, glory, religion, even menaces, were employed to move the king. Perhaps, if it were lawful to indulge in such speculations, it was for this noble virtue, that Pélisson was rewarded by conversion, and La Fontaine, by the gift of repentance. The former, from this happy moment, abandoned his former trivial compositions, and wrote no more, excepting for God and for his Church. As he had neither paper, pens, or ink, he used to cut off little pieces of the lead casement, with which he used to write down his thoughts. While in prison many learned persons dedicated their works to him.

Nothing could disturb the tranquillity of his soul, for mourning had enabled him to view every object from the height of faith. One of his Odes was written during a great storm, in the Bastile :—"Rude and terrible blast, thou only assaultest my prison ; while on the sea, how much greater cause of fear ! Celestial faith, whose ardor elevates and inflames me ; thou teachest me that this weak body is nothing but the dwelling of my soul. Others may well fear a cruel shipwreck. Rude and terrible blast, thou only assaultest my prison." Another Ode is addressed to the sun : "I behold thee, O Sun ! advancing with royal splendor ; but another object, greater than thee, occupies all my thoughts : I feel it ; it is in my heart : before it, thy splendid beams grow pale, and thy light resembles a shadow. By it I live ; by it thou runnest thy course, and bringest night and day. Depart, O Sun ! whither thou art summoned ; I have no regard, no discourse, excepting for its immortal light." Again :—"Rise, my soul, above the earth, and above the pride of profane mortals. Contemplate the saints, whose long fervor, imitating the labor of the heavenly Saviour, sustains their spirit with celestial hopes." Again :—"The example of Godeau has inspired me with the desire of consecrating my genius, and my voice to God. I behold a thousand learned men, whose verses have power to reign over kings, and to give to their names a deathless renown. Mortals, who possess this precious gift, too long have ye flattered the princes of the earth ; begin, at length, to praise the Monarch of Heaven." Again :—"Sweet nightingales, who return every year to sing in these groves, consecrate your charming voices to the glory of God, who has endowed you with them. Bright flowers of the fresh season ! do not present yourself to my sight—you render the earth too lovely : I wish to love only heaven." Again :—"Double bars, with bolts unnumbered—triple gates, strongly locked, to souls truly wicked, you represent hell !—but to innocent souls, you are only wood, stone, and iron." Upon his deliverance from the Bastile, after some delay, in consequence of hearing of the intended promotion which awaited him, he, at length, embraced the Catholic religion, in the subterraneous church of Chartres, in the year 1670. The same day, he wrote an affecting letter to the King ; and on the following, retired to the Abbey of La Trappe, and remained there during ten days, leading the life of a holy anchorite : his piety affected every beholder. Ever afterwards, he was in the habit of hearing mass daily,—of receiving the communion on all festivals,—of making frequent retreats,—of delivering some prisoners every year : he was the father of orphans, and the protector of the weak : he made considerable presents to several churches, chiefly to mark his veneration for the mystery of the eucharist. Amongst others, he gave a silver lamp weighing two thousand pounds, to the Sisters of the Visitation, to burn night and day before the blessed sacrament. "Happy captivity !" cried Fenelon, alluding to him in the discourse which he pronounced on entering the French academy, "Happy captivity ! salutary bonds ! which reduced, under the yoke of faith, this mind too long independent. During this period of leisure, he sought in tradition for arms to combat truth ; but truth conquered him, and revealed itself to his soul, with all its charms. He left his prison, honored with the esteem and graces of his King ; but, what is much more, he left it, being already in his heart a humble child of the Church.”*

Of the necessity for mourning in the spiritual life, men were well convinced in the ages of faith ; but its source was far deeper and more mysterious than the mere present utility which resulted from it to the soul. “Augustin and Jerome belong to these latter ages of the world,” says a philosopher, in casting a glance over the history of the human mind. “One discovers in them an order of ideas, and a manner of thinking, unknown to antiquity. Christianity has made a chord to vibrate in their hearts which till then had been mute. It has created men of revery, of sadness, of disgust, of restlessness, who have no refuge but in eternity.”—“The present life is sweet, and full of much pleasure ; yet not to all men, but to those only who are attached to it.” It is St. Chrysostom who speaks thus :—“For if any one were to look up to heaven, and contemplate what wondrous things are there, immediately he would despise this world, and esteem it of no value. The beauty of bodies, so long as no greater beauty is discerned, excites admiration ; but if any thing more excellent were to appear, the former would be despised. And if we should wish to behold that beauty, and to consider the form of the celestial kingdom, we should thenceforth be loosed from the bonds of this world.”†

“O quam sordet terra,” cries a great Saint, “quando cœlum aspicio !” And so says St. Augustin, after conversing with his mother, Monica, at Ostia, on the beatitude of the saints in Heaven, “Mundus iste nobis vilnerat cum omnibus delectationibus suis.”—“The bonds of this world,” he says, in another place, “have a true asperity and a false sweetness, a sure grief, an uncertain pleasure, hard labor, timid rest, things full of misery, and a hope void of happiness.”‡ Thus, “Not alone the creature groaneth and travelleth in pain, but also they who have the first fruits of the Spirit groan within themselves, expecting the adoption of the sons of God ;”§ “He who does not mourn as a stranger,” says St. Augustin, “will never rejoice as a citizen.”|| The holy Church, in her prayer to God, says, that his people labor under continual tribulations.¶ Let us proceed to inquire what were these tribulations which faith recognized as the legitimate source of a mourning that is blessed. In the first place then, we are told, by writers of the middle ages, that when the soul is awakened to a sense of spiritual things, the mere contemplation of its fallen state is a worthy cause for sorrow and for profound mourning.

* He wrote “Réflexions sur les Différends de la Religion,” which Leibnitz pronounced an admirable work ; also, “Traité de l'Eucharistie,” in which Bossuet said, “That charity was joined to truth, and that unction was added to light: it contained prayers, which he had composed for use during mass ; which are so fine, that Father Judde can find none more suitable to insert in his book of instructions.” Tom. III., 330.

† Hom. CC. in Joan.

‡ Epist. 30.

§ Rom. viii.

|| Tract. in Ps. 148.

¶ 3d feria, Fourth Week in Lent.

Hear the words of St. Vincentius, in his celebrated tract on the contemplation of God:—"O Lord! thou art my God and my Lord; and I have never seen thee. Thou hast made and restored me, and all that I possess of good, thou hast granted to me, and I have not yet known thee. For seeing thee I was created, and I have not fulfilled that for which I was created. O, miserable lot of man, when he lost that for which he was created! O, hard and dire calamity! Alas! what lost he, and what found he? What departed, and what remained? He lost beatitude, for which he was made; and he found misery, for which he was not made. That departed, without which nothing is happy; and that remained, which, of itself, is only wretchedness. Man used to eat the bread of angels, for which he now hungers; and now he eats the bread of sorrow, of which he once knew nothing. Alas! the common grief of men, the universal woe of the children of Adam! Driven from their sweet country, from the pleasant light, from the vision of God, from the bliss of immortality into darkness, and the bitterness and horror of death, amerced of heaven, and from eternal splendors flung."* Hear, again, how St. Bernard speaks, in his first Sermon on the Epiphany:—"The benignity and humanity of God our Saviour hath appeared, thanks be to God, by whom thus abounds our consolation in this pilgrimage, in this exile, in this misery. For this end we are the more careful often to admonish you that you may never forget how you are pilgrims, far removed from your country, driven from your inheritance; for, whoever does not know desolation, cannot acknowledge comfort; whoever is ignorant that consolation is necessary, it remains that he be left without the grace of God. Hence it is that men, who are engaged in the occupations and crimes of the world, while they do not perceive their misery, do not look for mercy. But you, to whom it hath not been said in vain, 'Be still, and see how sweet is the Lord;' and of whom the same Prophet says, 'He will announce the virtue of his works to his people,'—you, I say, whom secular affairs do not detain, are able to know what is spiritual consolation: 'Hearken! you who have known exile, because assistance is come from Heaven: for the benignity and humanity of God our Saviour hath appeared.'"—"There is a certain kind of tribulation," says Louis of Blois, "which we ought to seek and find; that which results from remembering that we are not as yet with God, that we are surrounded with temptations, that we cannot be without fear. He who does not experience this tribulation of his pilgrimage, thinks not about returning to his country."† "The weight of sin," says a holy friar of the Seraphic Order of St. Francis, "is only felt when it is out of its centre. Water and earth are heavy; and yet, when they are in their proper place, they are both without weight. Thus it is with sinners. They are as joyous as if they had never done any thing but served God, and led a life of innocence. The reason is, that sin reposes in them as in its proper elements; but let them forsake it, and then they will soon discover that its weight is intoler-

* Tract. S. Vincentii ad contempl. Deum.

† Tractat. in Ps. 49.

able.”* Reason itself can discern this, as may be seen with Seneca, who puts this difference between the sickness of the body and that of the mind ; that with respect to sickness of body, the greater it is the more painful; but in diseases of the mind, the greater they are, the less they are felt and complained of.†

Then, indeed, deceitful is the calm, so deceitful the silence, that even a heathen philosopher says, that the guardian angels speak not to all souls ; for when men struggle in the waves of the sea, those on the shore behold in silence as many as are at a distance from the land irremediably lost, but run and succor, with their hands and with their cries, as many as are approaching the land ; so these ministering spirits suffer in silence such as are sinking afar off in the flood of wickedness, but sustain and guide to a happy port those who are struggling to practise virtue.— That the first recovery from sin is attended by a sense of sorrow, is shown by St. Bernard, in language of wondrous sublimity :—“Lazarus is dead four days, and now stinketh. This answereth,” he continues, “to the state of sinners. The first day is that in which we die by sin, and are, as it were, buried in our consciences ; the second represents that temptation of evil habits, and those fiery darts of the devil, which can scarcely be extinguished ; the third is, while we meditate on our past years, in bitterness of heart, and yet labor not so much to avoid future sins, as we deplore what we have already committed. These are days of burial, days of clouds and darkness, days of sorrow and bitterness. Next follows the day of shame, not unlike the other three, when the wretched soul is covered with horrible confusion, while it considers what it hath lost, and revolves black images of sins before the eyes of its heart. In this state the soul dissembles nothing, but judges and aggravates all things, spares not itself, but is its own stern judge. Nevertheless, Lazarus, come forth ! Delay no longer in this abomination, in this despair, which is like putrefaction ; Lazarus come forth ! abyss calls upon abyss. The abyss of light and mercy upon the abyss of misery and darkness. Lazarus, come forth !”‡ In no stage of the spiritual life was the mourning consequent upon the sense of sin excluded. Thus, Paschasius Radbert mentions the soliloquy of his friend, the holy abbot, Wala, who said, on one occasion, “Why does he appear so sorrowful, as he walks alone ? Because he is with himself ; and he discerns what is within himself ; and therefore he has no joy excepting what springs from hope.”§

The infant new born is not exempt from sin. “Hence,” says Origen, “we find, in the sacred history, no personage of distinguished sanctity, who regarded the day of his birth as a day of festival and rejoicing.”|| It was to complete the triumph of a birth-day feast, that the holy John the Baptist was martyred.¶ Birth-days were not celebrated in the middle ages, but men rejoiced on the festival of their respective patrons. The Church guided them in this judgment, for she

* Le Sacré Mont d'Olivet, 136. † In Sentent. ‡ In Assumptione B. Mariæ, Serm. IV.

§ Vita ejus apud Mabill. Acta S. Ordinis Benedict. Sæcul. IV. Pars. I.

|| Hom. Levit. viii. 3.

¶ Matt. xiv. 6.

did not rejoice on the day of man's creation, which is the sixth. It soon became unhappy; "But admire the mystery," adds Bossuet: "the day when the first man Adam, was created, is the same as that on which the new man, the new Adam, died upon the cross. It is, therefore, for the Church, a day of fasting and of mourning—a day which is followed by the sad repose of Jesus Christ in the sepulchre, and which, nevertheless, is full of consolation, by hope of a future resurrection." The Church does not even celebrate the nativity of the saints. "What is this, brethren?" asks St. Augustine, alluding to St. Cyprian. "We know not when this saint was born, and yet we celebrate his birth on this day, which was the day of his passion. But even if we did know the day of his birth, we would not celebrate it, for on that day he was born in sin." These sentiments were universally adopted during the ages of faith. "The day of birth," says Michael Angelo, in a letter to Vasari, "ought not to be celebrated with festivals; they should be kept for the death of the man who has lived virtuously."

Protestantism was a soil in which every weed or plant of the ancient heathen life was able to revive and strike root, precisely because the supernatural influence of faith was withdrawn, and the observance of birth-days in the ancient style, on the anniversary of which men would render honors to Bacchus, like the Pagans,* furnishes a remarkable example. Sometimes they would celebrate their birth-days as a religious festival. Heriot, who founded a hospital at Edinburgh, in the statutes of his foundation ordered his birth-day to be kept solemnly, and himself to be on that day commemorated in his chapel; and the minister who officiated was to receive five pounds and a bible, which day the Presbyterians continued to celebrate, though they had abolished Christ's birth-day, and the festivals of God's saints.

With the moderns, the associations of the natural were stronger than those of the supernatural life, or rather the latter were entirely abandoned: and here we shall do well to remark the difference in regard to real cheerfulness between the festivities of the middle ages, and those of our times: the former were designed to commemorate a glorious and happy triumph, in which no image was seen but which had connection with life, and everlasting gladness; the latter to please men whose hopes extend not beyond the present life, where they place all their happiness, have for subject of rejoicing, an event which is fraught with the gloomy idea of change, of departed youth, and of by-gone years, and of death approaching with rapid step, beyond which this pompous festivity of nature has nothing to promise. So true is it, that even the rejoicings of the world are full of its sadness and bitterness. But it was not only a sense of their own condition that could inspire men of spiritual life with mourning; a regard for the eternal lot of other men, and of humanity in general, would have conduced to it no less. "Consider the multitude and the greatness of the miseries which oppress children," says St.

* Eurip. Io. 1137.

Augustin, "and how the first years of their life are full of vanity and suffering, illusions and fear. Then when they grow up, and begin to serve God, error tempts them to their seduction; labor and sorrow tempt to other discouragement; concupiscence tempts them to inflame their passions; pride tempts them to exalt themselves; and who can find words to represent the various pains which belonged to the yoke of the children of Adam."* Hence another source of mourning to the just, in the consideration of the evils which are in the world, and of the obstacles which the perverse wills of men present to the beneficent designs of God. "Signa tau in frontibus virorum lugentium," says Ezechieh. "See how good it is to mourn for evils," adds St. Odo, of Cluny, "since it makes men worthy of receiving the stigmata of the cross."† "The soul of a true Christian," says Louis of Blois, "ought, after the example of Jesus Christ, to feel a profound sadness in considering the great number of men who not only do not honor God, but whose impiety despises him, and who lose themselves by sin. How is it possible without grief to behold the ruin of such noble creatures?"‡

———"O ye misguided souls!
Infatuate, who from such a good estrange
Your hearts, and bend your gaze on vanity,
Alas for you!"§

And here I am tempted to borrow a similitude from history, which may place this matter in a stronger light than could be derived from mere discourse of reason; for what must have been the desolation of those few Syracusans, who, as Thucydides relates, believed Hermocrates, and feared for the future, when all the rest of the people were divided, some affirming that the Athenians would in no manner come, and that what was said could not be true; and others, that if they did come it would be to their own greater loss; and others, wholly despising the news, turned the matter to a jest and laughter.¶ We have here an emblem of what passes in the world at all times with regard to the predicted vengeance of Heaven; and can it be strange that the insensibility of the majority of men, should fill the hearts of the prudent with mourning and dismay? How can they not mourn when they behold men at variance with the truth, who, as Dante says,—

"Dream, though their eyes be open; reckless some
Of error: others well aware they err,
To whom more guilt and shame are justly due.
Each the known track of sage philosophy
Deserts, and has a bye-way of his own:
So much the restless eagerness to shine
And love of singularity prevail."¶

Alas, in every age the desolation caused by heresy has afflicted the hearts of the faithful. In the fifth century, we are told that so great and innumerable were the horrors of heresy, that not only it was difficult to enumerate, but that it was disgusting to name them. The subtlety of diabolic fraud had so immersed them in the sense of those who perish, that even heretics believed that they had their heretics. Thus men abandoned apostolical tradition, and followed masters of perfidy.* If this were true in the fifth age, what must have been the mourning in that which beheld the commencement of the last great schism, when Christ's holy Church, her divine faith, and her tremendous mysteries, were in so many places "disglorified, blasphemed, and had in scorn by the rebellious rout amidst their wine?" "Truly," says the mild and humble Louis of Blois, "when I consider the arrogance and impiety of the heretics of our age, I can scarcely refrain from tears : for they will not obey the church ; they refuse to be subject to its superiors ; they esteem as nothing the primacy of the chief Pontiff, who is the supreme vicar of Christ ; they petulantly insult the Apostolic See : followers of a monstrous confusion, and revilers of the divine ordination, they wish the visible Church to be without a visible head on earth ; they abolish and deride the salutary sacramental confession ; heaps of blasphemies against the sacred eucharist, that fountain of divine love and of all good, and against that celestial sacrifice of the mass, I say against that mystery of ineffable dignity, they produce with a barbaric and pagan irreverence."†

* S. Augustini cont. Julian. Lib. IV. 16. † S. Odonis Collat. Lib. II. Bibliothec. Cluniac.

‡ Institut. Spiritual. cap. VI. § Dante Parad. IX. ¶ Lib. VI. 35. ¶ Parad. XXIX.

To make no mention as yet of those persecutions, which must be spoken of in reference to a different beatitude from what we are now considering, sorrow was unavoidable on a view of the injury inflicted on the Church by the conduct of false disciples. Alas ! there has been no age in which this was not a fruitful source of mourning to the just. "We have internal as well as external combats," says St. Boniface, writing to the Bishop Daniel, describing his missionary labors in Saxony, "as when some priest or deacon of the Church departs from the faith and from truth. Tunc deinde prorumpit cum paganis in contumelias filiorum Ecclesiæ, et est obstaculum horrendum evangelio gloriæ Christi."‡ St. Francis Xavier found that the greatest obstacle to the establishment of the faith in the great kingdoms of Asia, came from the Christians themselves—those false, worldly-wise Christians, who protest against fanaticism.§ The love of gain induced some of the richest Portuguese merchants at Sancian to put a stop to the intended voyage of St. Francis Xavier to China—for they said that no doubt the governor of Canton would revenge his boldness upon them by seizing their ships and goods.|| Wherever there was eminent piety and service, there was reason to expect the enmity and attacks of men professing virtue, who would argue upon the dangers of excess of zeal. A fearful example of this fact is attested on the sides of the Rocky Hall, which served for refectory to the monks of St. Benedict at San Cossi-

* Consultatio Zachæi Christiani et Apollonii Philosophi, Lib. XI. cap. 11. apud Dacherii Spicileg. tom. X.

† Ludovic. Bosii Collyr. Hæreticorum, Lib. II. cap. 1.

‡ S. Bonif. Mart. et Archiep. Epist. III. § Bouhours, Vie de S. F. X. I. 138. || Id. II. 8.

mato, where is painted the miraculous preservation of the blessed Father St. Benedict from poison. There are always persons to whom the common dictates of piety seem like the ravings of fanaticism. Catherine de Medicis termed it bigotry to desire that the theatres should be closed in Lent.* Plato says that if a man judges well, he will be of opinion that there are few men very good or very wicked τοὺς δὲ μεταξὺ πλείστους.† No doubt, this continued to be the case even in happier times; and it is no less certain, that from those persons who profess and desire to remain in a medium state, the most afflicting embarrassments proceed, which present obstacles to the advancement of truth, the extension of happiness, and the greater glory of God. According to the circumstances of men does the enemy lay his snares; and thus he labors to inspire those who are within the pale,—where none perish by a false belief,—with a secret hate and disrelish for their own brethren, and with a corresponding inclination to esteem their adversaries. St. Peter the Venerable, the fourth abbot of Cluny, was accused by some of the monks of Clairvaux of not following the rule to which he was bound,—of composing laws himself, and of casting aside the precepts of the Fathers,—of breaking the vows which he had made to St. Benedict, and of despising the authority of Bishops in the government of his abbey,—of being too severe, and too merciful.‡ Without looking farther into this dark volume, methinks here was enough to make many say with Hesiod, that it would be better to die than to have lived to know of such things.

Moreover, if we reflect upon the influence of the Catholic religion upon the human mind, and upon the new relation in which it places men with regard to the events and circumstances of the world, we shall easily understand why Catholics, even during the ages of greatest faith, should have mourned more than other men: for, being imbued by their divine religion with the principles and the love of order, they necessarily feel more intensely the disorders introduced by sin into human society. Having the knowledge of truth, the prevalence of error,—which they know to be such,—must unavoidably fill them with more affliction; and having to maintain positive principles, which are unceasingly attacked by the power of darkness, their life, in an intellectual as well as in a moral sense, becomes a continued combat.

The moderns, on the other hand, from being imbued with no principles or love of order, are consequently indifferent to the reign of confusion and disorder. Having no certain apprehension of truth, they are not grieved at the support which is given to a thousand errors, all of which, for any thing they know to the contrary, may be truths, since, from their own highest authority, there may be always an appeal to the suggestions of every man's own mind: and, having no decided ground to maintain, it matters little to them what principles men choose to attack, for they feel an interest in none. They can immediately shift their position as an opponent advances, for they place their glory in believing that there may be equal truth in opposite systems,—so they stretch out their hands to all fraternal nullities, and lay claim to the favor of all men alike. Humanly speaking, therefore, they have fewer intellectual causes for mourning than those of the faithful fold; who cannot but feel disorder and recognize error, and stand to meet the enemy, whose momentary victories they can never celebrate as their own. If to this consideration we add the effects of the new relation in which Catholicism places many men with regard to the circumstances of the world, we shall discern still further reason for the mourning of the just. Ah! how must he mourn, in lands which heresy has devastated, whose eyes are suddenly awakened to the divine light of heavenly truth, enabling him to judge rightly for the first time of the character of past events, which before, perhaps, had been the theme of his pride and rejoicing. When led by grace divine to hear the old instructors, their sanctity so wins upon him, that while kings and penal laws pursue them, he mixes his tears with theirs, and has thence no desire left on earth but still to succor them. What must be his bitterness, to whom the accumulated woes and horrors of more than three centuries are presented, suddenly, in all their nakedness and terror! In an instant, all that ideal of beauty and excellence, which his mind had so long nourished, perishes, and he beholds in its place revealed the secrets of Heaven's vengeance. "Wretched man!" with hand against his breast he cries, "in what blindness hast thou hitherto lived! The friends and martyrs of God thou didst esteem fools, and their life and death without honor; the cruel persecutors, the unjust judges, the base and hypocritical ministers of tyranny, have had all thy esteem: the sorrows of the just have been unknown to thee; their holy discipline thou didst despise. Alas! thou hast misconstrued every thing. Who then can wonder at thy tears and desolation? the burden of many ages on thee light at once, by thy retrospect reviving to torment thee with the thought that they have been."

* Journal de Hen. III. 3. p. 180.

† Phædo.

‡ S. Pet. Ven. Epist. Lib. I. 28.

With regard to themselves, too assuredly such men are not long in discovering, that there is a woe reserved which will affect them personally in the nearest and dearest affections of their heart; for, from the hour that they declare openly for the Church of Christ in opposition to the profane city and to the innumerable sects of false religions which are made subservient to its interests, calumny, suspicion deep, and hatred, will be directed against them. They are but just converted; and see already how their ancient friend, perhaps their brother, doth begin to make them strangers to his looks of love. "Extraneus factus sum fratribus meis," we may hear them mournfully sing; "et peregrinus filiis matris meæ."* There will not be wanting, perhaps, even in the circle of those who once appeared most to esteem them, persons grave and seeming holy, who will traduce them in the minds of men,

"Blighting their life in best of its career, Branding their thoughts as things to shun and fear."

* Psalm lxxviii.

Moreover, to Catholics, who desire that the glory of the Creator should be extended over the whole earth, and who feel for the calamities of the most distant members of the city of God as intensely as for those of the persons nearest to them, the course of human events of itself presents a more tragic and melancholy aspect than to inconsiderate and selfish men, who care for nothing but what immediately concerns their own interest. What an affecting description do we find in the chronicles of the middle ages, of the mourning in which all Europe was plunged, whenever any calamitous intelligence came from the East ! It was in the reign of Henry VI. that the news arrived at Crowland Abbey of the fall of Constantinople, that most celebrated Christian city. "Woe to us Christians who have sinned," exclaims upon this occasion the monk of Crowland. "Why, O Lord, were we born to behold with weeping eyes the desolation of our people and the affliction of our sacred religion ? The patriarchal seats, worthy of such veneration,—Constantinople, Antioch, Alexandria, and Jerusalem,—are oppressed with the yoke of slavery or occupied by Saracens and Turks. Christianity is reduced as if into an angle of the world !"* The fall of Jerusalem, the profanation of the holy city, the loss of the holy sepulchre, the sufferings of the chivalry of Palestine, the calamities to which all the Christians of the East would be subjected,—these were reflections which turned into houses of mourning every castle and every cottage in France and England. "Vox turturis, vox doloris et gemitus fines Christianorum usque ad mundi ultima lamentabili novitate rumoris percussit," says Godfrey the monk.† When to this common grief was added the pastoral solicitude for the Church, the mourning exceeded the endurance of mortals. Pope Urban III. died of grief on hearing at Ferrara of the fall of Jerusalem. Nicholas V. never recovered from the melancholy which seized him on hearing of the capture of Constantinople by the Turks ; and Clement IX. died of grief in consequence of the capture of Candia by the infidels.

But we have not yet glanced at the most mysterious and yet most general cause for the mourning of the devout heart during the ages of faith. The master of the sentences says of holy men, "that in contemplating the great event of the death of Christ, they both rejoice and mourn. 'De eodem ergo letabantur et tristabantur.' "‡

"Religion," says a philosopher, "involves infinite mourning. In order to love God (he means not with love of preference, but with affection), he must require help. How wondrously is this problem solved in Christianity !"§ Hear how St. Theresa speaks : "The pains of death have encompassed me," said the royal prophet, speaking in the name of Christ, "O what a dreadful evil is sin, when it can cause such pain and even death to a God ! Christians now you are called upon to fight in defence of your King. Now you must follow him in this great desertion.

* Hist Croylandensis. 529, in Rerum Anglicarum Scriptor. Tom. I.

† Godefrid. Monach. ap. Freher. Script. Tom. I. p. 250.

‡ Petri Lomb. Lib. I. Distinct. XLVIII.

§ Novalis. Schriften, II. 305.

There remains to him but a very small number of subjects, and the crowd follows the standard of Satan ; and some who wish to be styled his friends in public, betray him in secret, and there is hardly any one left in whom he can perfectly confide ! O thou only true friend, what ingratitude in him who betrays thee ! O ye who are true Christians, weep with your God : the tears which he shed were not for Lazarus alone ; but also for all those whom he foresaw would refuse to rise when he should cry to them with a loud voice commanding them to come forth from the tomb.”* Here then was a source of mourning in comparison with which all other afflictions were unworthy of mention ; for,

——“Upon such a shrine,
What are our petty griefs? Let no man number his.”

“Suffer me to be an imitator of the passion of my God,” says St. Ignatius the Martyr in his epistle to the Romans. What an amazing and sublime rule is that which St. Bonaventura proposes as the first fruit of meditating on the passion of Christ, that the highest and most perfect religion, the rule of all perfection of life and virtue, consists in imitating the passion and death of Christ, and endeavoring to be conformable to him in all his sufferings.† “Abhorreo videre cor meum non vulneratum,” saith he, “cum videam te Salvatorem sic pro me vilissimæ cruci affixum. Nolo enim, Domine, sine vulnere vivere, quia te video vulneratum.”‡

So the Church prays, “that we who celebrate the mysteries of our Lord’s passion may imitate what we commemorate.”§ “The ascent of the soul by wisdom from the passion is in this manner,” says St. Bonaventura, “when a man considers that most blessed passion which I am not worthy to name, in which He of almighty power was trampled upon for us, He of infinite wisdom, treated as a fool, and He the best and highest, filled with bitterness and condemned to a shameful death, from this the mind rises to an admiration of such divine condescension and benignity ; and then, when it masticates that passion of its Lord Jesus, all the ardor of its love begins to be directed towards him : it feels a taste of a certain ineffable sweetness, and its appetite, is, as it were, appeased with bitterness. The whole interior of man is thus alienated from itself, and rests in Christ. O mira et a sæculis res inaudita ! In ineffabili amaritudine, dulcor indicibilis reperitur.|| Nay,” continues this seraphic doctor, “in mourning, men fulfil all the virtues to which beatitude is promised.”—“The splendor of the beatitudes shines forth in the blessed passion of our Lord, which is properly their fountain and origin. For who is poor in spirit unless Christ naked upon the cross ? Who is meek unless he who was led as a sheep to the slaughter, and who, as a lamb, opened not his mouth ? Who mourns, unless he who, with a great cry and tears, offered up supplications for his enemies, who lamented for our sins, and had compassion on our miseries ?

* Exclamat. X.

† S. Bonaventur. Stimul. Amoris, Pars. I. cap. 4.

‡ Id. cap. 2.

§ Secret. 2d Septemb.

|| Stim. Amoris, Pars I. cap. 7.

Who hungered and thirsted after justice unless Christ upon the cross, satisfying for our sins and thirsting after the salvation of souls? Who is merciful unless that Samaritan who bore our infirmities upon his own body? Where is cleanness of heart seen unless in him who cleansed our hearts with his precious blood? Who is pacific, unless he who is our peace, and hath reconciled us to God in his blood? Who suffers persecution for sake of justice, unless he who was crucified by the Jews, against whom men blasphemed and bore lying testimony?"*

The writers of the middle ages say, "that the heart which loves God is overwhelmed with affliction at the thought of having ever preferred the vain joys of the world to the sweetness of present sorrow, that it mourns and despises itself for having ceased to mourn, that it mourns for having left the cross to go to the house of merriment. True," say they, "our sweet adorable Lord went to grace with his presence the marriage feast: he would even contribute to its hilarity and assist the poverty of the bridegroom; but all the while he knew that he himself was advancing to his passion; that his repose was to be the bloody cross, and his feast the vinegar and gall. O divine Jesus! how hard is it for one who loves thee to seek for joy. It is permitted him. Yes, thou smilest upon his youth and biddest him be happy and holy; but ah! he would follow thee to that dread garden where thou wert betrayed, he would follow thee to weep and knock the breast, and to kiss thy bleeding wounds; he would remain at thy sepulchre weeping with the holy women. My sweet adorable Saviour is in agony, and do you bid me join the rout of revellers? he is betrayed and condemned, and do you bid me rejoice with the world which rejected him? O, no; better is it to remain apart and pour forth pitying tears with holy Mary, the queen of heaven and mistress of the world, who stood by the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, full of sadness!" "Happy senses of the blessed Virgin Mary," exclaims the Church, "which, without dying, deserved the palm of martyrdom beneath the cross of our Lord."† Ah suffer me to mourn with her, tear me not away from this cross, from this tomb:

"Eia mater, fons amoris, me sentire vim doloris : fac ut tecum lugeam.

Fac me vere tecum flere, crucifixo condolere donec ego vixero."

Wounded with these strokes, inebriated with this blood, may I be guarded by the cross, and delivered by the death of Christ.

"Perish the joys that would separate me from those who mourn; perish the honors, the triumph that would require smiles not tears, rejoicing, not mourning. Ah, for a little while I was enticed to join the mirthful crew, and my soul was filled with a different kind of bitterness. It seemed as if I had been condemned to mourn no more with the just, condemned never more to make one of those who sing the pathetic "stabat mater," the "inviolata," or "salve Regina," or "vexilla Regis," and that seemed equivalent to the sadness and the whole weight of sin and death. O with what transport did I hail my first sweet returning tears ; and how was my spirit dissolved in an ecstasy of delight, when I found that I might become again a mourner, and lose the memory of ungrateful joy. Flow fast my tears, flow fast for my having wished to banish ye, for my having forgotten and betrayed my infant Saviour, my despised Saviour, my crucified Saviour. What joy is comparable to the sweetness of these tears ? Certainly not the world's joy ; not for all that it can offer would I ever again exchange them. Only Paradise, only the blessed face of Christ, only the ineffable beatific vision of God in his eternal glory can make my soul forget them." They are the expressions of mourners, but the foretaste of heaven ; belonging to earth, but never to be wiped from the eyes of those who aspire after innocence, till the day of glory comes, that day of joy which shall never end.

* Id. cap. 8.

† Commun. fest. of the 7 dolour

Here we are naturally directed to inquire respecting those penitential exercises of which we find such repeated mention in the history of the ages of faith ; for we must already have touched at the source from which they sprung, and this is a subject which belongs intimately to the history of ancient manners.

CHAPTER IV.

THAT the spirit of mortification, of self-sacrifice, and of penance belonged to the mourning of the faithful, is manifest from what has been already seen respecting the order of their life and the natural desire of their hearts ; but independent of incidental causes, it was of necessity characteristic of the Christian discipline, in consequence of the express requisition of God, and of the positive advantages which resulted from it in the progress to spiritual perfection. The words of Christ admitted of no exceptions, "Abneget semetipsum, et tollat crucem suam quotidie."* "What is the question," asks Tertullian, "you are anxious to know—if your penance will be useful to you or not before God ? 'What does it matter ? God commands you to do it ; is not that enough to oblige you to obey him ? When there should be nothing but the respect which is due to his authority, he deserves that you should have regard to him in preference to your own utility.'"† The command is without exception. The vessel of election was not dispensed from this law, and hence we read "Castigo corpus meum."‡ David who sinned had no escape, though he was the man after God's own heart. It was penance which rendered him so, as

* S. Luc. IX. 23.

† De Pœnitent.

‡ Epist. ad Corinth. I. cap. 9.

St. Ambrose intimates. "Pœcavit David," says he, "quod solent Reges: sed pœnitentiam gessit, flevit, ingemuit, quod non solent Reges."* Cause some find for doubt in that the Pagans have been known to practise austerities with the view of appeasing their deities; but reason and tradition have enabled men in all ages to discern some truths, and if the consent of philosophers were a proof against a practice or a doctrine, there would be few points of Christian discipline or faith secure. Besides there is a wide distinction to be observed here. There have been superstitions among the heathens, which induced their votaries to practise mortifications beyond which human nature cannot attain; for as Bourdaloue remarks, "the difference between Christians and the followers of Pagan severity consisted in this, that while these men mortified their flesh, they abandoned their minds to all the impulses of passion. Whereas the mortification of Christians was chiefly that of the heart, as a means to reform and purify it."† Otherwise, it was of no avail, insomuch that in relation to men who were truly contrite or truly inflamed with the love of God, the opinion of Fichte, at least in one sense, was correct, that "for them there were no longer any self-denial; no longer any sacrifices; for the self which is to be denied, the objects which are to be sacrificed, have been removed from their sphere of vision, and estranged from their affections. This denial, these sacrifices can only excite wonder in those who continue to value the objects of them, and who have not yet given them up; when once they are given up, they vanish into nothing, and we find that we have lost nothing." The holy Fathers universally maintain the vanity of all corporal austerities unless the mind and heart be corrected.

"Beware," says St. Jerome, "lest your fasts become a source of pride. You fast, and ill-humor makes you insupportable: another does not fast, and he is gentle to all the world. You lose by your vices the fruit of your mortification."‡ In what used to be styled the dark ages, St. Columban reminds his monks of the same distinction. "Do not suppose," saith he, "that it is enough to fatigue the dust of our bodies with fasts and watchings, if we do not also reform our manners. To macerate the flesh, if the soul does not fructify, is to till the ground without ceasing, and never to reap fruit from it. What signifies it to carry on a distant war, if the interior be a prey to ruin? A religion, all of gestures and movements of the body, is vain. The suffering of the body alone is vain; the care which man takes of his exterior is vain, if he do not also watch and preserve his soul. True piety consists in humility, not of the body, but of the heart. It is not enough to speak and read about virtues. Is it with words alone that a man cleanseth his house of filth? Can any work be accomplished without labor? Gird up your loins, then, and never cease to combat."§ Besides, after all, it is quite clear that the Christian spirit of self-sacrifice was unknown to the Pagans,

* Lib. de Apolog. David.

† Serm. sur la Sévérité Chrétienne.

‡ S. Hieronym. Epist. ad Eustoch. Virg.

§ S. Insit. II. Bibliothec. Patrum, Tom. XII. cap. 10.

and in vain shall we look for it in the scenes which recall the most renowned deeds of their heroic devotion. When we are lead to expect an instance of this pure and noble spirit, it is rather a calculation of evils, and the choice of the least, which gives rise to the apparent offering. Thus, it is not until after a long examination of the indignities which await her, if she continue to live, that Macharia, in Euripides, resolves to embrace death. It is better to die, she concludes, than to suffer such things;* and, in like manner, in the Iphigenia, in Aulis, the spirit of the victim is completely opposite to that of sacrifice in the Christian sense. “What is the marriage of Paris and Helen to me? It is the sweetest of all things to behold the light”—

———μαίνεται δ', ὅς εὐχεται θαυεῖν· κακῶς ζῆν κρείττον, ἢ θαυεῖν καλῶς.†

So also Polyzena consents to die; but it is because she perceives that longer life would not be to her advantage, since she also has lost the dignity of her ancestral rank, and all her hopes of being married to a king, since she is now a slave, a humiliation to which she is not accustomed, and in her situation it is a much more happy thing to die than to live, for to live not in honor is the greatest misery.‡ The Antigona, of Sophocles, presents indeed, an instance of very high sentiment, but then it is mixed with hatred and contempt for the unjust decree of the tyrant, who has presumed to meddle in what concerns him not, the discharge of her domestic duties.§ But, say the Protestants, is not the indulgence in the spirit of sacrifice and mortification, and is not the whole doctrine of penance an injury to the atonement, and a rejection to the grace of God? And besides this, surely, to use the words of Fichte, “The voice of philosophy does not call upon us to mortify ourselves: O, no; it calls upon us to cast away that which affords no enjoyment; that when we have done so, that which is a teeming source of endless enjoyment, may come and take possession of our souls?”

The voice of philosophy, to reply, in brief, has, no doubt, often pronounced things very sweet in comparison with the bitterness of truth. Its error here does not consist in an overfine spinning of truth. It is essentially an error. The voice of God, whatever that of philosophy may say, calls upon men to mortify their corrupt nature upon earth, and to take up their cross daily; and with respect to the theological argument, it is quite a sufficient answer, that if it were valid, Christ himself would not have required self-mortification in the words above cited, nor would his Apostles have practised it. It would be more to the purpose to inquire respecting what has been transmitted by the voice of the ancient Fathers, than concerning the affirmations of philosophy; though Calvin might say, “he was not moved by what was every where found in the writings of the ancients on satisfaction.”|| “Dominus orandus est,” says St. Cyprian, “Dominus nostra satisfactione

* Heraclid. 524. † 1237. ‡ Hecuba, 340. § 48. || Instit. Lib. III. c. 4. §. 38.

placandus est. Qui sic Deo satisfecerit—letam faciet ecclesiam, nec jam solam Dei veniam merebitur, sed coronam.”* To the like effect speak Tertullian, St. Ambrose, and all the holy fathers, as may be seen at length in Sardagna, or any other dogmatical theologian.† St. Augustin expressly says, “That it is not sufficient to change our manners for the better, and to depart from evil, unless we satisfy God, by penance, for the things which we have done, by the sacrifice of a contrite heart, with alms co-operating.”‡ That man should be called to suffer, does not derogate, as the modern sects pretend, from the merits of Christ, in whom, as the Council of Trent observes, “is all our glory, and in whom we satisfy God’s justice.”§ Though original sin has been remitted, man still suffers temporal death. Do they think it would be fair to conclude, from this fact, that the satisfaction of Christ was not full and abundant? Mortal sin is forgiven, and yet temporal penalty is exacted by God. Adam was pardoned, and yet condemned to die. Moses and Aaron were pardoned,|| and yet punished, by not being permitted to enter the land of promise. David was pardoned,¶ and yet to punish him his son was condemned to die. St. Augustin draws the conclusion;  and the holy Fathers, on similar ground, press the necessity for penance, to avert the punishment of God.†† Remission of temporal punishment is gratuitous, although man is to give satisfaction, because it is the free gift of God which enables his works to be satisfactory through Christ, and because these works are themselves the fruit of Divine grace. Our satisfactions are the means by which the price of redemption is applied to us; and this is a point which ought to present no difficulties to the Protestants, who admit that, without faith, the merits of Christ are not applied, although their value is independent of it.

All theologians firmly believed, and clearly taught, that the satisfaction of Christ was sufficient, as far as price, to expiate all the sins of men, and that the private works of satisfaction were not required to supply any defect in that price, but on account of the reasons thus explained by the Council of Trent:—“It becomes the Divine clemency, that our sins should not be remitted to us without some satisfaction; lest, taking occasion from lighter sins, we should fall into greater, becoming contumelious to the Holy Spirit, treasuring up wrath to ourselves against the day of wrath. Without doubt, these satisfactory penalties recall men powerfully from sin, restrain them as if with a bridle, and make them more cautious and vigilant; heal the wounds of former sins, and of former vicious habits. In addition to this, by suffering for sin, we are made conformable to Jesus Christ, who satisfied for us—ex quo omnis nostra sufficientia est; and we have a pledge, that if we suffer with him, we shall also be glorified along with

* Tractat. de Lapsis.

† Tom. VIII.

‡ Serm. CCCLI.

§ Sess. XIV. cap. 8.

|| Num. 20.

¶ Reg. 12, 13.

 In Ps. L.

†† Tertull. de Pœnitent. 4. S. Cyprian. de Lapsis. St. Jerome in Joëlem. S. Chrysostom. Hom. 41. ad pop. Antioch.

him.”* St. Ambrose says, “That he has heard of persons who deny the merit of abstinence and fasting, and continence, whom he refutes, by reminding them of the sentences of St. Paul ;” and then he adds, “Qui non castigant corpus suum, et volunt prædicare aliis, ipsi reprobi habentur.”† The advantages derived from mortification of the senses, were clearly discerned during the ages of faith. The wisdom of God explains why mortification should be good for man—“Quoniam in igne probatur aurum et argentum, homines vero acceptabiles in camino humiliationis.”‡

There is pain which purges and purifies, and a pain which consumes and devours: this last is the portion of the wicked. Pain, without penance, is the fire of hell. “Woe to the heretics,” cries St. Ephrem, “who says there is no such thing as penance. They deserve to be likened to those insane men who say there is no God ; for to say that there is no God, or to annihilate his mercy by saying that there are no remedies able to cure the wounds of weak unassisted men, are one and the same thing. On the other hand, I grant to you, that there is no such thing as penance ; but I mean for those who abuse penance, that they may sin, for this is to mock God.”§ “O divine clemency,” exclaims Basil, bishop of Seleucia, “to what a dignity does penitence attain ! Men weep and God is changed ; mortals lament, and the immortal decree is cancelled !”|| The reason of the early philosophers and the judgment of the ancients generally, pointed out to them the advantages of mortification. The Pythagoreans observed abstinence from flesh as conducive to purity of mind, health of body, and promptitude of understanding.¶ Aurelian, the Emperor, ascribed his constant health to a custom of abstaining one day in every month from food and drink. Augustus Cæsar was remarkable for his abstinence, as Suetonius relates. Plato adopted an austere life. Hermodius arrived at the age of an hundred, Democritus and Hippocrates at that of an hundred and five, by a life of abstinence. Drexelius mentions, as among the many fruits of fasting, “The rendering serene all the senses, external and internal ;” so the Church, in her prayer at the beginning of Lent, speaks of “This solemn fast, which is a wholesome institution, to heal both our souls and bodies.” In the primitive Church, fasts were entitled stations. “Our fasts are camps to us,” says St. Ambrose, “which defend us from diabolic attacks ; and they are called stations, because, standing in them we repel our enemy.” How remarkable are the following words of the sacred text, “Jejunium nescit fœneratorem, non sortem fœneris novit : non redolet usuras mensa jejunantium.”†† In the history of the middle ages, we have this sentence illustrated ; for it was not so common then, as in modern times, to witness the fall and ruin of ancient and noble houses, to hear of their being stript of their ancestral domains, or become the spoil of usurers.

* Vide La Hogue Tractat. de Incarnatione, 92. Sardagna de Satisfactione. Theolog. Tom. VIII. p. 217.

† Epist. Lib. X. 82.

‡ Eccles. c. 2. 5.

§ S. Ephrem. Tractat. de Pœnitentia.

|| Basil Sentent. or 12.

¶ Jamblic. de Pythagoric. Vita, cap. 16.

 Hier. Drexelius de Jejunio, Lib. II. cap. 5.

†† Judith. cap. 1, 2.

The spirit of the Catholic discipline, which they observed, was unacquainted with the terms mortgage and interest ; and we find, in consequence, that patrimonial estates were retained through a long succession of ages. St. Basil the Great, says, "That all the saints have rendered their lives worthy by fasting."* All the most holy and approved persons that we read of in the sacred pages, Moses, Elias, Juditha, Esther, Sarah, Job, Tobias, Esdras, David, Ezekiel, are expressly recorded to have fasted. Daniel fed on pulse, and wisdom gained. In the new law, our Saviour Christ set us an example. St. Paul, Barnabas, Simon, Lucius, and other followers of Paul, were in many fastings. St. Gregory Nazienzen says, "That St. Peter almost always fasted, and ate only beans." St. Matthew, as St. Clemens Alexandrinus testifies, lived upon herbs and roots. It is recorded of St. James the Greater, of St. James the Less, Bishop of Jerusalem, and of St. John, that they always abstained from flesh meat. Honey and locusts were the food of the Precursor in the Wilderness ; and Hegesippus relates, "That the first Christians were taught to abstain, by the blessed Marc Pontif, of Alexandria." Passing on to later ages, we find Theodosius the Younger accustoming himself to fast twice every week, and to abstain from wine in Lent, Charlemagne fasting even to the risk of injuring his health, Otho the Great, making his whole army observe a fast, before giving battle to the Hungarians, Lothaire, King of the Franks, continuing to observe a fast during a dangerous illness, and the Emperor Ferdinand I. adopting a rule of great abstinence after the death of his excellent wife. Of the abstinence and self-control of Rodolph the Emperor, history relates an heroic instance ; for, being on an expedition with his army, and oppressed with thirst, a vessel of water, which a peasant was carrying, was immediately seized upon, and brought to him as a great treasure ; but he ordered it to be restored to the peasant, untouched, saying, "I thirst not for myself, but for my army."†

In a future place, when I shall come to speak of the festivals and seasons of the Church, it will be necessary to return to this subject, and describe, at more length, the manners of the middle ages, in relation to the ecclesiastical law of fasting and abstinence. Solemn public penance, instituted on occasion of the Novatian heresy, which accused the Church of being too indulgent in receiving back sinners, was abrogated earlier in the Greek than in the Western Church. In the latter, it ceased with the seventh century, when alms, pilgrimages, and confinement in monasteries, were substituted for it, which alteration is, by some, ascribed to Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury, who was a Greek. The ancient severity, however, did not begin to be relaxed until after the eleventh century. In the times of greatest fervor, the discipline of the Church respecting the greatness and duration of penance was never invariable. Each age, each province, had its customs. In one place, public penance was reserved for very few crimes ; in another it was required for a great number. The same sins were not punished with equal rigor, but much depended upon the local judicature. Universally, however, the fundamental parts of penance were the same; so that the objection advanced by heretics, against the use of the word penance, is a mere quarrel about words. That a change of mind was requisite, every one knew without having studied Greek, or heard their pedantic eloquence.

* De Laude Jejuni.

† Drexelius de Jejunio, Lib. I. c. 3.

The first thing required in penance was the ordination of the mind to God: but, says St. Thomas, "The mind can not duly be converted to God without charity."* And elsewhere he says, "Omnes virtutes participant aliquid de charitate."† And St. Bernard says, "Charity converts the soul."‡ Hence, St. Augustin says, that unless the Holy Spirit should make man a lover of God, he will not be transferred from the left hand to the right.§ It would require but a slight acquaintance with the history of religion to be able to detect the error of those modern writers, who, speaking of such men as the Count of Anjou, apply the term "miserable" to the penitents of the middle ages. If penitents,—in the sense in which the word was then used,—no men were less miserable. Assuredly it was not an unhappy state for man, born the child of wrath, and fallen from baptismal innocence, to be dismissed from the sacred tribunals as were Adam and Eve from Paradise,

Sent forth, though sorrowing, yet in peace."

It was in allusion to spirits far more grievously afflicted, though resembling these penitents of earth, that the great poet of the ages of faith exclaimed,

———"O spirits! secure,
Whene'er the time may be, of peaceful end!"¶

And of whom he elsewhere says,

"He show'd me many others, one by one:
And all, as they were nam'd, seem'd well content,
For no dark gesture I discern'd in any."¶

In the air and countenance of one of these penitents of the middle ages, if suddenly one of them could be introduced into a circle of the most refined modern society, there would be nothing to strike the attention as remarkable, excepting, perhaps, a more than ordinary gentleness and dignity. Hear how St. Jerome describes Asella. "Nothing can be milder than her severity, nothing more severe than her mildness; nothing more melancholy than her sweetness, nothing sweeter than her melancholy. Her figure denotes mortification without the least parade; her words are like silence, and her silence has words: her exterior is always the same;

* Lib. IV. cont. Gentes, cap. 72.

† In III. Dist. 26. art. 2.

‡ De diligendo Deo, 12.

§ De Trinitat, Lib. XV. 18.

¶ Dante, Purg. XXVI.

¶ Id. XXIV.

her dress exhibits nothing refined or curious; her ornaments consist in their plainness. The good speak of her with admiration, and the wicked dare not attack her. Let the priests of the Lord, on beholding her, be filled with profound veneration."

In the ages of greatest fervor, a due and rational attention to health was never excluded in the most austere discipline of penitents. St. Jerome, in condemning immoderate fasts and austerities, quotes the saying of the seven sages of Greece,—“Nothing too much;” and declares it to be as wise and just a maxim as it is celebrated.† St. Bonaventura mentions that the blessed St. Francis would never suffer his friars to injure their health by too much severity. Experience, indeed, would here suffice. St. Hilarion lived to the age of eighty-four; St. Augustin and St. Jerome, Paphnutius, Macarius and St. Frances de Paul, lived to ninety; St. Anthony to one hundred; Udalricus, Bishop of Padua, to one hundred and five; St. Simeon Stylites to one hundred and ten; St. Paul the Hermit to one hundred and thirteen; Arsenius and Romualdus to one hundred and twenty years: and all, after a life of rigid abstinence and fasting. Hear how St. Chrysostom writes to Olympias:

“Neither the rigor of winter nor the weakness of my health, should inspire you with any fear. The winter, though as severe as in Armenia, and that is to say every thing, does not incommode me to excess, for we have taken measures against it, and we neglect nothing to secure us from its inconveniences. For that purpose we keep up a good fire—we carefully exclude the external air from our apartment—we cover ourselves with many clothes; and, as a last resource, we keep within doors. After my example, venerable Olympias, attend to your health; I conjure you, I ask it of you as a grace. Direct all your attention to keep off infirmities. Remember too, that sadness can cause infirmities. Think of the misery of those whose body is worn down by sickness, and reduced to such a state that they can no longer enjoy either the seasons or the things needful to life. I implore you then to procure the assistance of the most skilful physicians, and to apply the proper remedies to deliver you from these maladies.”‡—“If some should come and say to you not to fast, lest you should be made weak, do not believe them nor listen to them,” says St. Athanasius, “for by them the enemy suggests this. Remember what is written,—that when the three children and Daniel, and the other captive youths, were led by the King of Babylon, and commanded to eat of his table, and they refused, and did eat only of the seeds of the earth, that, after ten days, when introduced into the presence of the King, their faces, instead of being squalid, appeared more beautiful than those of the others who had been fed at the royal table. See then,” continues this great saint, “that fasting does not produce what you dread. It cures diseases, it dries up the humors of the body; it puts the demon to flight; it expels bad thoughts; it renders the mind clearer, the heart purer, the body holier: and, in short, it raises man to the throne of God.”

* S. Hieronym. Epist. ad Marcellam. † Epist. ad Demetriad. ‡ Letter to Olympias.

Finally : in the Father of the Scholastic Theology, we find the same counsels of prudence and moderation :—"Injure not your health," says St. Anselm. "Melius est enim ut cum salute corporis, læto animo aliquid faciatis, quam per ægritudinem ab his quæ cum lætitiâ bene facitis, deficiatis."* Thus, those extravagant and gloomy images of penance, which some men associate with the remembrance of the scholastic-romantic ages, have, in general, no other foundation but the fancy of poets and the misrepresentation of the adversaries of the holy Church.

But let us on ; our length of way admonishes to speed, and we have to mark other instances of mortification and penance, as connected with the character of those who mourned with effectual grief. To speak of the ordinary exercises which were recommended by the universal consent of the spiritually wise, would be long and needless. In this respect, the manners of the middle ages present nothing remarkable, excepting the fervor and sincerity with which the discipline of a penitential life was observed by men in every class of society. Behold that race of mourners, all downward lying, prone upon the ground, and weeping sore. These are the elect of God, in whom repentant tears mature that blessed hour, when they shall find absolution from the holy Church, and with Heaven acceptance. "My soul hath cleaved to the dust," you hear with such deep sighs uttered, that they well nigh choke the words. But let us pass on to view still more remarkable fruits of penance, undertaken by contrite sinners, some of whose voluntary penal woes are well calculated to excite our astonishment. Genebaud, Bishop of Laon, penetrated with a sense of sinfulness of his conduct in having yielded to a foul temptation, sent to entreat St. Remi to come to Laon at whose feet he prostrated himself, and confessed his fault. To repair the public scandal of his fall, the bishop shut himself up in a dark cell, more like a tomb than the abode of a living man, and there he passed seven years in prayer and fasting, tears and watching. During this time, St. Remi undertook the charge of his diocese, and at its expiration, he restored him to his episcopal see.† In the year 582, St. Hospice, a recluse, shut himself up in a tower to do penance near a celebrated monastery at Nice, in Provence. In that tower he lived a long time till his death. Celebrated also was the example of Dominick Loricat, or the Curiassed, a renowned penitent at the end of the tenth century, so called because he wore next the skin a coat of mail, which he used to lay aside only for the discipline. The extraordinary austerities of this man furnished a striking lesson to the rude warriors who knew him, of the heinousness of sin. But as they were accustomed to a life of every kind of hardship, a moderate penance would have been counted for nothing : or rather, it would have seemed to them like a recognition of the lightness of sin.

Some modern writers, who profess to philosophize, express the utmost astonishment at meeting with such acts of mortification in a religion which lays claim to peace and blessed charity : but such amaze will not be long the inmate of a thoughtful breast. If it had been evinced in ages of faith, they who expressed it would have been referred for solution to the Gospel which is read on the first Sunday of that solemn season, when the Church sings "Creator alme siderum," and reminds men of the coming of our Lord to judgment; and of those dread words, "And these shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the just unto life eternal."—"What will be the tribunal of the Judge," cries St. Augustin, "when the cradle of the infant terrified proud kings."* Who can think of the day of his coming? and who will stand to behold him? At that tremendous hour of last judgment, when, as St. Ephrem says, "the priest will be separated from the priest, the bishop from the bishop, the father from the son, the daughter from the mother,—when the reprobate, cast off from before the face of God, will find themselves alone, deprived of all assistance, abandoned even by hope,—when they will cry, 'O how could we lose in indifference the time that was given us! What shall we do? Alas! we can do no longer penance! The time is past. No more shall we see the innumerable legions of angels and saints, no more shall we contemplate that true light which enlightens the abode of the blessed! Behold us here isolated, rejected, far from God, far from joy. Farewell, ye just; farewell, apostles, prophets, martyrs. Farewell, all ye that are happy and holy!'"†

* S. Anselmi Epist. CL. ad Goffrid.

† Anquetil, Hist. de Rheims, Lib. I. 50.

These were the considerations which moved men with such force to do penance seriously; for they said with St. Augustin, "If man wished to punish himself, God would spare him. Sit oportet ipse severus in se, ut in eum sit misericors Deus."‡

Hear how St. Odo, the abbot of Cluny, speaks of the danger of sin; and consider what an impression such words must have made upon the simple, profound, and susceptible minds of men in the middle ages. "Adam once sinned, and is dead. If you therefore should sin, expect not to be spared. If any one could have been spared, it would have been Adam, who was new-made, tender, and rude, and who had before known no sin;—but as for you who wish to sin after the Law, after the Prophets, after the Gospel, after the Apostles,—what hope can there be of indulgence?"§

There is one remarkable characteristic of the middle ages, which we should constantly bear in mind whenever we institute a comparison between them and our own times, in relation either to literature, art, or religion,—it is, that these things were all taken seriously, taken in earnest. While hearing the moderns converse on subjects of religious truth, one might expect every moment that some of them would have sufficient acuteness and consistency as to propose a question like that of Callicles, to Socrates, who, after hearing his noble statement of the evil of sin, consisting in its nature rather than in its punishment, exclaims, "O Socrates, tell us whether you say these things seriously or only in jest, for if you are serious, and it be really true what you now say, without doubt it follows that our whole life is perverse, and that we do all things exactly contrary to what we ought.||

* Serm. II. de Epiph.

† Serm. LXXII.

‡ S. August. Serm. CCLXXVIII.

§ S. Odonis, Abb. Clun. II. Collation. Lib. II. Bibliothec. Cluniac.

|| Plat. Gorgias.

In the middle ages, it is true, men did not seem to believe that the way to heaven was precisely the broadest and easiest that presented itself to the senses ; they were impressed with the idea that their souls could not be saved without retirement, meditation, and occasional renouncement of lawful pleasures ; many of the penitential austerities were no doubt great ; but who can hear without trembling what St. Gregory says, "that more men perish by means of false penance than by impenitence itself;" and after this, who can feel inclined to criticise the penitents of ages of faith ? It is not, however, to be denied, but that occasionally the spirit of human severity may have mixed itself with the austerity of penance, so as to have occasioned great and grievous abuse. When the passions of men are strong, they are sometimes fearful even in the deeds which spring from virtuous sources ; and the facts of ancient history are not to be concealed because some men in modern times have chosen to exaggerate and pervert them thoughtlessly, or for malignant purposes. The horrible tale professing to reveal the secrets of monastic penance in the middle ages, which the genius of a modern bard has rendered so familiar, contains abundant internal evidence, that the author wrote from vague and general report, and without having ever studied the subject which he pretended to illustrate. Who that has read the rules of the blessed St. Benedict, breathing nothing but seraphic love and sanctity, will not lift up his hands in astonishment, on hearing that account of the judgment pronounced upon Constance de Beverley in the abbey of Lindisfarn, where the three Heads of houses are feigned to have sat for horrible doom :

"All servants of Saint Benedict,
The statutes of whose order strict
On iron table lay !"

As if that holy book gave them authority to commit the barbarous deed which imparts such a horrible intent to this narrative.

How grave and moral writers can be guilty of this strange readiness to admit and propagate slanders against the saintly and illustrious dead, I know not, nor is it necessary for us here to inquire. What we have to do is to examine the real facts which may have originally suggested the idea of this celebrated romance ; and no one need shrink from such an investigation, through a tenderness for the character of former times, for it is no reproach peculiar to any age, that some men should have been found in it, who were without prudence or without charity. The first mention of a penitential prison for guilty monks, occurs in the writings of St. John Climachus, who was abbot of Mt. Sinai, at the end of the sixth century. St. Benedict who lived before this book of St. John Climachus had appeared, prescribed in his rule various modes of correction for monks who offended, but he makes no mention of a prison ; although in the XVIIIth chapter, he enumerates accurately all the precautions and punishments to be used before expelling a monk as incorrigible. "But," says Mabillon, in his treatise on the Monastic prisons, "the hardness of some abbots in subsequent times, was carried to such an excess, that they mutilated the limbs of some monks who were guilty of great crimes, so that the monks obtained from Charlemagne, an especial decree for their protection. All the abbots being assembled at Aix-la-Chapelle, in 817, ordered that in each monastery there should be a retired house, domus semota, for the guilty, a chamber with a fire-place and an ante-chamber for work. This was ordained by all the abbots of the empire, France, Germany, and Italy. It was in subsequent times that Matthew Prior of St. Martin-des-Champs, according to the report of Peter the Venerable, invented a fearful kind of prison which was without light, and destined for those who were to be perpetually confined, and it was called the Vade in Pace. The abbot was guilty of this excess through his extravagant severity and hatred of sin; but he inflicted it upon only one criminal monk. Stephen, Archbishop of Toulouse, complained of these inventions to king John, "de horribili rigore quem monachi exercebant adversus monachos graviter peccantes." This led to measures of prevention in future; Mabillon expresses his astonishment at such inhumanity in monks, who ought to be models of all gentleness and compassion; but it should be remembered how rare and isolated were such instances in the long succession of ages; how solitary they stand in history, and unconnected with any part of monastic discipline; and that after all, the immunities of the religious, who were not subject to the civil power, made some provision for the punishment of great offenders absolutely necessary. As for the story of Constance, it is utterly defective in regard to history, inasmuch as the extension of such penalties to communities of women is a mere invention; and even if the author had adhered to limits within which he would have had some foundation, the unwarranted assertions, to use the gentlest expression, which are woven through the whole tissue of his poem, would, to any reader of moderate instruction, have destroyed all coloring of truth. This Matthew Prior of St. Martin-des-Champs, to whom he is so greatly indebted, was not to mankind but to sin a foe; ignorant it is true, but justifying no poet in the conclusion that he had retired into the cloister "for despite and envy;" or "that he joyed in doing ill." The whole abuse is to be ascribed to the extravagant zeal of some well-meaning men in times of great severity of principles; and we find that there was no obstacle or delay in providing against it effectual remedies.

CHAPTER V.

WE have already seen some of the works of mourning which were substituted for the solemn public penance of the ancient canons; but that which in a literary or poetical point of view, is the most interesting of these works, remains to be considered, which consisted in the pilgrimages either expressly prescribed or voluntarily undertaken for the correction of passions and the expiation of sins. Of the former, some were imposed for great offences as a more severe penalty than that which was enacted against them by the civil laws. Men who had committed homicide were ordered to go on pilgrimage to various holy places in foreign lands, bound all the while with iron chains, for in these ages capital punishment was rarely inflicted. These chains were worn round the neck and also on both arms; sometimes the pilgrims deserved to be freed from them, and then they were freed in the church.* The four miserable knights who murdered St. Thomas at Canterbury, after long wanderings, were enjoined to make a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, and there to live as penitential converts on the black mountain. Some were to be condemned to pass the whole remainder of their lives on pilgrimage. Such were degraded priests who should have discovered the secret of confession. "Deponatur, et omnibus diebus vitæ suæ ignominiosè peregrinando pergat." We read of others who were never to remain more than one night in the same place.

At Rheims disputes and combats between the citizens, used generally to be terminated by the sheriffs, and the most usual penalty inflicted was a pilgrimage. The persons condemned were to set out on a fixed day, and to remain in the town indicated during three, six, or twelve months, and to bring back authentic certificates. It was generally a pilgrimage to St. James in Gallicia, to Tours, Toulouse, Marseilles, or Boulogne sur Mer. The two enemies were often condemned to travel, but in different directions, which, as Anquetil remarks, "was a simple and wise method of re-establishing peace between them, for time and new objects, and the interposition of friends to calm the minds of both parties, were always sure to heal the wounds."† But the pilgrims who chiefly demand our attention at present belong to a different class from these: they were men who, without having rendered themselves amenable to human laws, had undertaken painful journeys

* Mabillon, Præfat. in II. Sæcul. Benedict.

† Hist. de Rheims, lib. III. 155.

in obedience to what was prescribed to them by religion, as affording the means of correcting vices, and of atoning in the sense required for the sins of their past life.

The palmer differed from the pilgrim in having no fixed residence, but spending his life in visiting holy places, at the same time professing voluntary poverty. Spencer, without scorn, describes the former :

“At length they chaunst to meet upon the way
 An aged sire, in long blacke weedes yclad
 His feete all bare, his beard all hoarie grey,
 And by his belt his booke he hanging had ;
 Sober he seemde, and very sagely sad ;
 And to the ground his eyes were lowly bent,
 Simple in show, and voide of malice bad ;
 And all the way he prayed as he went,
 And often knockt his breast, as one that did repent.”*

The Church had introduced the custom of assigning a journey to the holy land as an efficacious penance ; and there are not wanting even modern writers separated from its communion who can discern and point out the wisdom of what was thus recommended. “I know of nothing,” says one of these, “so likely to bow down a proud spirit, and soften it into deep and purifying thought, as a long distant journey. There is no heart proof against the solemn influence of solitude among strange and impressive scenes. The confidence which it has in itself, and in which its contempt for the future was intrenched, gradually gives way among them. The new forms under which nature presents herself, are so many proofs that there is an existence and a power, of which, in the thoughtless uniformity of the past, it had received no idea, and with that new consciousness, rushes in a train of feelings, which, if not the same, are nearer than most others to those inspired by religion. For this effect of the long and often perilous journey which he prescribed, the priest might look with some degree of confidence ; and no doubt experience taught him, that the hardest of his penitents was not likely to come back from Syria with a mind unimpressed with the sentiments he wished to inspire. Other advantages also presented themselves in favor of this kind of penance. To the natural influence of the journey through wild and distant countries, was added that of the example of many devout and enthusiastic wanderers. At every stage of his route, the traveller was sure to meet one or more of these humble palmers, either hastening to, or returning from, the holy city. Their humility, self-denial, and constant prayer, were powerful appeals to the haughty souls of the unwilling pilgrim. Generally also he was, by the nature of his expedition, far separated from his former companions : for his proud knights and splendid retinue no longer followed him as a gay and gallant noble ; and if they accompanied him, it was to be worshippers, like himself, at the holy tomb. He was thus led to form associations which materially aided the purposes for which the penance was imposed, and the priest knew that his instructions and exhortations to repentance would be repeated as many times as there were leagues between his parish and the sacred walls of Jerusalem. Nor are reasons of another kind wanted to justify the preference of pilgrimages over other penances. What could be more proper than to send him, who had broken the laws of Christ, to contemplate the scenes which had been hallowed by his sufferings? What could better persuade to repentance, than the sight of objects which recalled to mind all he had done for the sake of mankind, and to bring them under the dominion of love and peace? The guilty violator of divine laws could not tread the streets of the holy city, without feeling as if the very stones cried out against him, to remind him, as his eyes turned towards the heights of Calvary, that he had 'crucified the Son of God afresh.' So far this writer. But the moral advantages of this discipline were well understood and explained with greater clearness at the time when it received the highest sanction. In all ages, many of those who thought seriously about their salvation, used at times to leave their home and family to have leisure to follow God, disengaged from domestic cares, going out of their own country like the Magi, to repair to Christ.

* F. Q. I. 1.

We read of many saints who, by the inspiration of God, have abandoned houses, and riches, and friends, to travel like pilgrims through strange nations, in order to serve him more at ease and freedom. In this conduct, they imitated not only Abraham but the apostles. They felt that the distractions and ties of a multitude of friends and riches, and worldly concerns, left them not sufficient leisure to attend to the interests of their souls, and the fruits of such pilgrimages were so notorious that it became a proverb. "Exeat aula qui volet esse pius."

Many remarkable examples of this kind are found in the records of the middle age. Frodoard, in his history of the Church of Rheims relates, that in the time of Foulques Archbishop, who had succeeded Hincmar, there came into the province of Rheims, seven brothers, Gibrian, Helan, Tresan, Germain, Veran, Atran, and Petran, with their three sisters, Fracia, Promptie, and Possenna, come from Ireland in pilgrimage, for the love of our Lord Jesus Christ; and they established themselves each in a separate place on the banks of the river Marne. Gibrian, who was a priest, inhabited the village of Cosse, where he lived many years soberly, justly, and piously, applying himself till the end of his life to combat for his salvation.* In the seventh century, St. Giles seeing that he could not lead an obscure and retired life in his own country, where his piety and learning made him the object of general admiration, resolved to leave it to avoid the applause of men; he, therefore, passed into France, and chose for his dwelling a hermitage in the desert, which was near the mouth of the Rhone. Thence he removed into a place called Garde, and thence into a forest in the diocese of Nismes. The Saxon chronicle relates, that in the year 891, "three Scots from Ireland came to King Alford in a boat without any oars; they had stolen away because they would live in a state of pilgrimage for the love of God, they recked not where. The boat in which they came was made of two hides and a half; and they took with them provisions for seven nights, and within seven nights they came to land in Cornwall, and soon after went to King Alford. They were named Dubslane, Macbeth, and Mælinman." From the same motives monks came from Rome, into Ireland, being also drawn thither by the desire of a stricter life, or the love of sacred learning.*

* Lib. IV. cap. 9.

Bede relates of St. Hilda, "that after dedicating herself wholly to the service of God, she intended, from the province of the East Angles, to pass over if possible into France, forsaking her native country and all that she had, and there to live a stranger for our Lord, in the monastery of Celles, that so she might the more easily merit the eternal country of heaven." These motives were expressly approved of by the greatest philosophers of the middle ages. "Change of place," says St. Bonaventura, "is sometimes favorable to the spiritual health of novices. In changing place they change objects which may have led them astray. Men often become better and more perfect by leaving for a time their country and their native land."† St. Jerome goes so far as to say that a monk cannot be perfect in his own country.‡ In the last book, we observed that the interests of learning were thought to require absence in a foreign country, and now it appears that a journey to strange lands was deemed no less conducive to those of a spiritual nature. The moderns are for placing the summit of virtue and happiness in domestic repose, but after all, what skills it in this voyage of life, to cast anchor and say to one's bark, "Let us rest here: behold the port which is appointed to you! here you shall sleep like an island of the sea, which the force of the bitter waves cannot disturb? On the wide seas of this world there is no port, and shipwreck alone casts us upon the shore."§ St. Augustin treats at large upon the social life and shows to how many evils and offences it is exposed, notwithstanding all the wisdom and prudence which men may bring to it;|| and besides, he observes, "that after the example of their respective prototypes, the two cities into which the whole race of men are divided, Jerusalem and Babylon, and distinguished from each other by the former being in a state of pilgrimage, and the latter in a condition of apparent rest. Cain, whose name signified possession, founded a city earthly, having this world for its fixed resting-place, established in its temporal peace and felicity; but Able, whose name denoted grief, was a stranger and a wanderer. Seth and Enos were named after the resurrection, and the hope of those who invoked God. For thus the city of God in the time of its pilgrimage is only sustained by hope, which arises from faith in the resurrection of Christ." These are

* Monastic. Hiber. Introduc.

† S. Bonaventuræ Speculum Novitiorum, cap. 2.

‡ Epist. V.

§ De Lamartine.

|| De Civitate Dei, Lib. XIX. cap. 5.

the profound views of St. Augustine ;* but in a lower sense, and without reference to saints who approach perfection, it is obvious, that in a foreign country the pilgrim or scholar has more opportunity for recollection. Separated from former companions and occupations, the days of his youth come back upon him like a plaintiff strain of harmony ; a tone of mourning pervades his thoughts and looks. Neither personal merit nor family connections avail him there : he is left alone, and has occasion to think upon God and on eternal truths as well as to practise humility in an eminent degree. Introduced to a different language and to different manners, his former associations are broken, and the facilities to vice are diminished : he can hardly be so profligate as to begin the abuse of new words and of new manners. Such solitude was favorable to charity. Under the strong, religious impressions which it was calculated to produce, every one seemed a friend, every face was loved, every one was believed to be pious, and just, and innocent. In society it is hard to retain such a temper ; hatred, suspicions, and indignation, easily enter and possess the heart. Travelling was a school of humility, when a great man would wander like Ulysses, as a poor unknown stranger. We find the son of Sirach testifying that he has travelled much, and exhorting others to follow his example.†

The ancients were not ignorant of the intellectual and moral good which resulted from leaving home, and visiting distant countries. Pythagoras, we are told, finding himself loaded with gifts and occupations of public life by his countrymen, concluded that it was most difficult to sit at home and to philosophize, and remarked, “that all who had before him studied philosophy, had passed their lives among strangers : therefore renouncing all political administration, he departed from Samos and repaired to Italy, where he established himself in Crotona.”‡ “Abducendus est etiam,” says Cicero, speaking of him whose passions were to be corrected, “nonnumquam ad alia studia, sollicitudines, curas, negotia : loci denique mutatione, tamquam ægroti non convalescentes, sæpe curandus est.”§ Sophocles introduces a king, acknowledging the benefit he has received from having been educated a foreigner in a strange country, where Theseus says to CEdipus, ὥς οἶδ' αὖ γ' αὐτὸς, ὥς ἐπαίδευθην ζέυρος,

ᾧ ὅπερ σὺ———.]

And when Pythagoras returned to Samos after an absence of twelve years, we are told that he was received with admiration by the seniors ; for that he seemed to have brought home from his peregrination more beauty and wisdom, and greater indication of divinity.¶

With respect to the Christian pilgrimages, additional reasons would result in favor of them, from considering what was the particular object in view in their

* De Civitate Dei, Lib. XV. cap. i. 17, 18. † Ecclesiast. XXXIV. 12; XVI. 23; XXXIX. 5.

‡ Jamblich. de Pythagoric. Vita, cap. 5.

§ Tuscul. IV.

¶ CEdip. Col. 562.

¶ Jamblich. de Pythagoric. Vita, cap. 5.

institution. The desire of visiting places, associated with the memory of persons dear and venerable, is a feeling of humanity recognized in all ages by the universal race of men, and interwoven with the profoundest roots of the sentient principle of our nature. If it sprang from mere caprice or some particular error of any age, we should not find that its reasonableness could be every where and at all times understood, as we know that it is. When Chateaubriand was at Sparta, a chief of the law desired to know for what object he had come to Greece. Upon the interpreter replying that he had come to examine the ruins, the chief burst into loud laughter, and regarded him as a madman, until he added, "that he was only passing on his pilgrimage to Jerusalem," when the other exclaimed, "Kalo, kalo," making no more questions, but seeming perfectly satisfied ; for all the motives of religion are understood and respected every where. A striking instance of the intensity of this feeling is furnished by Father Bouhours, in his history of St. Francis Xavier, for he relates, "that after the death of the saint, one of the Indians who had been converted by him, and who was a most holy Christian, not content with visiting the place of his death, made a journey across an immense country, and passed the seas in order to behold the castle of Xavier. Entering the chamber where he was born, he threw himself on his knees and kissed the ground and wept, after which, without paying attention to any thing else in Europe, he returned to India, considering as a great treasure, a little piece of stone which he had picked out of the wall of the chamber."* The pilgrimages to certain abbeys like Einsiedeln, or to Shrines, as that of St. Thomas at Canterbury, were themselves facts which, by attesting the truth of ancient prodigies thus transmitted from father to son, continually excited men to greater fervor. Visiting holy places, also to kiss the spot which was darkened with the blood of martyrs, or to have a more lively apprehension of the great mysteries which were consummated in Palestine, by beholding a representation of the very places in which they passed, conduced, when performed with what a certain great German author calls "the sacramental sense," from the enjoyment of which none but the race of sophists are excluded, to the experience of a kind of inspiration ; and was an act which was known to be holy by its fruits. Generally, as we have already seen, the object of pilgrimages was to deliver men for a time from temporal cares and acquaintances, from the concerns of a family, and from all those solitudes of the world which so engross the thoughts of men, that whatever they may pretend they cannot think upon God or the state of their soul, or meditate on the eternal years. It was also to give them opportunity of practising humility, the first step in the heavenly life, and of mortifying their bodies by fatigue, which of itself might overcome sensuality. The very idea too that in going perhaps this journey of three days into the wilderness, to sacrifice to the Lord their God, they were also going to a place where thousands and millions had gone before, in circumstances like their own, for the sake of their souls, and where many of them had been permanently converted to God, must have spoken to the heart in powerful language. Yet we find prudence and moderation along with the greatest fervor, as may be witnessed in the letter of Petrus Cellensis to the prior of Canterbury, where he says, "My conscience accuses and excuses me for not going to the tomb of our holy Thomas, the precious martyr of God. I am a monk, an abbot, and an old man, and as such I ought not to leave my cloister, not neglect my temporal cares, but I should lean my staff against my fig-tree and have in mind the eternal years. It is pious to go, it is pious not to go. The journey is good which is attended with holy devotion; but the detention is religious which is joined with pious commemoration."*

* Lib. II. 282.

It was ungentle and unjust scorn in Milton to speak of "pilgrims that strayed so far to seek in Golgotha him dead, who lives in heaven;" a sentence comprising a most false testimony and a most sophistical objection. It was well known by these men who strayed to Golgotha, that the only indispensable pilgrimage was that to our heavenly country, by the purification of the soul which might be obtained without leaving home. "Non enim," as St. Augustin says, "ad eum qui ubique præsens est locis movemur, sed bono studio bonisque moribus."† But yet in spite of Milton's incredulity, the way, to the pilgrims, might not be in vain nor unfruitful.

St. Paul desires that married persons should separate from each other for a time, and abandon the cares of wedded life, to give themselves to prayer.‡ By a pilgrimage this separation was joined with prayer, and on this ground Wittwyler, in his history of St. Meinrad and the pilgrimage of Einsiedeln, defends the practice as beneficial and holy. But is it said abuses may have followed; undoubtedly it may have been so. But where have not abuses followed? and as Tschudi a German author remarks, "that is at once the greatest abuse when men destroy what is good in order to prevent abuse." "There went," "you say, "in the holy throng, men of little worth, and hypocrites most vile, who looked for nought but gold:" God alone, it is true, knows the pilgrim, but this uncertainty furnished no valid ground for objection against such a practice. The devil led our blessed Saviour into the holy city, and we need not marvel to find him conducting thither whom he will. "Nor," as St. Augustin says, "ought the sheep to lay aside their clothing, because wolves sometimes conceal themselves in it."§ Persons, you complain, used to desert their families to go on pilgrimage: "But," says the historian of Einsiedeln, who wrote from experience, "did they not return better fathers, better sons, and better men? Were not the proud become humble, the weak strong, the immoral pure, and was not the temporary loss recompensed an hundred fold?"

* Petri Cellens, Epist. Lib. VII. 21.

† I Corinth. VII. 5.

‡ De Doctrina Christiana, cap. 10.

§ Lib. II. de Serm. Dom. in Monte, cap. 12.

Let it be remarked, too, that the persons who condemn the pilgrims are themselves wanderers, only differing from them in having no religious motives for their way. They are wanderers, like that hero of paganism, who was impatient to leave the people and city of the Phœcians, and yet, no sooner is he departed, than we find him crying out, "Ah! whither have I come! Would that I had remained there with the Phœcians"—

*αἰὶ' ὄφελον μέναι παρά φαίηκεσβιν αὐτοῦ

It is not for men, the sole of whose unblessed feet can find no rest, to speak disdainfully of the pilgrim's course, impelled by a reasonable desire, and bounded by a holy vow. Granting that the places in general to which he repaired may have had no recommendation in the estimation of the world, and of those who remain in it, what then? Cannot religion give to particular places a charm and an importance beyond what commerce or pleasure can impart? "Men," saith Pindar, "speak of the Island of Delos, but the gods in Olympus call it, 'The far-famed star of the dark earth.'" Loretto and Walsingham make but a poor figure in the diary of an epicurean or commercial traveller; but in what a tender and hallowed light are they seen by the poor? In the year 1061, an obscure widow, inhabiting a small village, on the wild and tempestuous coast of Norfolk, by erecting a little chapel, resembling that at Nazareth, where our blessed Lady was saluted by the angel Gabriel, is able to impart a renown to that village which extends throughout all England; and such as not all the kings of the earth combined, with all the aid of parliaments to boot, could ever have given to it. Erasmus describes Walsingham in his light manner; and yet, even from his account, one cannot help regarding it with interest:—"Not far from the sea," saith he, "about four miles, there standeth a town, living almost of nothing else but upon the resort of pilgrims. There is a college of canons there, supported by their offerings. In the church is a small chapel, but all of wood, whereunto, on either side, at a narrow and little door, are such admitted as come with their devotions and offerings. Small light there is in it, and none other but by wax tapers, yielding a most dainty and pleasant smell; nay, if you look into it, you would say it were the habitation of heavenly saints, indeed, so bright shining it is all over with precious stones, with gold and silver." Camden mentions, that princes have repaired to this chapel, walking thither barefoot. These places are now plundered, overthrown, and stigmatized, as the proper objects of scorn to men of intelligence; but is it just to prevent the poor from making their innocent journey to a cross,—to some spot, known in their annals as the far-famed star of the dark earth,—while such immense sums are squandered upon voyages of mere pleasure, to visit springs of mineral water, and brilliant cities, through idleness and vanity? Why are the pious, to be condemned for seeking holy places for the sake of edification, in order that the visible and temporal may be made the means for them to gain eternity?

To the great Benedictine Abbey of Einsiedeln, it was the custom every year for whole parishes of Switzerland to repair, in solemn procession, with cross and banners: vast numbers of nobles and princes also used to make this pilgrimage. More collected or saintly looks I never beheld than in the pilgrims whom I met along the roads leading to it. In the year 1826, there were, among these pilgrims, one hundred and fifty thousand communicants, which only exceeded by a small number the average amount every year. Pilgrims, before setting out to visit holy places, were enjoined to hear mass, in which was to be said the prayer for travellers; and, at the end, the Roman ritual prescribed various psalms and prayers, which the priest was to repeat, in reference to them. In like manner, on their return, they were to receive a benediction, the form of which may be seen in the ritual. Of the ardor for visiting the holy land in ages of faith, there are on record many affecting instances. Raymond, a young man of Placentia, having been early impressed with a veneration for the pious pilgrims who passed through his native city, fell into a profound melancholy, of which no one could discover the cause; at last, persuaded into a confession by the bitter grief of his affectionate mother, he told her that his mourning originated in his earnest desire to visit Palestine. He had concealed his desire till now, from the fear of afflicting her; but, instead of being grieved, as he had expected, she regarded him, for a time, with silent joy, and then embraced him, saying, "I am a widow, and I may imitate the example of St. Anne, who in her widowhood, quitted not the temple of Jerusalem, neither day nor night." Having then informed her son that she was resolved to accompany him on his holy journey, they immediately made their preparations. Previous to their departure, they received the episcopal blessing from the holy prelate of Placentia, who placed a red cross upon their breasts, and begged them to remember their country during their meritorious engagement, and to pray that it might be preserved during the calamities with which it seemed threatened by signs from heaven. They then took up their staff and scrip, and set out on their journey, accompanied, for a short distance, by their friends and neighbors. Nothing remarkable befell them on the way; but when they came in sight of Jerusalem, they are described as weeping at the remembrance of the sufferings of the Lord of Life. Their devotion, on approaching the holy sepulchre, was still more vividly excited; and as they knelt, pouring out their souls at the foot of the cross, they passionately desired that they might die there, where the Saviour himself had poured out his blood. Having visited the other sacred objects in Jerusalem and its neighborhood, they set sail for their native land; but scarcely were they embarked, when Raymond fell sick of a dangerous malady, but he soon recovered, and they arrived safely at land. No sooner, however, were they thus near the completion of their long journey, than the fond mother was seized with a fatal illness, and expired in the arms of her son, spending her last breath in blessing him, and exhorting him to pursue a life of virtue and piety. But a far more memorable example is furnished by St. Jerome, in his immortal letters, describing the pilgrimage of St. Paula :—

“Before setting out, she divided all that she possessed among her children ; then she embarked, weeping, and afraid to turn her eyes towards the dear objects that she was to leave for ever. She touched at the isle of Pontia, celebrated by the exile of Flavia Domitilla, who generously confessed Christ in the persecution of Diocletian. She visited with respect the modest retreat, where this holy lady spent the long years of her martyrdom ; but all her wishes were fixed upon arriving at Jerusalem, whither she hastened on the wings of faith. She passed between Charybdis and Scylla, in the Adriatic, and was obliged to stop at Mithon, to repair her exhausted strength. Thence she arrived successively, at Cythera, at the promontory of Malea, at Rhodes, and at the island of Cyprus, where she had the consolation to find the holy Bishop Epiphanius, who retained her with him for ten days, which she employed to the glory of God, in visiting the numerous monasteries which covered this island, and every where she left abundant alms to the multitude of holy personages, whom the renown of the illustrious prelate had drawn together from all parts of the world. From thence she passed to Seleucia and to Antioch, where the Bishop Paulin detained her for some time. Thence she made a painful journey, during the depth of winter, through Phenicia and Syria. Arrived at the tower of Elias, on the banks of the Sarepta, she addressed her prayers to our Saviour Jesus Christ, and traversed the sands of Tyre. Thence she passed to Cotti, which is now called Ptolemaïde, where she entered the country of the Philistines. She saw the celebrated tower of Straton, and the house of that Cornelius who is mentioned in St. Paul’s Epistles, where is now a church. She passed through Lydda, where Dorcas and Enea were raised to life by St. Peter and St. Paul. Then she saw the tower of Arimathea, to which belonged Joseph, who buried our Lord. Thence she passed by Emmaus, which is now called Nicopolis. Here the house of Cleophas is still shown : it is changed into a church.

“Paula remained some time at Gabaon. Thence, leaving on the left the sepulchre of Helena, she entered Jerusalem. Now she gave proof of her great humility: for, as a proconsul of Palestine, who knew the family of the noble lady, had prepared an apartment for her in the Pretorian palace, she would have no other lodging but a little humble cell. Without taking any rest, she began to visit the holy places, with such an ardent piety, that, without the desire which pressed her to go to prostrate herself in those she had not as yet seen, she could not turn herself away from those which she beheld. O what tears did she pour forth at the foot of the cross and in the holy sepulchre ! I call to witness the inhabitants of Jerusalem who were present. She then visited the citadel of Sion, and the place where the Holy Ghost descended upon the apostles. After distributing all that remained to her between her servants and the poor, she departed at last for Bethlehem. She went a little of out her way to see the sepulchre of Rachel. Arriving at Bethlehem, and entering into the grotto, she contemplated the holy asylum of the queen of virgins. There I heard her say that, with the eyes of faith, she saw the divine infant, and the magi adoring, and the Virgin Mother, and the shepherds hastening to behold the Word made flesh. In the joy which accompanied her holy tears, she cried, 'Hail Bethlehem, so worthy of thy name; House of Bread! where the Bread of Heaven deigned to descend for us. Ah! how is it possible that I, wretched sinner, should be found worthy to kiss this cradle, to pray in this cave, where the Virgin Mother deposited her Divine fruit? This shall be the place of my rest, since it is the country of my God; here will I dwell, since my God did not disdain to be born here: here will I give myself to that God who gave himself up for me.' Descending then to the tower of Ader, she saw the place where Jacob fed his flocks, and where the shepherds heard the angels singing, 'Gloria in excelsis Deo.' Thence she passed to Gaza and Bethsura, and to the house of Sara; she saw the cradle of Isaac, and the oak of Abraham. Then she passed to Chebron, called Cariath, that is, the town of the four men, because it was supposed to contain the tombs of Abraham, Jacob, Isaac, and Adam.

"On the following day, at the rising of the sun, she stopped on the summit of Caphar Barnecha, whence she beheld the vast solitude, where once stood the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah. But I return with the illustrious traveller to Jerusalem. Paula visited the tomb of Lazarus: the house where dwelt Mary Magdalen and Martha. She then went to Jericho; and on the way thought of the good Samaritan. She stopped at the place where the blind received their sight. The next day, soon after midnight, she travelled to the banks of the Jordan; and as the first rays of the sun gilded its banks, she reflected on that Son of Justice which there began his divine mission. She contemplated with veneration the tombs of Joshua, and of Eliezer, son of Aaron; and she could not sufficiently admire this latter, which is at Gaban, in the territory of his family, because, being charged with the division of the conquered land, he had kept for his own part the country which was the most scorched and barren. She then visited Silo and Sichem. She entered a church, which has been built on the side of the mountain of Garezim, over the well of the patriarch Jacob, where our Saviour sat with the woman of Samaria. Thence she went to view the tombs of the twelve patriarchs. Weak as she was, she mounted on foot to the summit of the celebrated mountain where the prophet Abdias retired with the hundred prophets in time of persecution, living in caverns, and feeding upon bread and water. Thence she went to Nazareth, to Chanaan, and Capharnaum. She saw the Lake of Tiberiad, sanctified by the honor of having borne the Lord in his navigations, and the desert where he fed the multitude. From the top of Mount Thabor she discovered the mountains of Hermon and Hermonium, and the vast plains of Galilee. She was pointed out the city of Naïn, where the widow's son was raised; but time would fail me to describe all the places which the venerable Paula was prompted to visit by piety and faith. I pass, therefore, at once into Egypt, where she visited the church which is built over the tomb of the prophet Micah. Then passing over the immense sands of the desert, where she had nothing to guide her but the print of steps, almost effaced, of the travellers who had preceded her in that perilous way, she arrived at the river Seor, and the plains of Tanis. Thence she passed to the city of No, which is now called Alexandria. She then visited Nitria, which had just recently embraced the faith of Christ. The bishop of this city, named Isidore, who had had the honor to confess his religion generously during a persecution, came out to meet her with a crowd of monks, many of whom were priests. At the sight of so many eminent personages, she rejoiced in the glory of the Lord, acknowledging herself unworthy of the honors there showed to her. Then it was that she became acquainted with the Macaires, the Arsetuses, the Serapions, and the crowd of other saints, who were the glory of Christ in these countries. She visited the holy solitaries with respect, and prostrated herself humbly at the feet of each of them. In the least of these servants of God, she thought she beheld God; and it seemed to her that the honors she rendered to them were rendered to Christ, whose image they were to her eyes. O, wonderful ardor! O, courage! almost incredible in a woman, Paula would have wished to have passed the remainder of her days with them, subject to their austere rule, if she had not been recalled to Palestine; so, embarking at Pelusa, she passed to Magunia, and thence returned to Bethlehem; where, for the first three years, she inhabited a small house, until a monastery with cells had been constructed by her orders. There, by the way-side, she built an hospital, which was always open to poor travellers in the very place where Joseph and Mary had found no asylum. Here ended her travels; and from this period (adds St. Jerome) I shall confine myself to describe the progress which she continued to make in virtue.”*

The motives for visiting the holy land, as has been admitted by modern writers, were reasonable and holy; and that Rome should have been another place to which pilgrims, from every part of the world, were directed, can excite no surprise, when we consider the religious interest attached to that venerable city, and the indulgences which were extended to those who visited it with a devout intention. We find repeated mention of the pilgrimages to Rome in the Saxon Chronicle; Ina, king of Wessex, who founded the monastery of Glastonbury, afterwards went to Rome, and continued there to the end of his life. Again, in the year 709, we read that Cenred went to Rome, and Offa with him; and Cenred was there to the end of his life. Alfred sent pilgrims to Rome; for kings used often to send pilgrims thither, and to Jerusalem, paying their expenses, as we see in the testament of René, King of Sicily, so late as in the year 1474.† On their return, such pilgrims always carried their palms at the procession.

In the remarkable letter which Canute addressed to the bishops and nation of England, he describes, in simple and affecting language, the motives which induced him to make a pilgrimage to Rome: and it is interesting to observe how precisely similar they were to those which still actuate every devout Catholic who repairs thither. Independent of the advantage resulting to the traveller himself, there were reasons to recommend the custom of this particular pilgrimage to the judgment even of those who were politically wise: for, as Spedalieri shows, the Christian pilgrims meeting together in Rome from every country, brought back to their own land a kind of practical and personal conviction of all being children of one mother, so that afterwards every one felt within himself an additional motive for desiring to avert discord, and whatever might interrupt the concord of the common family.*

* S. Hieron. Epist. ad Eustoch.

† Mem. de Comines. Preuves.

To estimate justly the disposition of the pilgrim's mind, we should consider what were the difficulties to be encountered on a journey, in the middle age, even, as Thucydides says, "by a well-girded man." It is true, nothing was then more common than travelling. What a great traveller was St Bernard! and how many journeys did even a St. Theresa make for objects connected with the different establishments which she founded throughout Spain! We find no trace, indeed, of men and families abandoning their native land to travel over the world, through the vanity of that knight in Ariosto, who has squandered his estate, and of whom we are told,

"Ruined, at length he thinks he will be gone
To other country, where he is unknown."

We have seen that some travelled in order to conceal their virtues, not their vices; but chivalry and the scholastic life corresponded with devotion in suggesting the advantages of travelling, like Homer, to distant nations, to study, not alone the manners, but also the laws, customs, and institutions, which prevailed in different places; and the influence of the Catholic religion, far more than the wisdom of some of the ancient sages, tended to overthrow those barriers, which national jealousies and pride have so often, and in so many countries, interposed between the mutual intercourse of men as with the Dorians, who prohibited travelling, and excluded all foreigners, through an anxiety to keep up their national character and customs, and particularly as, under the laws of Zaleucus, who made it death to leave one's country for another. Christine de Pisan deems it greatly in praise of Louis de Bourbon, fourth brother of King Charles V., that he was a great traveller: "Moult a voyagé et esté en maintes bonnes et honnorables places."† George Chastellain could boast, in like manner, that he had travelled in France, Spain, England, and Italy; and the poet Ronsard, that he had devoted a long time to this employment.

"J'ay long temps voyagé en ma tendre jeunesse Desireux de loüange, ennemi de paresse."‡

* De diritti dell'uomo, Lib. V. 5.

† Livre des fais, &c. II. chap. 14.

‡ Gouget, Tom. XII. 225.

It was during his travels in Germany and his visits to all the great courts of Europe, that the noble and learned Spaniard, Don Diego Savedra Faxardo, collected the materials for his admirable work on the Institutions of a Christian Prince. Like him described by Dante, nothing could overcome, in the ardent spirits of the middle age, the zeal they had to explore the world, and search the ways of life, man's evil and his virtue.* Homer is represented saying, that he prefers wandering to remaining in the sacred streets of Cyme :

——— Μέγας δέ με θυμὸς ἐπείγει δῆμον ἐς ἀλλοδαπῶν ἰέναι ὀλίγον περ ἐόντα.†

Petrarch, in a letter to Andrew Dondolo, doge of Venice, apologizes for his own wandering life, and says, "Heroes, philosophers, and apostles, have led the same."

He might have added, that the noblest works of human genius denote clearly that their authors were pilgrims and strangers upon earth. Chateaubriand defends the plan of his Martyrs from those who condemned it as being only that of a journey, by observing that the Odyssey is nothing but a journey ; that the Æneid, the Lusiad of Camoens, the Jerusalem of Tasso, and the Telemachus of Fenelon, are also journeys, or chiefly composed of journeys. But there was still a higher consideration which moved men in the middle ages in favor of travelling,—for they remarked, that the life of our Divine Master was like a continual journey and pilgrimage. Consider how often he and his blessed mother travelled, beginning with that journey from Nazareth to the mountains of Judea, which, with the return was a distance of twice ninety-five miles. Then there was the journey from Nazareth to Bethlehem of Judea, which was ninety-six miles ; from Bethlehem to Jerusalem, with the return, which was twelve miles ; from Bethlehem into Egypt, which was about three hundred miles, and back again to Nazareth : from Nazareth to Jerusalem, which was ninety miles, and back again ; from Nazareth to the Jordan, which was ninety-two miles. From thence to the desert, five ; from the desert to Bethany, fifteen ; from thence to Cana in Galilee, ninety-four ; thence to Capharnaum, forty-five ; thence to Jerusalem, one hundred and twelve ; thence to Bethbesen on the Jordan, twenty-five ; thence to Sichar in Samaria, forty-four ; thence to Cana, fifty ; thence to Bethsaida, forty-seven ; thence to Capharnaum, six ; thence to the Gessareneth, with the return, which was ten ; thence to Jerusalem, one hundred and twelve ; thence to the Lake of Genesareth, one hundred and six ; thence to Capharnaum, six ; thence to Nain, with the return, which was one hundred miles. Thence to Nazareth, forty-seven ; thence to Sepphoris, fifteen ; thence to Capharnaum, fifty ; thence to Corozaim, with the return, sixteen ; thence to the confines of Tyre, fifty-five ; thence to Sidon, twenty-five ; thence to Capharnaum, fifty-five ; thence to Dalmanutha, five ; thence to Bethsaida,

* Hell, xxvi.

† Epig. IV.

five : thence to Cæsarea-Philippi, thirty-eight ; thence to Mount Thabor, fifty-eight ; thence to Capharnaum, forty-five ; thence to Jerusalem, with the return, which was two hundred and twenty-four ; thence to Bethabara, on the Jordan, thirty-six ; thence to Jerusalem by a circuit of one hundred and twelve miles ; thence to Bethany, twenty-three ; thence to Ephrem, twenty ; thence to Jericho, sixteen ; thence to Bethany, twenty ; thence to Jerusalem, and back to Bethany. Then twice again from Bethany to Jerusalem, with the return thither. And lastly, the final return to Jerusalem.*

In the middle ages, the manner even of ordinary travelling had many advantages. Young nobles, of high houses, would then make their way on foot “in forma pauperis,” with peasant’s shoes and staff in hand. Thus would they foster habits of simplicity and endurance, and that amiable taste for the beauties of nature, which is so closely allied to many virtues. What delightful recollections were in store for him who used to rise before the sun, in order to find a more refreshing bed amidst the salt-sea billows of the Mediterranean, where, from amidst them, he would observe, thrown against the blushing sky, the dark and stately form of the pines, which line the rocky shore,—for him who used to wander beneath the marble steeps of Chiavera, or through the forests, on the shore of Chiassi, listening to the gathering melody which rolls from branch to branch, when Eolus hath loosed from his cavern the dripping south ? What joy would fill his breast, when he beheld the snow-topt Appenines, like golden clouds, amidst the radiance of the rising sun ; and below, far in the distance, for the first time Soracte, and the Tiber, who first unlocks near there his mighty flood, as they appear to him who descends the Mount Ciminus, journeying on his way through Roneiglione to the eternal city ! What a sweet, fond theme afterwards, for such as loved him, to hear of his “moving accidents by flood and field, his hair-breadth ’scapes, and most disastrous chances that his youth had suffered.” In the middle ages, even this rambling assumed a religious character. Along with their student and castle songs, ἄνθεα ὕμνων νεωτέρων, as Pindar says,† these young wanderers could all sweeten their thoughtful hours with repeating some hymn of holy Church, corresponding with their state. He who was first risen would leave the town before his company, and, as he passed along the shore of the placid sea, spread out, in calm majesty, like the floor of a mighty temple, when already the rising sun darted his beams, and, with his arrowy radiance, gave fearful note of provision, for the ensuing hours, he would think of the dangers that might befall him during the meridian heat ; he would be reminded of the flames of anger and the sins of an impatient tongue, and then he would repeat, with audible voice, the primal hymn, which prays to God, at the rising of the star of day,

“Linguam refrænans temperet
Ne litis horror insonet.”

* Voyages de Jesus Christ.

† Olymp. IX.

It is not a mere picture of the imagination which ascribes such manners to the common traveller. In a later age the Chancellor D'Aguesseau mentions, that when his father and mother used to travel, they always began by reciting the prayers of travellers, which are in the holy book of Priests.

The scenes of life too with which travelling generally familiarized men, conduced to the formation of a noble and thoughtful character. They were not led by it to associate with the wretched-godless crew, which, in our own time, is annually discharged upon all the roads of Europe, from the pestilential dens of London or Paris. In general, a modern traveller is only transported from city to city, and from inn to inn, where the same atmosphere, the same dissipation, the same discourse, the same faces accompany him: he is escorted frequently by atheists and epicures, as if by demons—

"Ah, fearful company! but in the Church
With saints, with gluttons at the tavern's mess."*

A wanderer in the middle ages, like Dante, might be traced, in his devious course, to an assembly in the sacristy of some Church, or to some knightly castle among the mountains, or to a chamber in some monastery, in a wild and solitary region, or to a tower of some lord near a river, or to a rock adjoining some castle on which he used to sit, or to a palace of some splendid patron of learned men, or, to some banquet hall in the house of some illustrious senator. These journeys had even occasionally the character of a pilgrimage. Peruthgarius, son of Theodald, attached to the court of Count Gerald, being dispatched on a journey by that nobleman, and coming near the Church of the Martyrs, in the town of Kentibrut in Thurgau, was admonished by his page, who here showed himself no Pythagorean, to turn aside a little from the road, for the sake of prayer.† Express and avowed pilgrimages were, however, many of the journeys of the lay nobility. In the Mortuary Hall on the dead body of the knight, which was there exposed, used always to be placed his sword and the staff of pilgrimage, which he had borne to different places during his life.‡

Thus far there might seem to be no reason for concluding that the life of a traveller, in the middle ages, had any connection with the character of mourners; but if we consider it with more attention, we shall find that not only, like other occupations of men, it was mixed with joy and sorrow, but that the latter must have predominated at least with the greater part of those who engaged in it. Young men, indeed, may have always rejoiced at the prospect of undertaking a perilous journey, through the same spirit which made the Athenian youth so eager to sail for Sicily: "the desire of seeing distant lands," καὶ ἐνέλιπιδες ὄντες σωθήσονται, as Thucydides says.§ No sooner returned than they may have been ready to second the proposal of Laertes: "My thoughts and wishes

* Dante, Hell. xxii.

† Tristan, Tom. V. 134.

‡ Mabillon, Acta Ord. S. Bened. Sæc. IV. 5.

§ Lib. VI. 24.

bend again towards France." But no such spirit or encouragement can we ascribe to the pilgrim who left his home and country through penitence and who was often of advanced years, and already bowed down with the weight of calamity. "In the age of the Crusades," says Bonald, "men endeavored to expiate crimes which were easy to commit, by virtues which were painful to practise."* We must remember that, after all, the feudal life was especially domestic and sedentary. Long voyages, by men of mature age, were rare, and under all circumstances, painful and difficult. A journey from one province to another was a great enterprise. Hénault relates, that the monks of St. Maur-des-Fossés, near Paris, excused themselves from going into Burgundy, "on account of the length and dangers of the journey." Thomas Poucyn, elected Abbot of Canterbury in the year 1334, travelling to Avignon, to receive the Pope's benediction, arrived there after a journey of three weeks and three days, of which the expenses came to the sum of twenty-one pounds eighteen shillings. Frequently men had to travel over lands without a road, and through a people speaking a multitude of different idioms. It was not till the thirteenth century, that some inns began to be found in Italy. Hence, before going on a journey, men went to confession. Thus Alcuin writes to Dametas: "Make safe your journey by confession, and remember to guard it by alms."† St. Anselm writes in like manner to his brother Burgundius, who was going to Jerusalem: "I advise and entreat you not to carry your sins with you, but get rid of them effectually by a general and exact confession of all your offences from your youth."‡ Since thou hast far to go, bear not along the clogging burden of a guilty soul.

Abbot Rodulf, in the beginning of the twelfth century, describes his journey across those Alps, which saw pass, in the eleventh, that terrible red flag of the children of Rollo, which was to put to flight the eagles of the eastern empire. It was in winter, on his return from Rome, and scarcely, he says, was the suffering endurable by the human body. "We were detained at the foot of the Mount Jove,§ in a village called Restopolis, from which we could neither advance nor retreat in consequence of the quantity of snow which had fallen. At length 'the Maroniers,' or guides, conducted us as far as St. Remi, which is on the same mountain, where we found a vast multitude of travellers; and where we were in danger of death from the repeated falls of whole tracts of snow from the rocks above us. We remained some days in this unhappy village, till at length the guides said that they would lead on, but demanded a heavy price. Their heads and hands were guarded with skins and fur, and their shoes armed with iron nails, to prevent them from slipping on the ice, and they carried long spears in their hands, to feel their way along over the snow. It was very early in the morning, and with great fear and trembling the travellers celebrated and received the holy mysteries, as if preparing

* Legislation Primitive, III. 275.

† S. Anselmi Epist. Lib. III. 66.

‡ Alcuini Epist. XLVI.

§ Great St. Bernard.

themselves for death. They contended with each other who should first make his confession ; and since one priest did not suffice, they went about the Church confessing their sins to each other. While these things were passing within the Church with great devotion, there was a lamentable shout heard in the street—for the guides who had left the town to clear the way, were suddenly buried under a great fall of the snow, as if under a mountain. The people ran to save them, and pulled them out,—some dead, some but half alive, others with broken limbs. Upon this, we all returned to Restopolis, where we passed the Epiphany. Upon the weather clearing, we again set out, and succeeded happily in passing the profane mount of Jove.”*

In these holy pilgrims, the spirit of self-denial and mortification was continually put to the test. S. Aderal of Troyes, in the tenth century, made twelve pilgrimages to Rome in honor of the apostles, travelling the entire way on foot : and once being obliged to pass a swollen river, he boldly entered the torrent, and swam across. He passed the Appennines in a season of intense cold, barefooted, that he might suffer something for Jesus Christ, and each time that he crossed the Alps, he beat the rocks with bare feet.† One of the old chronicles, relating the crusade of Frederic Barbarossa, says, that to paint the sufferings and the heroic resignation of the crusaders, would require the tongue of an angel. Such pilgrims did not resemble these modern travellers, who would all follow Hercules to the infernal regions in search of the poets, but, like Bacchus, taking especial care to bargain for a way that was neither too hot nor too cold.‡ Their’s was a way over the cold Alp, the nurse of snows through all the year, and through scorching deserts, where every shape of painful death surrounded them. Nicephorus relates that Evagrius came to Macarius the Anchorite, about the meridian hour, asking for some cold water, being quite exhausted with the heat and fatigue, to whom Macarius placidly replied, “My son, be content with the shade ; for many travellers and navigators are this moment wanting it.”§

Nor were sufferings wanting even in nearer lands. Many a pilgrim to Camaldoli, might mourn while traversing those desolate scorched hills of broken earth, where wretched peasants spread before the sun, to be dried on the slaty bed of torrents, the little corn yielded by that ungracious soil. Hastening on their way to invoke God at the shrines of saints, these poor pilgrims would come to rivers, where they would have to give their last loaf to be transported across, having nothing else left to offer.||

When a noble left his ancestral hall on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, if he had enemies they might rejoice, and say, like the suitors of Penelope, when they heard that Telemachus was setting out, “that he went to perish far from his friends, wandering alone like his father.” They might indulge such a hope ; for there

* Chronic. Abbatiae S. Trudonis, Lib. XII. p. 496. apud Dacher. Spicileg. Tom. VII.

† Desguerrois, Hist. du Diocese de Troyes, 250.

‡ Aristoph. Ranæ, 119.

§ Lib. XI. c. 43, Hist. Eccles.

|| Mabillon, Acta Ordinis S. Bened. Sæc. IV. 5.

were not wanting grounds to make it highly probable that it would be realized. William, Duke of Guyenne, was a proud violent prince, abandoned to all kinds of profligacy, and so haughty, that he seemed to look down upon the greatest nobles. He chose to recognize the antipope Anaclet, notwithstanding the efforts of St. Bernard and of the Bishop of Soissons, who in vain endeavored to draw him from the schism. St. Bernard after retiring for some time to his Abbey of Châteliers, wrote from there to the duke, ordering him to come to him. Though this letter was little respectful in appearance, it produced the effect intended. The duke, immediately on receiving it, set out for the abbey, where the saint after receiving him with all the honors due to his rank, proceeded to remonstrate with him without sparing him, speaking to him, during the seven days that he retained him, with such force, of death, the last judgment, and the pains of hell, that William appeared touched to the quick, and departed in the best dispositions. After some relapses, he was at length finally converted to a holy life. So, after making a devout testament, he resolved to set out on a pilgrimage to Compostella : and in such obscurity did he travel, that, after leaving his states, he was never more heard of. Suger supposed that he died on the road. All that is known for certain respecting him is, that, after traversing Biscay and the north of Castille, he reached the city of Leon ; but beyond that, all was conjecture. The general opinion was, that God took him to himself towards the end of the first Lent of his pilgrimage, and that he received the viaticum on Good Friday. Many were the pilgrims who thus perished without ever having seen the day of return, the ροστιμον ημαρ, or without any thing having been ever heard of the manner, or place, or time of their death.

If Eurylochus, in Homer, departed weeping, though along with two and twenty companions, how must he have mourned, who had to set out, through unknown ways, alone ! The sign of mourners was even prescribed to be worn by those who had charge of receiving the pilgrims, as at Paris in the Hospital of St. Jaques-du-haut-Pas, founded by Galligus, guardian of another house of the same order in Italy ; for there the members were enjoined to wear the sign of Tau woven upon their breasts. Well, then, might one of these pilgrims hear words of affection addressed him on his departure like those which were directed to retain Telemachus. “Dear child ! what hath filled your mind with this desire ? Wherefore, beloved, do you wish to go alone over much of the earth ?

———— ιέναι πολλήν ἐπί γαῖαν
*μοῦνος ἑών.

Remain at home and enjoy what you possess. There is no necessity for you to suffer evils on the cruel sea, or to wander thus

———— οὐδέ τί σε χρῆ, πόντον ἐπ’ ἀτρυγέτον κακὰ πάσχειν οἶδ’ ἀλαλήσθαι.”

* Odyssey, II. 363.

His reply, if made, as it well might be, in the Virgilian line, would not seem to deny the justice of ranking him as a mourner.—

“Vivite felices, quibus est fortuna peracta
Jam sua : nos alia ex aliis in fata vocamur.”*

We read in the life of Lietbertus, Bishop of Cambray, that when that holy bishop had resolved upon making a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, in the year 1054, setting out from his city of Cambray, he was accompanied for three miles by a multitude of people of both sexes and of all ages, who took leave of him with sighs and tears.†

Those who remember with what horror a sea voyage was contemplated during the middle ages by the greatest part of those who travelled through devotion, can easily appreciate the degree of constancy which they must have possessed to undertake it. Perfectly in the style of Homer was their constant exclamation, τίς δ' ἄν ἐκὼν τοσούτῳδε διαδράμοι ἄλμυρὸν ἰδῶρ ἄβπειτον;

When the king St. Louis and his host had embarked at Marseilles, Joinville describes how the priests and clerks came upon the deck, and “began, with all the ship’s company, to sing aloud the ‘Veni Creator Spiritus.’ Then the sailors, while singing, spread out the sails in the name of God, and the wind soon filling them, we began to make way, and soon lost sight of land, and saw only the water and the sky. ‘Et par ce veulx-je bien dire (continues the brave Joinville), que icelui est bien fol, qui sceut avoir aucune chose de l’autrui, et quelque péché mortel en son âme, et se boute en tel dangier. Car si on s’endort au soir, l’on ne scest si on se trouvera au matin au sous de la mer.’” Undoubtedly the pilgrim who returned from Jerusalem, or from some other distant land, bearing his branch of palm, and then placing it as an offering on the altar of the Church of his home, coming back alone after wandering for ten years, like Telemachus, or perhaps for twenty, like his great father, suffering many woes, might now with good reason have been felicitated as a man peculiarly favored, to whom it was not destined, as Mercury says to Calypso of Ulysses, to perish far from his companions, but to whom it was still reserved to see once more his friends, and to come to his lofty-battlemented house, and to his father-land.‡ Guizot, in affirming that the crusades could have involved the chivalry of Europe in no painful service, because they required no change of life from men who were always roving, seems to forget the express testimony of history to the mourning and affliction of the crusaders in leaving their homes for these expeditions, which they undertook as a work meritorious.—Thus we behold one of them only persuaded after a long conversation

* Æneid, Lib. III. 493.

† Vita Lietberti, Episc. Cameracensis, cap. 31, apud Dacher. Spicileg. Tom. IX.

‡ Hom. Od. V. 114.

with St. Bernard, who speaks to him on the passion of Christ, till dissolved in a flood of tears, he conquers his preference of house and land, and resolves to take up the cross. Joinville, in quitting his home, cannot endure the sight of his ancestral towers, and so keeps his face turned from them.

But among the instances on record of the penitential spirit in which many of the crusaders departed for the Holy Land, there is none more striking than that of William, Count of Poitiers, who speaks as follows, before setting out for Palestine: "I wish to compose a chant, and the subject shall be that which causes my sorrow. I go into exile beyond sea, and I leave my beloved Poitiers and Limousin. I go beyond sea to the place where pilgrims implore their pardon. Adieu, brilliant tournaments! adieu, grandeur and magnificence, and all that is dear to my heart! Nothing can stop me. I go to the plains where God promises remission of sins. Pardon me, all you my companions if I have ever offended you. I implore your pardon. I offer my repentance to Jesus, the master of heaven: to him I address my prayer. Too long have I been abandoned to worldly distractions; but the voice of the Lord has been heard. We must appear before his tribunal. I sink under the weight of my iniquities."

I am not ignorant, indeed, with what bitter scorn and insulting censure the modern writers speak of the influence which occasioned this wondrous progress of nations to the East; but neither am I in doubt respecting their unreasonableness in so doing. Pope Urban II. in the Council of Clarendon, conceding the indulgence to all who should join the enterprise which was to deliver Jerusalem from the yoke of the Saracens, made this provision, which is read in the second canon: "Quicumque pro sola devotione, non pro honoris vel pecuniæ adeptione, ad liberandam ecclesiam Dei Jerusalem profectus fuerit, iter illud pro omni pœnitentia ei reputetur."—"Can one conceive (asks Guizot), that at present a people of proprietors would all of a sudden abandon their property and family, and leave their homes, without an absolute necessity, to seek such distant adventures? Nothing of this kind (he adds) would have been possible, had not the daily life of the possessors of fiefs been a kind of training for the crusades."* Nor would it have been possible then, he might have added, if religion had not imparted a sanctity to mourning, and taught men to embrace such sufferings as meritorious. Besides, without taking into account what this author had elsewhere admitted, that the feudal life was favorable to domestic habits, and to the importance of women, it is a manifest truth, that by a law of nature and the very constitution of the human mind, men in general, with the exception of certain peculiar tribes, must in every age be similarly affected with regard to the love of home and of country. To be driven out from one's native land—a wanderer among foreign nations—seemed to the Greeks a greater punishment than death, and to be the appropriate penalty for an impious man.† Before the influence of the universal Church had counteracted the pride and cruelty of the national spirit, which alienated man from man, the condition of a foreigner was truly wretched.

* Discours sur l'Hist. Mod. Tom. IV. 5.

† Eurip. Hippolyt. 1050.

St. Augustin says, that a man would rather keep company with his dog, than with another man who did not understand the language which he spoke. And even had it been otherwise, who could be insensible to the feelings expressed by Hippolytus, when he bids adieu to the land of his birth, the scene of his youthful sports, and the witness of his happy days? The Catholic religion, notwithstanding the universality of its sphere of action, had not destroyed or diminished these feelings. St. Ambrose, speaking of the eminent virtues of the patriarch Abraham, remarks in the first place the command which he received to go forth from his country, and from his acquaintances, and from his father's house, and then he adds, "It would have been sufficient to say from thy country," but the rest was added in order to prove his affections.† "Why do you fly?" asks St. Ambrose, addressing those who dreaded the advance of the barbarians. "Perhaps," he continues, "you fear captivity. Do you not know that this is the greatest captivity, not to behold your country? And what can be more grievous than the banishment of a journey?"‡ How well is that described by the great poet—who passed so many years of his own life in wandering—where, describing the first glimmering dawn, he adds,

———"That breaks
More welcome to the pilgrim still as he Sojourns less distant on his homeward way."§

St. Bernard, in the age of the greatest fervor for pilgrimages, in the age of the crusades, himself the preacher of the crusade, reckons the love of our country among the fruits of justice.|| Judge then from all this, whether the pilgrim in distant lands, who could say of himself, like Ulysses, that he had never entered his country since he first followed Godfrey or Richard to Jerusalem to help the Christians, but had always been wandering full of sorrows, that his constant wishes and expectation were, to arrive at his home, and to see the day of return—

οἴκαδ' εἴ' ἐλθέμεναι καὶ νόστιμον ἦμαρ ἰδέσθαι.¶

Whether, I say, this pilgrim, be he layman or priest, knight or palmer, ought not to have been reckoned among the tribe of mourners?

But let us note some details relative to the manner of their journey, and to the consolations afforded them on the way.

Before setting out, the pilgrim provided himself with a commendatory letter, called a letter of communion, which was composed so as to prevent the possibility of its being forged. These letters used to be given, not only to all clerks who travelled to a different diocese, and who, by the canons of the Council of Tours,

* De Civitate Dei, Lib. XIX. cap. 7.

† S. Ambros. Lib. de Abrah. Patriarch.

‡ S. Ambrosii Serm. LXXXV.

§ Purg. XXVII.

|| De Ordine Vitæ.

¶ Odyss. V. 220.

in the year 461, were prohibited from travelling without them, but also to all laymen, in evidence of their being at peace with the Church : for, as Optatus Milevitanus says, "The whole world was formed into one society and communion."* Thus the testimonial of Catholic faith answered to the συμβολα, or Tessera of the ancients, which were tokens of hospitality, made so that a person, by producing one piece, might be recognized by another who had its corresponding part. Jason tells Medea that he will give her these symbols to insure for her an hospitable reception from his friends in the country to which she is going.† Thomassinus alludes to this subject in treating on hospitality, to whose observations the reader may refer.

Humility, simplicity, and charity, characterized the pilgrim's way. In the old fabliaux of the two rich citizens and the laborer, the former going on a pilgrimage, and being joined by a peasant, they all three travel on lovingly together, and join their provisions in a common stock. The duty of the Teutonic knights as pilgrims was denoted on the seal of their order, which represented the mother of Christ seated on an ass, holding the infant Jesus in her arms, with Joseph walking and leading the animal, the star going before them as when they fled into Egypt‡. Little difficulties were not to interrupt the course. "The morning rain stops not the pilgrim," is the proverb we have derived from these ages. In the rules given to the Knight Templars, they were directed to travel two or three together, and when they came to any place in which there was a house belonging to the order, they were obliged to take up their lodging there with the brethren, and they were directed to provide themselves with a light, which should be kept burning during the night, near where they slept. "When you go on a journey (says St. Bonaventura), live in great peace with him whom the superior will have given to you for a companion. Never engage in any dispute with him, although you should be in the right, but yield to him with tranquillity, and keep silence, because it is seldom that any one is convicted by disputing, or made to change his opinion. Preserve your own peace, that you may give peace to others, and begin by appeasing yourself, and then you may appease him ; because, what you would say in trouble and agitation to him who is troubled and agitated, would only trouble and agitate him the more ; and you will more easily win him by your gentleness and patience, than by all the reasons you could allege : for virtue is not taught by vice, nor humility by pride. Be accommodating and agreeable on the journey, but without dissipation or compromise of your duty."§

Monks, like minor friars, were bound to travel two and two. On their way they were commanded to show respect to every one, and to salute all strangers whom they met, to take every occasion of consoling, instructing, and edifying those in whose company they found themselves, and never to show harshness or

* Vide Joan. Devoti Institut. Canonic. Lib. II.

† Eurip. Medea, 613.

‡ Voigt Geschichte Preussens, II. 57.

§ S. Bonaventuræ de Reformat. Hominis exter. cap. 36.

rudeness in reproving such as acted wrong in their presence ; but to admonish them with gentleness and humility, so that in this way going through the world, they might literally accomplish the order of Jesus Christ to preach the gospel to every creature. St. Martin converted a robber who happened to travel along with him. They were always to endeavor to arrive at the place of sleeping before late, that there might be no hurry to themselves or inconvenience to their hosts.* Monks on a journey were advised to take little books with them, and Mabillon describes the volumes for this purpose, which were in a monastery of Cistercians. St. Gregory the Great says, "that the Abbot Æquitius used to carry sacred pages in leather cases on each of his sides." There were books expressly composed for the pilgrims, containing prayers, and hymns, and litanies suitable to their engagement. The moral work entitled Le Dialogue du Crucifix et du Pèlerin was written by one of these pilgrims, William Alexis, the humble prior of the monastery of Bury, in the diocese of Evreux. He wrote it in the year 1486, at the request, as he says himself, of some pilgrims of Rouen, who were with him on the holy voyage, "for their spiritual consolation, and to excite them to devotion and patience." Gouget observes, "that it is a most pious work, and that the author had always in view the engagements of his state."† Companies of pilgrims travelling together recited the psalms and sung litanies on the way.

St. Gerard, bishop of Toule, made a pilgrimage to Rome for the sake of devotion. So leaving not a little substance for the support of the poor, he set out on his journey with twelve companions of the clerical and monastic order, who with him might continually chant psalms or jubinations. They seemed to make the whole road to Rome one church, the standard of the cross always preceding them. Who could describe the abundant alms which they dispensed on the way ? Upon arriving at Pavia, they were received by the holy Maiolus, abbot of Cluny,‡ and the blessed Adhelbert, who was afterwards a martyr.§ "O what spiritual exultation was theirs ! What conversation on the supernal kingdom ever to be desired ! What divine discourse upon the divine word ! Each hung upon the other's lips. Each believed that he heard Christ in the other, who certainly dwelled in them."|| When pious travellers entered a town, they used to visit first all the places of devotion which it contained ; then they used to offer their alms to the hospitals, and serve the poor that were in them. In the time of Petrarch, when the emperor Charles and the empress came to Rome to be crowned on Easter Sunday, arriving there on Maunday Thursday, on the two following days, he visited the churches in a pilgrim's habit.

Many travellers of the modern school feel themselves strangers and aliens as they pass through the nations of the Catholic church, and seem as if never to be

* S. Bonaventuræ Speculum Novitiorum, cap. 29. 31.

† Bibliothèque Française, Tom. X. 119.

‡ Who ruled from the year 948 to 994.

§ Bishop of Prague, crowned with martyrdom in the year 997.

|| Acta Tullensium Episcoporum apud Marten. Thesaur. Anecdot. Tom. III.

at ease, or capable of perfect refreshment, till they arrive at that little city of Calvin, where the law at present forbids men to proclaim the divinity of Christ; but the pilgrim of the middle ages had the consolation of finding his home in every church which he passed on the way. Every where he found the same holy rites, the same language which had been familiar to him from childhood. Did his heart for a moment fail at the thought of his course being unaccomplishable, and did the memory of home and the prospect of danger prompt him to return without seeing the place of his desire? in prayer, at the foot of the altar, he gathered fresh strength and courage to continue on his way, for he felt as if he were then but for the first moment setting out from home. The Missa Sicca or Nautica used to be celebrated on ship-board. When St. Louis was a prisoner in the hands of the Sarassins, he had a Missa Sicca celebrated in his presence. The rubric prescribed that the priest should be clad as usual in the sacred vestments; that he should read the mass till the preface; that the canon was to be omitted; that the pater-noster was then to be said; but that all the secrets were to be omitted, and that neither chalice nor host was to be on the altar. In later ages Pope Benedict XIV. gave permission to have mass said on board the ships of the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, provided the sea was calm and the sky serene.* Guido de Monte Rocherii, who wrote about the year 1333, approves of the custom of celebrating a Missa Sicca before travellers who should arrive late and after the priest had said his mass. In this case he says, "that the priest after reading the mass of the day, should show relics instead of continuing the canon." Even in desolate and benighted regions, religion supplied the wanderer with an idea which served as a substitute for home: for, as the Athenian general said to his soldiers in his affecting speech on the retreat from Syracuse, "that they were to consider it as if they themselves, wherever they happened to rest on the way, immediately constituted the city,"* so these bands of Catholic pilgrims, when they had to traverse infidel lands, were consoled with remembering, that wherever the hand of Providence might conduct their steps, they were themselves holy Sion and the walls of Jerusalem.

Bounty to the poor was the virtue more than all others pre-eminently to distinguish the pilgrims, who never forgot that it was when travelling, the good Samaritan practised that memorable work of charity, and that a hostel was the scene of it. The joy and devotion expressed by pilgrims on first coming in sight of Jerusalem or Rome, or the temple of their vow, was a subject which has employed the genius of the noblest poets and painters. Clarke thus describes his first view of Jerusalem: "'Hagiopolis!' exclaims a Greek in the van of our cavalcade, and instantly throwing himself from his horse, was seen upon his knees bare-headed. Suddenly the sight burst upon us all. The effect produced was that of perfect silence throughout the whole company. Many of our party, by an immediate impulse, took off their hats as if entering a church, without being sensible of so doing. The Greeks and Catholics shed torrents of tears ; presently beginning to cross themselves with unfeigned devotion, they asked if they might be permitted to take off the covering from their feet, and proceed bare-footed to the holy sepulchre. We had not been prepared for the grandeur of the spectacle which the city alone exhibited." So also we read, "that after the first transports of joy on beholding Jerusalem, deep repentance succeeded through the whole host of the crusaders," for Tasso, at this point, closely follows history.

* Benedict. XIV. de Sacrificio Missæ II. 48.

"Scantly they durst their feeble eyes dispread
 Upon that town, where Christ was sold and bought ;
 Where, for our sins, he, faultless, suffer'd pain,
 There where he died, and where he liv'd again.
 Soft words, low speech, deep sobs, sweet sighs, salt tears,
 Rose from their breasts, with joy and pleasure mixt :
 For thus fares he the Lord aright that fears,
 Fear on devotion, joy on faith is fix't :
 Their naked feet trod on the dusty way,
 Following the' ensample of their zealous guide ;
 Their scarfs, their crests, their plumes and feathers gay,
 They quickly doft, and willing laid aside." *

The hill whence the pilgrims gain the first view of St. James of Compostello is called Montjoye, or Mons Gaudii. The number and devotion of the pilgrims at various holy places would be so great, that whole towns used to spring up and be established in consequence. At St. Maur, it used to be a great privilege to the inhabitants who alone had the right to sell candles to the pilgrims for the procession.†

The greatest concourse was always at the principal festival, celebrated at that particular place. Never shall I lose the memory of the devout multitude which flocked to the Seraphic mountain of Alvernio, when that simple and joyous family of Christ, dwelling there in great innocence, and ministering in all things to strangers, commemorated the stigmata of its blessed founder. Thither came men and women, old and young, rich and poor, and all entered as if it were into their own house, so sure was the humblest pilgrim of receiving food, and fire, and welcome. Then when the bell sounded for the first vespers, this throng of pilgrims which had filled the courts, and cloisters, and corridors, and halls of the convent, hastened into the church, where they met before the altar like one family. On the evening of the next day, which closed the pious solemnity, these pilgrims descended from the mountain, if not like St. Francis bearing the signs of our redemption on their bodies, yet assuredly as far as one could judge from their saintly looks and by their whole demeanor, having the cross in their hearts imprinted by the Spirit of God. Sometimes, without regard to particular festivals, the penitential seasons of the ecclesiastical year were spent in these pious journeys. King Robert of France used to spend whole Lents on pilgrimages.

* Book III.

† Lebeuf, Hist. du Diocese de Paris, Tom. V.

With respect to the assistance afforded to pilgrims on their way, there are some facts which deserve notice. In the eye not only of religion but of the state, they were privileged persons. In the remarkable letter of Canute to the bishops and nation of England, after describing his pilgrimage to Rome, he mentions having taken occasion to obtain from the emperor Conrad and other princes, an exemption for all his subjects who should make the pilgrimage to Rome, that they might not be detained at the barriers, nor subjected to any exactions on their way. "As for pilgrims," says a capitulary of Pepin-le-bref, "who make a pilgrimage with a view to God, let no toll be demanded from them."* In the year 1358, Rudolph Archduke of Austria and Lord of Rappersweil, undertook the amazing work of erecting a bridge over the lake of Zurich, though the breadth in that place is eighteen hundred paces. This was done in order to assist the pilgrims who were travelling to Einsiedeln, as they used frequently to be prevented from crossing the lake by storms which opposed the fulfilment of their pious vows.† The erection of hostels for the reception of pilgrims was a work of charity to which communities and individuals devoted themselves. Cities and private persons made foundations to procure asylums for their fellow townsmen in places of pilgrimage, or for such as were on their way thither. In the year 1752, the magistrates of Avignon wrote to the council of Rheims, to say that every native of Rheims or of Champagne passing by their city had a right to be nourished during three days, and to receive an ecu on proceeding forward.‡ At Lille, we read of two ancient hospitals for the pilgrims. There were five at Douai, and there was one at each of the towns of Orchies, Armentiers, and Seclin, where the grey sisters and other pious persons exercised hospitality.§ In the year 1353, several hostels were founded at Einsiedeln, for the gratuitous reception of pilgrims, rich and poor, who were all to be received without respect of persons, for God's sake.|| At Freyburg, in Switzerland, shortly after entering the city from the side of Germany, and before ascending the steep hill, you see the small ancient hostel for the pilgrims of St. James of Compostello. The image of a pilgrim with his bottle, cockle, hat, and staff, stands in a gothic niche over the door. At Paris there was the hospital of St. James to receive pilgrims who should be going to Compostello. Some thought that it had been founded by Charlemagne, but it was not established till the year 1315, and it was the work of some Parisians, who, having made this pilgrimage, and wishing to perpetuate the memory of it, formed themselves into a fraternity. Every year on the first Monday after the festival of St. James the Greater, the brethren assembled in the church of the hospital, and made a solemn procession with the staff of a pilgrim in one hand and a lighted taper in the other. Over

* Cap. Pipp. A. 755. Baluz. Tom I. Col. 175. † Einsiedlische Chronik by Tschudi, 73.

‡ Anquetil, Hist. de Rheims, Lib. III.

§ Hist. des Saints de Lille, Douai, &c. 672.

|| Tschudi Einsiedlische Chronik, 69.

the gate of this hospital of St. James, was the following inscription : "Nullos fundatores ostento, quia humiles, quia plures, quorum nomina tabella non caperet, cœlum recipit; vis illis inseri? vestem præbe, panem frange pauperibus peregrinis."*

In the great hospital of the Knights of St. John, at Paris, there was an immense square tower which contained four vast halls, one over the other, furnished with beds for the pilgrims of Jerusalem, and for the sick who asked hospitality.† At Milan, Barnabo Visconti founded an hospice for the entertainment of pilgrims. At Rome, besides the vast hospital for pilgrims where every one is received, there were a multitude of similar foundations, though of a confined nature, which were of great antiquity. The Hospital of the Holy Spirit still bears a name from its proximity to the hospice which had been founded for their countrymen by our Anglo-Saxon ancestors. Alfred was the founder of this house, which, on the change of religion in England, was converted by the Catholics into a college. The French had also their hospitium for French pilgrims; and there was an hospitium for foreign secular priests of all nations who should be travelling. But, as connected with great events and illustrious titles, no foundation was so remarkable as the Pilgrim's Hospital at Jerusalem, which gave rise to a renowned order, whose fame must endure as long as the world lasts. The Bull of Pope Honorius III., speaks of it in these terms : "Those who, with various perils by sea, visit, through devotion, the holy city, and the sepulchre of our Lord, know well how dear to God, and how venerable to men, is that place which affords an agreeable and useful asylum for strangers, and for the poor in the German Hospital of St. Mary at Jerusalem : for there the indigent and the poor are refreshed, obsequious attention is paid to the sick, and they who have been fatigued by divers labors and dangers are restored and refreshed; and in order that they may proceed with greater security to the holy places, sanctified by the corporal presence of our Lord Jesus Christ, there are brethren especially appointed, at the expense of that hospital, to wait upon them."

The hostels, or inns, which have succeeded in most places to these ancient foundations of charity, have, in Catholic countries, still retained an aspect which gives them an interest in the estimation of devout or of romantic travellers.

The innkeeper of the middle ages took care to have holy images in the apartments of his hostel for his guests. There was a room, or at least a table, separate for persons who were excommunicated.‡ All which did not prevent persons from fancying that there were some inns which the demon had kept, and which were served by his imps. The very signs of inns continued to favor the idea that every journey was a pilgrimage; for such were the associations connected with images of the three kings, of the flight into Egypt, and of the pilgrim, which were so generally placed over the gate to invite the traveller to pull his rein. At Bacione, the last stage to Rome, there is a lone huge inn, which, from the throng and variety of guests, may remind one of a pilgrim's hostel; and on the bleak wild mountain of Radicoffani, there is another solitary inn, in which is a chapel, where mass is said. Arriving here on the festival of St. Michael, I had the happiness of finding that a priest was just arrived for the purpose of saying mass, and all the people of the inn proceeded to assist at it with great devotion. Arriving about the Ave Maria, at any inn in the states of the church, where one so often meets companies of ecclesiastics travelling, the sound of their solemn voices, repeating their holy office aloud, seems to impart to the inn the sanctity of a cloister, and consoles the solitary pilgrim, who can feel himself as if domesticated under a holy roof; whilst the dramatic show, which sometimes succeeds during supper, completes the charm, at least in the estimation of one who seeks in travelling, not luxury, but the simple and holy manners of the antique world. Lord Marmion's train arriving at the hostel where the palmer sits by the fire, furnishes the poet with a picture, of which the coloring denotes a more northern clime, though the substance is familiar to us all—

* De Saint-Victor, Tableau de Paris, Tom, II. p. 490.

† Lebeuf, Hist. du Diocese de Paris, I. 6.

‡ Monteil, Hist. des Français, Tom. III. 487.

“Down from their seats the horsemen sprung,
 With jingling spurs the court-yard rung;
 Soon by the chimney's merry blaze,
 Through the rude hostel might you gaze;
 Might see where, in the dark nook aloof,
 The rafters of the sooty roof
 Bore wealth of winter cheer;
 Of sea-fowl dried, and Soland's store,
 And gammons of the tusky boar,
 And savory haunch of deer.”

But not merely in the inns and hostels was the pilgrim a most welcome guest; everywhere alike, whether to the cottage, or to the castle, he might direct his steps, at any hour of the day or night, and feel secure of meeting with a kind reception. No where in a Catholic land would he find the φυγόξενον, whom Pindar mentions; nor the “stranger-hating house,” which Admetus speaks of in the Greek play. As in the primitive days of Christian society, if a stranger showed that he professed the orthodox faith, and was in the communion of the Church, he was received with open arms wherever he went. To have refused him entrance would have been thought the same thing as to have rejected Jesus Christ himself.* Even without any knowledge of his character, the wanderer was admitted to hospitality; and the general sentiment of the host, on such occasions, may be learned from chivalrous tales, as from that of Gyron le Courtois; for we read there, that when Danayn le Roux and his varlet were riding one night in the forest, they espied a fire in the distance, and coming up to it, they found that it came from a tent, in which a knight was lodging with his company. The squire went up to the knight in the tent, and said, "Sir knight, here is a knight all armed, and we do not know what he wishes to say." "Bien soit il venu," replied their lord, "par adventure vouldra il ceste nuyte demourer avecques nous. Se il est preudhomme, moult en suis lye et joyeux de sa compaignie avoir, et se il est autre, Dieu le conseille. Sa bonte le conduyra, et sa mauvaistrie luy demourra quant il se partira de nous." * The Church took the lead here. St. Hildegard styles Pope Eugene, "The Father of Strangers."† In fact, at Rome, on Maunday Thursday, the holy father shows himself the servant of strangers, repairing to the hospital of the poor pilgrims, who have come thither from every clime, and there humbly ministering to wash their feet. To secure the protection, not alone of pilgrims, but of all persons who traveled through the world, was a constant object of solicitude with the Holy See, and various councils raised their solemn voice to further it, in opposition to local abuses, and even to the civil legislation. Vincent of Beauvais cites a Council of Lateran, which says, "They who with damnable cupidity pillage the substance of Christians suffering shipwreck, whom, by the rule of faith, they are bound to assist, become subject to excommunication unless they restore what they have taken. Nothing must be taken from shipwrecked persons, whether found on sea or on shore; nor will any custom, statute, or prescription, excuse offenders in this case; for it is against the precept of our Lord, who says, 'Do unto others what you would they should do unto you.' " ‡

* Benedict XIV. De Canonizatione Servorum Dei, Lib. I.

In the year 1377, Archbishop Albert, of Prussia, published a charge, for the utility of the faithful navigating, to declare "that such persons, merchants, or others, are placed under the protection of the Apostolic See; and, in the event of any of them suffering shipwreck, to call upon all who are near to bear them assistance, for God's sake, and for the sake of natural equity, and as they would wish to be themselves assisted in similar circumstances." § Even in times of war, pilgrims always found an efficient protection in being under the safeguard of the Holy See, which gave them free liberty to pass into hostile nations. We must hope, therefore, for the honor of Buecleugh, that no credit need be paid to the old harper, who sings of the Lady of Branksome, gathering a band to surprise Lord Cranstoun, as he went on pilgrimage to the chapel on the edge of St. Mary's Lake. The general obligation of respecting and succouring the stranger was an express precept of the Almighty to his chosen people; and it was a primeval tradition, which we find transmitted in the writings of many of the ancients. "Advenam non contristabis, neque affliges eum," is the command to the Jews,|| which is elsewhere repeated. "Advena sit inter vos, quasi indigena; et diligetis eum quasi vosmetipsos."¶ And the Athenian, in Plato, observes that offences against a stranger, or host, are visited with a more severe punishment from Heaven

* F. 411.

† S. Hildegardi Epist. I.

‡ Speculum Doctrinale, Lib. X. cap. 62.

§ Voigt Geschichte Preussens III. 509.

|| Exod. xxii.

¶ Levit. xix.

than those committed against one's countrymen, of which the reason is given, in the following most amiable words, which savor not the least of modern political economists—*ἔρημος γὰρ ὦν ὁ ἑένος ἑταίρων τε καὶ ξυγγενῶν ἐλεεινότερος ἀνθρώποις καὶ θεοῖς.

But to return to the pilgrim, and to view him seated beneath the hospitable roof. Those vast chimneys of the feudal castle, overwhich used often to be carved the hunting of St. Hubert; and in which a whole cartload of wood used to be burnt every day in winter, used to hear strange variety of sweet and solemn words,—the song of the page, the councils of the chaplain, the fable of the troubadour, the wanderings of the palmer and his woes. What were those pilgrims' tales of which the men in our ages speak so scornfully? Were they related by men resembling, indeed, those wanderers, who used to visit Ithaca, of whom the swine-herd says, in Homer, that they are apt to lie, nor do they wish to tell the truth; but they have always some idle stories about Ulysses, by means of which they hope to gain the favor of Penelope; and she loves them, and, weeping, asks them a thousand questions,† or, like these modern writers of travels, these narrators of scandal, and calumniators of Catholic nations, who, if they were honest, might say with the Sycophant, in Plautus—

“Advenio ex Seleucia, Macedonia, Asia, atque Arabia,
Quas ego neque oculis, neque pedibus unquam usurpavi meis.‡

Ah, no! it was a different race of men from all these. In their journeys they were never to affect to bear news, however good and probable: “For,” as St. Bonaventura said, “it was not the part of religious men to be news-bearers. The wise man had given them this precept, ‘Avoid spreading reports, lest men should say you are the authors of them.’”§ “Let him who wishes to hear good news,” says a great writer of that time, “hear Christ speak concerning the kingdom of God, the future judgment, the heavenly Jerusalem, the felicity of the supernal citizens, the eternal rejoicing of the angelic choirs. Let him hear the prophets announcing the mysteries of Christ, and denouncing penalty against sinners; let him hear the apostles and evangelists relating the works and miracles of Christ; let him hear the doctors and other masters beautifully discoursing, expounding the happy way, and refuting errors.”|| Their journeys had no features to amuse the profligate, like those which belonged to that famous voyage to Brundisium, to the account of which the moderns are never tired listening. Travellers of the modern discipline would have had nothing to fear from landing upon Scythian Taurus, while the temple of Diana stood, if the daughter of Agamemnon said true, that nothing but what was holy could ever be offered to the goddess. She would refuse to sacrifice any one of these men, saying—

* Plato de Legibus, Lib. V.

† Od. XIV. 125.

‡ Trinummus IV. 2.

§ S. Bonaventuræ Speculum Novitiorum, cap. 32.

|| Thomas à Kempis, Hortulus Rosarum, cap. 12.

οὐ καθάρον ὄντα· τὸν δ' ὁσίον δῶδω φόνῳ.*

But the case would have been different in the middle ages; for the wandering scholarboy, or the hoary palmer, would then have touched there to enrich the poet's mournful themes; and, therefore, the tales and discourse of those who had avoided that danger would be pure as the oracles of God. Their conversation also, though relative to foreign lands, had nothing to recommend it to the ears of that race of men most foolish, as the poet styles them, "who always vituperate things domestic, and look on all sides for distant objects, seeking vain things with idle hope."† Their devout and solemn narrations suited not the children of vanity, nor those who had not their treasure with them; yet, though it was far from the gentle pilgrim to be a common laugh, still, as St. Bonaventura prescribes to the monk, in lodging with seculars on his journey, he was to be simple and humble, gentle without flattery, gay and affable without dissipation. It was his duty to moderate, on these occasions, the austerity of his manners; and for the sake of charity and honest utility, to lay aside his gravity for a time.‡

To judge merely from what occurs in our age, it would be impossible to understand or credit the interest which these pilgrims could inspire in every circle of listeners, whose attention to their tales they craved, for Christ's dear Church's sake. Of all descriptions of men at present, the traveller is perhaps, the most insipid and disgusting; it seems as if he can only add the description of eating and drinking to the commonplace narrations which are to be found in every library made up of scandal, reviling of holy things, calumny and pretended discoveries in the intrigues of government, and in the science of economy; and, besides this, if travellers were themselves of a higher order, men would be wanting in feeling to appreciate them: they would rather trust their pompous journals than their unpretending guest. The truth is, that religion is the source of all deep and powerful interest, so that where there is no religion, there can be no really intense intellectual interest experienced on any subject; for, let the understanding be ever so anxious to create one, the heart will still prove, on its demands, a cold and powerless organ. Hence no one now has sufficient regard for a wanderer as even to ask him, in the Homeric style—

τίς πόθεν εἶς ἀνδρῶν; πόθι τοι πόλις ἣ δέ τοκῆς;§

It is only, How stood the exchange, and what majority had ministers?—or rather, ten to one it is, if possible, more prosaic still,—what money have you in your purse? But in ages of faith, when the hearts of men overflowed with the love of Christ, when in thought and in the deepest affection of their souls they ever stood on Calvary, and wept at the holy sepulchre, no sweeter moment was there than that in which they listened to the pilgrims describing the wonders of Jerusalem. To hear of Rome, too,—of sacred Rome,—and of Christ's vicar, who

* Eurip. Iph. Taur. 1029. † Pindar, Pyth. Od. III. ‡ Id. cap. 31. § Od. XIV. 187.

meekly sways the race of pre-elected men, full of reverence and amaze, desire in their minds grew with satiety. He it was who could tell of such things that held both keys to their heart, turning the wards, opening and shutting with a skill so sweet that besides him in their inmost breast scarce any other could admittance find. As Martial says to a Roman, who was with him in the country, "Roman tu mihi sola facis;" so, he who had been in these sacred places was to them Rome and Jerusalem; and, like the Abbess of St. Hilda, they would style him holy Palmer: for, surely, they would add—

“——He must be sainted man,
Whose blessed feet have trod the ground
Where the Redeemer's tomb is found.”

His very face was as a book, where men might read strange mournful, yet beatific things. The ideal of noble chivalry, with all its sufferings, seemed united there with that of the saintly life; and in fact, the knightly pilgrim, like the Ulysses of the Odyssey, seems to be more in his genuine element when wandering in the midst of adventures and tempests, and in disguise, than when openly counselling and fighting on the plains of Asia. In Marmion, we have a fine description of the palmer, when Young Selby proposes that this stranger should be Lord Marmion's guide—

“Here is a holy palmer come,
From Salem first, and last from Rome:
One that hath kiss'd the blessed tomb,
And visited each holy shrine,
In Araby and Palestine;
On hills of Armenie hath been,
Where rest of ark may yet be seen;
By that Red Sea, too, hath he trod
Which parted at the prophet's rod;
In Sinai's wilderness he saw
The mount where Israel heard the law;
He shows Saint James's cockle-shell;
Of fair Montserrat, too, can tell;
And of that grot, where olives nod—
Where, darling of each heart and eye,
From all the youth of Sicily,
Saint Rosalie retired to God.
To stout Saint George, of Norwich merry;
St. Thomas, too, of Canterbury;
Cuthbert, of Durham; and Saint Bede,
For his sins' pardon hath he prayed,
He knows the passes of the north,
And seeks for shrines beyond the Forth;
Little he eats, and long will wake,
And drinks, but of the stream or lake:
This were a guide o'er moor or lake.”

The English knight approves of the plan, and says, that he loves such holy wanderers who can always cheer the way with some legendary strain ; but young Selby, with an altered countenance, and finger laid on his lip, intimates that he is, perhaps, an over solemn and mysterious guide ; and he is going on to describe his air and manner, when Marmion interrupts him, and says, that he will have no other guide but the palmer—

“So please you, gentle youth, to call
This palmer to the castle-hall.
The summon’d palmer came in place—
His sable cowl o’er-hung his face:
In his black mantle was he clad,
With Peter’s keys, in cloth of red,
On his broad shoulders wrought;
The scallop-shell his cap did deck;
The crucifix around his neck
Was from Loretto brought;
His sandals were with travel tore—
Staff, budget, bottle, scrip he wore;
The faded palm-branch in his hand
Show’d pilgrim from the holy land.
When, as the Palmer came in hall,
Nor lord, nor knight, was there more tall,
Or had a statelier step withal,
Or look’d more high and keen;
But his gaunt frame was worn with toil,
His cheek was sunk, alas the while !
Poor wretch ! the mother that him bare,
If she had been in presence there,
In his wan face and sun-burnt hair,
She had not known her child.
Danger, long travel, want, or woe,
Soon change the form that best we know.”

The palmer consents to guide the knight, but observes, that they must set out with morning-tide, adding—

“For I have solemn vows to pay,
And may not linger by the way,
To fair St. Andrew’s bound.
Within the ocean-cave to pray.
Where good St. Rule his holy lay,
From midnight to the dawn of day,
Sung to the billow’s sound.”

The remembrance of the palmer might turn our thoughts to muse upon the Platonic notion of the pilot where Socrates explains what renders him so conscious of the little value of his services to those whom he guides over the watery way ; for, if that passage be compared with the description of the saintly wanderer, there will be found the same countenance and language in them both. The latter guides the knight, and seems not to imagine that he has performed any great office; he participates in his sufferings and success; and though full of charity, yet, whether he sees him cast down or elevated, he changes not his tone. Alike to him seem the prosperous and and adverse course of his companion: he rejoices with him as though he rejoiced not; and enables him to see at length the day of return, and no sound of congratulation passes his lips. What is this but the same phenomena which Socrates observed in the pilot? "Witness the pilot," says he, "by whose skill our lives and properties are perserved from such great danger; and yet how modest he is and humble, and how far from making great boast, as if he could perform any thing wonderful; but if he preserves us safe coming from Ægina, he only demands two obols; and if he leads us back safe from Ægypt or Pontus, with our sons and wives and riches, he asks but two drachms; and the man who possesses this art, and who can perform these things, goes down to the shore, and walks by the sea-side about his ship, in a lowly unassuming manner; for he perceives, I think, that it is very uncertain whether he has done a service or an injury to those whom he has saved from being drowned in the waves, knowing that he has put them on shore no better in body or soul than when he received them into his ship; he considers, then, that if any one, pressed with incurable maladies of body hath been saved by his means from perishing in the sea, the same is to be pitied, and has received no benefit from his hands; and if any one should have many incurable maladies in his soul, which is so much more precious than the body, it will be of no utility to him to preserve him from the sea; for he knows that it is not for the advantage of a wicked man to continue to live, since he must needs live ill; therefore, there is no law to ordain that a pilot should be honored, although he saves us."*

Many instances are on record of persons of profligate lives having been subdued and converted by a casual meeting with these holy wanderers, whose dignified and saintly presence would strike even brute violence with adoration and blank awe. Here, again, one's thoughts may return to what is told in pages of the old philosophy; for we read that, when Pythagoras descended from the sacred top of Carmel, where he had remained in solitary meditation, arriving at a bark, he uttered nothing but these words, Εἰς Ἀἴγυπτον ὁ ἀπόπλους; Are you bound for Egypt? And they answering in the affirmative, he embarked, and remained silent during the whole voyage, for two nights and three days eating nothing, and constantly composed and motionless, so that the sailors concluded it was a demon that passed from Syria into Egypt; and they were careful to utter no bad words among themselves, and to abstain from all impropriety till they had set him safe on shore.† The licentious songster, or the rude and worldly knight, the lover of wine and minstrelsy, bent perhaps upon some dark deed, would little suppose that the palmer's presence could interrupt their merriment, yet, when confronted with him, "how would one look from his majestic brow, seated as on the top of virtue's hill, discountenance them, despised, and put to rout all their array?"

* Plato Gorgias.

† Jamblich. de Pythagoric, Vita, cap. 3.

It was not necessary to ascribe to the palmer that knowledge of more than could be learned by holy lore, of which young Selby spoke, in order to account for the solemn and half terrific scene at the hostel hearth—

"Resting upon his pilgrim-staff,
Right opposite the palmer stood:
His thin dark visage, seen but half—
Half hidden by his hood.
Still fix'd on Marmion with his look,
Which he, who ill such gaze could brook,
Strove by a frown to quell;
But not for that, though more than once
Full met their stern encountering glance,
The palmer's visage fell."

His silence was a commentary which made the song of Fitz-Eustace fall sad on Marmion's ear; and when at length he spoke, though it was only these words, "The death of a dear Friend,"

"Marmion, whose steady heart and eye
Ne'er changed in worst extremity;
Marmion, whose soul could scantily brook,
Even from his king, a haughty look;
Whose accent of command controll'd
In camps the boldest of the bold—
Thought, look, and utterance fail'd him now,
Fall'n was his glance, and flush'd his brow:
For either in the tone,
Or something in the palmer's look,
So full upon his conscience strook,
That answer he found none."

But it is time to return to our antique chronicles in search of instances that will illustrate the manner of a pilgrim's life from real history. An abstract of the narrative of Brother Nicole, the Carmelite, will, perhaps, supply what is yet wanting in our conception of this character in the middle ages, and with this testimony the present chapter shall conclude. "In the prologue, he states that he has accomplished this very holy and meritorious voyage, by the mercy of our sweet Jesus. I wish (he adds) to make known these noble and glorious places, to warn you to be mindful of our Lord Jesus, and that this book may be an amusement to many lords and ladies, who are curious to inquire respecting the land of promise. What I have seen, I will declare, to the best of my poor ability; and though this treatise be vile, and in need of much correction, nevertheless I pray all readers or hearers, who shall have made the same pilgrimage, if they should find any thing here contrary to our holy faith, that they will dispose it in good order through charity in honor of Jesus our Lord ; for I protest that, neither in this present treatise, nor in any other which I have made, or may hereafter make, do I pretend to say or write any thing whatsoever which should be against faith or good manners ; and I pray them, therefore, by charity, to correct my labors ; for, whatever is presented, ought to be well arranged." Speaking of the holy sepulchre in Jerusalem, he says, "So often as any one being faithful, or loyal in faith, enters within to contemplate the place, as many times does he behold, with the eyes of his mind, our Saviour Jesus there entombed." And speaking of Golgotha, he exclaims, "O great God, who hast delivered us from hell and from eternal death, is there a spot on the earth more glorious, more virtuous, more worthy of honor !" These are places which many Catholics kiss, shedding torrents of tears. The devout visitation of the holy places leads to holy meditation, to good resolutions of amendment, and to compunction for sin ; and, in my judgment, there is no Catholic pilgrim who does not return more virtuous, better, more perfect than he ever was before. What Christian, on entering that holy land, is not dissolved in tears ? Who is there that will not feel compunction, when merely from beholding that region, hearts are pierced, and laid bare with wondrous sighs ? Let a man be ever so wicked, it is impossible but that he must be changed at the mere view of what is before him. Sainte et saultaire progression et très meritoire peregrination outre la mer en Hierusalem : qui souffrira a dicter ta value ! Who is there that does not desire to amend his life, and to do penance for the time he has lost, when he beholds before his eyes things so wondrous, and so calculated to incite to virtuous deeds ? There without doubt, is the grace of God diffused and imparted to all souls who do not place obstacles in its way by a malignant will. "Persons in all ages," he continues, "have travelled far to see places and men that deserved reverence, witness Pythagoras, and Plato, and the noble queen Saba, and now we know, that after all the labors of men under the sun, one thing, and one thing alone is necessary to know, Jesus Christ crucified, and risen again, and ascended into heaven ; and therefore St. Paul declares that he desires to know and to write nothing but only Jesus, and to glory in nothing but in his cross, by whom we are saved and delivered ; therefore no longer do any wise men glory in their wisdom, or in their riches, or power, or virtue, but all remember what St. John saith in his gospel, 'that eternal life is to know one only sovereign God, and Jesus Christ whom he hath sent.' And although to attain this holy and salutary science, the gospel and the apostolic writings, and the daily preaching and proclaiming of the faith be widely sufficient, nevertheless to this not a little may contribute the said pilgrimage and the beholding of the holy places through simple love for our sweet Jesus, who in dying has destroyed our death. Therefore, for the present, I conclude with St. Jerome, 'that to have been in Jerusalem is not a very holy thing, but to have lived devoutly in Jerusalem, virtuously in holy conversation amidst a perverse generation, is to be praised, and renders the pilgrim worthy of renown.' After many vanities, alas, when the flower of my age had been lost, I began to consider the follies in which I had long slept; and the grace of Jesus awakening me to a sense of the worldly vanities by which I had been going to eternal perdition, I resolved from thenceforth to render testimony to the justice of the commandments of God and of my holy religion. I set out on my pilgrimage from the convent of Ponteau, in the diocese of Rouen.

"The reverend master Prior of the said convent, Geoffroy the Recluse, with a great company of the brethren of the convent, conducted me, during the space of three days, till we came to Chartres: en larmes et en pleurs fut nostre departement. There I waited for the setting out of a nobleman who is now a knight, the Seigneur de la Mouriniere, with whom I set out in Easter week, 1487, and rode through Savoy and Turin, till we reached Venice for the festival of St. Mark. We took up our lodging at the Savage Man in St. Mark's Place. Here we found many noblemen and clerks of France, some of whom joined our company, and among them was a Seigneur de Rochefort from Auvergne, and also there came to us a gracious and wise child, a native of Lyon, called Sir Henry de Encharmois. At Venice, they agreed with the patron of the galley, who was to supply all their expenses of journeying and food during the whole pilgrimage, both from and back to Venice, and each pilgrim was to pay him forty fresh dueats, half at Venice and the other half at Jaffa. He remarks, that at Cyprus one could procure twelve sheep for a dueat. They staid at Venice six weeks, in order to visit all the relics which are there and in Padua. At length setting out, they sailed to Corfu, Candia, Crete, Patmos and Rhodes. He found the inhabitants of Corfu, 'Devote à Dieu, gent tres-humaine, et de grant honneur pleine.' We arrived at Rhodes about ten o'clock in the night on the eighth of July, and passed under the castle of St. Peter, which is an impregnable fortress in the possession of the Knights of Rhodes. The dogs of this castle keep wonderful guard, for they go out at night, and if there should any Christians escape from the rocks, the dogs are sure to find them and to lead them to the castle; and if they find a Turk they kill him if they can, or they bark so loud that it is known within the castle.* It is wonderful how this castle can be preserved to Christendom, for it seems only six miles from Turkey, which is separated only by a narrow arm of the sea. The hospital of the church of Rhodes is a wonderful place, built like a monastery, and in the great hall there are thirty-nine beds for sick people of all nations and degrees, if they only believe in Jesus Christ; and in the middle is a beautiful chapel where masses are sung every day; and the poor sick people are all served on silver by the seigneur of Rhodes moult curiusement, and besides this, there are twenty-four chambers surrounding the cloister to lodge the pilgrims, who are received most fraternally, and they are invited most affectionately by the hospitaler who refreshes them, and serves them very joyously.

“On the Friday we had a fair wind in the stern, so that at six o’clock in the evening appeared the holy land. Then you might have seen and heard the devout hearts; then were groans and tears, and chants of devotion. We had to remain at Jaffa thirteen days to wait for the father guardian, and so we tarried in good patience, praising our Redeemer. At length we set forth; on approaching Rama, we were obliged to alight from our asses, and each pilgrim had to carry his burden with great pain, on account of the dreadful heat and of the dust, which was so thick that one could not see the other. The Moors would not suffer us to enter Rama mounted, so we entered it thus on foot, and there we were lodged in the hospital founded by the money of Philip of Burgundy. May God absolve the noble duke! From Jaffa to Rama we were escorted by Mahometans, to protect us from the other Moors who kept throwing stones at us every step we made. Sometimes they have killed pilgrims: such was our peril. On the morning of Sunday, the fifth of August, mass was said at four o’clock by one of the monks; and then at the offertory, the Father guardian instructed us how we were to behave on our journey towards the people of the country, speaking to us from the altar in Latin, Italian and German. ‘Dear and well-beloved brethren in Jesus Christ, take heed to the following advice, that you may not lose the fruit of this holy journey. First, if any of you should have incurred sentence of excommunication, the father guardian of this place, by the power of the holy father, can absolve you therefrom, to whom you must apply, and take consolation in this rejoicing which our Lord has granted to you, in beholding with your eyes the places on which he has trod in accomplishing the salvation of all men by his sacred blood. Secondly, you must believe firmly the articles of faith, for otherwise you will lose the merit and fruit of the pilgrimage. Thirdly, you must have great confidence as to your conscience, that you will have remission; and you must have contrition and a true intention of never again returning to sin. Fourthly, you must consider for what end you are come, and it must be for devotion and contemplation to see the holy places, weeping after Jesus Christ. Fifthly, I say to all, take heed, that you walk honestly and that you commit no evil. You must make no more mention of wine unless you can carry some from the ship; there is no celler here where you can buy any.’

“We set out from Rama on foot as we entered it, and under great heat. On coming to the place where our asses were waiting, each pilgrim claimed his own; so it was four o’clock in the afternoon before we began our march. We travelled till midnight. From Rama to Jerusalem is thirty Italian miles. On the fall of night, we entered the mountains which were very rude and hard for me, because I was obliged to leave my ass. ‘Oncques ne fus plus lasse.’ It is the greatest danger for pilgrims when they are left too far in the rear, for the people would desire nothing more than to destroy us one by one. At midnight we stopped to lodge under the shelter of an olive grove near a fountain, which was very refreshing to our thirst. Here we made our collation, and then under these olive trees the knights slept for three hours. An hour before day we mounted our asses, and rode till we saw the town of Arimathea. It was nothing but up and down hill, and it was laughable to look at our train one after the other. On reaching the summit whence we had the first view of Jerusalem, every one kissed the earth and raised his eyes to heaven. So we all entered the city, and the brethren of Mount Sion led all the monks to their convent where we had refecton. The others were lodged in the vast hospital of Saint John, and there sufficient victuals were given them. God knew how weary they all were. The next morning all the pilgrims were summoned to Mount Sion to hear mass and the sermon. Regulars and seculars each by devotion celebrated with great compunction. After the sermon there was a procession to Mount Sion. Then the guardian invited all the pilgrims to dinner, and every one was seated, charitably and honorably served with abundance, and then we all went in very noble guise to the church to return thanks. After vespers, we spent the time in contemplating the holy places." It appears that they proceeded to visit each of the holy places in solemn procession, each carrying a lighted taper, and a sermon pronounced at each station. Every year the good duke Philippe of Burgundy, used to give 1000 ducats in compassion and devotion for the support of the true Christians there serving God. That night after the procession, they remained in the holy sepulchre; the first part of the night was spent in confession, and after midnight, the masses were said in order, some on the holy sepulchre, others in it, and others on Mount Calvary. Lastly, the Bishop of Cambray sung high mass with great solemnity, and many received the holy communion, and then each went about according to his devotion, and at eight o'clock in the morning the gates were opened, and the pilgrims returned to the hospital or to their brethren. "On the Assumption of our Lady, we went at midnight to chant at the holy sepulchre, in the crypt of the church at Josaphat; and then returned to high mass on Mount Sion, where she died. Tout ce jour se passa en contemplation.' On going to visit the church of St. George near Rama, there were about sixty pilgrims, and the greatest part of them Englishmen. Horrible are the exactions and insolences of the Moors. One pilgrim was moved to strike a Turk, for which he was near forfeiting his hand. 'Pourtant Pélerins soyez tous enclins à tout endurer toutes les injures, griefs ou forfaictures au nom de Jesus, car il endura.' The poor Franciscan friars at Jerusalem live most virtuous and holy lives amidst these Sarassins and heretics."

The details on his return may be given in few words. For once he indulges in a poetic tale. "From the top of Mount Sinai," says he, "you behold a region stretching to the Red Sea, and in this plain there is a monastery of holy men, but no one can discern the way to it. You hear the bells toll: and some, it is said, have reached it, but none have ever returned. The monks of St. Catharine have gone in search of it, and have heard the bells, but have never succeeded. During this passage of the deserts of Mount Sinai, they seem to have carried a portable altar, so that mass used to be said even amidst those vast solitudes. "On returning, while at sea, on the night of the 12th of September, trespassed a noble knight, who had received the order of knighthood at Jerusalem. He was doctor in utroque, and named Master Symon, a gracious man and wise. God pardon him. And on the 16th inst. at six o'clock in the morning, trespassed a seigneur of the Church, subdeacon of Angers, named Messire Gilles, a native of Brittany, a man of great virtue, and full of good manners. Jesus be propitious to him and to us all!" At length, after a long and stormy passage from Alexandria, they arrived at Modoust, a city on the coast of Achaia; and now their long desire of hearing mass was gratified. Entrez en la cite on alla à la messe tres fort desiree a ouyer, car de long temps on ny avoit este.

Such is the style of a pilgrim's narrative; such were the sufferings and woes he had to endure; and yet a far deeper source of mourning to him was found in the reflections of philosophy, which were excited by what he had seen in journeying to the Holy Land. "O subject worthy of tears and bitter sighs! (exclaims Nicole) that these beautiful countries of the East, once so carefully cultivated by the holy apostles, should be now subverted and lost! Ah! who can think without groans of Asia and Africa, which had such noble churches, which heard a St. Augustin, a Chrysostom, a Cyprian, an Athanasius, a Cyrill, a St. John Damascene, a Gregory Nicene, a Gregory Nazianzen, a Basil of Cæsarea, and so many other great bishops? Helas Lucifer trebuscha du ciel a mis son siege present en orient. En orient sont les tenebres de peche qui ont tout aveugle et n'y voit on que l'ymaige de mort." They have broken unity, they have been rebellious to the see of Peter, to whom Jesus said, "Thou art called a rock, and on this rock will I build my Church:" and therefore, without doubt, those who are disobedient to this mother and mistress of the faith, fall into the guilt of heresy. St. Ambrose in his time said, he wished to follow the Roman Church in all things; so said St. Jerome at the time of the Arian heresy; so said St. Irenæus in the apostolic age; so say all good Christians: for where the body is, there will be the eagles: where is the chief, there will be the members. But the inhabitants of the East have left the ark, and therefore is their glory perished: "quiconques mangera l'aignel hors de l'Eglise Sainct Pierre necessairement est prophane."

These wise pilgrims of the middle age, who had found in the East, Mahometans, Greek schismatics, Syrians, Jacobites, Nestorians, Abassins, and Eutychians, had meditated on the difficulty which is now so often adduced, founded on the variety of religions, and the comparative smallness of the number who hold the true faith: but the result of their observations only led to reflections which confirmed their faith. This poor brother Nicole, in the beginning of the fifteenth century, pursued the same argument from analogy which has been so well developed by later philosophers; and he shows that the same difficulty presents itself in the natural world, with respect to things noble and base, where the phenomena of external nature would lead to the same reflection on the wide existence of evil, as a fact which did not admit of being denied.

Happiness, wisdom, and virtue, are not given to all men. Every kind of excellence is comparatively rare and precious, and we must be prepared, therefore, for finding that such is the case respecting that highest of all excellences, which consist in the splendor and eternal felicity of souls that attain to final beatification and glory. And, after all, he argues that we should be slow either to excuse or to condemn. We cannot presume either upon the innocence or the guilt of erring men. Negligence of inquiry and the evidences of our faith are great ; and therefore, the ignorance of many must needs be highly sinful : and the apostle says, that the unknowing shall be unknown. God will never desert those who sincerely turn their hearts to him. And if any seducer, under the habit or name of a Catholic doctor, should preach to any simple creature any error, and the simple ignorant creature should believe it to be Catholic truth, in turning himself to God totally, he will be preserved and his heart shall not be suffered to incline to folly : for David says that God will guard those who love him. But the understanding of men is created for the embracing of holy and salutary truth, and negligence here is no doubt worthy of damnation ; and as every thing tends easily to its natural end, so our natural intellectual virtue is more near to find God than it is to find his contrary. For God is always ready to aid those who seek him with a good and honest heart ; and thus we find that Cornelius, though a Pagan, yet living religiously and fearing God, St. Peter was sent to convert him and all his family. “Il est a croire totalement que jamais Dieu ne laissa ceux qui veulent adherer a luy diligemment.” And therefore all error that receives damnation, springs from malice. “L’homme n’est pas moins tenu a Dieu des operations de l’entendement que des operations de sa volonte ou affections :” And there are laws to regulate his will and affections, and therefore we may be sure that there are laws to fix limits to his understanding, to determine what he should believe, and what he should not believe : and therefore, ignorance is damnable, for they ought to believe what they do not : and they ought curiously to inquire what are these laws. Whereas the multitude run with all their strength to sin and death as their end ; and it is not strange, therefore, that they should find it. And we know that the justice as well as the mercy of God will be the subject of eternal admiration and joy to the just in heaven. And the first and great cause of all these errors is negligence of inquiry, and the second is aversion to believe what ought to be believed of God, and a hatred for the things that would enlighten and convert the soul ; and if they will not heed either holy words or miracles, it is not strange that they remain in error ; and another cause is the folly and presumption of men in supposing that their natural understanding is able to comprehend the mysteries of faith, and another cause is the abuse of the Scriptures, and another cause is a sensual life, like that of the Epicureans.*

These are the sorrowful and profound reflections, suggested to the traveller of the middle ages, by what was seen on the journey to the Holy Land. The reader will now pass on with a still more full conviction, that the pilgrim was indeed a mourner.

But there is another side, from which we must contemplate the mourning of men in ages of faith, which will place us in the presence of scenes of great sublimity, yet not without the charm of a profound tenderness. We are come where I have said we should see the departure of exiles to their country, amidst the mourning of friends who remain behind. The approach must not intimidate us, though we should be at first confronted with a tribe like that which Dante beheld, that came along the hollow vale, in silence weeping. Let us imagine that we behold some reverend stranger, with finger lifted, placed against his lips. This will suffice to warn us, that we may enter as the spot requires—silent and devout.

CHAPTER VI.

IF I were a maker of books," says Montaigne, "I would compose a register of different deaths, with a commentary: for whoever would teach men how to die, would teach them how to live." It is not merely devotion that is interested in this theme; history itself must acknowledge its importance; for, as the same philosopher observes, "death is the most remarkable action of human life. It is the master-day—the day that judges all the others." The path which we are pursuing, leads us necessarily within view of death, towards which we must turn our eyes. For though the nature of death is changed since the accomplishment of man's redemption, it is still the punishment which God has left to be inflicted upon sin; and whether considered in relation to nature or to grace, it is an event which involves mourning of one sort or other, according to the spirit with which it is received, or the previous preparation which may have been made against it. Men of the modern school, indeed, seem practically to consider this whole subject of death as one, independent of a scientific observation of the progress of the physical malady, beneath the attention of philosophers. Viewing it merely as the dissolution of organs, the decomposition of a worn-out machine, which is incapable any longer of being subservient to animal existence, as an extinction of the powers of life either through the nervous system constituting death by syncope, or through the circulation in the arteries of a different kind of blood, causing death by asphyxia,—in other words, examining it merely with the eyes of a physician, it is not strange that they should be insensible to the high moral grandeur which so often distinguishes the closing scene of mortal life, or that they should be surprised and offended at the importance which religion ascribes to this last act in the combat of her children. Far differently, it may be remarked, did the monarch of sublime song estimate the dignity of the human struggle, when, in the concluding scene of the Iliad, he represents the two heroes of Greece and Troy at length confronted with each other; when all mortal beholders are dissolved in tears and horror, and celestial powers prepare to join in the conflict; when even the King of gods looks down from his high throne of heaven, to sympathize in the dangers of great unhappy men, to pity their dreadful labors, and to raise at last that awful balance, which is to determine their irrevocable doom.*

I have said that the nature of death is changed since Christ dried up the fountain of tears by his resurrection: and this is a fact to which the history of the ages of faith bears such remarkable testimony, that if there were no other object in consulting it but merely to examine that testimony, there would be no hazard in affirming that the result would be more than sufficient to compensate for any labor that the inquiry might have occasioned; fully justifying the opinion, that the study of no other period of the history of man can present so rich and solemn a spectacle for the instruction and correction of the human race. When we first set out upon this track, I observed, that men could not with any justice accuse religion, or the history of the ages of faith, of leading them through dark and gloomy ways, which they might have avoided with other guides: and here I must repeat that remark; for it is not religion, but nature, which obliges all men sooner or later, to be familiarized with the image of death. Nature takes care that even in youth they should be taught to feel its reality: and oh! if the heart be left to nature, how bitter, how terrible, is that stern lesson! Infinite is the youthful mourning consequent upon the first experience of the changeableness of earthly things, which, to the inexperienced mind comes so necessarily, so unavoidably, that changeableness of things so closely and invariably interwoven with individual existence. A first announcement of death is a rent which is never forgotten, but which remains afflicting the soul like a night spectre, unless faith should change it into a joyful desire of that day, which will summon us to a securer world, and to a more consoling knowledge.† “Here,” as a great French writer observes, “there is no need of consulting history. The Muse of sorrow is of every age. Who is ignorant of the funeral chant? Who has not followed to the grave some tender, beloved relation, and felt the secret fall of that one pearly drop, which, from the manly eye, more than a flood of tears, bears witness to the affection with which a son can love his mother?”

The ancients notwithstanding their superstitious language, seemed to have had a passion for dwelling on the thought of death, and of its necessity. Pindar makes

* II. XXII. 168.

† Novalis Schriften, 1.24.

it enter into the definition of man : for, speaking of the human race, he says, "Those to whom death is inevitable." The heroic world, indeed, had its boastful eloquence to reconcile men to the king of terrors. What madness to repine at death ! What complaint is this ?

“ ἄνδρα θνητὸν ἔόντα, πάλα πεπρωμένον αἶδῃ, ἄψ ἑθέλεις θανάτοιο δυσηχέος ἐξαναλῦσαι; ”*

And yet this mortality, this fate, this death, how must they have been, to the feelings of nature, replete with images of terror, fearful, revolting, horrible ! To these unhappy men, with nothing to assist their frailty, death could not have appeared more amiable than it did to Adam, when he beheld, with looks of dismay, its first victim.—

“But have I now seen death ? Is this the way
I must return to native dust ? O sight
Of terror, foul and ugly to behold,
Horrid to think, how horrible to feel !”

Milton makes it an object of horror to the angel :

“—————Death thou hast seen
In his first shape on man: but many shapes
Of death, and many are the ways that lead
To his grim cave, all dismal.”

Since the Son of God endured it on the cross, such language would not only be unworthy of an angel's tongue, but without recurring to what is related of Spartan fortitude, it would argue ignorance and pusillanimity in a boy. The author of the Martyrs describes the image of death as it appeared after the great fulfilment of primeval prophecy. “One hand of the skeleton (he says), holds a scythe like a mower ; with the other it attempts to hide the only wound that it has ever received, that which Christ inflicted upon it, when he conquered on the top of Golgotha.”†

Cruel enemy ! well may it seek to hide that wound which has destroyed its sting irremediably. Unlike the formidable conqueror which it once hoped to be, only the weak and wicked can it affright or injure. We are so constituted, indeed, that this crisis naturally impresses every one with a feeling of awe. The pinched and pallid features, the cold, clammy skin, the heaving, laborious, rattling respiration, and the irresistible force of that disease, which no earthly remedies can overcome, speak of something appalling, and suggest the idea of an Almighty Power manifesting displeasure and inflicting punishment. Yet this is not the language which they speak to the Christian observer. He sees these formidable symptoms only as the means or the consequences of good. In the midst of all this apparent confusion, he can see much that he can understand, indicating the counsel and fore-

* II. XVI. 441.

† Lib. VIII.

sight of a wise and good Creator, by whom the progress and elevation of the human species is an object of constant care. Death, though something foreign from the original order of the natural world, has been converted into an agent of mercy : it has become homogeneous with the laws and constitution of a pure and innocent creation : it forms part of that great scheme, of which every discoverable purpose is marked with beneficence as well as wisdom. Death is still endured by the saints ; for, as St. Augustin observes, there could be no faith, if immortality of the body were to be the immediate consequence of the sacrament of regeneration ; but, by the wondrous grace of our Saviour, the penalty of sin is changed, so as to serve justice. Formerly it was said, "You shall die if you transgress ;" but now it is said, "Die rather than transgress." Thus, by the ineffable mercy of God, the punishment of vice becomes the armor of virtue, and the just gain merit, where the sinner found his doom.* Those penmen whom the Holy Spirit moved, in many a passage of their sacred book, predict or attest this admirable manifestation of our Creator's love. They speak of death as being henceforth amiable in the eyes of men, sanctified in the estimation of angels, precious in the sight of God. "Pretiosa in conspectu Domini mors sanctorum ejus." Their death is precious : it is their nativity : the entrance to rest, the exit to glory. And who can justly estimate the wondrous change which is here made manifest ? Consider what poor consolation for the human heart was supplied in those eloquent treatises by ancient philosophers, which they entitled "De Contemnenda Morte," in which it is so gravely discussed whether death be an evil. And if they are so unsatisfactory when read in health, notwithstanding all the brilliancy and magic of their style, what must they have been if proposed to the dying, with the hope of dissipating the terrors of their departure ? But since the Orient from on high hath visited the race of men, there is no longer occasion for engaging in such discussions, or for endeavoring to inspire contempt for that which is no longer an object of terror. During the ages of faith, the Catholic vision, the Catholic idea, that which shed a lustre over the whole course of human life, which consoled and exalted the mind in every vicissitude, and in every stage of the mortal course, that which determined the direction of all the intellectual faculties, and the whole shape of men's conceptions, that which alone gave a charm to prosperity and a value to existence, that vision had nothing to fear from the prospect of death. Unlike every thing that is subjected to human perception, it ended not there, but led on the soul to that passage, and enabled it to depart full of joy and confidence : while to the human philosopher, without the supernatural light and consolations of faith, every thing dear to his imagination, every thing interwoven with his mental habits, and with the very constitution of his heart, seems to end for ever, when he is clad in clay. "In death," says Durandus, "we pass from one Church to another, from the militant to the triumphant Church."† "For the just," says another holy writer, "natural death is only a passage from God to God, from one Paradise to another Paradise."* By the passion of our Saviour Christ, death was sanctified, death was become a holy and a blessed thing, a means of imitating Jesus, and of entering upon eternal life. St Basil says, "The nature of sadness is changed since the cross of Christ. At first the death of the saints was honored with lamentation and tears, but now, we rejoice at the death of the saints, for we believe it to be the passage to a better life."

* De Civit. Dei, Lib. XIII. 4.

† Durandi Rationale, Lib. IV. cap. 6.

Death, in the middle ages, had quite a different character from that in which it appears to Nature's eye. Who has not made this remark on beholding those ancient paintings which represent dying men, like those of Le Sueur, exhibiting the death of St. Bruno? What a placid smile on the countenance of the returning exile! With what peaceful reverence and wonder do the brethren stand or kneel round him! See that humble monk, who stands at a distance with clasped hands, on whose face one may read unutterable thoughts of love, so calmly regarding him as his spirit passes, while another still holds up the crucifix to his fading eye, though, by his attitude, turning round to those behind him, he seems to ask for assent to his own opinion, that he is already gone. "The souls of the just are in the hand of God, and the torment of death shall not touch them." Here are no bitter lamentations, or wringing of hands, or tearing of the hair.

"Nothing is here for tears, nothing to wail
Or knock the breast; no weakness, no contempt,
Dispraise, or blame; nothing but well and fair."

St. Ambrose wrote a Treatise "On the Advantages of Death," in which he shows the happiness of dying, because death has nothing terrible in itself, and is a deliverance from snares and sin. "With faith to enlighten you," say the philosophers of the middle age, "why fear death, which to you should appear only as a higher revelation of life? How many things do men voluntarily undertake, which are more painful and distressing than the act of death? Compare it with the setting out on a long and toilsome journey, alone, without friends, leaving all who are dear and familiar to you, going among strangers, where there will be no one to welcome you; and all this merely, perhaps, to satisfy vanity, and with the hope of gain! What sleepless nights, what fatiguing days, what profane and disgusting associates by the way, what interminable troubles and interruptions, perhaps amidst wars and civil tumults and persecutions of the Church. Compare death to this. You are at home, in the bosom of relations and friends, with those you love around you; no cares to trouble you, no solicitude; you are going a journey of necessity, a journey sanctified by the Saviour, and by the passage of all God's holy saints; a journey you must accomplish if you would be with that which you seek, if you would follow where all that is amiable and good is fled: whither all your hopes are gone before: where, perhaps, you will have father, mother, sisters, brethren, and saints, to welcome you: where you will find the friends of your childhood and youth, and where all your troubles will be at an end.—“Hæc peregrinatio mediocris vobis videri potest?” Why linger, why turn back, why shrink or fear to depart from earth’s shadows, which change and pass so quickly? How different the length of the two ways! How tedious, and difficult, and painful the one! how short, and easy, and calm the other! You fall asleep,—and when you awake, perhaps you find yourself in your country. You closed your eyes upon a flickering taper, and you may open them to behold heaven’s light which will for ever shine. The last sounds you heard were the prayers of some priest, feeble and worn down with his labors in this valley of tears, perhaps the mourning of nature struggling with faith, the longings of desire, the sighs of the dove, and now you hear joyful hallelujahs, and the music of exulting angels. “Let us reflect from time to time,” says St. Cyprian, “that we have renounced the world, and that we live here below as guests and strangers. What man, obliged to dwell in a foreign land, would not strain every nerve to return to his native country? What traveller journeying homeward, does not pray to heaven for a favorable wind, that he may the sooner embrace his dear parents? Our country is Heaven. We have for fathers first, the patriarchs. Why do we not hasten, why do we not run to behold our country and to salute our parents? A vast number of friends are waiting for us, a crowd of relations, of brethren and children, sure of their own salvation and only anxious for ours, desire nothing but to behold us united to them for ever. What joy for us to meet them again and to embrace them! What a pleasure to die without fear! What profound and perpetual felicity to live in eternity!” “All my hope is in death. I die of regret that I cannot die,” says St. Theresa in her celebrated gloss after communion, and the effusion of beatific light seen but in a vision, made the poet of the ages of faith exclaim, “Whoso laments that we must doff this garb

* L. P. Judde, Œuvres Spirituelles, Tom. II. 263.

Of frail mortality, thenceforth to live
Immortally above; he hath not seen
The sweet refreshing of that heavenly shower.”*

But methinks I hear some one reply, to die young is surely a calamity to be deplored even by the most spiritual? Indeed, what new doctrine is this to be delivered by men professing wisdom? Bacchus was for deciding against Æschylus merely because in one verse he represented death as the greatest of evils;† and the fable of Silenus, alluded to by Cicero, conveys the deepest conviction of the ancient world, who, when he was taken by Midas, is said to have given for his ransom this lesson, “that it was the best thing for man not to be born, and that the next best was to die as soon as possible:”‡ the latter part of which sentence must remind every one of what is read in the Sacred Scriptures, that Enoch pleased God, and appeared no more, because God took him away.§ “It was be-

* Dante’s Parad. XIV.

† Aristoph. Ranæ, 1393.

‡ Tuscul. I. 45.

* Gen. v. 24.

cause he pleased God," says St. Cyprian, "that he was transported far from the contagion of the world."

"In the ages of faith, he who was to be ὠκυμωρώτατος ἄλλων," as Thetis says of her son,* "would not have been regarded as unhappy." In fable, indeed, a mighty king is made to exclaim, "haa mort villaine ! comment as tu este si hardie dassailir un tel homme comme estoit mon nepveu qui de bonte passoit tout le monde." Yet not Orcus, as Euripides says, but Heaven seemed to have greater glory when the youthful died.† As far as relates to the thought of an untimely death, faith and reason clear, had undeceived men. Whether their flesh parted shrivelled from them, or whether they died when the cheek was first clothed in down, or before the coral and the pap were left, the difference was to eternity compared, "a briefer space, than is the twinkling of an eye to the heaven's slowest orb." But death in years of boyish innocence, even to nature's eye, was not a hideous or a fearful spectacle. What tender and even lovely scenes were those in which occurred the death of a St. Stanislaus, or a St. Louis Gonzaga. "I die without reluctance, I die full of joy, though the gifts of youth are mine to make life greatful to me." There was here enough to make men exclaim, "Death, death; O amiable lovely death."

The heroic spirit of the scholastic-romantic ages would not disdain to urge the motive which Achilles adduces to reconcile the youthful son of Priam to meet death.

*Ἀλλὰ φίλος, θάνε καὶ οὐ τῇ ὀλοφύρεαι οὕτως;
Κάθ' ἄνε καὶ Πάτροκλος, ὅπερ θέο πολλὸν ἀμείνων.
Οὐχ ὀρώας, οἷος κ' ἄγ' ὠ καλὸς τε μέγας τε;
Πατρός δ' εἰμ' ἀγαθοῖο, θεὰ δέ με γείνατο μήτηρ'
Ἄλλ' ἐπί τοι καὶ ἐμοὶ θάνατος καὶ Μοῖρα κραταιή.‡*

Why do you repine at death? Are not these dead in the flower of youth and beauty, cut off from beloved friends and brothers, from sweet and holy studies, from that golden world which is made joyful by piety and innocence, and yet did they not die with resignation and even with delight? Die then like them, and exult to follow such bright examples. For the generality of men to die young, was known to be, on every account, an excellent lot. "Priam," as Callimachus remarks, "wept much oftener than Troilus;" and in relation to spiritual good, Henry Suso observes, "that for the most part, with age sins are increased, and that you will find far more who become worse than who become better. Our blessed Saviour chose not to protract his life beyond the flower, and it was an Antipope who prolonged his usurpation beyond the years of Peter."§ Men never leave the world with such becoming grace as when young; as when they seem to make death proud with pure and princely beauty. To die young seems like a genuine heroic act. "Love is sweetest in death: for one who loves, death is a mystery

* Il. I. 505.

† Alcestis.

‡ Il. XXI. 106.

§ Called by some Benedict XIII.

of sweet mysteries ; it is a bridal night," to use the expression of Novalis.* If it be the most beautiful art and gift, as the Greek poet says :

εὐκλεῶς λιπεῖν βίον.†

then assuredly we should die young. In the death of youth there is nothing hideous or revolting, but only a most sweet solemn form of loveliness. In allusion to her death, Beatrice speaks thus to Dante :—

—————"never didst thou spy
In art or nature, aught so passing sweet
As were the limbs that in their beauteous frame,
Enclos'd me, and are scatter'd now in dust."

The death of youth, the striking down of these fair flowers, was often made the occasion of eternal good to men, by converting their hearts to a love of God. Adverting to this, Beatrice continued to admonish Dante.

"If sweetest thing thus fail'd thee with my death,
What, afterwards, of mortal, should thy wish
Have tempted? When thou first hadst felt the dart
Of perishable things, in my departing
For better realms, thy wing thou shouldst have prun'd
To follow me; and never stoop'd again
To bide a second blow."‡

In the middle ages, men were conversant with what Frederick Schlegel terms "the beautiful side of death." They marked that full and perfect consciousness, that peculiar clearness and almost foresight which so frequently attend the soul in her last moments previous to departure, to which Shakespeare alludes in these lines :

"O, but they say, the tongues of dying men Enforce attention, like deep harmony."

They marked that courage with which she prepares to enter upon a new sphere, upon regions that never saw man that could after measure back his course,§ that higher clearness in hope and faith, nay, even that expression of countenance which indicates a change to bliss, when they beheld with astonishment, a sweet melancholy smile steal over the face, like that which comes upon a sleeping child.|| The emblematical figure which is placed at the end of the sentence which this great Catholic philosopher was prevented from finishing by death, is quite in accordance with this view, and furnishes a striking contrast to the designs of that detested triumph which employed the pencil of the Basle Painter. It represents a beautiful figure with extended wings, and holding with outstretched arms, the rings and links of a broken chain. It flies upwards through the serene air, as if it had just escaped, and the globe of this earth is seen below, half enveloped in clouds,

* Schriften, II. 312.

† Eurip. Heraclid. 534.

‡ Parad. XXXI.

§ Dant. Purg. I.

|| Philosophie der Sprache, 112.

while an eye at the summit of the picture indicates the seat of God, towards which it is ascending. St. Charles Borromeo ordered a painter to substitute the golden key of Paradise for the skeleton and scythe by which an artist had represented death. In the chronicles of the middle ages, we read of many who made a swan-like end, fading in music, who died, as the poet says, "like the dolphin whom each pang imbues

"With a new color as it gasps away,
The last still loveliest, 'till 'tis gone."

So Shakespeare says of one who had passed from this world, "nothing in his life became him like the leaving it: he died as one that had been studied in his death."

"Speaking accurately and strictly," says Frederick Schlegel, "according to this Christian view of life, there is no such thing as death, but only a change of life and its passing form. There is no death in nature, that is to say, death is not essential and original, but it has been introduced into the creation subsequently and by accident. For men, the immortality of the soul, and the idea of this immortality form not so much an article of faith and of the highest hope, as a real phenomenon of nature, an unquestionable matter of fact, which is attested by all history."* "To die," says Novalis, "is a genuine philosophic act."† He alludes probably to that saying of the Pythagoreans, "that in three modes man could render himself better, by converse with the gods, by doing good to others, and by dying, which was the total separation of the soul from the body."‡ But whatever may be thought of this speculation, we may appropriate to ourselves the sentence, and say, in reference to death in the middle ages, that "to die was a genuine religious act," an act converted by the spirit of resignation and of love for Christ from a natural necessity, to be the voluntary offering of a devout and obedient heart. It must, however, be carefully remarked that this "beautiful side of death" is connected essentially with the Catholic form of life. It is the manners and customs of the impious city which make sickness and death horrible. To the quiet retirement and contemplation of nature, to the charity and spirit of obedience to God in which the Catholic was accustomed to pass his days, the silence of the sick room was no contrast; he had learned to live alone without visits, without cares, without political debates, and without flattery; but from a perpetual tumult of pleasures or business, with some constant external excitement, the transition to it was undoubtedly something as dismal to the imagination as the idea of death itself to the natural eye. And this leads me to notice the objection which some may advance, who though willing to admit that the act of death may have been stript of terror, cannot conceive how the passage to it through a long sickness, could ever have been any thing but a fearful and unmixed calamity. Unquestionably it belongs not to the principles of the true philosophy to imitate that stoical indifference which affected to deny that the sufferings of the body were an evil, or to adopt, as St.

* Philosophie der Sprache, 269. † Schriften II. 142. ‡ Anonym. de Vita Pythagoræ.

Augustin says, "the proud error of those who attribute to the strength of the human will that constancy which is derived from the Divine assistance."

"There are but few," says that holy doctor, "who are not punished in this life but only after it. The evils of diseases in the body are so numerous, that they cannot be all described even in the books of the physicians. Who does not shudder at the bare recital of them? Life itself begins with weeping, for Zoroaster alone is said to have laughed when he was born, which monstrous act portended no good to this inventor of magical arts, who found them of no avail even to preserve the vain happiness of the present life from the power of his enemies, since he was conquered by Ninus, king of the Assyrians. 'Grave jugum super filios Adam a die exitus de ventre matris eorum, usque in diem sepulture in matrem omnium.' And yet such is the mercy of God towards the vessels of mercy, that even from this yoke of the present life, the grace of our Saviour Christ, in a great measure delivers them,"* though not wholly, lest religion should only be loved for the sake of temporal advantages. What, let us ask, was sickness to the members of the city of God during these supernatural ages? Like every other condition to which mortal life was subject, it had experienced the mysterious and gladdening influence of the glorious light of faith. Sickness now disproved the definition of a happy man, as given by Metrodorus; for like death, it was become amiable, sanctified, and precious; it belonged to the condition not of wretched, but of blessed mourners; it was a holy condition full of instruction, full of peace; it was solitude, meditation, repose; it was the life of blessed eremites and of men perfect. Hear how a writer of the middle ages speaks to the sick. "We are commanded to weep with those who weep, and Jesus himself wept. Disobedience is inhumanity. I will weep therefore lest I should be disobedient and inhuman, and not an imitator of my Jesus. You are oppressed with sickness, my sweet son; you are perhaps about to go the way of all flesh. But whither? to life. By what way? You cannot err: the way is Christ. You cannot be deceived: Christ is truth. You cannot but live: Christ is life. But, beloved, confession, and penance are necessary that you may be in perfect charity. The love of your neighbor worketh no evil. What shall I say of the love of God? These are the two wings with which you must fly to heaven. Love God and God will love you. Love God and you will love whatever he loves, whatever he sends you. Do you suffer from a cough, from inflammation, from weakness of stomach, from any of the innumerable diseases to which our frame is subject? These are the gifts of God. These are his chastisements for your good; condemn them not, but revere and love Him who, as a Father, corrects you not in anger but in mercy. O with what a joyful heart ought you to hail the Divine visitation, the spiritual remedy, the antidote to the sting of death! Lift up your heart to God and say, 'Tu es spes mea, Deus meus: diffido de meis meritis, sed confido de miserationibus tuis: et plus confido de tuis miserationibus, quam diffidam de malis actibus meis.

* De Civitate Dei, Lib. XXI. 14. XXII. 22.

In manus tuas commendo spiritum meum.' ”* St Chrysostom writes as follows to Olympias and says, “Do not suppose that you lead an idle, useless life for your salvation, when sickness confines you at home attached to your bed. What you support is above what they suffer who are delivered to the executioners. ‘In vestra patientia possidebitis animas vestras.’ ” “He does not say,” adds St. Augustin, “your villas, your honors, your luxuries, your comforts, your health, but your souls ; and if the souls can suffer, as is proved by experience, so many things for the sake of that by which it may perish, what ought it not to suffer that it may never perish ? What ought it not to suffer, in order, by the tranquil endurance of pain and death, by a patient passion, to obtain the inestimable good of a happy immortality ?”† “Jam ægritudinem laudare, unam rem maxime detestabilem, quorum est tandem philosophorum,” says Cicero.‡ In fact, some of the ancient philosophers were able to discern the advantages which resulted from it, to the intellectual nature, and at least, in speculation to forestall the judgment of those happier sages, who directed their discipline to temper and moderate those excessive energies of the body which tended, by their full development, to weaken and impair the higher faculties.

“The sickness of a certain friend,” says Pliny, “gave me occasion lately to remark, that we are the best men when we are infirm. For when does avarice or lust solicit a sick man ? He has no thought of pleasure ; he does not seek honor, he neglects riches ; then he remembers that there are gods and that he is a man ; he envies no one ; he admires no one ; he despises no one ; and he neither attends to malignant conversation nor is he nourished by it.”§ These were a heathen’s reflections, but the Christian had far greater and holier considerations to cheer his hours of sickness. “Let a wise man be brave in enduring pain ; that is sufficient for the discharge of duty. That he should be joyful I do not require,” continues Cicero, “for unquestionably it is a sad thing, rough, bitter, hostile to nature, difficult to endure.”|| Yet faith enabled the Christian to find a source of satisfaction even in the pains of sickness, by reminding him that these supplied him with an opportunity of being more conformable to his divine Saviour. In health there were many distractions calculated to make him lose all similitude with that great prototype ; but on the bed of suffering he lay stretched like the blessed Jesus on the cross, and in the offering up of these pains, he found a sweetness and a consolation that surpassed all the exhilaration and joy of the most vigorous health, “as much,” to use the words of St. Augustin, “as the wisdom of Job in sickness exceeded that of Adam in the strength and freshness of youth wandering in the groves.” This was a phenomenon which suggested many reflections to men of philosophic observation, though, in their speculations, they too often overlooked the real secret cause of this mystery of the moral nature. The

* De Visitatione Infirmorum, Lib. incerti auctoris.

† De Patientia.

‡ Tuscul. IV. 25.

§ Epist. Lib. VIII. 26.

|| Tuscul. Lib. II.

testimony to the fact which is borne by Novalis, is assuredly remarkable, when he says, "the moment in which a man begins to love sickness or pain is perhaps that in which the sweetest pleasure is in his arms, and the highest positive delight runs through him. May not sickness be a medium of higher synthesis? The more fearful the pain, the higher the secret pleasure. Every sickness is, perhaps, a necessary beginning of the inward union of the two existences, a necessary beginning of love. Hence men can become enthusiastic for sickness and pain, and, above all, for death, as a closer union of the two existences. In general, do not the best things begin with sickness? Half of sickness is evil, the whole sickness is pleasure."*

This passage, by a modern philosopher, would furnish an interesting commentary on what is related of many of the saints whose sentiments in sickness and death are viewed with such contempt or incredulity by others of his religion who wanted the genius and penetration which he possessed. The Spaniards have a saying, "Where evil is, good is;" and these were occasions to demonstrate its truth. To the state of sickness in the ages of faith, there were certain duties and manners belonging, the observance of which gave rise to many lovely and astonishing scenes, which are described with beautiful simplicity in the ancient chronicles. The characteristics of the sick, like those of the dying, were changed, and wholly different from what they had been by nature. Like nectar now, men slowly sipped the most nauseous medicines, when they were reminded of the vinegar and gall. The Nurse, in the Hippolytus, says, "It is better to be the sick person than the attendant," the latter had so much to endure from the waywardness and impatience of the sufferer.† What a different portrait was seen in an Abbot Stephen, a St. Philip Neri, a St. Clare, a St. Mary Magdalen of Pazzi! What a different one was drawn by the poet who had the experience of Christian ages!

"He faded, and so calm and meek,
So softly worn, so sweetly weak,
So tearless, yet so tender-kind,
And grieved for those he left behind."

How changed, too, were those who attended on the sick! It was in ages of faith that arose those institutes of mercy in which holy women, like ministering angels, devoted their lives to serve the sick. Such are those sisters of charity, and those grey sisters, who continue to perform so many miracles of charity in our unbelieving age. Men visited the sick now not only through humanity and friendship, but as an act of devotion. "I was sick, and ye visited me," said our Lord, meaning, as he proceeded to explain, that whosoever would visit the least of his disciples in sickness would be recompensed hereafter as having visited him. Hence the sickness of the lowest attendant would be enough to reverse the plans of a whole family, and to interrupt the progress of a man in the highest authority.

* Schriften. II. 287.

† Eurip. 187.

St. Gregory of Tours describes his distress, on one occasion, as he was travelling, and one of his younger attendants fell sick :—"This event involved us in great loss, for the sickness of this boy put a stop to our proceeding further on the journey. I prayed earnestly to God that he might be healed ; for he was always most patient of labor, and most pious."* This help of intercession, so consoling to the sick, and often through Heaven's mercy so instrumental to their recovery, was never wanting in these ages of love. When Bayard was sick in Grenoble, the writer of his life relates, that every one was praying for his recovery. Not only his uncle, the bishop, but also all the noble citizens and merchants, with all the holy religious people, monks and nuns, interceded for him, day and night. He was soon restored to health. "Et nest possible," adds this devout writer, "quen tant de peuple ny eust quelque bonne personne que Dieu ne voulust oyr.†"

Among the advantages of sickness, even among the romantic ages of chivalry, was considered its exemption from the danger of a disturbed and unsanctified death. To the eye of religion, it would have been a happier end for Bayard to have died of the distemper which attacked him in the Episcopal Palace of his holy uncle at Grenoble, than to have perished as he wished, with the duke of Nemours, in the slaughter on Easter Sunday, at Ravenna. Aristotle, indeed, will not allow that courage can be evinced in sickness ;‡ so that with that idea the young knight might hold it in abhorrence : but, yet, experience in any thing, as the Stagyrte admits, may give rise to courage ; and, therefore, Socrates used to call courage knowledge ; and, for the same reason, they who were acquainted with sickness and death might have had occasion to evince courage.

With regard to physical sufferings, the deep and loving familiarity in which men lived with nature, enabled them to perceive that sickness and the approach of death are not what people in health imagine them to be. "Nature, then," as Paschal says, "gives passions and desires conformable to the present state. It is the fear which we give ourselves, and not nature, which troubles us ; because it joins to the state in which we are, the passions of the state in which we are not."§ But let us now draw nearer to these mourners, and behold them stretched on the bed of sickness, that we may have proof that during the ages of faith theirs was truly a blessed sorrow. In the monastic histories, we have many scenes of this kind described in minute detail. The author of that affecting book, which relates the deaths of certain monks of La Trappe, writes as if from the other world, for he had been sick almost to death, so as to have received the last sacraments of the Church ; and he had made what he supposed his last discourse to the brethren, when it pleased God to delay his departure. He relates, that many of the monks of La Trappe had originally gone to that house of austere penitence, in a state of the greatest weakness and suffering of body, and had been admitted into it from

* S. Greg. Turen. Miracul. Lib. II. c. 66.

† La tres Joyeuse Hystoire, &c., chap. lv.

‡ Ethic. Lib. III. cap. 6.

§ Pensees I. Part. IX.

a conviction that they would give as much edification, by patience and resignation in their sickness, as others by the labors and exercises which belonged to those of robust health.* The father abbot of La Trappe asked brother Euthymie, whether he did not feel the solitude of the infirmary very wearisome, and whether he was not tired with having nothing to do? To which he replied, "My days seem very short. I pass them in prayer, in reading, and in working, with my hands. Un chretien peut il s'ennuier?"† Yet these solitary men contemplated a state of real solitude, that which inevitably awaits the worldly race, with the utmost horror. Dom Isidore II., in his last sickness, said, on one occasion, to his brethren, "How will a soul that has neglected its Judge, and which has chosen to serve the creature and not its Creator, be able to accommodate itself to that fearful solitude in which it will find itself at the hour of death? What nakedness! What dereliction! This soul, which reposed in the creature as its centre and its happiness, beholds itself all of a sudden abandoned and deprived of every support. It is not sustained by God who has rejected it; neither is it by creatures, for they are without power to give it any succor. What a solitude! What a void!"‡ The Abbot de Rancé says of Dom Paul Ferrand, when sick in the infirmary, "I used to visit him every morning at four o'clock. I used to find him on his knees saying his Breviary."§. Dom Basile, in his last illness, though during severe cold, used to rise and say mass a little after four o'clock. So also Dom Isidore continued to hear mass every morning; and only two days before his death, he was able to hear it in the church without being supported.||

In the middle ages, the sick had the consolation of being able to assist at the holy rites of the Church till the last hour of their life. Hospitals were so constructed, that the patients who were in bed could each see the altar in the chapel; and those who were infirm in private houses were visited by the clergy, who were charged to administer this consolation to them. When sick persons were unable to leave their chamber, leave used to be given to say mass, even on the most solemn festivals, in a private oratory.¶ It was the custom also, that the psalms should be chanted to every dying person, as may be collected from Morinus, the sacramentary of St. Eloy, and from other liturgical monuments: "The ministers of the holy Church of God, with the utmost reverence, ought to sing before the sick every day, the office of vespers, matins, and lauds, with the antiphons, responses, lessons, and prayers, pertaining to them." St. Gregory of Tours, relates, that when St. Gall, bishop of Arvernium, was at the point of death; just as the morning broke, he asked what was singing in the church? They said that they were singing the Benediction; and he, commencing with the fiftieth Psalm and the Benediction, proceeded to sing the whole office of matins. But we

* Relations de la Mort de Quelques Religieux de l'Abbaye de la Trappe, Tom. II. 147.

† Id. I. 102.

‡ Relations de la Mort de Quelques Religieux de l'Abbaye de la Trappe, Tom. II. 127.

§ Id. I. 32.

Id. II. 138.

¶ Benedict. XIV. de Sacrificio Missæ, II. 24.

must proceed now to the consummation of earthly woe, to the last suffering of the blessed mourners.

CHAPTER VII.

WHEN man," said Simonides, "is in the sweet and precious flower of youth, having a light mind, he thinks of many unaccomplishable things : for he never supposes that he will either grow old or die ; nor, when in health, has he any thought of sickness. Such is their foolish mind, nor do they know how short to mortals is the time of youth and life."

*Θνητῶν δ' ὄφρα τις ἄνθος ἔχῃ πολυήρατον ἡβης, Κοῦφον ἔχων θυμὸν πολλ' ἀτέλεστα νοεῖ.
οὔτε γὰρ ἐλπιδ' ἔχει γηρασέμεν, οὐδὲ θανεῖσθαι
οὐδ' ὑγιῆς οὔ' ἂν ἦ, φροντὶδ' ἔχει καμάκον.
νηπιοῖς ταύτῃ κείται νόος· οὐδὲ ἴσασιν ὥς χρόνος ἔσθ' ἡβης καὶ βίोटου ὀλίγος Θνητοῖς.

Were we to judge from the spirit and tone of the literature of the middle ages, we might suppose that these beautiful lines of the ancient poet had ceased to be a just representation of the human mind with regard to the remembrance and contemplation of death. The Abbé Gouget observes, that the greatest number of the old poets of France loved to recall the image of death, and that they used even to introduce it into those works which seemed the least serious. The danse macabre was a common termination of their pieces.† The ancients did not dare in common so much as to pronounce the word which denoted it ; so that, with the Latins, to die was implied in that remarkable expression, "to rejoin the majority."‡ Not so in Christian Ages, when even by poets and orators, every particular instance of death is made an occasion for reminding men that they will themselves experience it, as in the words of Talbot, on the death of Bedford—

"A braver soldier never couched lance,
A gentler heart did never sway a court ;
But kings and mightiest potentates must die,
For that's the end of human misery."§

And yet nothing extravagant, useless, or unnatural, was sanctioned by religion with

* Stobæi Florileg. Tom. III. 288.

† Platus Trinummus. II. 2. 14.

‡ Bibliotheque Française, Tom. X. 185.

§ Hen. VI. 11. P. 2.

regard to the importance which is attached to the remembrance of death. It only said, to use the words of Lombez—"Live with the same circumspection and the same humility as if you expected death every hour, and think no more of death than if you were never to die."* It is related, however, of the Archduke Leopold, of Austria, son of the Emperor Ferdinand II., that he used to repeat every night on going to bed the prayers for the dying in recommendation of the soul, as if his sleep were to be followed by death : but of the spirit of the ages of faith in all these exercises connected with the meditation, we may say, in the words of Cicero, "Quæ non hoc affert, ut semper mereamus, sed ut numquam."† Who doubts, who denies that, in a certain sense death is a solemn and awful subject for the contemplation of man ? From high descends the virtue, by whose aid alone he is able to meet it without terror. "In the first place," as Montaigne says, "we all come apprentices not masters to death." We find ourselves presented with a multitude of thoughts, which are, to the greatest part of men, wholly new. "Know this well, O Soerates," says the aged Cephalus in Plato, "that when any one thinks himself near death, a fear and reflection come to him concerning things about which he had never thought before."‡ Of this fact poets have sometimes availed themselves, and I know not if their fearful pictures be not sometimes more calculated than the gravest discourse to prepare men for contemplating their end. Witness the account given by the Monk of Melrose, respecting the last hours of Michael Scott—

"When Michael lay on his dying bed,
His conscience was awakened ;
He bethought him of his sinful deed,
And he gave me a sign to come with speed.
I was in Spain when the morning rose,
But I stood by his bed ere evening close;
The words may not again be said
That he spoke to me on death-bed laid.
I swore to bury his mighty book,
That never mortal might therein look."

This account so wrought upon the imagination of the listening knight, that when the magician's grave was opened, and he in terror took

"From the cold hand the mighty book
With iron clasp'd, and with iron bound,
He thought, as he took it, the dead man frown'd."

Fable and romance derive, after all, their greatest charm from their concordance with truth. Leaving them, however, for more austere studies, how fearful it is to hear a holy man, Adam de Persenna, of the Cistercian Order, speaking of the day of judgment, and saying, "Nescimus utrum dies illa nobis futura sit lucis æternæ diluendum, an, quod Deus avertat, crepusculum æternæ noctis." The dying man knows also that he will not have long to wait without being informed

* Chap. II.

† Tuscul. III..16.

‡ De Repub. Lib. I.

of this momentous doom. "Hades," Αἰδης, is so called," says Socrates, "not as is generally supposed, from 'not seeing,' but much rather from 'seeing and knowing all things clearly.' " * Speaking of a man dead, the Greek poet says, "He knows all about it now: ᾧδον δ' ἐν δόμοις παιδεύεται." † Theologians say, "that the secret judgment of God takes place in the chamber where a man dies." ‡ "The place of the particular judgment, which is passed the first instant after the soul is parted from the body, is commonly thought to be that wherein a man dieth. So that God being immense and every where, raiseth in that very place his invisible seat, before which the poor soul, scarce yet out of the body, suddenly appeareth." § Then each one confesses all, and to judgment passing, speaks, and hears his fate; thence is conducted to the dwelling which suits his condition. How terrible is the thought of such a speedy and short trial! We can estimate its fears by the impressions which we feel on merely reading of the fate of the Plataeans, who obtained a similar hearing from the Lacedæmonians, who took their city, though upon them it was only a temporal punishment which could be inflicted. Each one of us may be reminded of what awaits himself when he hears the question that was proposed to these unhappy citizens as they came forth at the summons of their conquerors, one by one, and each was simply asked, "Whether he had done any good service to the Lacedæmonians, or to their allies, during that present war?" They begged permission to be indulged in a few words, and not to be confined to giving a direct answer; they wished μακρότερα εἰπεῖν, and their chief speaker was for declaiming at length upon their ancient deeds of patriotism in resisting the Medes. But they were not allowed to avail themselves of any past services, but still the one short and terrible question was proposed to each as he came out; and as he was constrained to confess the truth, that he had done nothing, he was put to death, and thus they all perished. ||

Strange and terrible visions and events are recorded to have taken place in various ages of the church in attestation of the speedy doom which follows death, which are not the less solemn, if explained on the ground chosen by St. Augustin, who ascribes them to the operation of angels acting by divine command. Among the letters of St. Boniface there is one relating a most awful vision, which was described to him by a man who had been miraculously restored to life, who revealed to him what his soul had seen in the other world. Guilty spirits, too, were known to come forth from their sepulchre, and start up from their biers to announce to the earth the punishments of divine justice, and to say to men, "Pray not for me! I am judged, I am condemned!" Who has not heard of that vision of Alberico, from which Dante is supposed to have taken the idea of his immortal poem? But while we are on such themes, gentle reader, as Socrates says to Theætetus, "Look around and examine μή τις τῶν ἀμνητῶν ἐπακούῃ, lest there should be any present of those persons who think that there is nothing existing but what they can grasp in their hands, and to whom παῦν τὸ ἀόρατον is inconceivable and inadmissible. Truly replies the disciple, you speak of dry, hard, repulsive men. O boy, they are not exactly the children of the Muses, (adds Socrates,) Εἰσὶ γὰρ ὧ παῖ μάλ' ἐὼ ἄμορσοι." Trusting, however, that they are far from us at present, let us hear what was the substance of this history. Alberico, then, we read, born of noble parents at a castle near Alvito, in the diocese of Sora, in the year 1101, was seized, on completing his ninth year, with a violent fit of illness, which deprived him of his senses for several days. During this trance, he had a vision in which he seemed to be conducted by two angels through purgatory and hell, and then to be taken up into Paradise, to behold the glory of the blessed. As soon as he came to himself again, he was permitted to make profession of a religious life in the monastery of Monte Casino. As the account he gave of his vision was strangely altered in the reports that went abroad of it, Girardo, the abbot, employed one of the monks to take down a relation of it from the mouth of Alberico himself. Senioretto, who was chosen abbot in 1127, not contented with this narrative, ordered Alberico to revise and correct it, which he accordingly did, with the assistance of Pietro Diacono, his associate in the monastery, and a few years younger than himself, and whose testimony to his extreme and perpetual self-mortification, and to a certain abstractedness of demeanor, which showed him to converse with other thoughts than those of this life, is still on record. It is conjectured that Alberico lived to a good old age.

* Plato Cratylus. † Eurip. Ion. 965. ‡ Drexelius Tribunal Christi, Lib. I. cap. 6.
§ Meditations for the Use of the English College at Lisbon, IV. || Thucyd. Lib. III. 98.

There was a similar narrative that used to be told in Melrose Abbey, respecting St. Drithelm, whose relics reposed there. This extraordinary man, the noble Thane of Cunningham, in Northumbria, subsequently a monk and confessor, after a severe illness, rose, as it were, from the dead, and reported his vision of the other world to Hemgils, a priest, from whom Bede derived his information, as also to King Alfred himself. This vision is also related by Aleuin. These are strange relations, but there are others more fearful still, which seems to confirm the belief of Origen, that God sometimes permits the spirits or souls of the dead to become visible to men;* notwithstanding the doubt of St. Augustin, who adduces but negative arguments to disprove it, as where he concludes from the fact of his mother having never appeared to him, that the dead can never really return to the living;† though, in another place, in reply to Dulcitius, he reasons upon the ground of the possibility of their appearing.‡ In the year 1150, it is related that, on the vigil of St. Cecilia, a very old monk, an hundred years of age, at Marchiennes, in Flanders, fell asleep while sacred lessons were reading, and saw in a dream, a monk, all clad in armor, shining like red hot iron in a furnace. The old man asked him who he was?—and hearing that he had lived among the monks of that convent, he stretched out his hand towards the spectre, but it charged him to beware how he touched it, adding, that he had yet to endure

* In Cels. Lib. II.

† De Cura pro Mortuis.

‡ Lib. de Octo Dulcitii Questionibus.

this fiery armor for ten years more, to expiate the having injured the reputation of another.* Those who are inclined to hear such narrations will observe, that the doubts of St. Augustin do not amount to denying that such a vision may have appeared, for he only infers that it was effected by the instrumentality of angels; however, Peter, the venerable abbot of Cluny, relates an event somewhat similar, which, from being attested by him, is more calculated to make a deep impression upon all. "There was a monk at Cluny," saith he, "named Bernard Savinellus. One night, as he was returning to the dormitory, after singing nocturns and lauds in the church with the brethren, he met Stephen, vulgarly called Blancus, Abbot of St. Giles, who had departed from life a few days before. At first, not knowing him, he was passing on, till the other spoke, and asked him whither he was hastening? Bernard, astonished and angry that a monk should speak, contrary to the rules, in the nocturnal hours, and in a place where it was not permitted, made signs to him to hold his peace; but as the dead abbot replied, and urged him to speak, the other, raising his head, asked in amaze who he might be? To whom it was answered, I am Stephen, called abbot of St. Giles, who have formerly committed many faults in the abbey, for which I now suffer pains: and I beseech you to implore the Lord abbot, and other brethren, to pray for me, that, by the ineffable mercy of God, I may be delivered."

Bernard replied, that he would do so; but added, that he thought no one would believe his report; to which the dead man answered, "In order, then, that no one may doubt, you may assure them that, within eight days, you will depart from life:" he spoke and vanished. "The monk, returning to the church, spent the remainder of that night in prayer and meditation. When it was day, he related his vision to St. Hugo who was then the abbot. As is natural, some believed his account, and others thought it was some delusion. The next day the monk fell sick, and continued growing worse, and constantly affirming the truth of what he had related, till his death, which occurred within the time specified."† But we have wandered too far amidst this darksome wilderness, where every man would rather ask than pretend to point out the way. Let us regain our road.

To all men death comes in part as the fulfilment of the original sentence upon sin. "Mors," says St. Anselm, "is derived a morsu pomi vetiti." It is so far essentially connected with mourning, either from a consideration of sin or from a remembrance of what was paid to cancel it; or, in fine, from the natural impulse of our poor humanity. Our first mother had the consolation of hearing an angel, and of learning that glorious decree of Heaven's mercy, which ordained that her seed was to overcome the serpent: but still, nature felt the terrors of the irreversible sentence, and we read,

"—————So much of death her thoughts
Had entertain'd, as dyed her cheeks with pale."

* Hist. des Saints de la Province de Lille et Douay. p. 377.

† S. Petri ven. de Miraculis, Lib. I. cap. 10.

Our all-perfect and almighty Saviour, Christ Jesus, wept over the grave of dead Lazarus : and when he heard of the death of St. John the Baptist, we read, “Seces-sit inde in navicula, in locum desertum seorsum.”* We find St. Paul saying that God had mercy on Epaphroditus, raising him from sickness, lest, by the death of so dear a friend, he should have sadness upon sadness.† We behold holy Mary too, the queen of heaven and mistress of the world, overwhelmed with sorrow beneath the cross, when “She saw her sweet and only child

In desolation calm and mild,
In life’s expiring throes.”

“Where is the man,” exclaims the holy Church, “who would not weep if he beheld the mother of Christ in such suffering?” Far be it from the humble followers of a crucified Saviour to profess a scorn for death, which he condescended to endure. It is disarmed, it is vanquished ; yet its aspect still bespeaks its origin, and the eye naturally turns from it in mourning. But if death be thus solemn to the just, to the chosen vessels, to the highly-favored of heaven, what shall we say respecting it, as affecting those who die subject to the wrath of God? The ancients were able to discern that there were two forms of death, widely different from each other, determined by the previous lives and characters of those who suffered it. Plato speaks of these in the Phædrus, the Phædo, the Gorgias, and in the tenth book of the Republic. “The way to Hades,” we read in the Phædo, “is not simple and only one ; for, in that case, there would be no want of a guide, since it would be impossible to go astray : but it seems that there are many cross-ways and circuits—and those who have committed sacrileges or murders, or other great crimes, fall into Tartarus, whence they never get out. ὁθεν οὐ ποτε ἐκβαίνουσιν.”* And Soerates would remind the wicked, that, when they die, ἐκείνους μὲν ὁ τῶν κακῶν καθαρὸς τόπος, will not receive them, but they will have to keep company for ever with those things that resemble them, κακοὶ κακοῖς συνόντες.†

To the natural terrors of a guilty conscience there was added, in ages of faith, the conviction, from the knowledge of express revelation, that punishments were prepared for every lost soul of men, in the future and eternal state ; and what tongue can describe that perspective of the horrors of hell, at which incredulity may for a moment laugh, but before which Voltaire himself, when dying, turned pale beyond the ghastliness of death ! “This I hold, this I think certain,” says St. Jerome, “that he who led an evil life cannot have a good end.” “O what a difference in death,” exclaims the venerable Bede, describing the last moments of a reprobate. “Stephen, in dying, beheld the heavens opened, and this unhappy man saw, as awaiting himself, hell opened !”|| What think you of that in which

* Matt. xiv. 13.

† Ad Philippens. II.

‡ Plato, Phædo, 114.

§ Plato, Thætetus.

|| Lib. V. Hist. Anglor. cap. 15.

Chrysorius died, horribly crying out, "truce till morning, truce till morning!" as St. Gregory relates in his dialogue?* "Now say thou, who goest to spy death, if any else be terrible as this? 'Mors peccatorum pessima.'" Would you hearken for a moment to their complaints?

"Thoughts, my tormentors, arm'd with deadly stings,
Mangle my apprehensive tenderest parts.
Exasperate, exulcerate, and raise Dire inflammation, which no cooling herb
Or medicinal liquor can assuage;
Thence faintings, swoonings of despair,
And sense of Heaven's desertion."

"Mors peccatorum pessima." The great men of this world die full of voiceless gloom, and impenitent, die as they have lived, like the Sarassin described by Tasso:

"Argantes died, yet no complaint he made,
But as he furious liv'd he careless dies:
Bold, proud, disdainful, fierce, and void of fear,
His motions last, last looks, last speeches were,|

"*Superbi formidabili, foci
Gli ultimi moti fur, l'ultime voci.*"

Or theirs does often resemble that terrible death which closes the poem of the Orlando Furioso,

"The indignant spirit fled, blaspheming loud, Ere while on earth so haughty and so proud."

"Mors peccatorum pessima," mark again,

"Approach the chamber, look upon his bed,
His is the passing of no peaceful ghost;
Which, as the lark arises to the sky,
'Mid morning's sweetest breeze and softest dew,
Is wing'd to heaven by good men's sighs and tears!"

Hearken to that holy monk who is assisting the dying Marmion on the bloody field:

"O look, my son, upon yon sign
Of the Redeemer's grace divine:
O think on faith and bliss!
By many a death-bed I have been,
And many a sinner's parting seen,
But never aught like this!"

"Mors peccatorum pessima;" I will look no more. It is every where the same, and yet this horror is but the prelude to that greater dismay when the trumpet of the judgment angel shall sound within their sepulchre crying, "Surgite, mortui!" already, however, are they made acquainted with their doom.

* Lib. IV. cap. 38.

† Lib. XIX, 26.

“They have slept the evil sleep,
That from the future tore the curtain off.”

On the other hand, it is true that the judgments of God are sometimes seen in the profound obscurity in which the future is involved to the eyes of the dying and impenitent sinner, who is permitted sometimes to console himself with the epicurean's affirmation, “that death is the last line of things.”* Pliny remarked the error of the common opinion, “that universally the testaments of men are a mirror of their manners, since Domitius Tullus appeared far better in his death than in his life.”† But it is in the modern society that these examples of an ungrounded tranquillity are chiefly found, to which no parallel is furnished by the history of the middle ages. The Tartarus of the ancients, the cross and sinister ways that Socrates speaks of, the testimony of original revelation, and primeval tradition respecting the future inexorable judges, “at whose bar,” as Cicero says, “no one can have a Crassus, or a Marc Antony, or a Demosthenes, for his advocate, but every one must plead for himself,” the terrible announcement of eternal fire by the voice of Him who cannot deceive, seem all alike to them, like idle tales to which they give no credit; they deny that there can be material fires, or spirits and bodies subject to them. Satan says to them, “thou shalt not burn,” as he did to Adam, “thou shalt not die:” he prevents them from remarking, that there may be a doom to penal fire joining wicked souls that first had been with fleshly bodies united in ways equally wondrous and equally true.

The death of a distinguished member of the Huguenot sect in France, was thus described lately by his friend. “His last words were respecting the things he had always loved: the joys and sorrows of his friends, literature, civilization, liberty, and the future prospects of France.” What would Socrates have thought of one who confined his discourse to such topics at his death? When these examples were first becoming known to Christian society, they excited a horror mixed with astonishment, which is forcibly expressed by Madame de Sevigné, on relating the death of Charles II.: “Il me semble que la mort du roi d'Angleterre devient plus philosophe et Angloise que Chrétienne et Catholique. Adieu roi me fait quasi un nœud à la gorge.”‡ But I must hasten on from the dark, and deformed, and sorrowful side of death, well pleased to leave so cruel sea behind, to illustrate from the history of the ages of faith, what we have alluded to as its beautiful side, and to view the fulfilment of this debt of nature in reference to the mourners who were blessed. Matter this not unbecoming even an heroic theme, as Homer will attest; for the question which Telemachus addresses to Nestor, after expressing the greatest reverence for his age and wisdom, was simply this “how died Agamemnon?”

πῶς ἔθαν' Ἀρπείδωσ ἐὶ' ὀυκρείων Ἀγαμέμνων;§

and with reason, since it is by their death men can be known. “In fine hominis,

* Horace Epist. I. 10.

† Epist. Lib. VIII. 18.

‡ Lett. Roy. 724.

§ Od. III. 248.

denudatio operum illius.” But who has a tongue to celebrate worthily the admirable and glorious triumph of the meek children of grace over death and the grave? Who is able to penetrate the depth of their mysterious consolations, or to conceive the ineffable sweetness and constancy of their hope? It is in reference to them that one may well be anxious to inquire from history; for who does not feel impelled to ask, in the words of Echecrates to Phædo, “What was it that these men said before death, and how did they die? for it would be a sweet thing to hear this.”* Let us look upon them as we find them lying on their death-bed, where, as in the instance of St. Dunstan, they saw so many strange visions of heavenly joys, showed unto them for their great comfort. Let us leave the history of the middle ages to speak for itself, and remain but mutes or audience to this act, while it displays before us, in the language of these ancient times, the form of death, which is pronounced to be precious in the sight of God.

In the ancient monasteries, there are necrologies, in which the deaths of the brethren and benefactors are minutely described; but besides these, the monastic histories abound with similar examples. “Now that we have described the holy deeds of St. Richarius,” says a venerable chronicle, “what remains but to relate the death of the just? But that should not be called death which constitutes the birthday of a saint; for when dead to the world, then he is truly born to Christ in heaven. It is miserable to love the place of death any longer, and after experiencing its dangers, to seem unwilling to enter the port. You should rather rejoice with him, that being saved from the wreck of the world, he should now live secure and crowned with Christ, eternally safe and happy. Therefore we shall not call it the death, but the transit of this Father, who on this account is truly happy, because, despising the world, he had this transit always before his eyes. The day before his departure, when he was to receive the object of his long desire, and to be joined for ever with God, he called Sygobard his fellow soldier, saying to him, ‘I know, my son, I know that my end is not far off, and that I shall soon behold my King whom I have long desired to see. Do you then prepare a vessel in which my body may be placed, not with superfluous study, but for necessary use, and my son, prepare also yourself with all diligence, that when that day, so near to me, and which is not far from you, shall arrive, it may find you prepared. I go the way of all the world, only may the Saviour of the world be gracious unto me, and defend me now from the enemy, who formerly redeemed me from the enemy; that whom I had as the consoler of my present life, may be a dispenser to me of eternal life.’ The disciple hearing him thus speak, wept much, but obeyed his orders, and when he had prepared the sarcophagus, the holy father had scarcely breath; yet still he continued to pray and to give thanks, while he fortified himself for his passage, by receiving the body and blood of Christ : amid thanksgiving and words of prayer his spirit departed.”*

* Plato Phædo.

In the same chronicle occurs the following scene : “After four years of sickness, Gervin still continuing to perform all his service to God, being inflamed by a devotion which nothing could interrupt, was apprised of his approaching deliverance in this manner. In the beginning of the year of our Lord MLXXIV., on the day when the Church celebrates the presentation of our Lord Jesus Christ in the temple, he said mass in the crypt of the church of our monastery, and being more afflicted than usual, it was with difficulty that he was able to complete the mysteries. However, by the grace of God, having accomplished them strictly, being fatigued by such exertion, the brethren supporting him on the right and left, led him back to his room, and then he said to them, “My sweet sons, do you know I have received from St. Mary leave to depart this day ?” And they asking whither he meant to go ? “Whither,” said he, “but to that place to which I have always desired to go, and for which I have always besought God ;” but the brethren replying, “that he could still live long, in order that sacrifice to the omnipotent God might be offered by his hands,” he said, “never again will brother Gervin sing mass.” In fact, he never rose again from his bed, and in the beginning of Lent, on the fourth feria, he called together the elder brethren and such as were priests, and spoke to them as follows : “As the blessed Germain said to his brother bishops, so I say to you, my sons, I commend to you, dearly beloved, my passage hence, for I perceive that the hour is at hand, when the salvation which I have long sought for from the Lord, will come to me ; and this was always the intention of my prayers, that the merciful God would order my death to take place during the holy days which have lately commenced ; and now since I trust that he is about to grant my petitions, I wish to confess before you, in the sight of God, all the evils which I have committed, and on account of which, I fear for my soul ; believing that this confession, through the tender mercy of the Lord and your intercession, will cleanse me.”

Having said this while the brethren wept round him, he recited before them some grievous sins, which they all knew he had never committed ; the brethren being astonished, having known the innocence of his life, said to him, “But good father, you accuse yourself of things of which it is manifest you were never guilty. Certainly you never committed adultery nor homicide.” “Spare me, brethren, spare me, I beseech you, and do not load my soul ; for if any have perished under my care, truly in the judgment of God, I shall have to render an account of their souls ; and as for adultery, hear what Christ says : ‘qui viderit mulierem ad concupiscendum eam, jam mœchatus est eam in corde suo.’ With these and other words he commended the care of his exit to God and to their prayers. Still he caused one of the brethren to sing the whole psalter to him every day, because he was himself unable. The brethren seeing that he approached his end, according to the mandate of St. James, anointed him with blessed oil, and asked him where he wished to be buried ; but he would not point out any place, leaving it to their own choice, but being continually urged to do so, he said, "I will tell you what I wish you would do, but I know you will not fulfil it ; fasten a rope to my foot, drag me and throw me on the dung-heap, because I do not think that I deserve any other sepulchre." He besought them, however, to carry him in his last hour into the church of St. Richarius, that there he might render his soul to God. Accordingly, on the third feria of the second week in Lent, after matins, the brethren found him in the agony, which he perceiving, with his hand he made signs to carry him into the church, and the brethren carried him there, and having spread sack-cloth, they placed him before the altar of St. John the Baptist. Then having placed the crucifix before him, the congregation began the litanies, and when they came to Sancta Maria, 'ora pro eo,' he repeated the words in death ; and when they chanted 'S. Richari, ora pro eo,' he let fall tears, and stretched out his hands, and repeated the words, and then he lapsed into quietness; and the litanies being finished, the brethren began the commendation of the faithful ; and when they came to 'suscipiat te Christus,' his spirit departed."*

* Chronic. Centulensis sive Richarii, Lib. I. cap. XXI. apud Dacher. Spicileg. Tom. IV.

Ingulphus describes the last days of Turketil, Abbot of Crowland :—"Worn down by age and labor, he expected the day of his release, devoting himself with greater assiduity to vigils and prayer, and celebrating the holy mysteries, allowing himself leisure for holy meditations, and relieving all the poor, giving food to all that sought alms, and to all the needy, and exercising every other act of charity, despising the present life, and desiring the future, neglecting nothing of the regular observances, and yet always speaking of himself as an unprofitable servant and from his heart imploring the mercy of Christ. Once every day he used to visit the schools of the children and sons of the nobles who were educating for the priesthood or the cloister, and to examine the reading and labor of each, bringing with him some figs or raisins, or nuts, or apples, or other such little presents, to reward those who were doing well, that all might be excited, not only by words or stripes, but by prayers and rewards : he assisted divers old monks that were sick to death, and would never leave them by day or night, but would sing the regular office before them, and perform, like the cleverest youth, all proper service with his own hands. At length, in the year 975, after the feast of SS. Peter and Paul, he was seized with a fever ; and on the fourth day, he assembled all the monks, forty-seven in number, with four lay-brothers, and exposed to them the state of the whole house. Then, having communicated in the sacred mysteries of Christ, he embraced the crucifix within his arms, and kissed it, with sighs and tears, and spoke such devout words to each of the wounds of Christ, that the brethren who stood near, wept abundantly ; and from the hearts of many of them, as long as they lived afterwards, the memory of his devotion never departed. On the day before his death, he made a short sermon to the brethren, and warned them to be careful against accidents of fire. He departed on the day of the translation of S. Benedict, at the completion of the regular office, and passed from the cares of his abbatial government to the bosom of Abraham.*

*Ibid. Lib. IV. cap. xxxv.-vi.

Serlon, Bishop of Séez, died in the year 1123. Some days before his death, perceiving his end to be near, after celebrating mass in his cathedral, he called the canons and officers of his church, and said to them, "I feel very weak, through age and sickness, and I see that my hour is not far distant. I commend you to God, who chose me to be your pastor, and I conjure you to pray for me. Let my tomb be prepared, for I have but a very short time to remain with you." After this discourse, he went with his clergy before the altar of the Blessed Virgin; and there, with his crosier, he pointed out the spot where he wished to be interred. Then, after saying some prayers, he sprinkled it with holy water. After this, the workmen opened the pavement, and dug the grave, and the masons built the vault: he then descended into it, and laid himself down as if he had been dead. The following day, which was Friday, he returned to the church, and wished to say mass. He had already put on his amice, but he found himself so weak, that he was afraid he might not be able to finish the celebration, and so he caused his chaplain to say mass; after which he assembled the canons, and said to them, "Come, all of you to me after dinner, for I wish to distribute, according to rule, the treasures which I have amassed from the revenues of the church, that no one may be able to accuse me before God. Sicut nudus in hunc mundum intravi, sic me decet nudum egredi." At three o'clock, the bishop sat down at table to dine, but he could eat nothing. During the whole repast, he spoke of God with great unction and grace. As the assistants were about to rise from table, he expired.† "When one visits the sick," says the Abbot de Rancé, "one has generally to console them; but this man, Dom Paul Ferrand, consoled those who came to see him die."‡ We have already visited the infirmary of La Trappe to watch the sick; let us now return to it to behold death. Dom Paul Ferrand assisted at tierce, high mass, and vespers, till the very eve of his departure. At the beginning of Lent, he had predicted that God would remove him hence on the same day as that on which he was pleased to die for sinners. On Maunday Thursday, he rose at half-past three in the morning, and between four and five went to the church and received our Lord. On his return to the infirmary, he said that he wanted nothing more than a bed of ashes and straw: he was most anxious to hear the death-hammer, which is always struck at the moment of a soul's departure. In the evening, he went into the church with a firm step, and received extreme unction. When the monk, who had charge of the infirmary, asked him, on his return, whether the exertion had not made him very weak ? He replied, ‘Cupio dissolvi et esse cum Christo. Moriatur anima mea morte justorum, et fiant novissima mea horum similia.’ On the morning of Good Friday he expired.”* When brother Joseph was dying, and already stretched upon the cross of ashes and straw, all the prayers being finished, as he seemed to desire something, he was asked if he wanted any thing, and he replied that he felt a great thirst. The monk brought him some diet drink ; but this perfect disciple of Jesus Christ, who had followed his Master with such fidelity in life, desired still to follow him on Calvary. He refused to taste it, and said, “Jesus Christ felt thirst upon the cross, and would not drink.” These divine words were the last he spoke ; and shortly after, full of joy and consolation, he resigned his soul into the arms of Jesus Christ.†

* Hist. Ingulphi, p. 51.

† Recherches Historiques sur la Ville et le Diocese de Séez, par De Maurey D'Orville, 119.

‡ Relations de la Mort de Quelques Religieux de l'Abbaye de la Trappe, Tom. I. 28.

When Dom Isidore lay at the point of death, having been silent for a long time, at length, about nine o’clock in the evening, as if he had just awoke from a profound sleep, he began to chant the praise of God with a loud voice, and with such force, that he was heard distinctly in all the adjoining chambers. He began with the litany of Jesus, and with that of the saints, adding the collects, and many other prayers, the Benedictus, the Magnificat, the Psalm Laudate Dominum de Cœlis, with the hymn and prayers in honor of the Blessed Virgin ; and he departed in the very act of singing to resume the chant in the choir of angels.‡ When Dom Alberic Godinot was stretched on the cross of ashes at the point of death, an ancient friend, who had come to see him, was weeping by his side ; but the holy man rebuked him, saying, “You ought to be ashamed to weep for me. Rejoice, my brother, and be not afflicted. Behold the time of my joy and of my happiness.”§

“Dom Dorothee died without appearing to suffer any agony, after he had had a full presentiment of the hour of his death. During the last hours of life, Dom Isidore never ceased invoking the saints, and saying, ‘Benedicite spiritus et animæ justorum Domino, benedicite sancti et humiles corde Domino.’ In the evening, he desired himself to be placed on the bed of ashes ; and all the community, on coming out from the collation, came to him, and recited the prayers for those who are in their agony ; but he was in an ecstasy of joy : he continued to speak of God and of his mercies until eleven o’clock, when he made signs to the monk who watched over him, to raise him up so as to sit upright ; but the monk not understanding him, he repeated the sign ; and still the monk, not knowing what to do, the other monks came round, and began to consult together what it was that he wished to say. Dom Isidore fearing that their zeal to serve him would lead some

* Id. Tom. I. † Id. Tom. I. 152.

‡ Relations de la Mort de Quelques Religieux de l’Abbaye de la Trappe, I. 383.

§ Id. II. 33

of them to speak, and so break their rule,* raised his hand on high, and said, in a low tone of voice, full of sweetness and reverence, 'Silence, my fathers, silence !' A few moments after he expired, in peace and perfect possession of his faculties."† "When the father abbot of La Trappe had administered extreme unction to brother Euthyme, the holy sufferer said, aloud, 'That he hoped in the goodness of God, and that he trusted in his mercy.' 'I asked him', says the Father Abbot, 'if he expected all from his goodness, without depending in the least upon his works, and if he sincerely renounced his past life.' 'I renounce it,' replied he, with a firm tone ; 'and I hope all from the goodness of God ; it is so great, that he has compassion and mercy upon those who are unworthy as I am.' This poor brother died in such peace, that it was like a lamp which goes out without any one perceiving it. We did not know whether he was dead, or whether he yet breathed ; but he had departed."‡ "Brother Peter Durant was three months sick ; and during the whole time, he never failed a single day, not even on that of his death, to say his office on his knees. He went to the church at four o'clock in the morning to receive the last sacraments. Two minutes before his death, he was regarding the crucifix with affectionate eyes, and saying, 'The just crucified for the unjust !' The brethren who recited the prayers around him did not perceive when he was dead, so gentle and happy was his passage."§ "When brother Zeno was dying, after the community had recited the prayers of the agony, he saluted all the brethren with inclinations of the head, and with an air of sweetness, and cheerfulness, and gratitude ; and, above all, with an expression of peace which filled them with consolation. A quarter of an hour before his death, one asked him what were his dispositions, at the moment : and he replied in two words, 'Patience and mercy.' Some instants after, without any convulsion or effort, he rendered up his soul into the hands of Jesus Christ."||

But let us repair to other places for illustrations of death in ages of faith.

Frodoard, in his History of the Church of Rheims, speaks as follows of the abbot, St. Theodulph. "He lived to the age of ninety, enjoying the finest old age, distinguished by his long white hair, amiable and smiling in his countenance, temperate in his manners, full of charity, liberal in alms, magnanimous in contempt for the world ; and never did any pain or fever, or fatigue of body, or accident, or pain of the soul, prevent him from his prayers, and from performing the works of the Lord, as long as his blessed soul animated his body. At length, one day, as he entered the Church to matins, being seized with slight symptoms of fever, he felt moved to recommend his soul to God, and continued in devout prayer till sunrise, when he returned joyfully to his cell ; and when his hour arrived, making his peace with all the brethren, with eyes and hands raised to heaven, he rendered up his blessed soul to his Creator."¶ When the humble and blessed friar James, who

* It was after Complin.

† Id. II. 147.

‡ Relations de la Mort de Quelques Beligieux de l'Abbaye de la Trappe, II. 147.

§ Id. II. 269.

|| Id. 303.

¶ Liv. I. chap. 25.

was a simple, unlearned lay brother, of the order of St. Francis, came to die, having begged pardon of all the religious who were assembled, he took a wooden cross, which he had at his bed's head, and kissed it, and put it to his eyes, and then, with great tenderness, although he was simple and unlearned, said in Latin, "Dulce lignum, dulces clavos, dulcia ferens pondera, quæ sola fuisti digna sustinere Regem cælorum et Dominum." All who were present were astonished—for none of the religious had ever heard the humble man say such like words in Latin. Having uttered these words, he gave up his spirit to our Lord.* St. Isidore, of Seville, feeling the approach of death, went into the church, assembled the people, made them a fine exhortation, then offered prayers to God, and rendered up his soul in presence of them all.

There are some affecting details recorded of the sickness and death of the great Abbot Suger. In his last illness he came, supported on both sides, into the chapter-room, where the monks were assembled, and there he made a discourse on the judgments of God, the most moving they ever heard. He then fell at their feet, and prayed them, with tears, to pardon the many faults of his administration and conduct during the thirty years that he had governed the house. They could only reply by their tears. Then he told them that he came there to judge himself, and that he concluded himself to have been unworthy of the office of abbot, and that he deposed himself, and remitted into their hands his crosier and all authority, conjuring them to proceed at once to a new election, that he might have the happiness to die a simple monk. He wished St. Bernard to come to assist him, but the saint was unable: however, he wrote to him a most affecting letter. "Brother Bernard wishes, to his very dear and very intimate friend, Suger, by the grace of God, abbot of St. Denis, the glory which springs from a good conscience, and the grace which is a gift of God. Fear not, man of God, to put off the earthly man, of which the weight sinks you down to the earth, and drags you almost to the abyss, that man of sin which torments, oppresses, persecutes you! What have you in common with these vestiges of an unhappy mortality, you who are about to be clothed with glory?" Such was the commencement of his letter. Towards Christmas the weakness became so great, that Suger believed his last moments were arrived, and he felt happy at the prospect of his deliverance; but thinking that his death would interrupt the joy that ought to accompany those holy solemnities, he prayed to God to prolong his life till after the festival. His prayer was heard, and after three weeks he expired.†

In the year 1148, St. Malachy, from Ireland, was seized with illness while staying in the Abbey of Clairvaux. Having celebrated the festival of All Saints with great joy, he assembled the monks on the third of November, and told them that God had heard him, and that he was to die in their arms. He departed after midnight

* Ribadeneira, Lives of the Saints, Novem. 11

† Hist. de Suger, Liv. VI.

In the year 1370, when Pope Urban was seized with his mortal illness, soon after his return to Avignon he ordered the doors of his palace to be set open, that all the world might be more impressed by witnessing his death. "It must have been a very affecting and edifying sight, (says a writer of that time,) to behold a Pope extended like a poor man, on a sorry bed, clothed in the habit of St. Benedict, which he always wore, his crucifix in his hands, and showing the signs of the greatest piety, penance, and resignation." Pope Leo IX. died in the church of St. Peter at Rome, while sitting near the tomb which he had prepared for himself. St. Chrysostom died on his forced journey to the shores of the Euxine, in the church of St. Basilique, into which the soldiers had allowed him to enter.

These are affecting and memorable records. But how deeply interesting to be able to assist at the last moments of the great blessed St. Francis of Assisi ! We read that at his death he said he wished to appear before his Judge, naked and stripped of every thing. Then causing the passion out of St. John to be read, he began to recite the Psalm, "Voce meâ ad Dominum clamavi, voce meâ de Dominum deprecatus sum. Effundo in conspectu ejus orationem meam, et tribulationem meam ante ipsum pronuntio. Educ de custodia animam meam ad confitendum nomini tuo : me expectant justi, donec retribuas mihi." With these words he departed.

Arnulph, a nobleman of Flanders, converted miraculously by St. Bernard to a religious life at Clairvaux, coming to die, after receiving the sacraments, exclaimed suddenly, "Vera sunt omnia, domine Jesu, vera sunt quæ dixisti." Some thought that he was raving ; but he went on to explain, saying that the promise of Christ was fulfilled, which affirmed that there was no one who had left house or brethren, or sister, or father, or mother, or children, or lands, for him and for his Gospel, who did not receive in this world an hundred fold, and in the future, life everlasting.*—St. Anthony found the dead body of St. Paul the Hermit kneeling on the ground, the head raised, and the hands spread towards heaven. At first he thought that he was alive, and was praying.—Peter the Venerable, Abbot of Cluny, describes a very solemn scene connected with the death of a poor novice in that abbey. "I came to him (says the holy abbot,) as usual after vespers with the brethren, and we found him in great suffering. He then received from my hands the celestial food of our Lord's body ; after which, he lost his speech. In silence he remained all that night and the whole of the following day, till the vesper hour, when suddenly he broke forth aloud, to our great astonishment, with the words, 'Domine miserere, chare Domine miserere, Domine misericordiam ;' and so he continued repeating these words, and invoking St. Martin. With this long and uninterrupted supplication for mercy, in the presence of us who knelt round him praying, and on the day of the Holy Innocents, did this innocent soul depart from the miseries of this life, and as is allowable to believe, attain to the mercy which he so devoutly invoked.”*

* Drexelius, Tribunal Christi, Lib. I. cap. 10.

It was in the year 1157, that Peter the Venerable, Abbot of Cluny, went the way of all flesh. His departure was in this manner. On the vigil of the Nativity of our Lord, entering the chapter as usual, in good health, he heard the announcement of the blessed festival, and after the manner of Cluny, he adored with the most humble prostration. After the lesson and the absolution of the dead, he began a sublime discourse on the preaching of the nativity and the announcement by the prophets; when suddenly, in the midst of his discourse, his eyes overflowed with a torrent of tears, and falling down, he was borne out of the chapter by the hands of his children, who were almost distracted through grief: he remained very ill the whole of that day and the following night, till the first dawn of the morning of the Nativity; and at the very hour in which Christ is believed to have come into the world, did he leave the world, and proceed to celebrate the solemnity of our Lord's birth with angelic spirits.†

Paschasius Radbert relates that St. Adalhard, Abbot of Corby, in the ninth century, said mass to the last, and preached twice on the day before his death. He expired a little after midnight on the Circumcision; and his last words were full of joy. With hands and eyes raised to heaven, he said aloud the Nunc Dimittis: then, after adding that he only desired the divine will might be done, he continued with a joyful voice, though full of the gravity of faith, “I shall go hence and repair to my God. Joyfully I shall repair to him; joyfully I shall die, and joyfully I shall pass the mighty gulf of this life, since I am about to arrive at everlasting joys, which have been for a long time promised to me.”‡

How quickly were these mourners comforted by their Divine Master! Behold St. Francis Xavier in the island of Sancian, on the confines of China, dying in a wretched open cabin on a desert mountain, without any worldly assistance—but yet overwhelmed with all kinds of spiritual benediction! Claudius Poujol, a monk of Einsiedeln, of most holy life, was not prevented by his mortal illness from going to communion in the church on the last morning of his life!§ The death of Hugue of St. Victor can only be related as we find it in Durandus; for the circumstances attending it are such as to defy comment. When this great doctor lay on his deathbed, he asked for the body of our Lord; but as his stomach could retain no food, the brethren, distracted between the impulse of humanity and reverence for our Lord, offered him an unconsecrated host, which he rejected, asking God to pardon them for what they had done: then they, in great astonishment, brought him the body of our Lord, which he was unable to receive. Upon which, raising his hands to heaven, he prayed aloud saying, “Ascendat filius ad

* Pet. Ven. Abb. Clun. IX. Epist. Lib. I. 4, Bibliothec. Cluniacens.

† Abbat. Clun. Chronologia.

‡ Vita S. Adalhardi, Mabillon Acta S. Ord. Benedic. Sæc. IV. p. 1.

§ Tschudi Einsiedlische Chronik. 218.

patrem, et spiritus ad eum qui fecit illum;” with which words his spirit departed, and the body of our Lord was no more seen.*

Hitherto, it is true, we have only beheld the last moments of men who may be considered as real philosophers—men who had followed the path of perfection in a religious life. But, during the early and middle ages, we might discover innumerable instances of the same form of death, within the walls of the palace, the castle, or the cottage. Every where alike, the priest and the dying man would speak together respecting the future world; and as Chateaubriand remarks, the sublime scene which antiquity presented but once in the death of the chief of its philosophers, was repeated every day in the humble cabin of the lowest Christian who expired. St. Servulus was a beggar and a paralytic from his childhood, who used to be carried daily into the portico of the church of St. Clement at Rome, where he was supported by the alms of the faithful, and where he himself used to relieve other poor. He used to get pilgrims and poor people to read the Holy Scriptures to him, and to repeat the Psalms. His death occurred in the year 590. As he was dying, while they chanted round him he suddenly ceased to sing, and said, “Hark! do you not hear that sweet melody in the sky?” And with these words he expired.

St. Vincent de Paul was summoned to St. Germain-en-Laye, to assist Louis XIII. in his last moments. The first words of the holy priest, as he approached the dying king, were, “Sire, Timenti Dominum benè erit in extremis.” The king was so familiar with this sacred language, that he immediately replied in finishing the verse, “Et in die defunctionis sue benedicetur!” Suger describes the edifying conduct of the King, Louis-le-Gros, when he was seized with the sickness which he thought would prove fatal. Suger was then constantly present with him by night and by day. The religious prince had, through all his life, cherished the desire to die in the Abbey of St. Denis, where he had been educated; and he wished to be transported there on this occasion, but he found himself too weak to bear the motion. Assembling all the bishops and abbots of his suite round his bed, he made his confession, and received absolution from them all. Then he distributed to churches and hospitals all his gold, silver, and precious furniture, giving even his clothes and the hangings of his bed, in order to imitate, as he said, “the nakedness and poverty of his Saviour, who died for him.” Thus reduced to poverty, he prepared himself to receive the last sacraments. During all his sufferings, which were very great, he never testified the least impatience or trouble: gentle and affable to every one, he consoled all who approached him. Causing himself to be carried into the chapel, there on his knees, though obliged to be supported, and with every expression of the utmost humility, he adored our Lord. Then he made a discourse to his son, exhorting him to prove himself a good prince, to be always the protector of the church, the father of the poor, and never to commit wrong.

* Durandus Nationale, Lib. IV. 41.

Then, after making his confession of faith with as much precision as if he had been a most able theologian, he received the communion, and almost immediately, afterwards found himself better, so as to be able to return to his chamber, where, however, he was again placed on his bed; on that poor bed which was now stripped of all the ornaments which had so lately adorned it. At this moment Suger, struck with such an alteration, could not refrain from tears; but the king said, "Dear friend, do not weep to see me in this state, but rather rejoice that God has given me grace to prepare myself for receiving death by this voluntary act of renunciation." In a few days he was sufficiently recovered to ride on horseback to St. Denis, to return thanks to God for his recovery, where he remained for a long time prostrate in prayer. Suger remained in his abbey spiritually refreshed by such an example of piety. When, at last, this great king came to die, he wished to be transported to St. Denis, but again he was too weak to bear movement. He caused some tapestry to be spread on the ground, and ashes in form of a cross to be strewn over it, and himself to be placed upon it; and upon this bed of penitence he expired in the act of making the sign of the cross.

In like manner, Henry III. of England, in the year 1272, after confessing his sins at first secretly, and afterwards in public before all the prelates and monks, who were present at his last moments, caused himself to be placed upon a bed of ashes, on which he expired.

Christine de Pisan gives a minute account of the last hours of the great and wise King of France, Charles V. "In order to give some recreation and comfort to his servants, whom he saw greatly afflicted on account of his sickness, he caused himself every day to be raised up, dressed, and placed at table; and, however weak, he could still address to them some words of consolation and of good advice, without any complaint or sign of grief, but only invoking the name of God, of our Lady, and of the saints. Two days before his death, after a most grievous night, he rose in this manner, and spoke to all his attendants with a very joyous countenance, saying, 'Rejoice, my good loyal friends and servants, for within a short hour I shall be out of your hands.' They supposed, from the joy of his countenance, that he alluded to his recovery; but he said this to intimate his approaching departure from this world of sorrow. On the day of his death, which was the Sunday, he desired to behold the crown of thorns of our Saviour and his own coronation crown, which were both brought to him by the Bishop of Paris and by the Abbot of St. Denis. That of the thorns he received with great devotion, tears, and reverence, placing it before his face; and that of his coronation was put under his feet. Then he began this prayer to the holy crown. 'O precious crown, diadem of our salvation! how sweet and delicious is the joy which thou givest by the mystery which is comprised in thee, if, indeed, He be propitious to me, with whose blood thou wert bedewed, as my spirit rejoices in the visitation of his worthy presence:' and then a long prayer he said very devoutly: after which, directing his words to the coronation crown, he said, 'O crown of France, how art thou precious and precious vile ! precious, considering the mystery of justice contained in thee ; but vile, and viler than all things, if we regard the labor, anguish, torment of heart, body, and conscience, yea, peril as to the soul, which thou bringest to those who bear thee ! And he that should well consider these things, would rather leave thee lying in the mire than lift thee up from it to place thee on his head.' Then the king uttered many remarkable words, full of great faith, devotion, and gratitude to God, so that all who heard him were moved to great compassion and tears. After this, mass was celebrated, and the king desired that lauds and benedictions should be sung to God with organs and melodious chant. Then he received the last sacraments after which he blessed his sons and all who stood by his side, and then the history of the Passion was read to him ; and near the end of the Gospel of St. John, he expired in the arms of the Seigneur de la Riviere."*

Is it not true, that the death of these Catholic kings was a sublime and instructive spectacle ? But, that our knowledge may extend to the full, let us go now and mark the mien worn at the last by those men, whose profession of arms, and lives spent amidst the distractions of war, would lead one to fear that theirs, at least, could not have been a holy death. We shall find that, in the middle ages, even these rough warriors, who died begging pardon and pardoning all the world, corresponded in their last moments, in some degree, with that type of sanctity, which faith had so widely diffused ; and that they were far from experiencing those fearful horrors and dreadful agitations, which attended the departure of those who die the death that hath no end. To most of them, one might have applied the words of Macbeth, alluding to Duncan,—“He is in his grave. After life's fitful fever, he sleeps well.” For mark their last moments. Behold them heavy with death, bowed unto the ground, yet making “their eyes unfolded upward, gates to heaven :”—

“Praying forgiveness of th' Almighty Sire
Amidst that cruel conflict, on their foes,
With looks that win compassion to their aim.”

Such spirits Dante found in Purgatory. They said to him,

“—————We all
By violence died, and to our latest hour
Were sinners, but then warn'd by light from heaven,
So that, repenting and forgiving, we
Did issue out of life at peace with God,
Who with desire to see him, fills our hearts.”†

In the same circle Manfredi appears to him, and says,

* Christine de Pisan, Livre des Fais et Bonnes Meurs du Sage Roy, Charles V. Lib. III. chap. 71.

† Purg. V.

“——When by two mortal blows
 My frame was shatter'd, I betook myself
 Weeping to him, who of free will forgives.
 My sins were horrible; but so wide arms
 Hath goodness infinite, that it receives
 All who turn to it.”

Further on he meets a spirit, who can give a more consoling history of his end.
 “Wounded I came to the bank of Archiano,

“——Fleeing away on foot,
 And bloodying the plain. Here sight and speech
 Fail'd me; and finishing with Mary's name.
 I fell, and tenantless my flesh remain'd.”

Shakespeare makes Hotspur exclaim, when Prince Henry's sword had robbed him of his youth, that he could prophesy, but that the earthly and cold hand of death lay on his tongue.

When William the Conqueror was laid on his death-bed, he confessed aloud to many priests, and in presence of the nobles of England and Normandy, all the sins of his life from his youth, and then, with many tears, implored their suffrage. Villars, in a later age, furnishes another example. Wounded at the battle of Malplaquet, he is in such danger, that it is proposed he should receive the sacraments, and in private. “No, no,” said he, “since the army has not been able to see Villars die like a hero, it shall see him die like a Christian.”

But what shall we say of death as connected with that chivalry, which in the middle ages, sought to restore to the Church the cradle of Christianity, and to the arts their ancient country, which pushed forward its forests of brilliant lances to the summits of the Alps and of the Pyrenees? Let the Muse of Tasso come to our aid. Hear how Godfrey, unmoved in look, in gesture, or in thought, addresses the Christian warriors on the approach of the Pagan host.

“——A crown prepare you to possess
 Of martyrdom, or happy victory;
 For this I hope, for that I wish no less,
 Of greater merit and of greater glory.
 Brethren, this camp will shortly be
 A temple sacred to our memory,
 To which the holy men of future age,
 To view our graves, shall come in pilgrimage.”*

And hear again how he speaks of the crusaders slain :—

“But such a death and end exceedeth all
 The conquests vain of realms, or spoils of gold;
 Nor aged Rome's proud stately capitol
 Did ever triumph yet like their's behold;

* Book. VIII. 15.

They sit in heaven on thrones celestial,
 Crowned with glory for their conquest bold.
 But thou who hast part of thy race to run,
 With haps and hazards of this yoss'd,
 Rejoice for those high honors they have won,
 Which cannot be by chance or fortune cross'd."*

But why have recourse to poetic fabling, when history is so rich in splendid instances? Ulrich Baier, the Komthum of Tapiau, fell in the battle of Sudauen, in the year 1281, fighting against the infidels in Prussia. "His death," says the historian, "was felt bitterly by the whole Teutonic order. As he had wished, so he died: like his Saviour, he had received four wounds in his hands and feet, and the mortal wound in his heart. By his side lay four other knights slain. His wish was, 'Ut possem vulnerari ab eis V vulneribus, sicut Christus pro me fuerat vulneratus;'† and the historian relates, 'Recipit in pedibus et manibus vulnera et quantum in corde.' " In fine, the death of the laity, in ages of faith, had often all those characteristic features of a sanctified and blessed end, which have appeared so admirable in men whose lives had been wholly and professedly devoted to God. John Corvinus, waivode of Transylvania, general of the army of the Hungarian king, who saved that country from the Turks, and one of the greatest heroes of Christendom, when on his death-bed, would not allow them to administer to him in his apartment the last assistance of religion; for such was his devotion, full of reverence, that he caused himself to be carried into the church. Priuli, the illustrious doge of Venice, whose life is recorded in a curious manuscript in the Library of St. Mark, in like manner, received the last consolations of religion in the church. He expired immediately after receiving the holy communion, with the words, "In manus tuas, Domine, commendo spiritum meum et populum meum." St. Homobonus, a married tradesman or merchant, a native of Cremona, died like some blessed monk or confessor. In the year 1197, going one night, according to his custom, to matins, sound and well, to the church of St. Giles, after the office he applied himself to prayer before a crucifix, where he remained till the first mass, and when the priest had said the Gloria in Excelsis, he extended his arms in form of a cross, and without any sickness or noise, rendered up his soul to God, and was buried in that church, amidst the tears and regrets of all the people.

But why do I speak only of men, since we find that, in these devout ages, neither the weakness of age or sex was able to counteract the sublime and wondrous influence of religion in annihilating the terrors incident to our nature at the prospect of its change? As we have already seen, sweet, and in an especial degree blessed, was the death of youth. What a beautiful description of a holy end is given by Peter the Venerable, Abbot of Cluny, describing that of a certain good youth, whom he calls his dear child John, whose puerile innocence was united with such a promise of future fruit."* It is related of a certain student in an English Catholic college, who died in his fourteenth year, that being asked by a priest whether he had a great love for Jesus Christ, he replied, "O my sweet Jesus, thou knowest that I love thee with my whole heart," and that saying these words, he expired. The description of the death of many of the young students in the college of St. Acheul, recalls the most affecting incidents in the history of a St. Stanislaus or a St. Louis Gonzaga. Drexelius speaks of an innocent little boy, who, in dying, seemed at first in great pain and anguish, till opening his eyes suddenly, and looking up to heaven, he assumed instantly a joyful smile, and even laughed aloud, so that the persons present doubted not that he was consoled by a vision of angels. "William Elfinston, when a youth, admitted into the society of Jesus, after a month was seized with a mortal illness. The joy which he expressed in countenance and in words was incredible, never ceasing to return thanks to God. At length he broke out into an ecstasy, and asked the persons present if they did not see the angel with whom he spoke? and some one asking what was the appearance of the angel, he replied that he resembled a certain youth who happened to be present. Thus in great joy and sweetness did his soul depart to Christ."†

* Book VIII. 44.

† Dusburg, c. 101.

Equally remarkable was the firmness evinced by those who were in the weakness of life's extremest verge. The old died like the young. The Egyptians, as Pliny relates, thought that the human heart diminished with age, so that, after a hundred years its decrease would necessarily occasion death. Had they been familiar with examples like the preceding, the absurdity of such an idea would have struck them, judging only from the moral effects which were displayed in the benignity, cheerfulness, and magnanimous resolution with which old men died. St. Gregory compares the human life to three watches of the night. The death of the aged, in fact, corresponded with the state of those who kept the third watch, and who already beheld the dawn.

But how wondrously was the power of faith displayed in enabling the weak and timid sex to meet death with heroic courage, with a profound and smiling calm, with an unshrinking unconquerable reliance on the promises of religion! When the venerable Mother de Chantal was on her death-bed, as the clergy repeated round her the prayers of the Church for the recommendation of the soul, she listened with great attention, and evinced a sublime tranquillity. Several times she was overheard exclaiming in the midst of the service, "My God, what beautiful prayers!"‡ That illustrious woman prayed with her last breath, evincing an evenness of mind, shaped as if with an especial view to astonish the schools of old philosophy, which never condescended to describe a woman's death.

* Epist. Lib. IV. 42.

† Drexelius, Tribunal Christi, Lib. I. cap. 10.

‡ Marsollier, Vie de Mde. de Chantal, II. 180.

That remark, "What beautiful prayers !" would have filled Plato with admiration, if not with envy.

St. Rusticule, abbess of the convent which St. Cæsareus had founded at Arles, died in the year 632. Her last sickness is thus described :—"It happened on a certain Friday, that after singing vespers as usual with her nuns, perceiving herself fatigued, she went beyond her strength in making the usual reading ; she knew that she was shortly to pass to our Lord. On the Saturday morning she felt cold, and lost the use of her limbs. Lying down on a little bed, she was seized with fever, but she never ceased praising God, with her eyes raised to heaven. She commended to Him her daughters, whom she was about to leave orphans, and with a firm soul she comforted those who wept around her. She found herself still worse on Sunday ; and as it was her custom that her bed should only be made once a year, the servants of God begged permission to give her a less hard bed, but she would not consent. On the Monday, which was the day of St. Laurence, she lost all strength, and her breathing became difficult. At this sight the sad virgins of Christ poured forth tears and sighs. It being the third hour of the day, as the congregation, in its affliction, repeated the Psalms in silence, the holy mother, in displeasure, asked, 'Why she did not hear the chanting of Psalmody ?' The nuns replied, 'That they could not sing through grief.' 'Only sing still louder,' she replied, 'in order that I may receive the benefit of it ; for that is very sweet to me.' The next day, her body having hardly the power of motion, her eyes, which preserved their lustre, shone like the stars, and looking on all sides, and not being able to speak, she made signs with her hand, that they should cease weeping, and be comforted. When one of the sisters felt her feet, she said it was not yet time ; but shortly after, at the sixth hour of the day, with a serene countenance, and eyes that seemed to smile, this glorious and blessed soul passed to heaven, and joined the innumerable choir of saints."*

The Countess de Russelmonde, who died a Carmelite, desired that the Passion of Christ might be read to her in her last moments. She continued to indicate where the reader ought to pause, till he pronounced the words "Tradidit spiritum;" and at that moment her spirit departed. Drexelius speaks of a holy matron who died smiling, so that a sweet smile remained on her features after death.† But the affecting account which St. Jerome gives of the death of the venerable Paula surpasses, in interest, every description that we could find elsewhere :—"This illustrious woman," he says, "perceived that her last hour was at hand ; but calm and joyous, as if she was about to leave strangers, and to revisit her family, she repeated the words of the Psalm : 'O Lord, I have loved the beauty of thy house, and the place which is the habitation of thy glory.'‡ 'How beautiful are thy tents, O God, of virtue ; my soul desireth after thee, and rejoices, in hope of being ad-

* Acta Sanct. Ord. Benedict., Tom. II. 146.

† Thom. Cantips. Lib. II. Mirac. c. 50.

‡ Ps. xxv. 8.

mitted into the abode of the Lord.* And, 'I had rather be the last in the house of my God than dwell in the tent of the sinner.†' And when I asked her, why she kept silence, and did not answer, and whether anything caused her grief, she said to me, in the Greek language, that she felt no regret, but that she was absorbed in the contemplation of that rest and perfect tranquillity to which she was approaching. This answer was the last that she uttered. She closed her eyes, and, as if quite detached from all mortal things, she was only occupied in murmuring, with a voice almost unintelligible, the sacred texts which I have repeated. She placed her finger on her mouth, to trace upon her lips the sign of Christ, and then she fell into her agony : her soul, ready to fly away, summoned her last strength previous to the dissolution of life, to give thanks to the Lord. There were there many holy bishops, and several priests, and Levites, who had come from Jerusalem and other cities adjacent. Troops of monks and virgins filled the whole monastery. As soon as Paula had heard the words of the Canticle, 'Rise my well-beloved, my Dove ; behold the Winter is passed, and has withdrawn, behold the rain has ceased,‡ she made a last effort, and replied, 'The flowers have covered the earth, and it is time to gather them ;§ yes, 'I believe that I shall see the good things of the Lord in the land of the living.¶' And with these words she expired. Then there was no sound heard of weeping or lamentation as at the last moments of people of this world, but all resounded with the music of sacred hymns. The holy bishops themselves took up the body of the deceased, and a certain number of the priests, accompanied it with lighted tapers, while others chanted psalms. It was deposited in the grotto where the Saviour was born, having been conducted by an immense multitude, which this pious ceremony had collected from all the cities of Palestine. No solitary recluse for that day wished to remain in his retreat, and there was no virgin who did not leave her cell. It would have been deemed by every one an impiety not to have hastened to show the last honors to the illustrious deceased. Widows and the poor wept while they showed the vestments which they owed to her charity, and all the unhappy whom she had consoled, cried out, that they had lost their mother. It was astonishing to observe that death had not changed her countenance. A sweet calm, mixed with gravity, was painted on all her features ; so that she seemed not dead, but sleeping a peaceful sleep. The prayers for her were continued during the whole week. The following was her epitaph :—Paula, descendant of the Gracchi, sprung from the illustrious blood of the great Agamemnon, Paula, who owed her origin to the celebrated Scipio, reposes in this tomb. She was the mother of Eustochium : her rank was illustrious here below among the Roman nobility, but she renounced vain earthly honors to imitate the poverty of Christ, and she came to conceal her life in Bethlehem."¶¶

* Ps. lxxxiii. 2.

† Id.

‡ Cant. II. 10.

§ Cant. II. 11.

¶ Ps. xxvi. 13.

¶¶ S. Hieronymi Epist. ad Eustochium, Virg.

Such, then, are a few of the examples which the history of the ages of faith affords us, when we examine it in reference to the mourning of men in their last hours, and in their death. Such was the manner of their departing. Thus simply and sweetly did they die, without any affectation of false philosophy evincing the insincerity and pride of a Possidonius, or desire of acting a scene to receive the plaudits of fellow-creatures, springing from that lofty and vain exaggeration of soul which seemed so magnificent to Cicero. Had we sufficient time to develop fully this view of history, and to point out all the collateral instruction to be derived from it, the present would be an excellent occasion for exposing the insane presumption of those innovators, who asserted and attempted to prove, by theological reasoning, that faith and true piety had perished in the middle ages—for there was then nothing singular or extraordinary in the scenes which are here described. Here were no doctrines contrary to what was professed by the universal Church. It was the spirit of the times to die thus. I know, indeed, that the best answer to the propositions of heresy would be found in the lives and writings of these children of grace; but, methinks, even in their death, they supply us with enough to disprove the calumny of their adversaries, and to answer the ends of a solid and practical refutation. But the limits appointed to our course will not permit any further delay: let the reader pursue the inquiry for himself: for us it will be sufficient to take leave of the subject with the words of the sacred page, "Ecce quomodo moritur justus, et nemo percipit corde: et viri justi tolluntur, et nemo considerat."

However, somewhat still remains to be done; for as it seemed best not to interrupt these narratives, to explain as they occurred the many things contained in them which, in an historical and philosophic sense, deserve particular attention, it will be necessary now to retrace our steps, taking a brief survey of them in general, in order to complete our view of the character which the mourning attendant upon death had assumed, and of the duties and manners to which it gave rise. In the first place, we must have been struck with the uniformity which distinguished the monastic observances in regard to death. In fact, these, which recalled but the customs of the primitive Christians, were every where nearly the same. "When a monk was sick, and in prospect of death, a servant brother was appointed, who should have nothing else to do but to tend him day and night. The cross was placed before his face, and every night a wax taper was kept burning by his side until broad day. Monks were allowed to be in attendance on him in order to sing the regular hours, and to read the Passion in his extremity. The servants, who had experience in such things, were to watch the proper moment, and to spread the ashes, and gently to place the sick man upon them, and then to give a signal, by striking the door of the cloister, when all the brethren were to run to the chamber, for this was one of the two occasions when it was permitted them to depart from their usual measured pace, the other being in the event of fire. If mass should be celebrating, or any regular office, all who were without the choir were to hasten, but those within were to remain. If the monks were in the refectory, the reading was to be instantly suspended, and the monks were to hasten. The litany was then to be chanted, and the prayers according to the progress of his agony.*

The manner of professing penitence by the reception of ashes was well known, as Mabillon shows in the sixth age.

Thus Severus Sulpicius describes the death of St. Martin, who, in his last hour, desired his disciples to prepare some vile couch for his body, saying, "Non decet filii Christianum nisi in cinere et cilicio mori." On these occasions, the sackcloth was spread on the ground, ashes were strewed upon it in form of a cross, and the persons who assisted a dying person gently placed him upon it. The laity often observed this custom at their death, as we have seen recorded of Louis VI. of France, and Henry III. of England. The monk of St. Denis also relates that Louis IX. gave up the ghost on sackcloth and ashes, and with his arms composed in form of a cross.† It was a pious custom, as early as in the sixth century, for Christians, in their last hours, to be carried into the church to die before the altar. This appears in the acts of Saints Benedict, Maur, Gilda, and others; and Bede gives a similar account of the death of St. Cuthbert, Bishop of Lindisfarn. Universally, the image of our Lord on the cross was placed before the bed of the dying man. "Sometimes it happens," says a holy priest, writing at the time when modern manners had superseded those of faith, "that, on being called to assist at the last moments of some noble, there is not one crucifix to be found in all his superb apartments, where such care has been taken to leave no material want unsupplied. At length, some one recollects, that on the upper story of the same hotel, immediately beneath the tiles of the roof, there lives some poor man, some young scholar, and it is suggested that, of course, he must have a crucifix. Then they hasten to make known their wants, and there they find a cross; and this poor man, or this scholar, lends it to the dying rich man, who at least is presented in his agony with that image which is designed to console those who in their lives have known the labors of men. When Cæsar fell, he had no object before him but the stern countenance of that great Pompey, whose dread form, carved in stone, as we yet behold it, can inspire only awe; but, in Christian ages, there were few places in which a man could die without having his last looks directed to some cross, the emblem of hope and mercy! The Maid of Orleans asked for a crucifix at her death, when every form of horror was accumulated. An Englishman broke a stick in two parts, and made a cross: the maid took it, kissed it, pressed it to her bosom, and mounted the pile. Mention has been made also of the death-taper. This alludes to the lighting that blessed candle which seems so odious to the children of this world, but so full of joy to the just: it signified the light of

* Antiq. Consuetud. Cluniacens. Monastic. cap. 29. Apud Dacher. Spicileg. Tom. IV.

† Mabillon Præfat. in I. Sæcul. Benedict. § 9.

faith and the lucid mansions, and it was used to dispel the fears of the departing soul. The body itself, when it lay without a name, seemed to partake of the new and blessed form of death. The temperate and austere discipline of Catholics was favorable to the delicate susceptibility of noble natures ; for to them it is an agreeable thought, that the body should not become a rich feast for disgusting worms, and a vast receptacle for pestiferous exhalations. The spectacle of a rich epicure within his shroud, or of one of these modern philosophers with whom he who dines best to the last makes the best end, would be almost enough to induce such men to fly to a monastery, where death would be stripped even of what seemed horrible to the senses, and where even the body would seem to participate in the soul's purity. In bequeathing his body to the earth, the man of temperate and austere habits might generally say, with the old poet of France, "Les vers n'y trouveront grand grasse."

Speaking of the beautiful appearance of the body of Dom Basile after death, the father abbot of La Trappe says, "It is true that it is one of the privileges of the servants of Jesus Christ, as the Holy Ghost teaches us, not to know either the deformity, or the horror, or the necessity of death. Non tanget illos tormentum mortis ; visi sunt oculis insipientium mori."* Describing the convent of the Carmelites at Nicopie, in Cyprus, brother Nicole, the pilgrim, relates "that it was founded by French noblemen, and that there rests there the body of John de Montfort, tres tout entier, et est le plus beau mort qu'onques fut veu dessus la terre."

Again, allusion is often made to the custom which became pretty general, of laymen assuming a religious habit at their death. Thus, in the Saxon Chronicle, we read, "In the year 1056, died Earl Odda, whose body lies at Pershore, and who was admitted a monk before his end : a good man and virtuous, and truly noble."† Milton is pleased to be very facetious on this subject,—speaking of those ———"Who, to be sure of Paradise,

Dying, put on the weeds of Dominic,
Or in Franciscan think to pass disguised."

But, not to observe what a remarkable testimony was here furnished to the celestial virtues which were recognized in the members of these holy and blessed orders, it is well known to all who are correctly taught in Chronic lore, that this was a practice observed by men of saintly lives, and that it did imply a voluntary renunciation of the world, not only because men naturally cling to the most unsubstantial image at their death, and cherish remembrances of the dignities and titles of the profession in which they had previously lived, but also because by this act they were, in the event of their recovery, bound to continue in the observance of that religious life which they had embraced in their sickness ; for those who, under such circumstances, had received the monastic habit, and who were styled * Relations de la Mort, &c. Tom. I. 192.

† 247.

"monachi ad succurrendum," had not liberty to return to the world on their recovery. This being known to every one, the act was certainly less indicative of a superstitious veneration than of a conversion of the heart to God. In Spain, such men were entitled confessors, as Ducange proves in his Glossary. A memorable instance of the scrupulous exactness with which this discipline was observed, is furnished in the history of Spain. Wamba, king of the Visigoths had drunk poison. When the bishops and the chieftains beheld him lying senseless, immediately they administered to him the order of confession and penitence; or, in other words, they gave him the monastic habit; and when this holy king had recovered from the effect of the poison, understanding that orders had been imposed upon him, he retired to a monastery, and there, as long as he lived, he remained in religion. This is the account given by Alfonso, Bishop of Salamanca; but the passage is explained by ancient Spanish writers, who say that the king at the time had expressly demanded the habit of religion.* Many princes became monks ad succurrendum. Thus Lothaire, son of Louis-le-Debonnaire, was made a monk in sickness at Prumia, and soon after died. The Fratres ad succurrendum were inscribed on the boards of the monastery, as persons partaking of the suffrages. Thus, John Commenæus, Emperor of the Greeks, has a place in the Necrology of the Abbey of St. Martin apud Laudunum. The words are, "XV. Kal. Maii commemoratio Joannis Imperatoris hujus ecclesiæ Fratris ad succurrendum."†

With respect to the moral characteristics of death in the ages of faith, many peculiarities must have excited attention in the preceding series of examples.

In the first place, what repeated allusions are made to the foreknowledge of death, and to its announcement in a supernatural manner! St. Francis Xavier told a certain merchant named Veglio, who was a holy man, that when the wine in his glass should taste bitter, it would be a signal to him to prepare for death. The event fulfilled the prediction.‡ In many ancient church windows, as well as on the hangings in the choir of Westminster Abbey, was represented the story of the forewarning of death, made to king Edward the Confessor, by some pilgrims, who came to him from Jerusalem and gave him a ring which he had before secretly given to a poor man that asked his charity in the name of God and of St. John the Evangelist, for it is said that he never refused any man who asked alms in the name of St. John, and he had nothing to give at that moment but the ring from his finger. Machiavel relates, "that the Duke of Milan had a strong presentiment of his death; for on the morning of St. Stephen's day when he was assassinated, after putting on his cuirass to proceed in solemn state to the church of St. Stephen, he took it off again, and said that he would hear mass that day in the castle chapel, and hearing that his almoner was already departed for St. Stephen's with all the ornaments of his chapel, he desired that the Bishop of Como might

* Mabillon Præfat, in IV. Sæcul. Benedict. § cap. 7.

† Mabillon Præfat. in III. Sæcul. § 1.

‡ Bonhours Vie de S. S. F. X. II. 178.

supply his place ; but as the Bishop was unable to do so, he was obliged to proceed to the church where his murderers were waiting for him.*

Hugo Flaviniacensis, in the chronicle of Verdun, relates, that Odilia, the daughter of Count Herimann, being told that she was to die on the following day, by Richard Abbot of St. Vito, prepared herself accordingly, and expired suddenly on the morrow while they were praying around her, and strange to hear, administering to her the sacred oil, though previously without illness. What remarkable instances, too, are recorded of men being apprised in a manner supernatural of the death of others at a distance !

St. Gregory of Tours relates, "that the blessed Severinus, Bishop of Cologne, on a Sunday morning after matins, going about as usual with his clerks, heard a chorus of angels in the sky, and he knew that it arose from the fact, that the soul of St. Martin was at that moment departing, and so the event proved."† Now it is true, that St. Gregory of Tours had collected many reports, to some of which it is difficult to give perfect credence ; but what shall we say of the fact of St. Ambrose, while celebrating mass at Milan, having been miraculously made acquainted with St. Martin's death at Tours ? St. Hugo, the sixth abbot of Cluny, and St. Anselm, Archbishop of Canterbury, died both on the same night and a holy monk had a vision at the time announcing their death.‡ The venerable Bede had another most remarkable instance. "The same night in which St. Hilda died in her monastery at Whitby, it pleased the Almighty, by a manifest vision, to make known her death in a distant monastery, which is called Hakenes. There was in this house, a certain nun named Begu, who had served our Lord in a monastic conversation upwards of thirty years. She being then at rest in the dormitory of the sisters, heard on a sudden, in the air, the accustomed sound of the bell, which used to awaken and call them to prayers when any one of their community was taken out of this world ; upon which opening, as she imagined, her eyes, she saw the top of the house uncovered, and a light from above filling all the place : which, when she had attentively considered, she saw in that same light the soul of the said servant of God going up to heaven, attended and conducted by angels ; upon which, immediately rising in terror, she ran to the nun who then presided in the monastery in place of the Abbess Frigyth, and with many tears and sighs, told her that the Abbes Hilda, the mother of them all, was departed this life, and had ascended in her sight, encircled with an immense light to the mansion of light eternal, and to the happy society of the citizens of heaven. The other hearing this, called up all the sisters, and assembling them in the church, admonished them to pray and sing psalms for the soul of their mother, which having performed during the remainder of the night, they were informed by the brethren who came there in the morning from Whitby, that she had departed from this world at the same hour in which the vision was seen. This is the account given by Bede. One might multiply these examples, and relate how, in the year 660, on the sixteenth of January, St. Furcy departed this life, in the village called Massiere, in Picardy, and the same hour appeared to Count Haymond, in sacerdotal vestments, attended by a deacon and subdeacon, with a lighted taper in his hand, saying, "that according to his promise he was come to wish him farewell before leaving the world;" but as accounts of this kind are familiar to every one, it is of more importance to call the attention to those memorable records of predicted, or rather of demanded death, which are found in the most authentic histories.

* Hist. of Florence, Lib. VII. † Mirac. cap. 4. 5. ‡ Bibliothec. Cluniacens. 438.

In 1312, Ferdinand IV., King of Spain, was summoned to appear before the tribunal of Christ, within thirty days, by the two brothers, Peter and John, of the order of Caravalla, who were unjustly condemned to death upon the charge of having murdered Benavidius during the siege of Alcaodela, which was then in the hands of the Moors. Upon the thirtieth day, which was the seventh of the Ides of September, he was found dead in his bed, to which he had retired in perfect health, so that among the Kings of Castile, he received the name of Ferdinandus in jus vocatus.^{*} Walter Burgensis, Bishop of Poitiers, unjustly accused and deposed by Pope Clement V., bore the injury with patience; but dying, for the sake of example to others, caused these words to be written on his tomb: "ad justum Dei judicium appello." Clement read the inscription, and did justice to his memory; but of his death, connected also with the summons of the Grand Master of the Templars, Drexelius declines to speak. Agrestius reviled and calumniated St. Columban after his death. Eusladius the Abbot, disciple of St. Columban, summoned the calumniator to appear before the tribunal of Christ within the year. Before the term was complete, Agrestius met with his death by the hands of his own slave.[†] Philip, King of France, solemnly cited to appear before the divine judgment within the year, by the Grand Master of the Templars, died on the twenty-ninth of November of that year. Francis Duke of Brittany, receiving back his brother Giles, who had been in England for his education, cast him into prison upon a false charge of treason and put him to death. The innocent youth cited his brother to appear with him before the tribunal of God within the year; Francis died of the dropsy before the term expired.[‡] Nantinus, Count of Angouleme, cited to judgment before God, by Heraclius the Bishop, expired, crying out that he was summoned by the priest, and that he acknowledged his crimes.[§] Rodolph, Prince of Austria, unjustly condemned to death a certain knight, who was enclosed in a sack and thrown into the river, the knight, before his head was covered, beheld the duke at a window, and cried out with a loud voice, "Duke Rodolph, I summon you to the tremendous tribunal of Christ, that you may give an account for putting me to death unjustly," he said, and ^{*} Mariana, Lib. XV. de reb. Hisp. c. 11.

[†] Surius, Mense Martio die 29.

[‡] Æneas, Sylvius, Hist. Europæ, cap. 43.

[§] Greg. Turonens. Lib. V. Hist. Franc. c. 36.

was pressed down, and he disappeared in the waters. The Duke laughed at the threat, but before the end of the year he was seized with a fever, which he acknowledged to be the stroke of Heaven calling him to judgment, and he died in horrors.*

“Oh! how severe God’s judgment, that deals out
Such blows in stormy vengeance——.†”

In Ireland Patrick O’Kelly, a bishop, and Conatius Ornarius, a Franciscan friar of noble birth, cast into a dark dungeon by the viceroy, for refusing to acknowledge the queen as head of the church, afterwards cruelly tortured and led to execution, spoke to the people for half an hour, and then turning to the viceroy, cited him to appear before the divine tribunal. They were put to death, and the viceroy proceeded to Limerick, where he fell sick and died on the fourteenth day after receiving this summons.‡ The master of the Teutonic order maliciously condemned to death a young man, against whom he had a private enmity. The youth, on his way to execution protesting his innocence, appealed to the Supreme Arbiter of life and death, and cited his judge to appear within thirteen days. Truly, God despiseth not the supplication of the poor, his eyes are upon the just, and his ears open to their prayers. The youth was executed, and on the thirteenth day, the Teutonic master was struck with sudden death. This happened at Riga in Livonia, in the year 1407, as Albertus Krantzius relates.§

In the year 1052, the Abbot Herveld was unjustly treated and oppressed by Burchard, Bishop of Halberstad. In vain he defended his cause before the tribunals. On his death-bed he sent for Frederic Count Palatine, and desired him to bear this message to the bishop, “that he was dying without redress, having been too weak to gain justice, but that he appealed to God, and that they should both appear before his judgment seat within a few days.” The abbot died, and in the course of a few days, as the bishop was mounting his horse, he was seized with a sudden illness, which left him only time to confess that he was hurried away to answer before the divine tribunal, and there to be judged.|| The abbot of the monastery of St. James at Leodium, being attacked by the governor and condemned by the bishop on account of his refusing to give up a certain young nobleman who wished to remain in the monastery, finding that he could gain no justice on earth, appealed to the heavenly court, and cited his unjust judge to appear there along with him before forty days. On the fortieth day, about the hour of nones, the abbot died. At the same moment the governor was in a bath, and hearing the convent bell toll for the dead, he asked what it meant, and being informed that the abbot of St. James had just died suddenly, he who had never forgotten to keep account of the days from the summons given, was seized with

* Drexelius Tribunal Christi, Lib. II. cap. 3.

† Dante. Hell, XXIV.

‡ Florimundus Redmundus de ortu hæres, c. 20.

§ Lib. XIII. Vandalie, cap. 2.

|| Lambertus Schaffnaburg. Annal. apud. Baron. Tom. II.

terror and astonishment, rising hastily and crying out, "Alas ! I must appear this day before the Supreme Judge !" and hardly had he touched the door when he sunk down, and with a dreadful groan expired.* Otho, the Roman Emperor, being reproved by his son William, the Bishop of Mayence, for his marriage with Adelaide, cast him into prison. The bishop summoned Otho to appear along with him upon the day of Pentecost, before the tribunal of Christ ; on that very day, Otho being in Saxony, was struck with sudden death, and his son had ceased to live a short time before.† Baronius denies the truth of this last account, and Drexelius declines pronouncing between the two cardinals.‡

These recitals are not without moral dignity. "History," says a great French writer, "is pleased with things grave and tragic." But they have led us far from the deaths of the just, to which we must now return. Another circumstance which must have struck us in the preceding narrations relative to their end is, the sudden and gentle manner in which the transition so frequently took place, from a state of perfect health to the long expected termination of the mortal course. So that the deaths of the holy and the unjust were so far often similar. Pelisson died suddenly, as if falling asleep, having the day before received the holy communion, a circumstance of which the Protestants attempted to avail themselves, asserting that he refused or eluded receiving the sacraments of the church.§ A holy priest of the diocese of Rouen, having begun to say mass, and repeating the words "introibo ad altare Dei," suddenly dropped down and expired. Many have departed while announcing the word of God to the people. The Cardinal de Berulle died while saying mass at the moment of pronouncing the words of the canon, "hanc igitur oblationem." Birnstan, Bishop of Winchester, was a man of the most pure sanctity ; every day he used to sing a mass of requiem for the dead, and at night he used fearlessly to walk about alone, repeating the psalms for the salvation of their souls, and of him it is said, that on one occasion, when he had finished the office with the prayer that they might rest in peace, a voice of a great multitude, as if of the dead out of their sepulchres, seemed to respond amen. He used to wash the feet of the poor every day, and give them food, and would then remain alone in prayer. One day being thus employed, without any previous sickness, his spirit departed. His disciples thought him still at his prayers, and suffered a whole day to pass, but on the following morning, very early, they broke in and found him dead. The citizens, because of his sudden death, seemed to have forgotten his memory, not knowing that "non potest male mori qui bene vixerit."* Notwithstanding the inference of the people here, this was a maxim well and generally understood during the middle ages. St. Anselm, or some writer of the same age, whose work has been mistaken for that of the

* Thom. Cantipr. Lib. II. de miraculis sui ævi, cap 35.

† Petrus Damianus, Tom. I Epist. Lib. II. 15. ‡ Tribunal Christi, Lib. II. cap. 3.

§ Hist. de Louis XIV. par De Larrey, an. 1693.

|| Wil. Malmesbur. de Gestis Pontif. Anglor. Lib. II.

Father of the Scholastic Theology, speaks expressly on the question: "Is it an injury to a good man if he be slain or carried off by a sudden death? By no means," is the reply, "For they do not die a sudden death who always remember that they are to die; therefore, whether by the sword or by wild beast, or by flames or waters, or wheels and torture, or by whatever other mode they die, 'Semper pretiosa est in conspectu Domini mors Sanctorum ejus.'"

Is it of any service to the wicked if they lie for a long time on their beds before death? none whatever; for by whatever death they die, they die an evil and a sudden death who die not in the Lord, and who used never to remember that they were to die.* Again, have we not remarked with how little fear these just and most humble men contemplated the approach of death? St. Ambrose said when he was dying, "that he had so lived, that he had no sorrow for having lived, and that he did not fear death, knowing that he was in the hands of a good Master." William of Malmesbury says, "that St. Wlstan was of such simplicity, that he had not the least fear of his agony and death. It was," he says, "simplicitas nescia de Dei diffidere misericordia."† In monasteries, and in them the spirit of the ages of faith is still preserved, there is nothing more striking to a stranger than the tone and looks of the holy religious when they advert to death. When I was lodged in the great monastery of Camaldoli, on the Apennines, one of the aged fathers used always to be carried into the church in a chair. One morning, after a night of dreadful tempest, with thunder and torrents of rain, I was informed by one of the monks, soon after mass, that this Father Francis, whom I had seen that morning as usual in the church, had been attacked with great illness in consequence of the first coming on of the cold of September. "He feels now a little better," said this monk, but, added he, with a smile that cannot be described by words, so full was it of sweet religious hope and constancy, "he is about to set out on his voyage—the voyage, I mean to eternity."

It is in these holy communities that one may listen with delight and astonishment to the thoughts of faith expressed often in the language of the Phædo. "I should wish to convince you," will the monk or friar say to us, "that a man who has spent his life in the study of philosophy ought to take courage at his death, and to be full of hope, that he is about to possess the greatest good that can be obtained, which will be in his possession as soon as he dies. Truly it would be ridiculous if, after teaching such lessons all our lives, the moment when death approached, we should grow angry at the thought of meeting what we formerly praised and made the object of our desire. It would be laughable to see a man who had held, that death was only a deliverance from the chains of the body, who after preparing himself for it during his life, should afterwards, when death did arrive, grow indignant at it. Would it not be supremely ridiculous? Certainly it would."‡ Religion supplied nearly the same words to Montmorency at his death: "Ah, Father," said he to the priest who came to console him, "it would be disgraceful, after knowing how to live during more than eighty years, not to know how to die during a quarter of an hour." Everywhere, indeed, there was deep humility and an exclusive reliance on mercy; but every where also we observe the same confidence, the same sweet exalted hope, enabling persons naturally the most scrupulous, susceptible, weak, and timid, to go down to the grave, having, with Adamantine force of soul, this belief that they would be happy in a life to come. Socrates could only advise men, ἀδαμαντίνως δεῖ δὴ ταύτην τὴν δόξαν ἔχοντα, εἰς ᾧδου ἵέναι.* whereas, in many cases, the humblest minister of religion in the ages of faith, could not only counsel, but also enable them to do so. Continued mention was also made of those sweet impressive and tranquil discourses, which were held by these holy men before death, which would have seemed so admirable to the ancient poets, who were fond of converting to dramatic use the novissima verba; and the almost constancy of this phenomena in members of the city of God, at some period previous to their change, would have led Arætus to abandon his distinction of peculiar maladies in attributing prophetic power to men arrived near the last scene of life.

* S. Anselmi Elucidarii Lib. II. cap. 31.

† De Gestis Pontif. Angl. Lib. IV.

‡ Plato Phædo, 68.

Celebrated with the ancients was the dying chant of the swan, the opinion of which Plato applies in a most splendid passage, to illustrate the happiness of the future world; though naturalists like Ælian, might shock the poetic imagination, by affirming that neither they nor perhaps any one else had ever heard a swan sing.† But to affirm, that the unwonted vivacity of thought and solemnity of feeling of these saintly men when about to leave our world, were like an announcement of their departure with harmonious sounds, and as it were, with sweetest music before they took their flight to heaven, and set out for a happier land, would expose no one to the danger of contradiction, or of being supposed subject to the delusions of their fancy. Socrates discoursing a short time before his death, remarked to his friends, "how proper it was for a person who was about to leave the world to investigate and to mythologize concerning that passage, as to what we can suppose it to be."‡ In the ages of faith indeed we do not find dying men engaged in any inquiry or investigation respecting the nature or consequences of death; but like St. Cuthbert dying, they spoke a few but strong words concerning peace and humility. They conversed on the necessity of death for all men, and on the certain truths respecting the future state to which it would introduce them; they spoke with hope of their passing to God and to the company of his saints, with whom it was far better to be than with imperfect men on earth, and these last accents of the mourning dove, must have impressed every one with the conviction that they would soon be comforted amidst the ineffable and eternal joys of the heavenly Jerusalem. When St. Sturm was dying, the monks begged that when he was with God he would pray for them: he replied, "Prove yourselves worthy, and be so conducted in your lives that I may justly pray for you, and then I would do what you desire." The examples which we gave of dying scenes from the histories of the ages of faith might be multiplied without end, and we should find them all characterized by the same astonishing mixture of quiet and sublimity. To conceive them fully, no doubt one ought to have been present; but even after reading the description which is given of them in the simple unstudied language of the middle ages, is it possible to avoid feeling the deepest emotion?

* Plato de Repub. Lib. X.

† Ælian. Var. Hist. I. 14.

‡ Plato Phædo, 61.

Methinks that every one who has attended to them will fancy that he hears a revelation of his own feelings in the account which the friend of Socrates gives of himself, after witnessing that sage's death: "Indeed I experienced impressions that were astonishing while present there; for I felt no compassion on being about to behold the death of a man who was dear to me; for O Echeocrates, that man seemed to me to be happy, as I judged from his manner and from his words, so sweetly and so generously did he die; and I felt assured that he did not depart to Hades without a divine destiny, but that arriving there, he would be happy, if ever any one at any time enjoyed happiness. On that account, therefore, I felt no compassion, such as might have been called for from persons who were present at grief; nor, on the other hand, did I feel that pleasure which we were accustomed to experience during our conversation on philosophy, though we then conversed as usual; but without premeditation or art, I suffered a kind of strange impression, and unusual mixture composed both of pleasure and pain, when I reflected that he was to die almost immediately; and all of us who were present experienced nearly the same feelings: at one time weeping, and at another laughing, and one of us, Apollodorus, did nothing but smile."* Now let the moderns be pleased to take note, that this passage, for which it would be difficult to find a parallel in the sublimest monuments of antiquity, would pass, if it were not for the occasional expression of doubt, almost unnoticed in those thousand chronicles which were composed by monks during, what they term, the dark and barbarous ages.

With respect to the last consolation which religion afforded to the dying, of which mention is so expressly made in the preceding examples, it is not necessary to enter into any detail. Every one knows that the Church has always desired, as St. Augustin says, alluding to the sacrament of reconciliation, "that none of her children should depart from this life without the pledge of her peace!"† Extreme unction, or, as it was called in the middle ages, sacred unction, for the former term it is not found in any author before the twelfth century,‡ was received, as we have seen, generally in the Church, for it was administered to persons who still had sufficient strength to receive it kneeling. The popular custom of wishing to defer it to the last moments arose from a superstition originating in

* Plato Phædo.

† Lib. I. de Adult. Conjug. cap. xxviii.

‡ Mabillon de Stud. Monast. Paris II. c. xiii.

England, and thence spreading into France, which made the people suppose that, after having received it, it was not lawful, in the event of the recovery, to walk, excepting barefoot, or to make use of marriage. Several provincial councils were obliged to denounce this superstition, as tending to deprive the faithful of the remedy provided for them by the Church. This sacramental rite had always been administered uninterruptedly, both in the Latin and Greek churches, from the time of the Apostles. Though it is not expressly treated of by many of the early fathers, because it was never attacked by heretics, it is, however, mentioned by Origen, St. John Chrysostom, St. Innocent I., St. Cæsarius of Arles, St. Gregory the Great, and by Venerable Bede, who affirms it to be practised by the Church in conformity to apostolic usage. In the middle ages it was the custom for many priests to be present at the administration of this sacrament ; but, after the thirteenth century, in the Latin Church, this usage gave place to the present discipline, though the faithful were still recommended to invite for this purpose as many ecclesiastics as could conveniently attend. In connection with the assistance afforded to the dying, we should particularly remark the sincerity and courage with which, whatever might be the circumstances of their condition, they were always warned of their danger. Behold Louis XI. fortified, walled in, engaged, as it were, in his castle of Plessis. Neither his son nor those charged with his domestic service could penetrate to him. One could only enter his chamber by means of a staircase, cut in the centre of a thick wall ; yet there did the Church supply him with a voice of severe and frank warning. His death was announced to him as abruptly, as plainly, as if he had been a poor peasant—"Sire, pensez à votre conscience ; il est fait de vous ; il n'y a nul remède." When the martial King, Edward the Third, was lying on his bed at the point of death, forsaken, and even plundered by his former favorites, one of whom took the ring from his finger, amongst so many there was only present at that time a certain priest, other of his servants, applying the spoil of what they could lay hands on, who, lamenting the king's misery, and inwardly touched with grief of heart, that among so many counsellors there was none that would minister unto him the word of life, came boldly unto him, and admonished him to lift up the eyes, as well of his body as of his heart, unto God, and with sighs, to ask mercy of him whose majesty he well knew he had grievously offended. Whereupon the king listened to the words of the priest ; and, although a little before he had wanted the use of his tongue, yet then, taking strength, he seemed to speak what was in his mind ; and then, what for weakness of his body, contrition of his heart, and sobbing for his sins, his voice and speech failed him, and scarce half pronouncing the word Jesu, he gave up the ghost at his manor of Sheene. Meschinot, who always lived with princes, being personally attached to the dukes of Brittany, takes care to remind them of death in bold and simple language—

"Princes, vous n'êtes d'autre alloi
Que le pauvre peuple commun.

Faites-vous sujets à la loi,
Car certes vous mourrez comme un
Des plus petits."*

From admonitions of the same frankness, the highest ecclesiastical dignitaries were not exempt, as the following instance will show. John de la Moote, the thirty-first abbot of St. Albans, in the reign of King Richard II., being at Tytenhangre, was suddenly attacked with a fatal pleurisy after mass on All-Saints. The monks of the abbey hastened to his assistance. William Wynteshal, his confessor, arrived there at three in the morning, and addressed him in these words : "The physicians have certain signs of your approaching death, and that you will soon be deprived both of reason and memory ; therefore, I require you to attend to the salvation of your soul while any vigor remains ; then and next, make restitution if you have defrauded any body ; and lastly, signify your will and pleasure in matters depending between you and our brethren." These instances are worthy of remark, if it were only to show the contrast between the spirit of the middle ages and of our own time. One of the most admired philosophical writers of the day, showing that politeness depends upon the philosophy of mind, observes, that the benevolent poor, who tend the sick with such assiduity, have yet little foresight of the mere pains of thought ; and, while in the same situation, the rich and better educated, with equal, or perhaps even with less benevolence of intention, carefully avoid the introduction of any subject which might suggest, indirectly to the sufferer, the melancholy images of parting life, the conversation of the poor, around the bed of their sick friend, is such as can scarcely fail to present to him every moment, not the probability merely, but almost the certainty of approaching death. "It is impossible," he continues, "to be present in these two situations without remarking the benefit of a little knowledge of the human mind, without which, far from fulfilling its real wishes, benevolence itself may be the most cruel of torturers."† I do not propose that this curious passage should be viewed in connection with those sentences of the Phædo, which have been noticed during the course of the present chapter, for a comparison between the modern and ancient philosophy belongs not to our subject ; but it is impossible, after hearing the sentiments of men in the ages of faith respecting death, and after witnessing their last moments, not to be struck with amaze at the change which must have taken place in the general disposition of men's minds before a book containing such a passage as that which I have now quoted could have been deemed, by consent of the learned, worthy of a distinguished place among the works of philosophy.

But to return from this digression. It is well known what care was taken that every Christian, sick or dying, at peace with God, should have the consolation and support of receiving the food of angels, the adorable body of Jesus Christ. In the darkest and most tempestuous nights, amidst forests and marshy wastes, the sound of a bell, and the light of a lantern, would announce the passage of a priest with his clerk,* repairing to the hermit's cell, or to the woodman's hut; and then the poor shepherds would hasten to adore their Saviour, and even the robber from the wood would follow at a distance, drawn and fascinated, as it were, by the mysterious attraction of that faith which he had practically renounced, without ever having been entirely able to expel it from his heart. The zeal and charity with which the dying were assisted during the middle ages tended not a little to impress a new character upon scenes of death. It is recorded of St. Osmond, Bishop of Salisbury, in the eleventh century, that he used to assist criminals at their execution, and would accompany them himself to the scaffold. The Church, in some places, had to remonstrate with the civil power, and in council, at Lambeth, at London, and at Vienne, formally to condemn the barbarous enactments which attempted to deprive criminals doomed to death, of the sacrament of penance. Many kings, however, confirmed her decisions by humane laws, as Ethelred, Edward, and Canute, in England, and Charles VI. of France. Many confraternities were established in which even the laity devoted themselves to the pious office of comforting the sick. Spenser, describing a holy hospital, alludes to such persons—

* Gouget Bibliotheq. Français, Tom, IX. 412.

† Lectures on the Philosophy of the Human Mind, Vol. I. p. 68.

“Another had charge sick persons to attend,
And comfort those in point of death which lay;
For them most needed comfort in the end,
When sin and hell, and death doe most dismay
The feeble soule, departing hence away.
All is but lost that living we bestow,
If not well ended at our dying day.”

Poor people, with their dying words, would desire that their chamber, and the way by which the adorable sacrament was to pass, the way before Jesus, the King of Glory, the God of men and of angels, the God of heaven and earth, the God of time and of eternity, should be strewn with flowers; and to honor the approach of the same mighty Lord, the apartments of the rich would be adorned with whatever in their possession was the most beautiful and precious. To tender and passionate souls, this hour, when he came to give himself to them, as their viaticum, was the hour long desired and ardently expected—it was the hour of love and of seraphic ecstasy. Nothing then remained but to press the image of Jesus to the bosom, and to wait in silence for the change. This last scene of the solemn act was closed by the Church's holy prayers, which winged the faint soul to mount to heaven, bidding it go forth from this world in the name of God the Father Almighty who created it, in the name of Jesus Christ the Son of the living God, who suffered for it, in the name of the Holy Spirit, which had been imparted to it; in the name of angels and archangels, in the name of thrones and dominations, in the name of principalities and powers, in the name of cheruhim and seraphim, in the name of patriarchs and prophets, in the name of holy apostles and evangelists, in the name of holy martyrs and confessors, in the name of holy monks and hermits, in the name of holy virgins and all the saints of God, that its rest that day might be in peace, and its habitation in holy Sion.

* Statut. Synod. of Troyes de Sacramentis, 8.

This assistance at death was connected also with many remarkable narratives, which, I believe, would have excited the envy of Cicero, if he could have heard them after composing his Tusculan disputations ; for who can doubt but that he would have rejoiced to have been able to adorn his page with such an account as that relating to the bishop in Scotland, who, when travelling alone on horseback among the Highlands, was forced, by a sudden and violent snow-storm, to seek shelter in a poor cottage by the way-side, where he was told that the father of the family was lying in an inner room dangerously ill. Ever attentive to the object of his holy mission, the good bishop desired to see him ; and, on being admitted, proceeded to admonish the poor man of his danger ; but he replied, that he felt assured of his recovery. As the bishop, however, persisted in showing him the groundlessness of his confidence, and in exhorting him to prepare for death, he confessed the secret cause which made him feel so secure, saying that he was a Catholic, and that during the last thirty years of his life, ever since he had first come into that desolate region, he had prayed to God not to take him from the world without enabling him to receive the last sacraments of holy Church. Pierced to the heart with reverential awe, the saintly bishop told him, that he who stood over him was a priest and a bishop, that he had with him the holy oils and the precious body of our Lord. "Then God has heard my prayer," cried the dying man, "and now may he let his servant depart in peace." The bishop administered to him the holy and adorable mysteries of the Church, and before he withdrew the soul was gone to behold its Judge. Equally interesting is the account given of a priest who was hastening on his errand of blessed charity, one dark and stormy night, through some of the most obscure lanes in London, to bear assistance to some poor dying person in that neighborhood. As he passed, suddenly the ground gave from under his feet, and he was precipitated through one of those cellar entrances which in some quarters of the capital are so frequently to be found adjacent to the wall. Recovering from the first shock, a deep moan, proceeding as if from the farthest end of this sombre vault, engaged all his attention. "In God's name who are you, and where am I fallen ?" asked the priest. "I know you," replied a feeble voice ; "you are a priest of the holy Church, come to console me at my death." A child now came up to him, whom the priest, with entreaties and charges of authority, prevailed upon to ascend into the street, in order to procure a light. But the narrative is soon concluded : this poor dying person received from the priest's hands the last consolations of religion, and then expired in his arms.

We have seen the consolations administered to the dying, but what was the condition of the surviving friends after the departure of him whom they loved, and what was the character of their mourning? Let the answer be sought in the writings of the ages of faith. In the first place, they were desired to make use of the assistance of reason and natural wisdom, as far as it was in the order of Providence that it should console them. To this St. Basil appeals in writing to the widow of Arintheus, saying, "He was a man, and he is dead, like Adam, like Able, like Noah, like Abraham, like Moses, like all that has ever been great among men." It is the same spirit which dictates that striking reply in Shakespeare, on hearing that the Lady Macbeth is dead—

"She should have died hereafter.

There would have been a time for such a word."

but to these considerations of natural wisdom were added the supernatural consolations of faith, which reminded men not only of the necessity, but of the happiness of dying. "How many times," says St. Cyprian, "my dearest brethren, hath God deigned to charge me openly,—me, humble and weak creature, to announce to you in my sermons, that we ought not to weep for those of our brethren whom the Lord has delivered from the world, since we know well that they are not lost, but only sent before us; and that, in their departing, they only precede us like travellers, and those who make voyages on the sea; that we ought to regret them, but not to lament them with cries; that we ought not to clothe ourselves with garments of mourning, when they have assumed in heaven the bright white robe; that we ought not to give the Gentiles an occasion to reproach us for weeping on account of those who we say live with God, as if they were for ever plunged in the abyss of annihilation. We betray our hope and our faith."*

Hear again how St. Basil writes to a mourning father:—"As the Lord hath established us to be, as it were, a second father to all Christians, we have regarded, as personal to ourselves, the affliction which you have experienced in the death of your blessed son. Upon hearing the deplorable details, we were at first moved, after the manner of men; but upon recollection, and as soon as we had considered this event with the eyes of faith, we asked pardon of God for having suffered our soul to be carried away by the force of passions; and we encouraged ourselves to endure what the ancient sentence of our God hath made the destiny of all mankind. If the life of this young man has not been of long duration here below, every one who reflects for a moment must conclude that this has been one of the greatest favors of heaven towards him. A longer abode upon earth is only a longer subjection to all kinds of evils. He has not known crime; he has never injured his neighbor; he has never been drawn on by unhappy circumstances to mix in the society of the wicked; he has lived exempt from lying, from ingratitude, from avarice, from voluptuous passions, from the vices of the flesh, and from the many other miserable productions of human depravity. His pure and spotless soul has retired from the world to rise to a happier region."

* On the Necessity of Dying.

Such is the language of consolation that we find invariably addressed to mourners during the middle ages, and such the sentiments which they themselves expressed, as being their support and encouragement. "Length of time," says Egburg, in a letter to the holy Abbot Winfred, respecting the death of his brother—"length of time will turn my present sorrow into gladness, for it is written, 'Amor hominis adducit dolorem: amor autem Christi illuminat cor.'"* Faithful in respect to historical similitude is the description which Tasso gives of the mourning of the Crusaders on the death of Dudon—

"His wailing friends adorn'd the mournful bier
With woeful pomp, whereon his corpse they laid:
And when they saw the Bulloigne prince draw near,
All felt new grief, and each new sorrow made;
But he, withouten show or change of cheer,
His springing tears within their fountains staid;
His rueful looks upon the corse he cast,
Awhile, and thus bespake the same at last:
We need not mourn for thee, here laid to rest,
Earth is thy bed, and not thy grave; the skies
Are for thy soul, the cradle and the nest,
There live, for here thy glory never dies;
For like a Christian knight and champion blest,
Thou did'st both live and die."†

But let us now turn to the immediate scene of mourning, to cast one look upon the sheeted dead, and to inquire what duties remain to be accomplished with regard to the departed soul. Durandus says, "That, at the moment of death, the bell was tolled thrice to denote the absolution which had been given to the penitent for the three modes of sin, by thought, word, and work;‡ and that for a clerk, the bells were tolled as many times as denoted the number of his orders."§ It appears that in the time of St. Sturm, Abbot of Fulda, it was the custom to toll the bells for persons in their agony; for this holy man, at the point of death, ordered the brethren to run to the church, "et omnes gloggas pariter moveri imperavit," and desired that the assembled brethren might be entreated to pray for him. In England, however, the bell was tolled after death had taken place; for, as we have seen, Bede, after relating the death of St. Hilda, says, that Begu, a nun of another convent, heard the usual sound of the bell which used to summon them to prayer, "Cum quis de hoc sæculo fuisset evocatus." At Rheims, the lugubrious tolling of bells, doleful from the jarring of sounds on the death of men, used to be called l'Abbé mort, as if the agony of a dying person, l'Abboy

* S. Bonifac. Mark. et Archiep. Epist. CI.

† Book III. c. 7.

‡ Durandi Rationale, Lib. VII. c. 35.

§ Id. Lib. I. c. 4.

de la mort, which shows that originally it was also tolled in the last moments of men.*

With respect to the concluding labors employed in the concerns of the body, the excessive anxiety and pains of the ancients on these occasions, were no longer required. With them, to wash and anoint the dead body was the only privilege they could bestow upon the dead.† When Agamemnon is slain, the chorus has only to ask—

τίς ὁ θάψων νιν; τίς ὁ ὀρηγνήσων; ‡

which would have been one of the last inquiries that in Christian ages would have been suggested by the death of a friend. Priam required ten days to prepare for the funeral of Hector;§ and to describe all that was done on that occasion, would require the unwearied tongue of a Homer himself. But in the middle ages, the ceremonial connected with the body, which followed death, was greatly simplified and curtailed. No one in his last moments was lead to fear, by the question of a Crito, that his faith was vain; and that he had but lost his time in laboring, with a view to the soul's immortality. St. Paul, the hermit, speaks to St. Anthony of his own burial in this style:—"Since the hour of my sleep is arrived, our Lord has sent you to cover this poor body with earth, or rather to commit earth to earth." So little importance seemed to be attached to the burial even of mighty kings, that strange scenes were sometimes presented, which might have been obviated if there had been greater previous solicitude, or an opinion more generally entertained of the importance of such rites. The salt carriers, who had the privilege of carrying the bodies of the kings of France to the grave, when conveying that of Charles VI. to St. Denis, laid it down in the middle of the way, demanding who was to pay them? Nothing is more common in the chronicles of the middle ages than to find mention of the express charge given by dying men, and even by great princes, like Philip, Count of Nemours, not only that no extraordinary pains or expense should be employed in their funerals, but even that their bodies should be committed to the ground with marks of indifference or ignominy. "All these things," says St. Augustin, "the care of a funeral, the kind of sepulture, the pomp of obsequies, are rather comforts for the living than helps for the dead. Many bodies of Christians are scattered naked on the earth; but Truth itself assures us, that men can do nothing further after they have killed the body. A crowd of servants swelled the magnificent convoy of Dives, whose obsequies seemed so splendid in the eyes of men, but much more beautiful in the sight of God was the ministry of angels which bore that poor Lazarus, not into a marble tomb, but into the bosom of Abraham."||

"Certain visions are related," says St. Augustin, "which seem to militate against this opinion; for the dead are said to have sometimes appeared to the

* Mabillon Præfat. in III. Sæcul. Benedict. § vii. † Hom. Od. ‡ Æschyl. Agam. 1546.

§ Id. XXIV. 665.

|| De Civitate Dei, Lib. I. 12. De Cura pro Mortuis.

living, who knew not where their bodies lay, and to have revealed the spot, in order that they might obtain burial. Were we to answer that these are falsehoods, we should seem to rise insolently against the writings of some of the faithful, and against the sense of those who affirm that such things have happened to themselves ; but we may reply, that the living also, without being conscious of it, appear often in dreams to the living ; and, therefore, these visions of the dead cannot prove that the departed soul has really returned to instruct them. Such things, perhaps, may be done by angelic operation, without the knowledge of those whose bodies are unburied, by divine command, in order to console the living, or by these admonitions to recommend the humanity of sepulture to the human race, the neglect of which cannot injure the dead, but would argue impiety in the living. Why should we not credit these angelic operations by the dispensations of the providence of God, exerted towards the good and the evil, according to the unsearchable depth of his judgment, whether the minds of mortals are thence instructed or deceived, consoled or terrified, according as mercy or punishment is due to each from Him whose mercy and judgment are not vainly commemorated by the Church ?”* While, therefore, it was believed, that this was a matter which did not interest the dead, there was no disposition in the Church to approve of any thing inhuman or extravagant with respect to the burial of the body. The Parthians used to give their dead to be devoured by birds and beasts. The rigid and inhuman sect of the stoics was indifferent, whether the body were to rot below or above ground. It was men like Lucretius and Lucian, who thought that nothing would remain after death, who chiefly ridiculed the care of the dead.

During the ages of faith, there was, in the minds of men, a deep and profound tenderness, an amiable and loving susceptibility, which admitted of nothing harsh or repulsive to the intimate feelings of our poor humanity. “Mary Magdalen,” says St. John of the Cross, “deserved to be the first to behold Jesus Christ after his resurrection, because she remained the last by his sepulchre.” “The bodies of the faithful,” says St. Augustin, “are not to be despised and cast out, since they were the organs and vessels used by the Holy Spirit. Dear and venerable is a paternal vest or ring ; and in like manner should we honor the body which was more joined and familiar to us than any garment which we wear, which served not as an external ornament or assistance, but which belonged to the very nature of man. Our Lord commended the woman who had prepared ointments for his burial ; and in the gospel, he is commemorated with praise who diligently and reverently gave him sepulture.”† For the same reason were they blessed by King David who buried the dry bones of Saul and Jonathan, because no one ever hated his own flesh, and what they wished to be done to themselves when deprived of sense, they did to others who were in that condition.‡

The primitive Christians kept their dead exposed during three days, clothed in

* De Cura pro Mortuis.

† De Civit. Dei, Lib. I. 13.

‡ De Cura pro Mortuis.

precious habits, and watched over them in prayer during the time. Then they carried them to the tomb, bearing lighted tapers, and singing hymns expressive of their hope of the resurrection. They buried with them either the ensignia of their dignity or the instruments of their martyrdom, or phials full of their blood, or the acts of their martyrdom, or crosses, or the book of the Gospel. The body was placed with the face regarding the East.*

St. Anthony, though alone in the desert, having brought out from the cell the dead body of St. Paul the Hermit, sung the hymns and psalms, according, as St. Jerome says, to the Christian tradition.† St. Jerome mentions the lights that were borne at the funeral of St. Paula, and notice of them occurs also in the account of that of St. Cyprien.‡

The form of monastic burial corresponded with the simplicity of the religious life. We read in the history of the church of Durham, that when any monk was dead there, he was dressed in his cowl and habit, and boots were put on his legs, and immediately he was carried to a chamber called the dead man's chamber, where he remained till night. At night he was removed thence into St. Andrew's Chapel adjoining to the same chamber, and there the body remained till eight o'clock in the morning. The night before the funeral, two monks, either in kindred or kindness the nearest to him, were appointed by the prior to be especial mourners, sitting all night on their knees at the dead man's feet. Then were the children of the Ambrie sitting on their knees in stalls on either side of the corpse, appointed to read David's Psalter all night over incessantly, till eight in the morning, when the body was conveyed to the chapterhouse, where the prior and the whole convent met it, and there did say their dirge and devotion; and then the dead corpse was carried by the monks into the centry-garth, where it was buried, and there was but one peal rung for him.§

Yet the renown of sanctity and the devotion of the people, often rendered the burial of the religious, scenes of astonishing interest. Neither the pomp of the funeral of kings nor the triumphs of the ancient conquerors, were more solemn than the convoy of the body of the humble St. Martin to the Monastery of Mar-montiers on the Loire, in the year 397. There were more than two thousand monks present who had been his disciples, besides a distinct choir of virgins and an innumerable multitude of devout people.

The body of the blessed St. Francis is placed in a vault under the Marble Chapel in the great Church of Assissi. It stands in an upright posture; but the vault having been shut up by Gregory IX., no one can enter to behold it. A small opening, however, is left, through which a person may look by the light of a lamp burning in it. In the convent of the poor Clares of Assissi, in a vault under the high altar, lies the body of St. Clare, with a lamp burning before the opening into it. This was an ancient custom, as may be collected from the mode of Episcopal burial in the thirteenth century, according to the description of the tomb of a bishop of Angers. "He was buried in the mitre in which he had been consecrated, his crosier was by his side, and on his breast was placed the chalice, and a lead paten, containing wine and bread, and in this instance, behind his head there was a kind of channel in which was a lamp lighted with oil, so that when the sarcophagus was closed, the light of that burning lamp shone within upon the body through an opening.*

* Benedict. XIV. de Canonizatione Servorum Dei, Lib. I.

† S. Hieronymi Vita S. Pauli Eremitæ. ‡ Joan. Devoti Institut. Canon. Lib. II. lit. vii § 1.

§ The Ancient Rites and Monuments of the Monastical and Cathedral Church of Durham, p. 89.

Camden and Weever relate that, at the suppression and demolition of the abbeys in York, burning lamps were found in many tombs, the flame of which it was said could not be extinguished by wind or water.

This practice seems to have greatly struck the poetic imagination of the Minstrel, who has so grandly described the midnight opening of the grave of Michael Scott in Melrose Abbey.—

"Lo, warrior! now the cross of red
Points to the grave of the mighty dead;
Within it burns a wondrous light,
To chase the spirits that love the night."

These are the monk's words to Sir William of Delorain. And when the gravestone had been raised, we read of the lamp within the tomb, that

"No earthly flame blaz'd e'er so bright
It shone like Heaven's own blessed light,
Show'd the monk's cowl, and visage pale,
Danced on the dark-brow'd warrior's mail,
And kiss'd his waving plume."

What follows is truly beautiful and solemn:—

"Before their eyes the wizard lay,
As if he had not been dead a day.
His hoary beard in silver roll'd,
He seem'd some seventy winters old;
A palmer's amice wrapp'd him round,
With a wrought Spanish baldric bound,
Like a pilgrim from beyond the sea,
His left hand held his book of might;
A silver cross was in his right;
The lamp was placed beside his knee:
High and majestic was his look,
At which the fellest fiends had shook;
And all unruffled was his face:
They trusted his soul had gotten grace.
And the priest pray'd fervently and loud:

* Guillelmi Majoris Episcopi Andegav. Gesta apud Dach. Spicileg. Tom. X.

With eyes averted prayed he ;
 He might not endure the sight to see,
 Of the man he had lov'd so brotherly."

In the grave of Charles of Trier, grand master of the Teutonic knights, were deposited, by his express orders, the life and prophecies of St. Brigitte. This was that just and great man, whose bitterest enemies could never charge him with a single fault.* The extraordinary respect shown to many bishops at their death, forms a remarkable feature in history. St. Hugh, of Lincoln, the Burgundian, was carried to his grave at Lincoln by three kings. When St. Medard, Bishop of Noyon, died, the king, Clotaire, was present, and he assisted afterwards in person to carry the body to Soissons. And, as Don Savedra remarks, the dead body of that brave prelate, Gilles d'Albornos, passed from Rome to Toledo on the shoulders of the nations, as well friends as enemies.†

We may learn the form of collegiate burial from the account which is given of the customs that used to be observed in the English College at Douai. "At the burial of any of our members, the whole community attended in a very solemn procession from the College Church to that of the parish, where high mass was sung. The corpse was carried by the schoolfellows and companions of the deceased; a priest was borne on the shoulders of his fellow priests; and a dozen or twenty scholars surrounded the bier with lighted flambeaux. At the head of the procession went the priest, deacon, and subdeacon, vested for mass, with acolyths, thurifers, and our own choir, in surplices. The students followed, two and two, in the order of the classes, wearing cassocks."

The Roman ritual prescribes, that at the funeral of young persons, the bells should not be tolled in a lugubrious manner, but that they should rather be rung, so as to produce a festive sound.‡ This holy pomp of burial did not depend upon the rank of the deceased. In every country, during the middle ages, as in Spain or Portugal at the present day, the funerals of a poor tradesman or mechanic were, in their external form and appearance, often more splendid than those of potent peers or wealthy gentlemen. Though many of them could not even afford a coffin, yet their biers would be surrounded by a blaze of light streaming from hundreds of wax torches, each as thick as a man's arm—for all working men, as we have formerly shown, had enrolled themselves in a fraternity, and the expense on these occasions was always borne by the whole society.§ In the case of poor persons who had no such assistance, the Roman ritual requires that the priests of the parish should furnish tapers at their own expense, that so venerable a rite may never be omitted through any unworthy regard to economy.||

The work of corporal mercy, which consisted in burying the dead, used to be

* Voigt. Geschichte Preussens, IV. 381.

† Christian Prince, II.559.

‡ De Exequiis Parvulorum.

§ Letters to Osorius.

|| De Exequiis.

performed, as in Italy at the present day, by noblemen and persons of the highest condition, who, through devotion, used to form confraternities for that purpose. Spenser describes this custom—

“Others had charge of them now being dead,
In seemely sort their corses to engrave,
And deck with dainty flowers their brydall bed,
That to their heavenly spouse both sweet and brave
They might appeare, when he their soules shall save,
The wondrous workmanship of God’s own mould,
Whose face he made all beastes to fear, and gave
All in his hand, even dead we honor should.”*

With respect to the funerals of great nobles and kings, in the middle ages, if there was often a more magnificent pageant attending them, the pomp was still always ecclesiastic, and almost monastical, never secular or military. The Burning Chapel, so called from the quantity of lights which were placed round the body previous to interment ; the ceremonial of sprinkling it with holy water ; the vigils and prayers ; the attendance of the clergy of all orders, both regular and secular ; corresponded with the character of men, so many of whom expired on sackcloth and ashes.

“King Charles V. of France,” says Christine de Pisan, “was wondrously afflicted on the death of his queen ; and although the virtue of constancy was greater in him than in most men, this departure caused him such grief, that never before or after did any event produce the same effect in him ; for much they loved each other with great love. The king, who loved the body, thought of the soul by devout prayers, masses, vigils, and psalters, and great alms. The body was carried solemnly, according to the usage of kings and queens,—clothed, adorned, and crowned,—on a rich bed of cloth of gold, surmounted with a canopy ; and thus it was conveyed in great procession to the Church of our Lady. Four hundred torches, each of six pounds of wax, burned there. Monks of all orders went before the body, and our princes walked after it, clothed in black.”†

These sad pageants on the death of kings, were not without a high moral dignity, and a most salutary effect upon the minds of men. Poets discerned this, as when Martial d’Auvergne, in his Vigils, relates the death of Charles VII. ; and, after describing the pomp of the funeral and the grief of all France, concludes thus :

“Ainsi le regard de ce monde
Après quo on a eué grand liesse
Tousjours ne pleurs et deuil redonde,
Et la joye finit en tristesse.”‡

Weever, in the discourse prefixed to his great work, laments, in bitter terms, on grounds of social policy, the error and practice introduced after “the Reformation,”

* Faery Queen, I. 10:

† Chap. L.

‡ Les Vigiles de la Mort du Roy Charles VII.

which caused all the ceremonial rites of obsequies to be laid aside as a fruitless vanity; and he makes this remark, "that although the manner of burial and the pomp of obsequies be rather comforts to the living than helps to the dead: and although all these ceremonies be despised by our parents on their death-beds, yet should they not be neglected by us their children or nearest of kindred, upon their interments."

As when the soul was departing, so also when the body was descending into the grave, the prayers of the Church employed the thoughts of the assistants. Unknown to the middle ages was that custom of the Athenians which has been revived in modern times by the infidels of France, of choosing some distinguished man of the city to pronounce a panegyric over the dead at their burial, ἐπαῖνον τὸν πρέποντα, as Thucydides styles it.* But instead of this vain parade of rhetoric,—

"The mass was sung, and prayers were said,
And solemn requiem for the dead;
And bells toll'd out their mighty peal
For the departed spirit's weal."

The first Christians made a wail for their dead, as at the funeral of St. Stephen, of whom we read, "Fecerunt planctum magnum super eum."† Yet it became the custom, in a very early age of the Church, to suppress all public lamentations. St. Jerome testifies that at funerals it was usual to sing allelujah. In later times, however, it was found necessary to provide against a return to the ancient practice of the heathen mourners,—so prone are men at all times to succumb from the supernatural elevation of faith. The Pagan excessive wail for the dead was strictly forbidden by the canons, as may be seen in Burchard. "Nothing (say they) should be sung but psalms and prayers for the soul, and kyrie eleison." Among the interrogations on the visitation of a bishop in the tenth century, we read, "Whether any one has sung over a dead man in the night diabolic songs, or drank or eat, or seemed to rejoice at his death, or if dead bodies were kept with nocturnal vigils in any other place besides the church?" By a synod in that century, the clergy are commanded to forbid such customs, and all laughter over the dead. "Laics (say the canons), who observe funeral vigils, should do it with fear and trembling and reverence. No one there should presume to sing diabolic songs, or to dance, or make jests, which the Pagans learned to practise from the devil. For who does not perceive that it is diabolic, not only alien from the Christian religion, but even contrary to human nature, there to sing, rejoice, get drunk, and be dissolved in laughter, laying aside all piety and affection of charity, as if rejoicing at a brother's death, where grief and lamentation with weeping ought to resound for the loss of a dear brother. Therefore, such insane joy and pestiferous singing must be altogether prohibited on the authority of God. But

* Lib. II. 34.

† Acts viii. 2.

if any one desires to sing, let him sing kyrie eleison, otherwise let him keep silence."

When the moderns take notice of any particular abuse connected with religion existing in society at present they confidently ascribe it to the spirit of the middle ages. But with a very little knowledge of history it is easy to discern the error of such an opinion. Religion, during the middle ages, was engaged in an incessant struggle to abolish the corruptions which had existed before its arrival: and perhaps there is evidence to prove, that even in the tenth century there was a more delicate sense of what was, or was not, in unison with the spirit of Christianity and the mysteries of faith, and in consequence of the greater power of the Church to correct evils, a much more correct and effective discipline than can be found at present.

Reader! more lines I will not waste in setting forth the form of funeral rites—for other subjects so thicken upon us, that on this I cannot longer dwell. We have seen the dead man committed to the earth, with the ceremonies which were attached to his office and condition. "No more his bed he leaves ere the last angel-trumpet blow." We may conclude in the style of Homer—Thus did they bury the hero and the saint.

CHAPTER VIII.

RETURNING now from the sad spectacle of the natural side of death, let us see what the history of the middle ages records respecting the comfort which was reserved for these mourners in the great mysteries of our holy religion.

We have seen the character which death assumed during the ages of faith, attending the sufferer from sickness to the grave, where, on mere natural grounds, it would have been reasonable to suppose that all offices respecting him were terminated, and all the duties of the survivors fulfilled, whose lips his name, however once cherished and familiar, was never again to pass. Thus it was in the ancient world amidst the darkness and gloom of the night of heathenism, when, as Pliny says, "men loved, or rather pretended to love, only the living, and did not even pretend to love any but those who were prosperous: for both the wretched and the dead were alike forgotten."* A man of extraordinary genius and renown like Cicero, indeed, might vainly flatter himself with the thought of the fame which awaited him, and say, in allusion to his death, "Longum illud tempus quum non ero, magis me movet, quam hoc exiguum." But this boast only rendered him obnoxious to the reproof which the same philosopher had passed upon others, saying, "Quoniam hæc plausibilia non sunt, ut in sinu gaudeant, gloriosè loqui desinant."* This was, in truth, a delusion too palpable to impart consolation to any heart. The fact was no less stubborn because sung in immortal verse by poets, that when any one died, all the benevolence of men, as Stesichorus said, perished.

* Epist. Lib. IX. 9.

ἡ ανόνητος ανδρὸς παῖς ὅλλυται ανθρωπῶπων χάρις.

"Time will abate thy grief," says Alcestis, about to die, to her husband; "the dead are nothing;" or, as the later poet expressed it,

"When we die, we are only ashes and a shade."†

But were not those who still continued to divide time by calends in possession of some comfort after the death of friends? Yes, as the son of Nestor says, "This was the privilege of mourning mortals, to cut off the hair and to stain the cheek with tears."‡

To persons at all conversant with Christian history, one need scarcely observe that the idea of death, in the mind of those who were its witnesses, had undergone a change no less complete than that which affected the sentiments of those who experienced it themselves. The moderns, indeed, seduced by the ravings of an ignorant fanaticism, and originally encouraged to attend to them by the artful policy of flagitious potentates, who thirsted for the plunder of property that had been consecrated to sacred purposes, were so unhappy as to renounce the faith of the holy Catholic church, in respect to the assistance of the dead and the consolation of those who mourned for them. To avaricious and insensible hearts it was a delightful prospect which opened, when it was announced that paternal inheritances were no longer to bring with them the incumbrance of solemn rites, "est sine sacris hæreditas."

In recording the work of destruction which followed the adoption of the new opinions, the Protestant historians supply abundant evidence of the pious solicitude with which men in ages of faith had provided for the relief of those who had risen from flesh to spirit, and for the consolation and advantage of their posterity. The mouldering ruins of those [chantries and holy chapels which give such an interest to our woods and mountains, still attest it, and the solemn language of the statutes preserved in such institutions as were suffered to remain under an altered form, still supplies an exercise for the ingenious facility with which, according to the new moral philosophy, men can escape from the obligation of accomplishing their vow.

*Tuscul. III. 51.

† Hor. Carm. I. 7.

‡ Od. IV.

From the birth of Christianity prayer for the dead was observed as a divine tradition and a deposit of faith. Miles, the Protestant Oxford editor of the works of St. Cyril of Jerusalem, acknowledged the fact in these words: "It is most true that the prayer and offering of the dead prevailed in the church from the time of the apostles." That anniversary prayers for the dead were observed, appears from Tertullian.* By the conclusion which St. Perpetua was led to draw from her two visions, it is clear that the church in that early age believed the doctrine of the expiation of certain sins after death, and that she prayed for the faithful departed. We see too, that the parents of St. Agnez used to watch by night at her sepulchre. St. Augustin, after remarking that in the Book of Maccabees it is read, that sacrifice was offered for the dead, adds, "But if this had not been read in the ancient Scriptures, it is not a little matter that the authority of the universal church is conspicuous in this custom, where the commendation of the dead occurs in the prayers of the priest which are offered at the altar of God."† St. Ambrose says, "that the faithful ought not so much to deplore the souls of the departed, as to accompany them with their prayers, that they ought not to draw an argument for tears, but a subject for recommendation to the Lord;"‡ and St. Chrysostom says, "that they should assist the dead, not with lamentations, but with prayers, supplications, and alms."§ St. Augustin says of his deceased mother, "She did not command us to provide aromatics for her dead body, an especial monument, an ancestral tomb; but she only desired that she might be had in memory at thy altar, O God, whence she knew that Holy Victim was dispensed, by means of which the handwriting that was against us has been destroyed. Inspire thy servants, O Lord, that as many as read this may remember thy servant Monica with her husband Patricius at thy altar."|| This was to provide against that purifying trial which may follow death, and against that day of which the prophets spoke, when the Lord should wash away the filth of the sons and daughters of Sion, and obliterate the blood from the midst of them with the spirit of judgment and with the spirit of burning, when he should sit burning and purifying as if gold and silver, and should cleanse the sons of Levi, and melt them as gold and silver, when the sacrifice of Judah and Jerusalem should be pleasing to him as in the primitive days.¶ The fervor and charity of the middle ages appear in nothing more conspicuous than in the zeal of men to assist their departed friends. Many of the epistles in the collection of those of St. Boniface, are occupied in transmitting, or in requiring the names of priests and laymen deceased, that they may be commemorated at the altar. The friendship of the holy men, whom missionary zeal had scattered through distant regions, finds only one consolation in the thought that they are always united both in life and death in the heart of Jesus. Thus Doto writes as follows to the Bishop Lullo: "quam-

* Lib. de Monogamia. Id. de Corona Militis, cap. 3.

† De cura pro Mortuis.

‡ Ad Faustina. II. Epist. 8.

§ Rom. XLI. in Epist. I. ad Coriuth.

¶ Confess. Lib. XIX. cap. 13.

¶ S. Augustini de Civit. Dei, Lib. XX. c. 25.

vis terrarum longitudine separati videmur, tamen et terrarum longinquitas non dividit mente, quos charitas divina conjunxit in corde.”* On this principle they might have used the words of Pindar, expressing their belief that the dead take an interest in the fortune of their surviving relations on earth.

Κατακρύπτει δ' οὐ κόρις
 Συγγόνων κεδνὰν χάριν.†

The celebration of the memory of the dead on the third, seventh, thirtieth, and anniversary day, is a most ancient institution, as appears from St. Augustin and other fathers. Amalarius and Alcuin explain the mystic reason of these days as follows: “the third day after the obit,” say they, “is celebrated to express our trust in the future resurrection, from the memory of our Saviour’s rising on the third day; the seventh day expresses a general number or a totality, on which we pray that all their sins may be forgiven.” “Luctus mortui Septem dies,” says the Scripture;‡ and thus the sons of Jacob celebrated the obsequies of their father during seven days;§ or because the seventh day is the Sabbath, we pray the Lord of the Sabbath to give them eternal rest. The thirtieth day is observed in conformity to the venerable examples of the Old Testament, as when the children of Israel wept for Aaron during the space of thirty days, and when Moses died they wept for him thirty days in the plains of Moab. And the anniversary is repeated that in the event of their being still exposed to the purifying flames, they may be assisted by the suffrages of the faithful, for much it avails them, there to be the object of the prayers of such

——“Whose wills
 Have root of goodness in them.”||

Cardinal Bona, speaking of the office of the dead, says, “that it was by an especial Providence that learned men from the very age of the apostles, employed themselves in describing the received rites of the church, because the Holy Spirit foresaw that heresy in the latter ages would attempt to pervert and confound all things.”¶ The office of the dead begins absolutely without an invocation of the divine assistance, glorification of the most holy Trinity, or benediction, or any rite indicating joy, “in order,” as Amalarius says, “to correspond with what took place at the death of our Lord.” Cardinal Bona observes, “that generally when we pray for the dead, we are reminded of our own end; they are dead and we are also to die, they yesterday, we to-morrow.” What an advantage, then, had the pious charity of our ancestors provided for the living also in their foundations for the spiritual wants of the dead? “Memorare novissima tua, et in æternum non peccabis.” The anniversaries of kings were celebrated in Gaul in a very early age. Celebrated were those of Clovis, in the church of St. Peter, now of St. Geneviève,

* Bonifacii Epist. LXXXIV.

† Olymp. Lib. VII.

‡ Eccles. 22. 13.

§ Genes. I. 10.

|| Dante Purg. XI.

¶ De Divina Psalmod, p. 271.

 Id. 265.

that of his son Childebert, in the monastery of St. Vincent, now of St. Germain des Près, and that of Dagobert, in the church of St. Denis, of which there was no monument to trace the beginning.* In the sacristy of the cathedral of Ravenna, I saw several very ancient inscriptions in stone, to commemorate the obligation of the canons, to celebrate a solemn mass of requiem on certain anniversaries, which it was the object of these inscriptions to specify. Luther of Brunswick, grand master of the Teutonic order, in his last illness desired himself to be removed to Königsberg, in order to make his devout prayer in the cathedral which he had lately assisted to erect. He gave orders that he should be buried in the midst of the choir, and that over his grave a light should for ever burn, for maintaining which he left funds, and that a dole and a feast should be always made on the anniversary of his death, when a solemn requiem should be sung. This was "the pure and wise master," as he was styled; "the poet, the just man, the mild ruler, the devout friend of the monks and of the poor."† Suger composed lessons for matins recording the virtues of Louis-le-Gros, which were read in churches where his anniversary was celebrated. It became a general custom to found and erect chapels, and sometimes even monasteries, on fields of battle, where prayer should constantly be offered up for the souls of the slain. Battle Abbey, in Sussex, was a celebrated instance, and in Switzerland, the chapels of Mortgarten and Morat have been visited by most travellers in that country. After the great battle at Rudau, in 1370, the Teutonic knights erected three chapels in which masses and vigils were to be performed for the souls of the fallen; two were on the banks of the Rudau, and the third on the Laptau, and on the spot where the heroic marshal fell, the grand-master placed a vast monument, on which the names of the heroes were inscribed.‡ The poor gained nothing by the abolition of these anniversaries consequent on the setting up of a new religion. King Edward I. when he founded obits for his queen Eleanor, in Westminster Abbey, provided also that money should be given to the poor that came to the solemnization of the same. King Henry V. founded perpetually one day every week, a dirge with nine lessons, and a mass to be celebrated in the same abbey church, for the soul of King Richard the Second, and he appointed that on each of these days six shillings and eight pence should be given to the poor people, and on his anniversary, that twenty pounds in pence should be distributed to the most needful. These solemn anniversaries like that of the great baron, mentioned by Dante, as he whose name and worth the festival of Thomas still revives because commemorated on that day,§ were the means of multiplying those sublime and consoling offices of religion, in which men experienced the purest delight, as well as the most salutary impressions; for of them we may say with truth, "Hæc sunt solatia, hæc fomenta sanctorum dolorum." Then it was that they were led to meditate on—

* Mabillon Præfat. in III. Sæcul. Benedict. § 6.

† Id. V. 220.

‡ Voigt Geschichte Preussens, IV. 512.

§ Parad. XVI.

"That day of wrath, that dreadful day,
When heaven and earth shall pass away;"

to consider within their hearts

"What power shall be the sinner's stay ?
How shall he meet that dreadful day ?
When shrivelling like a parched scroll,
The flaming heavens together roll;
When louder yet, and yet more dread,
Swells the high trump that wakes the dead."

And to pray devoutly, in silence weeping,

"Oh! on that day, that wrathful day,
When man to judgment wakes from clay,
Be thou the trembling sinner's stay,
Though heaven and earth shall pass away !"

And what did the church teach the while, respecting the efficacy of these suffrages in behalf of the dead ? You may learn this from the canons of the church in Ireland, which were passed in about the eighth century. The Synod says, " In four modes does the church offer for the souls of the dead. For the greatly good, they are thanksgivings in whom the oblation hath nothing to obliterate; for the greatly sinful, they are consolations to the living ; for those who are not greatly good, they conduce to their obtaining full remission ; and for those who were not greatly sinful, to their pains being rendered more tolerable."* This was conformable to the words of St. Augustin ; "For some men after their death, the prayers of the church or of pious people are heard ; but it is for those, who after their baptism, neither lived so ill as to be judged unworthy of such mercy, nor yet so well as not to need such mercy."† Besides these anniversaries and the solemn season, which was expressly devoted by the church for the discharge of this sacred duty, there were innumerable occasions on which it was usual in the middle ages to apply to it. "The Church," says St. Augustin, "as a faithful mother, prays for all her children departed, that they who left no parents or friends may still have the benefit of suffrage."‡ In many countries, as in France, it was the custom for "le Clocheteur des Trépassés to go about the streets at night with a bell, chanting out in a solemn tone,

"Réveillez-vous, gens qui dormez, Priez Dieu pour les Trépassés."

Marchangy says, "that, in some provinces, funds used to be left by will to churches for the purpose of keeping up a cry, every Monday at one o'clock after midnight, to the sound of two bells for the commemoration of the dead." It used

* Capitula Selecta Canonum Hibernens. ex libro XV. cap. ii. apud Dacher. Spicileg. Tom. IX.

† De Civitate Dei, Lib. XXI. cap. 24.

‡ De Cura pro Mortuis.

also to be a pious custom on board passage boats, as we still find in those which take passengers from Naples to Sorrento, and in many others which ply upon the rivers of the north of Italy, to ask a subscription for masses for the souls in purgatory.

As a conclusion to this chapter let us hear the affecting words in which Ælfred, Abbot of Rivaulx, speaks of his love for a departed friend, who, as he says, "has admitted him to his friendship from the very commencement of his conversion to a religious life." With this passage the first book of his Speculum Charitatis ends, and it is highly worthy of our attention in this place, as revealing the thoughts and minds of men during the ages of faith, with respect to the mourning of surviving friends, and to the reasons of the duty which devolved upon them to pray earnestly for the departed soul. "Certainly," he exclaims, "as far as my eyes can discern, O Lord, there was nothing in thy servant which could be an impediment to him in passing to thy embraces ; but no man knows what is within man unless the spirit of man which is in him ; whereas thy eye, O Lord, penetrates to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and is a discernor of the thoughts and intentions of the heart ; and as a certain worthy servant said, 'Væ etiam laudabili vitæ hominum, si remota pietate disentiatur.' Behold then, O Lord, the source of my fear and of my tears. Attend to them, O thou most sweet and merciful Saviour ! Receive them, O thou my only hope, my one and only refuge, my God ! Receive, O Lord, the sacrifices which I offer to thee for my beloved friend, and whatever stains may remain in him, either pardon or impute them to me. Strike me ; on me let thy anger fall ; only hide not thy blessed face from him ; withdraw not thy sweetness from him. O my Lord, let him experience the consolations of thy mercy, which he so earnestly desired, in which he so securely confided, to which he commended himself with such sweet vehemence, during that night when, after the other brethren had withdrawn, and one only was left to watch by him, he was heard to break forth with those repeated words, 'Misericordiam, misericordiam, misericordiam !' He was endeavoring," as they say, "to sing the whole of that verse, 'misericordiam et judicium cantabo tibi, Domine ;' but recalled by the sweetness of that first word, he could proceed no farther, and so rested in the repetition ; and when he saw the brother, who sat by his bed, not appearing to be equally impressed with a sense of its sweetness, he caught his hand, and pressing it with earnest emotion repeated again, 'misericordiam, misericordiam.' That soul seems to have been dissolved in ineffable joy at the thought of such grace, feeling that its sins were absorbed in this immense ocean of divine mercy, so that nothing was left to oppress or terrify the conscience. As for me, I will follow thee with my tears, with my prayers ; with the sacrifice of our Mediator. And do thou, O Father Abraham, extend thy arms again and again to receive this poor one of Christ, the other Lazarus, receiving and cherishing him as he returns from the miseries of this life ; and to me also, who so loved him, grant a place of rest along with him in thy bosom."

CHAPTER IX.

WHEN Ulysses was conducting Neoptolemus to Troy, the vessel passed within sight of the tomb of the great Æacides, and in the painting which Quintus Calaber gives of this voyage, there is an admirable stroke of nature, truly Homeric, in reference to it :

*Τοῖσι δ' ἄρ' Ἰδαιῶν ὀρέων φαίνοντο κόλωναί,
Χρύσα τε, καὶ Σμίνθειον ἔδος, καὶ Σίγϊας ἄκρη.
Τυμβὸς τ' Αἰακίδαο δαΐφρονος· ἀλλὰ μιν οὔτι
Υἱὸς Αἰεέρταο πυκαφρονέων ἐνὶ θυμῷ
Δεῖξε Νεοπτολέμῳ, ἵνα οἱ μὴ πένθος ἄεξῃ
Θυμὸς ἐνὶ στήθεσσι.

In the ages of faith, as well as in more ancient days, it was a work of humanity and of religion in which mourners found a sweet delight to commemorate the dead even by a material monument. It was a Catholic as well as an Homeric practice, by means of sepulchres, to remind the living of the shortness and uncertainty of human life, to raise a mound or a symbol upon the spot on which the brave or good had fallen, to pile up a tomb upon the shore of the wild sea, ἀνδρὸς δυστήνοιο, καὶ ἐσσομένοισι πνέεσθαι.†

Euripides says, “that the traveller, as he passes by the tomb of Alcestis, will thither bend his devious way, with reverence gaze, and with a sigh smite on his breast.” And in the early and middle ages of Christian history, to behold a sepulchre, and to supplicate God over a particular grave would be the object of long and painful journeys.

Who knows not the sublime and wondrous event which of itself has served to designate a long period of the ages which we are attempting to illustrate? Who has not continually on his tongue the ages of the crusades; the ages in which men renounced their homes, their country, their friends, engaged in all the horrors of a long and perilous navigation, exposed themselves to the dangers of an Asiatic and pestilential climate, willingly rushed forward to encounter death in every form and circumstance that could render it painful, and all this for a tomb?

In such an age it was natural that the spirit of mourning should have developed itself in every gracious and solemn form that harmonized with the genius of love and memory, that it should have perpetuated, by material monuments on this earth, some traces of the affection of children, and of parents, and of friends, that it should have multiplied those sepulchres which relate the untimely departure of heroic worth, which exhibit the overflowings of youthful sorrow, or the calm and brief expressions of experienced wisdom tombs which recall the images of youth, and beauty, and goodness,

* Od. VII. 401.

† Od. XI. 76.

———“at sight whereof

Tears often stream forth, by remembrance wak'd

Whose sacred stings the piteous only feel.”*

Alban Butler remarks, “that the primitive Christians were solicitous not to bury their dead among the infidels, as appears from Gamaliel’s care in this respect, mentioned by Lucian in his account of the discovery of St. Stephen’s relics, as also from St. Cyprian, who makes it a crime in Martialis, a Spanish bishop, to have buried Christians in profane sepulchres.”† To be buried near the holy martyrs was a great object of their desire ; this was the wish of St. Ambrose in dying, for which S. Maximus assigns the following reason : “Hoc à majoribus provisum est, ut sanctorum ossibus nostra corpora sociemus, ut dum illos tartarus metuit, nos pœna non tangat.” In the cemetery of St. Calixtus, Pope and martyr, on the Appian way, were buried more than one hundred and seventy-four thousand martyrs and forty-six popes. With what awe, with what unutterable reverence did I descend into the catacombs of St. Calixtus, of St. Cyriacus, and of St. Marcellinus, preceded by the friar holding the small taper, which every moment seemed about to be extinguished by a sudden blast from some fresh passage among the sombre vaults ! Here I was told St. Lucy laid the body of St. Sebastian ; there was found the body of St. Cecilia ; further on was discovered the body of the holy martyr Maximus ; on this side lay a pope, and on that several children. O what a solemn and religious place ! and how it fills the soul with emotions indescribable of joy and sorrow ; one might call it Pausilpus, παύσις τῆς λύπης, the end of grief. Truly here death hath no sting : the grave no victory. One would wish to lie down here in peace, that one’s soul might follow whither these are already gone. “Hospites fuerunt super terram et ego : tanquam umbra subito transierunt et ego.” Into the catacombs of St. Calixtus one descends from the Basilica of St. Sebastian, and on the wall near the entrance there is an inscription on stone, containing the account which St. Jerome gives of this very spot : “When I was a boy studying at Rome,” says the holy doctor, “I used, with other companions of my age and inclination, to go about diligently every Sunday amidst the sepulchres of the apostles and martyrs, in crypts which are excavated in the depth of the earth, having bodies of the dead on both sides for walls, and where all things are so obscure, that one might say the prophetic word was fulfilled, “Descendant ad infernum viventes.” The scanty light, at rare intervals admitted from above, only tempers

* Dante Purg. XII.

† S. Cypriani Epist. 68.

the horror of the darkness, and serves to deepen the black night which succeeds to it. One is reminded of that Virgilian line,

“Horror ubique animos, simul ipsa silentia terrent.”*

In early times, none but martyrs, bishops, and abbots, were allowed to be buried within the church. No title of nobility conferred this privilege, and no money was required for burial, but oblations were received and even enjoined by many kings.

The Roman ritual, however requires that the poor should be buried wholly gratis. The exclusion of heretics, and of such as died deprived of ecclesiastical peace, was a primitive disciplin which was never renounced. Thus at Ravenna, the sepulchres of the Arian Goths, and of the ministers of King Theodoric, were removed out of the churches, as soon as the Catholics regained possession of them; and many of these are now arranged in a museum within the archiepiscopal palace. At the same time it may be well to remark how religion, in the middle ages, guarded men from contracting any superstitious opinion of the importance of burial in holy ground, and from that error which led so many poets of antiquity to describe the sepulchre as a place of rest for the body, within which the dead man reposed; as in these verses which Cicero ridicules :—

“Neque sepulcrum, quo recipiat, habeat, portum corporis;
Ubi, remissâ humanâ vitâ, corpus requiescat malis.”

“Is it an injury to the just if they be not buried in the cemetery of the church?” is a question that occurs in a work ascribed to St. Anselm; to which the answer is made, “By no means: for the world is the temple of God, which is consecrated by the blood of Christ; and, therefore, whether they be cast out, or buried in the field, or in the wood, or in the marsh, or in what place soever, they are always preserved within the bosom of the Church, which is spread over the whole earth. Is it of advantage to the just to be buried in holy places? Places become sacred in which just men are buried; but to those who suffer it is of advantage, because when their friends meet there, they are reminded by their monuments to offer up prayers to God for them. Is it of any service to the wicked to be buried in a holy place? Nay, it is rather an injury to be associated in sepulture with those from whom they are far separated in merit.”†

All this had been shown by St. Augustin in answer to Paulinius, Bishop of Nola, who had consulted him on being entreated by a certain widow, who desired that the dead body of her son, a faithful youth, might be buried in the Basilica of the blessed confessor Felix. “The devotion of the mother to the martyr,” says St. Augustin, “is itself a supplication in behalf of her son, and, therefore, it may be to his advantage to be interred in that Basilica: adjuvet defuncti spiritum, non

* S. Hieronymi in Ezech. Com cap. 40.

† S. Anselmi Elucidarii, Lib. II. cap. 31

mortui corporis locus, sed ex loci memoria vivus matris affectus. It seems to me, that the only advantages to the dead in being buried near the martyrs is, that by commending them to the patronage of martyrs, the ardor of that supplication for them is increased.”*

At first, indeed, even the bishops, saints, and martyrs, were buried near the church; “juxta ecclesiam,” as Bede says of St. Augustin’s body. This was in the front court, the Paradisus Ecclesiæ, as at Rome; or in France, Ecclesiæ Paravisi-um. The ancient canons forbid any one to be buried within the church itself.† Thus, before many of the churches of Ravenna, as at the cathedral and before the Basilica of St. John the Baptist, stand vast sarcophaguses, in which great person-ages were buried, before it was permitted to entomb any one within the church. Those in the Basilica of St. Apollinare, in Classe, containing the ashes of the early archbishops, have been placed within during later ages, for originally they stood without. Thus still is placed at St. Vitale the Sepulchre of Isaac, Exarch of Ravenna, that illustrious Armenian who commanded armies in the East and in the West, and whose glory, as the epitaph pompously sets forth, reached from the rising to the setting sun!

Constantine was buried in the porch of the Apostles at Constantinople; Honorius in the porch of St. Peter at Rome; St. Augustin, the first Archbishop of Canterbury, was interred in the porch of St. Peter and Paul, which was a church of his foundation near Canterbury, and together with him, six other archbishops who next succeeded him, whose relics were afterwards removed into the Abbey Church.

In the fourth century, bishops were buried within the church; though, for a long time after, only bishops, abbots, holy priests, and laics of the utmost sanctity, were allowed to be buried in churches.‡ By degrees, however, this salutary discipline was broken through, and persons of all ranks, without regard to spiritual qualifications, were admitted to be buried within the church; the only distinction required being, that laymen should be placed with their feet towards the altar, while ecclesiastics should have their heads next it, as if fronting the people. Still the memory of the former discipline prevailed, so far as sometimes to induce great princes, through humility, and as an expression of penitence, to command that their bodies should be interred without the walls. An instance of this occurs in the history of Suger; for we read, that when he proposed to rebuild the Abbey Church of St. Denis, the entrance was obstructed by a great massive porch, which concealed the portal. This had been built by Charlemagne from a pious motive. Pepin his father was buried under that spot, not laid on his back, like other dead men, but prostrate, with his face against the ground, in order to denote, as he had said, that he wished to make amends for the excesses committed by his father,

* De Cura pro Mortuis.

† Thomassinus de Vet. et Nova Ecclesiæ Disciplin. Pars III. Lib. i. c. 68.

‡ Durandus Rationale, Lib. I. cap. 5.

Charles Martel. Charlemagne, not enduring that his father should lie buried without the church, had built this huge porch, that by this contrivance he might be within it. Suger, however, had the body removed to another place, and the porch destroyed.*

The Church, in several synods, proposed to restore the ancient discipline respecting sepulchres, and strong measures were enforced to correct the abuses which time and the pride of family had introduced. In the Council of Rheims, in the year 1583, it was decreed that no tombs should be erected higher than the ground, and that no statues, or military standards, or trophies, should be placed upon them, and that the dead were only to be praised in becoming language. "Quæ ad pietatem et preces pro mortuis faciendas spectent potius, quam defunctorum, enarrandis laudibus insumantur."† By the Council of Tholouse, in the year 1590, no inscriptions or emblems were to be placed in the church but such as were approved of by the bishop or archdeacon.‡ The occasion of these statutes was the Pagan taste, which had begun to affect even the ancient style of sepulchral architecture.

The tomb of the Scipios is carved in marble, and adorned with works of art; but the sepulchres of the martyrs were rude and solemn. In the Catacombs, the inscriptions and emblems over the Christian graves are very simple—such as, "The holy martyr, Maximus."—"In pace Hippolitus, amator pauperum."—"Gregoria in pace." Sometimes there is an iron grating to preserve the slab, on which some saint has slept, from being worn away by the devout kisses of the faithful. In the cloister of St. Paul, in those of St. Lorenzo and of St. Agnez extra Muros, and in the porch of St. Maria in Trastevere, as also in one gallery in the Vatican, you see the simple inscriptions which used to be placed over the martyrs; for these slabs have been removed from the Catacombs, where they covered the apertures of the recesses in which the bodies lay. The emblems, which are in general but rudely carved, are very numerous. You see a bird with a branch in its bill,—a heart,—crossed palms;—a ship in full sail near a tower, on the top of which is a flame;—a man holding out his arms extended in prayer;—a boy riding on a dolphin;—a barrel, and the monogram of Christ;—a man preaching from a pulpit, and a bird bringing to him a branch;—an anchor;—two birds about to drink from a chalice;—one bird feeding another;—a fish, a lion, a leopard, wheels, hatchets, crooks and spears. The interest inspired by such monuments must of course greatly exceed what can be generally experienced. But although we cannot expect to feel similar emotions from beholding the tombs of a later date, there is still, in those of the middle ages, a majestic simplicity, a most venerable air of holiness, which is enough to startle, and reduce to silent awe, the curious observer of our days. In the first place, the words inscribed upon them are generally full of sublimity. The heathen sepulchral inscriptions, preserved in the gallery of the Vatican, are very minute in specifying the exact age and the abundant merits of the person, who, as on the modern tombs, in countries that have abandoned the ancient creed, is always shown to have been "bene meritus." Nothing however, in ancient times, bore resemblance to the vanity and bombast of the modern epitaphs, of which that on Sir Philip Sidney in St. Paul's beginning, "England, Netherland, the heavens and the arts," may be assumed as the perfect model. This was not the style adopted in ages of faith. The tomb of Suger, in the abbey of St. Denis, consisted of a simple stone, raised about three feet high, on which these four words were inscribed—"Cy gist l'abbé Suger,"—which gives occasion to Mabillon to remark how much nobler was the style of inscriptions in the middle ages, than that so full of pompous affectation, which had begun to introduce itself in his time.*

* Hist. de Suger. Lib. IV.

† Can. de Sepult.

‡ Thomassinus de Vet. et Nova Ecclesiæ Disciplin. Pars III. Lib. i. cap. 68.

The epitaph in brass on the Black Prince, in the cathedral of Canterbury, was this.—"Here lieth the noble Prince, Edward, the eldest son of the thrice-noble King Edward the Third, who died on the feast of the Trinity, in the year of grace, 1376: to the soul of whom, God grant mercy. Amen."

How impressive are those old English inscriptions given by Weever, like that at Minster in Shepey:—"In the most holy name of Jesu, pray for the sowls of John and Margaret:"—or those in Stone church: "O merciful Jesew, have mercy on the sowl of Sir John Dew. Sweet Jesew, grant to William and Ann and us, everlastyng lyff. Pray yow hertely for charitie. Say a Pater Noster and an Ave."

Thomas Brenton, Bishop of Rochester, confessor to King Richard II. who travelled into many places beyond seas, and preached at Rome before the Pope, being famous for his learning and rare endowments, was buried at Seale, under a marble stone on which was his portraiture, and only these words were inscribed:—"Credo quod Redemptor meus vivit;" and these figures, 1389.

On the tomb of Sir John Lombard, priest, in Stone Church, were certain Latin rhymes, beseeching whoever passed by, whether he were a grown man or only a boy, to pray that his soul might find mercy. In the north cloister of St. Paul's Cathedral, a grave-stone without a name had only this inscription: "Vixi, peccavi, penitui, naturæ cessi." In the Temple Church was an inscription, imploring prayer for the soul of Richard Wye, and only these lines added:—"Domine, secundum delictum meum noli me judicare. Deprecor Majestatem tuam ut tu deleas iniquitatem meam." The epitaph on King Edward the Confessor, in Westminster Abbey, consists of these three hexameters:

"Omnibus insignis virtutum laudibus Heros,
Sanctus Edwardus Confessor, Rex venerandus;
Quinto die Jani moriens super Ethera scandit.
Sursum corda, Moritur Ann. Dom. 1065."

* De Studiis Monast. Pars II. cap. 12.

The only words upon the tomb of that potent noble, William Bouchier, Earl of Eu, in Normandy, which was in the Church of Little Easton, were these:—"Fili Dei, miserere mei; mater Dei, miserere mei." At Boston was a fair tomb, whereon were engraven in brass the names of John Deynes and Katherine his wife, and these two words only added, "Respite, Respite!"—an allusion probably to the prayer of the passion which begins with these words.

The sepulchral inscriptions upon the religious, and on certain young students, in the Abbey of St. Alban, made by the Abbot Whethamsted, were of such interest and beauty in the estimation of Weever, that, although the brasses containing them had been plundered from the grave-stones, he yet inscribed them in his book, having collected them from the manuscript of the abbey.

In Catholic countries, which have never witnessed the barbarous rage against the dead, their monuments should be objects of minute attention, and they will often repay it. I observed a very ancient sepulchral slab in the pavement of the old Cathedral of Ravenna, to commemorate Gregorius. There was no date or other notice, but only the figure of a cross, and written under it, in very ancient characters, "O crux sancta, adjuva nos." In the same church Gerardus, archbishop, who died in the year of our Lord 113, was commemorated by a simple leaden tablet. In the cathedral of Sienna I remarked on the pavement a tomb slab, representing a bishop holding clasped in both hands a book open, in which was written, "Firmiter credimus, simpliciter confitemur." There was no name or date or other words. In the cloisters of the Abbey of Fontenelle may still be seen many sepulchral stones, very small and humble, with no other ornament but a little Greek cross and a simple tear under it. There is no name engraved, but only the day, month, and year of the departure.—It was well for a poet or a philosopher when it devolved on monks to compose the inscriptions for his tomb. What pilgrim, who has visited Rome, has not been induced to ascend that toilsome hill on which stands the humble convent of St. Onufrio? Within the court are two orange trees of great height, reaching above the cloistered arches, and ever overshadowing the windows in the upper stage. In the church, at the left hand of the western door, on entering, is a small slab, on which you read these words:—"The bones of Torquato Tasso lie here. Lest the stranger should not know the spot, the brethren have marked it with this stone." Did not the poor Hieronymites know how to write the poet's epitaph?

In the middle ages, as in Italy and other Catholic countries at the present day, there was often, in sepulchral inscriptions, a kind of struggle indicated between humility and the desire of edifying the living, by attesting some peculiar trait in the character of the dead. Thus I have frequently observed some testimony of this kind: on one it would be, "Pious towards God;" on another, "A lover of the Poor;" on another, "Devout in the care of Temples." Men had not to compose epitaphs for persons like Timocreon of Rhodes, on whose tomb a sentence of piety would sound like a satire, or the anticipation of God's judgment. On the tomb of Lodovico de Bellomonte, Bishop of Durham, who lay buried before the high altar in that Church, were engraven in brass certain divine and celestial sayings of the holy Scriptures, which he used peculiarly to select for his spiritual consolation.”*

In the Campo Santo at Pisa is a tomb associated with many historical recollections of saintly interest, on which the inscription, if not in the best style of latinity, at least presents a singular contrast to the style of those Pagan epitaphs with which it is surrounded, being preserved there as relics of art. On this tomb, which contained the ashes of the mother of the Countess Matilda, we read—

“*Quamvis peccatrix sum Domina vocata Beatrix
In tumultu missa jaceo quæ Comitissa.*”

Indeed, to examine the sepulchres of the middle ages, which yet remain, forms one of the most interesting employments for the leisure of a philosophic traveller, who, like Pausanias, after traversing Greece, may find it well to occupy one-half of his relation with the description of tombs. Where does he feel deeper emotion than, for example, on entering the cathedral of Salerno, to behold the sepulchre of that sublime and illustrious saint, Pope Gregory VII., who died there a fugitive, repeating these words with his last breath—“Dilexi justitiam et odivi iniquitatem ; propterea morior in exilio.” With what a sweet melancholy does one wander through the cloisters of the great monastery adjoining the Basilica of St. Anthony at Padua, or pass before the numerous chapels in that vast church, reading, as one walks, the inscriptions over the learned, or the saintly or heroic dead ! What a testimony do they furnish to the spirit and manners of Catholic times ! Some commemorate the warrior who united letters and philosophy with arms ; who, in his life time, many a noble act achieved, both by his wisdom and his sword. Such are the tombs of Stephen de Ripa, of the Ubaldini family, and of Ascanio Zabaralla ; others, the holy and profoundly learned monk, who, after a long course of public teaching of theology in that ancient university, departed to the source of truth. These are chiefly to friars of the seraphic order of St. Francis, who are represented teaching on their sepulchres. Others, again, as that tomb of the Polish knight, Adamus Zalinsky, record the studious, chaste, and valiant traveller, who had seen Africa and Asia, and who had resolved upon visiting Jerusalem, when death constrained him to leave here his toil-worn limbs. On one sepulchre, as on that of Andrew Arcolus, you are told of the mathematician and astronomer who united zeal for science with piety to God. Such is the testimony to his virtue, conveyed in these lines—

“*Astrorum motus omnes, arcanaque prompsit
Dextera ; meus hæret qui movetas tra Deo.*”

On another, of the orator who loved peace, and who studied to preserve it to

* The Ancient Rites and Monuments of Durham, p. 25.

his fellow-citizens. Such is the inscription on Father Paulin, which is intended to transmit nothing more respecting him to posterity than that he loved peace and pursued it. There are tombs, as that of Wesling, the Mindan knight, to the learned and devoted physician, who had visited Egypt for the sake of studying exotic roots, and of acquiring a knowledge of all arts; and who, on returning, falls a victim to his pious labors in gratuitously tending the sick poor in a time of pestilence. There are others which attest the miracles of humility and of seraphic ardor, which have been wrought by the Catholic religion in the breast of the learned, and of those endowed by heaven with extraordinary genius. Such is the tomb of that illustrious woman, Helen Cornelia Lucretia Piscopia Cornaro, who united an admirable sublimity of soul, and a most tender piety, to prodigious knowledge, being mistress of seven languages; so, that, being greatly honored by the princes of Europe, and especially by Pope Innocent XI., and after devoting herself to a life of religious and philosophic contemplation, coming to Padua in obedience to the command of her father, she received publicly the laurel crown of philosophy, an example unparalled within the memory of man in that celebrated college. There are others, too, erected over the diligent, innocent, amiable, and holy youth, who, in the midst of his academic studies, distinguished himself by his kindness to the poor, and his ardent desires after the heavenly country whose only fault was too much application, and too little care of himself. Such, or similar, is the character ascribed on their sepulchres to Henry de Gram the Saxon, Camillus Bonaventura the Roman, Ludovicus Brixia, Frederick Rota of Bergamo, and a number of other young noblemen and students, who died during their course at that university; and to some of whom, having no parents, the slab is erected by their dearest college friend. The affecting inscription on the tomb of Andrew Canzki, a young Pole, who died on his travels in Italy, would apply to many a pilgrim who visited that sacred land without ever seeing the day of return—

"Italiam peragro dum sopes quinque per annos, Hei patrium repetens mors mihi vertit iter."

There are tombs which seem to admonish the living in asking indulgence for the dead. Such is that tomb of John Trivulzio Magnus, in the church of St. Nazarus at Milan, on which is written, "Joan Jacobus Magnus Trivultius Antonii filius, qui nunquam quievit quiescit. Tace." And such that tomb over the beautiful Agnes in the Abbey of Junnières, on which was this short and touching epitaph—"Cy gist Damoiselle Agnes Seurette, en son vivant dame de beauté, Dissoudum et de Vernon-suo-Seine, pitieuse aux pauvres, laquelle trespasa le 9 Fevrier en l'an 1449."* There are others which seem not so much the tombs of men as the true monuments of chivalrous and Castilian honor. Such are those two sepulchres in the church of Santa Maria

* Taillepie, Antiquitez de Rouen.

la Nova at Naples, which were generously raised by the Duke of Sessa, nephew of the Great Gonzalve and Governor of Naples, to two unfortunate warriors, who were his enemies, Lantrec and Pierre Navarre. There are some tombs, which so abruptly present the image of the private domestic virtues amidst the solemn magnificence of sepulchral art, that it is hardly possible to view them without weeping. They affect the stranger, too, because in a foreign and beauteous land, they remind him of the virtues of his own, or rather that in every country the amiable disposition is the same. Such is that tomb in the Campo Santo near Bologna, of a young Genoese, of Patrician family, John Baptist Sebastian Cattaneo de Volta, whose innocent boyish form is represented above, and of the manners of whose holy youth a simple and touching account is given, describing how he sighed after heaven, and how for the first time he gave his parents sorrow when he died. Some tombs there were attesting the bonds of a mysterious friendship, such as that in the monastery of Medianum, which commemorated two brethren, John and Benign, both disciples of St. Hydolph, both born on the same day, and who were never separated from each other from childhood; having been educated together, trained in the same studies, clad in the monastic cowl on the same day; having lived together, fallen sick together on the same day, died and received into Heaven on the same, and then their bodies buried in one tomb.* There were tombs which seemed erected for the peculiar delight of poets. Such were those in the church of St. Francis at Ferrara to commemorate heroes, sung by Ariosto. There were others, as if to proclaim, without vanity, the force of ancestral virtue, such as that in the church of Ecouen to the family of Chardon, on which one reads—

“Chardonete gentis cernis commune sepulcrum, Conspicuos clero, Marte, totâque viros.”

There are tombs on which the inscription seems to combine the playful irony of Socrates, during his last moments, described so sublimely in the Phædo, with the serene majesty of the Gospel. Such is that sepulchre in the cathedral of Ravenna, on which these words are inscribed—“Hic non jacet Donatus Capra. S. Raven. Ecclesiæ canonicus. Illud tantum hic jecit quod jacere potuisset in hoc monumento: mortalia deposuit qui totum virtute se voluit immortalem. Medicus fuit sed alios curavit non se ipsum. Suum esse nihil censuit præter animum. Et hoc nunquam ægrotavit. Sal. MDCIIL. recessit.” At least, the style of this inscription presents a great contrast to the first line on a neighboring, but far more illustrious sepulchre—

“Hic Claudor Danthes Patris extorris ab oris.”

But it was not merely in the style of the inscriptions that the interest of the ancient Catholic sepulchres consisted. The designs, the emblems, the images, were all strongly characteristic of the ages of faith. Undoubtedly, pomp and magnificence belonged to the sepulchres of the great.

* Chronic. Senoniensis, Lib. II. c. xi. apud Dacher. Tom. III.

"Henry VII. in Westminster dwelleth," as Lord Bacon says, "more richly dead in the monument of his tomb than he did alive in Richmond, or any of his palaces." King Henry III. caused a coffin to be made of pure gold and precious stones for the holy relics of Edward the Confessor, and so artificially was it carved by the most cunning goldsmiths, that, although the matter was of inestimable value, "yet the workmanship excelled it," as Matthew Paris saith. When Henry V. died, his queen, Catherine, caused a royal figure to be placed upon his tomb, covered all over with silver plate gilded, the head of which was of massive silver ; so that, at "the reformation," when the "battering hammers of destruction," as Master Speed saith, "did sound in every church," it was broken and carried off as a prize, and only a headless monument left. "The funeral pomp and the solemn monuments, adorned with images and precious stones ought not," says Savedra, "to pass for signs of vanity in princes, but rather as evidence of a generous piety, which marks the last bounds of human greatness, and shows, in the magnificence with which it honors their ashes, the respect which is due to majesty, for tombs are a mute history of the duties, and the end of man."* Neither ought this care of monuments, or attention to the preservation of particular bodies, to be regarded as arguing, in the men of past times, any inconsistency in their firm belief respecting the general resurrection of the flesh. The moderns would have had nothing to teach them. "The dead," says Louis of Blois, "moulder into ashes, or are devoured by dogs ; but all the particles that are dispersed are whole to God, for they are in those elements of the world whence they first came out when we were made : we see them not, but God knows whence he can bring them forth again, since, before we were, he knew how to produce us."† The emblems upon tombs, and the whole development of sepulchral architecture in the middle ages, indicated the mind essentially Christian ; and the departure from this style, in the deplorable times which followed, was loudly lamented by all who retained any reverence for antiquity. "If any one," says Weever, "shall seriously survey the tombes erected in these our dayes, and examine the particulars of the personages wrought upon their tombes, he may easily discern the vanity of our mindes, vailed under our fantasticke habits and attires, which, in time to come, will be rather provocations to vice than incitations to virtue ; and so the Temple of God shall become a schoole-house of the monstrous habits and attires of our present age ; and which is worse, they garnish their tombes now adayes with the pictures of naked men and women and bring into the Church the memories of the heathen god and goddesses."*

Upon the sepulchres of the middle ages, the Passion, or Resurrection of our Lord, were the most ordinary representations. Kings and nobles of illustrious

* Christian Prince, II. 588.

† Tractat. in Ps. lxii.

‡ A Discourse of Funeral Monuments, chap. iii.

houses sought no separation from ecclesiastics in the ornaments to be placed upon their graves. The magnificent tomb of Louis XII. and Anne of Bretagne, which was executed by Paul-Ponce, was surrounded with statues of the twelve Apostles. The tomb of O Piers Shoonks, lord of an ancient decayed house, well moated near Burnt Pelham, who died twenty years after the conquest, which is in the church of Pelham Furnix, contains his figure, carved in stone, and about it are represented an eagle, a lion, a bull, and an angel, to denote the four evangelists. Upon the wall of St. Paul's Cathedral, in London, was the image of Jesus, as also the figure of a lady kneeling before it, with the inscription, "Here, before the image of Jesu, lieth the worshipful and right noble Ladie Margaret, Countesse of Shrewsbury, late wife of the true and victorious knight, John Talbot, Earle of Shrewsbury, which Countess passed from this world the fourteenth day of June, in the year of our Lord 1468 ; on whose soule Jesu have mercy. Amen."

Who has not experienced a mysterious influence on regarding the sepulchres of the middle ages, which remain in our ancient churches, where saints have left those deeds that in the last great day will shine so bright, on which kings and heroes, mitred monks, and blessed hermits, are represented in such revering forms of devotion that one almost expects to see tears start from them ! These are all the works of men, who ever thought, as they carved the stone, that they were gaining heaven. Ah ! how do those images of the dead seem to admonish the living ! These hands, with palms so fervently joined, these arms so meekly crossed upon the breast, that face, so full of sweet melancholy, that whole composure of the limbs, so humble, so devout, so full of reverence ! How does not all this seem to admonish us, coming suddenly as we often do upon them, with obdurate hearts and minds distracted, with a body abandoned to a proud disdainful demeanor, the consequence of a long intercourse with the modern society which requires it as a passport to favor. How are we struck with awe, and how does the memory of holy things irresistibly return at the spectacle : the dead seem to reprove us from their sepulchres, and the stones themselves to have acquired an expression which can pierce through the very deepest intricacy of our hearts. If it were only on these grounds methinks what St. Gregory of Tours relates would not seem incredible : that in the church of Vodollacenum, on the river Garonne, where two holy priests were buried, one near the south, and the other near the north wall, while the clergy were singing the office, it was thought that the voices of these saints were heard to join in the choir with wonderful sweetness.* These monuments were often designed and even executed by holy priests and religious men.

The monk who wrote the chronicle of Sens published by Dacherius says, after relating the death of Anthony, Abbot of his monastery, "he was buried in a stone tomb, upon which afterwards I carved with my own hands an image of the abbot, as if reposing, and holding his pastoral staff in his hand.”* If Cicero thought it worthy of mention in his Tusculan disputations, that he had discovered under a covering of thorns and weeds, the antique sepulchre of Archimedes, bearing a sphere and a cylinder carved upon it, which was unknown to the Syracusans themselves, what Catholic need fear to describe his impressions, when in a land of darkness and unbelief, he has unexpectedly found upon the earth-level tomb within some ancient desecrated temple, the sculptured form of a tonsured priest clad in holy vestments, and holding in his hands the chalice and the paten! Unknown and unintelligible to the descendants of the men who once were so familiar with holy rites, that poor stone seems in his eyes like an altar, which it would be sacrilege to touch, excepting with the devout and solemn kiss of revering lips. Ah, if those who lie within these sepulchres were seen, what would be thought even by the simple rustics of the pompous and scornful men who now tread upon them, “ne’er mindful to ruminate the bed beneath their feet!”

* De gloria Confessorum, cap. 47.

St. Gregory of Tours, speaking of a place where the bodies of a vast number of the faithful were interred, after observing, “that although some who lay buried there had been blessed martyrs, yet they had no particular commemoration,” concludes with a remark which must be often suggested to those who wander among the time-worn sepulchres of the ages of faith. “Sunt enim ibi ut diximus,” saith he, “illustrium meritorum viri, quorum nomina, ignota incolis, scripta tamen ut credimus, retinentur in cœlis.”† It was not alone within churches that the monuments of the dead in the middle ages assumed that solemn form. There were holy fields in the neighborhood of cities and within the walls of monasteries, which were all thick spread with sepulchres, like that place mentioned in the history of Charlemagne,‡ and alluded to by Dante, “where Rhone stagnates on the plains of Arles.”§ Archbishop Ubaldo Lanfranci, who accompanied Richard Cœur-de-Lion to the holy land, on his return in the year 1200, brought back with him to Pisa a large quantity of earth from Mount Calvary, and deposited it on the spot round which the cloisters of that celebrated Campo Santo were erected. On the great plain south of Paris, there was a place of burial from the time of the Pagans. An ancient oratory stood there dedicated under the invocation of St. Michael, for in former times there was always a St. Michael’s chapel within or near great burying grounds.|| An image of the holy Archangel, weighing the souls in his balance, remained till the revolution, on the highest point over this plain, which was the pinnacle of Nôtre Dame-des-Champs.¶ The turret of the Holy Innocents at Paris, like that which Dom Mabillon remarked at Bonneval in the diocese of Chartres, and that in the cemetery of Sarlat, were probably to contain lights to guide persons who came to the church at matins. Peter the Venerable speaks of a tower built in the midst of the cemetery of the abbey of

* Chronic, Senoniensis, Lib. II. cap. 21. Spicileg. Tom. III.

† De gloria Confessorum, cap. 42.

‡ Turpin, cap. 28. and 30.

§ Hell. IX. || Lebeuf, Hist. du Diocese de Paris, Tom. III. 230. ¶ Id. Tom. I. chap. 2.

Cherlieu, in the diocese of Macon, on the top of which a lamp used to be lighted every night, through respect for the holy place in which the faithful reposed ; and in the cemetery of Cluny, he mentions, that there was a stone pedestal in the centre on which there was a lamp which was always burning during the night, through reverence of the faithful who there rested.† The cemetery of the Carthusian monastery of Calci near Pisa, is a most impressive and yet smiling spot. It forms a lovely garden in the midst of the cloister ; a fountain of marble and bronze stands in the centre, and the Apennines clothed with olives rise on all sides in beautiful undulations above the white Arcades. On the right are buried the priests, in the centre are the lay-brethren, and on the left those who minister. Such is the plan adopted in all monasteries of that order, as may be seen at Florence, Pavia, Ferrara, and Bologna.

In conclusion, though it is painful to be obliged to introduce such recollections, we must remark that the ancient monuments of the Christian dead have in these latter ages been the object of both religious and political hatred, so that in England and France we have only some scanty vestiges remaining of the sepulchral magnificence of the ages of faith.

Weever was led to compile his great work on ancient funeral monuments from observing how barbarously the sepulchres and epitaphs of the illustrious dead in England had been broken down and effaced, the brazen inscriptions torn away for lucre sake, and their beauty destroyed through “the malignitie of wicked people, and,” as he says, “our English profane tenacitie. Nothing,” he adds, “will be shortly left to continue the memory of the deceased to posterity ; pilfery and the opinion some have, that tombs and their epitaphs taste somewhat of popery, having already most sacrilegiously stolen, erased, and taken away, almost all the inscriptions and epitaphs inlaid or engraven upon sepulchres, and most shamefully defaced the glorious rich tombs and goodly monuments of our most worthy ancestors,” and he expresses a wish that some order might be taken for the preservation of the few yet remaining, for to his own knowledge, by the observation he had made in many churches, “the monuments of the dead were daily thus abused.” He says, “that the foulest and most inhuman action of these times was the violation of funeral monuments. Marbles which covered the dead were dug up and put to other uses ; tombs hacked and hewn in pieces ; inscriptions or epitaphs, especially if they began with an ‘orate pro anima,’ or concluded with ‘eujus animæ propitiatur Deus,’ for greediness of the brass, or for that they were thought to be antichristian, pulled out from the sepulchres, and purloined, dead carcases for gain of their stone or leaden coffins, cast out of their graves, notwithstanding this request engraven upon them, ‘propter misericordiam Jesu requiescant in pace.’ These commissioned grave-rakers, these gold-finders who make such deep search into the bottom of ancient sepulchres, pursued their barbarous rage against the dead, though in the second and fourteenth years of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, their savage cruelty was discountenanced by a royal proclamation." He mentions, "that in Saint Leonard's church, Shoreditch, the ancient epitaphs were all taken away for covetousnesse of the brasse, by one Doctor Hanmer, vicar of this church, which he converted into coin, and presently after went over into Ireland. Even where tombs had not been purposely broken and destroyed, they were suffered to grow waste with devouring time, or to be hidden under the seats or pews then erected, as was the case," he says, "in our Lady's chapel at the abbey of St. Alban's, which was filled with the dead bodies of the nobilitié, slain in the great battle near that town, whose trophies were now in this barbarous manner defaced. Many monuments of the dead," he says, "in churches in and about this city of London, as also in some places of the country, are covered with seats or pews, made high and easie for the parishioners to sit or sleepe in ; a fashion," he adds, and his testimony is remarkable, "of no long continuance, and worthy of reformation."* With respect to the sacrilegious devastation of tombs in consequence of political fury, it is to France and the countries which unhappily fell under its impious domination, that we should rather look, though the religious reformers had been at work there also, for Francis Baldwin, a French lawyer, in the time of Calvin speaks of men then making war even upon the dead, the statues, sepulchres, the very bones and bodies of martyrs and princes, escaping not their barbarous hands.† Every one has heard how the French, in the first stage of their revolution, made war upon the dead and violated their quiet tombs, not being able to endure that mute history which, as Savedra says, "they afforded of the duties and the end of man ;" but many are ignorant of the stupid and barbarous, and if possible, still more infatuated measure which they adopted every where, when they were phrenzied "to that worst pitch of all which wears a reasoning show," of transporting sepulchres from their original site, to form a museum of art in their capital, or within some central spot within the cities of which they had taken possession.

* Id. Tom. I. chap. 2.

† De Miraculis, Lib. II. 27.

A greater proof of insensibility, of an utter want of all the feelings of taste and genius, to say nothing of religion, could scarcely be found in the history of nations. For what interest could be inspired by these tombs when deposited along with books and machinery in modern galleries of art, and removed from all the associations which had made them venerable? The sepulchre in which Abailard and Heloisa were buried, was indeed an object of interest when it was seen in the monastery of Paraclet, near Nogent-sur-Seine in Champagne, where Peter the Venerable had himself erected it ; but what was it when placed in a museum in the street of the Augustins at Paris?

The tombs of the knights slain at the battle of Poitiers, such as those of the Duke of Athens, of John de Bourbon, of the two brothers, Chambely de Chatillon, and of other nobles who died for their country on that memorable day, could

* Funeral Mem. p. 701.

† Respons. ult. ad Jo. Calvin.

awaken a thousand recollections, and kindle an heroic flame, from the very circumstance of their being seen in the Franciscan convent in that city: but when removed to a distant capital, what were they but so many old stones, mere specimens of ancient sculpture? Poets might well direct their steps to the great Benedictine Abbey at Ferrara, in order to visit the sepulchre of Ariosto; but who could feel any interest in regarding it when it had been removed by those insane Frenchmen to the public library, in order, as they said, that it might be seen along with the finest editions of his poems! Yet this is done by the nation which has taken upon itself to designate the middle ages as a blank in history, an epoch when men were deprived of all intelligence and genius! It is, however, like striking the slain, to expose the weakness of these poor sophists; let us leave them to babble, and only remark within ourselves how wise were the ages of faith in respect even of all material arrangements, and how much more favorable they were, not only to poets, but to the common feelings of the human heart. It was then that a natural order was followed, combining variety of measures in accordance with the variety of circumstances in nature. A poet, a learned philosopher, or a renowned hero, was buried in the church of his parish, in the monastery where he had died, or in his ancestral tomb.

In the eighth century, we find that the desire of being buried in one's paternal sepulchre led to the decrees of synods;* although St. Augustin had shown, that the divine menace to a prophet, that he should not be buried in the sepulchre of his fathers,† was merely intended to excite a human affection, and was no further a punishment than in afflicting the living.‡ In like manner the works of a painter were deposited in the church for which he had designed them, to which, perhaps, like Rubens, he had presented them, as a perpetual memorial of his having within their walls received baptism, the portal to his faith. Thus every monument was seen in the place for which the master-mind of its author had designed it, and in connection with the circumstances which often constituted its chief interest. In this men followed wise and cunning Nature, who scatters her various productions over the whole world, and is never found to collect them all in one place, without regard to climate or locality, or to the harmonious accordance of surrounding tones and objects. Such was the system of the middle ages, when an idea was the origin and determining principle of every material monument, imparting to it life and reason. But for this the wisdom of the moderns has substituted a mere fictitious and nominal system, according to which, monuments are erected, and institutions founded at random, or from mere material motives, while, as it were, the soul is left to follow or not, as accident may determine. In order to have uniformity, and classification, and centralization in inanimate things, which, by their very nature, should be various and dispersed, these sophists, who introduce anarchy and division into spiritual things, hasten to disinter the dead, and to collect their moulder-

* Dacherius Spicileg. Tom. IX.

† 3 Reg. 13. 21.

‡ De Cura pro Mortuis.

ing ashes into common cemeteries, in the same manner as they could collect all the paintings and statues of every city in one gallery in Paris; thus presenting us, in one spot, with death in mass, and depriving all other places of the sanctity with which, when seen in detail, it had formerly invested them.

No more tender connection can be traced between the study and the tomb, between genius and the country which it had adorned, between virtue and the home and friends to which it was endeared! but all is confounded and amassed together in one overwhelming crowd, to which an unnatural, unmeaning, and even burdensome uniformity, is imparted. True, these vast cemeteries, within the ancient enclosures of suppressed monasteries, may have an imposing aspect, from the beauty of the ancient site; and at all events, they supply an object to the idle traveller, who, without it, might be at a loss which way to direct his steps; but assuredly one may regret the time when these sepulchres were found standing apart over the very graves which had originally received their tenants, when the knight lay by the side of the palmer, and the monarch by the counsellor whom he had loved; when one could trace signs of tender connection even among the dead, and when graves and tombs entered into the system of an harmonious variety. Such discipline, one may remark, was more favorable to the associations of the learned, to the illustration of history, to the interests of friendship, to the desire of mourners, and to one of the deepest, and perhaps most amiable feelings, of our nature.

CHAPTER X.

BRIEF shall be the last act of what may be termed this fourth school, in our well-intended but imperfectly accomplished course. We have endeavored to show, from ancient writings, what was the character of mourners during the ages which were most illuminated with the light of faith: and I am much deceived if enough has not been advanced to prove that they were abundantly blessed; that if they were not able to define evil with as much minuteness as the ancient philosophers, they were able to escape from it better. That their mourning was sanctified and angelic; that it was blessed in their calamities, in their profound studies of wisdom, in their loves, in their spiritual exercises, in their penance, in their sickness, and in their death. They wept, it is true, before the Lord who made them. As the great Cardinal Bellarmin prescribes, they wept for sorrow, because they had provoked to anger the best of Parents, they wept for joy, because the Lord who made them was mild and of great mercy : they wept for sorrow, because their benignant Creator, to whom the Church offers up prayers with weeping, loveth justice : they wept for joy, because He desireth not the death of sinners, but that they may be converted and that they may live.”* They mourned after the example of the prophets, of the apostles, and of the universal Church. They mourned with a Bernard and a Vincent, from a consideration of sin and its penalty. They mourned with a Francis and a Bonaventura, from a remembrance of the passion of Christ. They mourned with an Anthony and a Hermit Nicolas, from an anticipation or a retrospect of the persecutions of the Church by heretics—for the latter foresaw the Lutheran, as the former had wept from foreseeing the Arian heresy. They mourned with an Augustin and a Chrysostom, from a consideration of the miseries of the human race. They mourned with a Thomas Aquinas and an Anselm, from the depth and penetration of a mind, to which were made known the hidden and unsearchable things of the wisdom of God. Finally, with a Bellarmin, they mourned, from a sense of the necessity of tears ; for the sighs of the dove, the tears of the just—tears of sorrow and tears of love—are an earnest of the remission of sins, an imitation of the virtue of Christ, the nurse of compassion, of reformation, of manners, and of charity. They indicate a contempt for the world and a love for God. They are fruitful in works of penitence and mercy during life, and a consolation which surpasseth thought at the hour of death.

All this I have attempted to illustrate from the history of the ages of faith : but still, something more remains in reference to the conclusion of that benign and gracious sentence from the Mount, which proceeds to affirm that these mourners, seen to have been already blest from the operation of a general law, were, in addition, by an especial and supernatural grace to be comforted. “Beati qui lugent quia consolabuntur.” They that sowed in tears were to reap in joy : going they had wept, casting abroad their seeds ; but coming, they were to return with exultation, carrying their sheaves with them. In this life they had sorrow, because, as St. Augustin interprets the passage, they had lost, by their conversion to God, parents, brethren, and friends, and felt that persecution, which all holy members of the Catholic Church will have to suffer in every age,† or they had sorrow, because, according to the commentary of St. Jerome, St. Chrysostom, and St. Ambrose, they mourned for their own sins and for the sins of others. They thus had sorrow ; a sorrow, indeed, most sweet : for, as St. Augustin says, “Dulciores sunt lacrymæ orantium, quam gaudia Theatrorum.”‡ And though men of this world, who know not the sighs of the dove, can scarcely be persuaded of this, nevertheless, as Bellarmin says, it is most true.§

Still, in comparison of what awaiteth those that are to be of angels signed, they had sorrow ; but their Lord was again to see them, and their hearts were to re-

* Bellarmin de Gemitu Columbæ. Lib. I. c. 1.

† Tract. in Psalm cxxvii.

‡ Lib. de Serm. Dom. in Monte.

§ De Gemitu Columb. I. 3.

joice, and their joy no one was to take from them. They were to be comforted. But who shall attempt to describe that comforting? Blessed be they that weep; and God himself shall wipe the tears from their eyes. "Those must needs be comfortable tears," adds Father Diego de Stella, "which the blessed hand of our Master doth wipe away!" Even in this brief and wretched life what comforting was theirs! St. Augustin remarks, "That it would be tedious to enumerate the instances of divine being called by the same names as human things, although they are separated from each other by an incomparable diversity."* Man, when a citizen of the earthly republic, uses God's words, and imparts to them his own infelicity. Thus, in the language which conveys heavenly truth to his understanding, to mourn is to be brought as near to God, the source of all happiness, as the present condition of human life admits. In the language of the impious city, to mourn, is to be wretched, to have every principle of joy, annihilated within us,—that is, to be separated from him as far as possible. In the sense of faith, in the view of the city of God, mourning carries with it its own consolation; it is, in fact, only one component ray in the lustrous beam of that light which imparteth unclouded felicity. To mourning belongs charity, and the peace of God, along with which nothing harsh or bitter can ever enter, but only sweetness, and such happy things as have affinity with the glorious end for which souls were first created. Religion, in her severest discipline, seeks to render no one sad. She imposes misery on no one; but, as St. Bernard says, "Charitas vult te tuum sentire dolorem, ut jam non habeas unde dolere: vult te tuam scire miseriam, ut incipias miser non esse."† The mourning which she inculcates stands opposed, therefore, not to joy and pleasure, as Johnson and other modern writers would insinuate, but to the sadness of the world and of death, to that unjust delight which, as the poet of old could discern, was necessarily followed by a bitter end—

——— τὸ δὲ πᾶρ δίκαιον
γλυκὺ πικροτάτα μενει τελευτά.‡

But, perhaps some one will be inclined to suggest a doubt here; and will refer, in justification of his incredulity, to what has occurred during many ages in lands where heresy has been allowed to conquer, and to impart, in show, at least, all the treasures of the earth to such as fell down to worship it. Methinks I see his mind, by thought on thought arising, sore perplexed, and with vehement desire, seeking solution of the maze! True, there are cases, and history, both ancient and modern, furnishes numerous examples of it, when every one, at the bottom of his soul, is forced to admit, that the cause of the conqueror has pleased the Providence which rules the world, that of the conquered, good men. This history, undoubtedly involves one of them; but if these persons diligently attend, they will understand that while full consolation was imparted to just mourners, even in

* De Diversis Quæst. ad Simplician. Lib. I.

† Epist. 2.

‡ Pindar, Isth. Od. VII.

the present life, to the unjust who seemed to have no need of consolation, the punishment of men was wanting, not that of God. Men defended a tyrant, and pursued and consummated what he had begun in a most detestable action; men praised a most base and pernicious sophistry; men pronounced a sentence of acquittal; men felt not in themselves the injury of their crime; men gave to these destroyers palaces and domains. I admit that all benefits from men were theirs, and greater could not be demanded; but from God,—Almighty God!—what greater punishment could fall upon them than that fury and madness? “Unless,” as Cicero says, “perchance in tragedies, you think that those whom you behold, covered with wounds, and consumed with grief of body, are objects of greater wrath than those who are introduced raving and insane; but (as the Roman orator continues) the complaints and groans of Philoctetes are not so miserable as that exultation of Athamas, and those horrid dreams of matricide.” These sophists, in rejecting the sweet and salutary yoke of authority; when they overthrew the houses of the religious; when they drove the best men, by sanguinary laws, from the administration of the state; when they established the principle of private judgment, that is, universal disorder; when they overthrew holy churches, to build out of them palaces, for themselves; when they profaned and abolished sacred rites; when they did not perceive that they were impious and insane; then did they suffer those punishments which alone, in many instances, in this present state of existence, are constituted, by the God of heaven, for the wickedness of men: for, indeed, the infirmity of our body is subject of itself to many sufferings, it is destroyed often by the slightest cause: the peace and joy of the soul can triumph over its pains; but the darts of God are plunged into the minds of the impious. Without doubt, some nations, in their collective capacity, have exhibited all the effects which might be expected a priori to follow from a judicial sentence registered against them in heaven; and that, too, while the citizens of the earthly republic were loud in their praises, admiring and esteeming them eminently glorious. True, indeed, great caution is necessary in coming even to any private conclusions with respect to the judgment of God, to which so many wise and holy men, like Cardinal Allen and his contemporary Bishop Watson, have wished that the punishments of states were wholly left; nor need any one be told that, according to ecclesiastical science, a general retention of sins can affect the title of no man formally; but leaving distinctions to divines, and, waving the theological argument altogether, there are historical facts crowding upon the memory, which may well incline thoughtful men to suspect secretly, that a great deal more may frequently be true than what the school requires them to believe, or even than what the caution of the school would permit them to announce. Wars, famine and pestilence, are not the only scourges of God; there are moral invasions, which proclaim, with even greater certainty, the visitation of his anger: pride, avarice, and a mind wholly given up to the worship of matter, constant external prosperity, leading to hardness of heart, and misery of the poor: the being puffed up, like the Corinthians, having no more sorrow, no mourning of the dove, but in its place the gloom and sullen groans of Babylon; the want of spiritual resources, the want or the corruption of the word of God, and the confusion of Babel succeeding to unity of religion; the rich being engulfed in stupid sensuality, and involved in an ignorance which appears to some invincible; the co-operation of all things to obscure the light of Christ, and to make men aliens in spirit from his church;—these, and other effects following, from the removal of the candlestick, are still more evidently the inflictions of Divine justice; so that, whoever has beheld a nation, with manners thus opposite to the supernatural discipline of the city of God,—a nation, thus, to use prophetic language, adoring the beast and its image, receiving its inscription on the forehead and on the hand, may certainly be warranted in concluding, that he has seen a chastised people, not indeed without numerous particular exemptions, for the general schemes of Divine beneficence are never, in any place, wholly interrupted: but yet, in its collective character, and as far as suits the purpose of furnishing a perpetual lesson to mankind, a people already punished, already under the fearful scourge of Almighty Providence, whether the cause be to human ken fathomable or not. But in the judgment of those who observe history with the eyes of faith, this is the order of grace, and as clearly to be understood as that of nature. Peter and Paul, they say, live yet to mark our doings. Many a time ere now the sons have, for the sire's transgressions, wailed: and that living justice, upon the primal seat, vested with mysterious power, when it denounces pride no longer tolerable, binds it not in vain.

The very heathen philosopher could discern what, in the secrets of Divine judgment, would be most terrible for man. "It was," says Maximus of Tyre, "from transgressing the eternal law that Alcibiades was unfortunate; not when he was summoned from Sicily by the Athenians, nor when he fled beyond Attica; these were small calamities, for Alcibiades in exile was greater than those who remained at home; he was honored by the Lacedæmonians; he fortified Deceleia; he became the friend of Tissaphernes, and the general of Sparta; but the punishment of Alcibiades began long before; it was ordained by an older law, and by older judges. When he left the Lyceum, was condemned by Socrates, and proscribed by philosophy:—then it was that Alcibiades was banished and undone." And now, what remains but to express a fervent hope, that some of the many mourners of earth may be induced, by reflections such as these, drawn from the testimonies of past ages, to approach nearer than they have ever hitherto done to contemplate their history. For there is but one way to escape evil, which is by flying to the same citadel in which the ancient Christians stood, and thence taking up the same arms as were used by them; but, from it, alas! how great a distance are the men of our age! "O quam longe recessimus ab apostolica disciplina," cried Bellarmin, "et quam rara nunc est, quæ olim frequentissima erat, gratia lacrymarum."*

* De Gemitu Columbæ, Lib. I. 9.

Men of sorrows, who mourn with an unavailing, an unblest grief, you may have heard how the Sage of Greece exhorted his anxious disciples to search, not only into the wisdom of their own country, but also into that of the barbarous nations, whose opinions and customs they should, he said, thoroughly investigate in search of some epode, to deliver them from the fear of death, sparing neither riches nor labor, as there is nothing for which they could more wisely expend both.* In some respects, you stand in the same position as these disciples; in the midst of supposed superior civilization, and in spite of your profession, still conscious of being unpossessed of a practical remedy against that dread of death from which it is clear not all the advance of science, nor all the refinements of your philosophic and liberal views of religion can deliver you at your last hours. Be not then ashamed to imitate the humility prescribed to them, and take that salutary hint from old philosophy, and apply it to the present circumstances, and to your own condition. You call the ages of faith dark ages in the world's history; and you suppose that the generation of men which succeeded, from the fall of the Roman empire till the sixteenth century, were a race of barbarians, at least in comparison with those which belong to the ancient and modern civilization. Well, be it so. Let us, for a moment grant all that you demand; let us call them dark and barbarous ages. Literature, you say, will have it so; but remember that philosophy may take very little heed of the judgment of literature. At all events, it is never scared by a reproachful epithet; and you must admit, with Plato, that it matters not the least, whether you have recourse to Greeks or barbarians, provided you can but discover somewhere that epode, that efficacious remedy, to enable you to render blest your sorrows, your sickness, and your death.

At present, in the midst of all those modern lights, of all this boasted civilization, so contrary to the simplicity which characterizes the city of God, you mourn; you fear sickness; and, above all, you shrink in terror from the thought of death; at least, you cannot pretend that men in these days die with as much tranquillity, and with as bright and steadfast a hope as the men whose dissolution we have been witnessing in the ages which you designate as those of monastic darkness. You mourn, and your mourning is avowedly without hope, without a blessing. Indeed, your own guides affirm that, for sorrow, there is no remedy provided by nature; it is often occasioned, by accidents irreparable, and dwells upon objects that have lost or changed their existence: it requires what it cannot hope, that the laws of the universe should be repealed; that the dead should return, or the past should be recalled. There is nothing, in the modern civilization which can make it otherwise. Well, then, will it not be reasonable to try what may be found among the barbarians? "O, wearied spirits! Come, come and hold discourse with us, and be by none else restrained." "You have no comfort in your calamity," as the poet testifies, "but that of tears, and the cries of lamentation, and the muse which has sorrow. This is all the sweetness which that muse can promise to you." * "O, it is not just to call you," as the poets styled men of old, "unwise and vain, who have invented hymns for days of festal joy, for banqueting and triumph, the delightful sounds to sweeten prosperous life, but who have never discovered, by the muse and harmonious ode, how to soothe the bitter sorrows of mortals, when deaths and dreadful evils come to visit houses; then there would have been some advantage from song to wretched men; but in times of joyful feasting, what need of sounds to increase a pleasure which is already at its full—

* Plato Phædo, 78.

στρυγίους δὲ βροτῶν οὐδεὶς λύπας εὔρετο μούσῃ καὶ πολυχόροισι φῶδαις παύειν ἐξ ὧν θάνατοι, δειναὶ τε τύχαι πφάλλουσι δόμους.†

Ah! if you would but condescend to visit the humble and meek race, and investigate their ways, lifting up your eyes, like men in those antique days, to the mountains whence help might come to you,‡ you would, like them, find consolation according to the multitude of the sorrows which oppress your heart. Secundum multitudinem dolorum meorum in corde meo, consolationes tuæ lætificaverunt animam meam.§ Then you would say, like them, "Gladden the soul of thy servant, my Saviour and Creator; gladden it, because I have raised it to thee. It was on the earth, and on the earth it was full of bitterness; lest it should become corrupted through bitterness, lest it should lose all the sweetness of thy grace, I have raised it to thee, who alone art joy. The world is full of bitterness. Rightly are men admonished that they should raise their hearts to thee. Let them hear and obey. Let them raise to heaven what is wretched upon earth."|| St. Augustin has attempted to enumerate the principal sources of pain and sorrow to men, and mournful indeed is the view which he reveals of this life.¶ Yet, then, with this confirmed, even by your own experience, "You would feel," as St. Chrysostom says, "that it was a greater gift to suffer than to raise the dead; for, by the gift of miracles God would render thee a debtor to himself; whereas, when he sendeth thee sufferings, he maketh himself debtor to thee; he has pledged himself that you shall be comforted." Then, however afflicted, your peace of mind would not be lost: "But," as St. Bernard says, "your desolation would be sweet. Desolatur suaviter." Joy would well from grief, as in that beauteous gulf of Spezzia, where one sees the sweet water rise up out of the salt and bitter sea. "It is only the beginning of misfortune," as the author of the Martyrs says, "which could for an instant alarm you." In the full height of adversity, you would find, in separating yourself from the earth, tranquil and serene regions; as when one ascends the bank of a furious torrent, one is horror struck at the entrance of the valley, and with the roar of the waves; but in proportion as one ascends the mountain, the falls di-

* Eurip. Troades, 608.

† Eurip. Medea. 193.

‡ Ps. cxx. 1.

§ Ps. xcii. 19.

|| Ludovic. Blosii Tractat. in Ps. lxxxv.

¶ De Civitate Dei, Lib. XXII. 22.

minish, the noise dies away, and the course of the traveller comes to an end in regions of silence near the sky, in sweet verdant spots, enamelled with a thousand new flowers, far from all that can wound or contaminate pure and innocent creatures. Yes, the ineffable goodness of God would be felt even when he punishes, for it would be the effect of his correction that you had discovered this source of surpassing joy. The hour when the solitary soul, widowed of its last hope, would expect nothing more from the earth, when friendship would fail, and weak man, who fears the contagion of misfortune, would leave you face to face with grief, when the future would have no longer any charms to make you wish for the morrow ; then, if you were one of those humble and blessed mourners, the voice of God would be heard in the silence of your heart, that language which can be mixed with no other, and which consoles and beatifies those who cannot be otherwise comforted.* At the sweet sounds of comfort you would turn from earth, and in saintly contemplation behold a love which must be left in silence here ; "Nor through distrust," as Dante saith, "of words only, but that to such bliss the mind remounts not without aid."† Then, too, God would give such grace that, without boasting, you might use whatever language had been framed by sages to express how little they feared calamity : happy were your death, your ending blest, your torments easy, full of sweet delight. After having been in the dungeon in the midst of sufferings, like another chosen vessel, you would participate in his raptures into the third heaven ; after having sunk under the weight of chains with Peter, you would be delivered and comforted by an angel. Do you not hear what the holy Church sings ? Francis, Francis the mourner, the despised, the persecuted ; Francis, poor and humble, enters rich into heaven, and is honored with celestial hymns. Well, then, thither too, would you follow to receive the last abundant consolation, for

"There are the treasures tasted, that with tears
Were in the Babylonian exile won."‡

Oh, that Highest God would deal thus with these poor mortals for whom Christ wept, and bled, and died, with these deceived but still generous creatures, once made in God's own image, in the freshness of their being so gifted virtually, that all better habits would wondrously have thrived, and possessed of faculties to be again his glorious champions, defenders of his holy city, the joy of mystic Sion. O that he would behold them in their state calamitous, betrayed by apostates, dispossessed of strength, and turn their labors, for he ever can, to peaceful end. Then, in the blest kingdoms, meek of joy and love, all the saints in solemn troops would entertain them. Angels, ever bright and fair, would sing ; and, singing in great glory, comfort them, and wipe the tears for ever from their eyes.

* La Martine, Harmonies Poétiques et Religieuses.

† Parad. XVIII.

‡ Dante, Parad. XXIII.

439068

